Mr. Chapman: I am grateful for that encouraging reply. Will my hon. Friend assure the House that he will seek amending legislation well before the end of 1988? Since the directive explicitly gives uniform minimum protection to third parties in motor accidents, but implicitly encourages more than the minimum protection, will my hon. Friend look sympathetically at the need for our legislation to be much tighter than that laid down in the directive?

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend has taken a close interest in this matter over a long time. He is right in implying that the legislation will not have to come into effect until 1988, according to the directive. Our intention is to bring the necessary secondary legislation before Parliament during the present Session.

My hon. Friend asked about the possibility of raising our conditions above the minimum. We are consulting about that at the moment, and we shall take into account what my hon. Friend said.

Lowlands Airport Policy (Report)

9. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has now considered the report of the Scottish Affairs Committee on lowlands airport policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have read the Committee's report with interest. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to make a statement about Scottish lowland airports policy shortly.

Mr. Foulkes: But the Minister said that months ago in exactly the same words. Will he confirm that, since the bulk of the evidence to and the report of the Select Committee and the report of his own working party favour retaining Prestwick as Scotland's transatlantic gateway, the only reason for delay is an internal battle between the political dogma of his Secretary of State and the interests of Scotland as represented by the Select Committee, Scottish Members of Parliament and the Secretary of State for Scotland? When shall we know whether sense triumphs over political dogma?

Mr. Spicer: I understand the anxieties expressed by the hon. Gentleman and many of his colleagues. The hon. Gentleman has made it out to be a simple matter, but it is very complicated and perhaps more complicated than we anticipated originally. All I can say is that we hope to make our decisions known in the next few weeks.

Coal Industry Dispute

11. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest estimate of the cost of the coal dispute to British Rail; and how the money is to be recovered.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail estimates lost freight receipts at £240 million. It is for British Rail to devise ways of recovering these losses and to achieve the financial target for the freight business.

Mr. Marlow: If such losses were made by a private sector company, obviously they would not be made up by the taxpayer. Will my hon. Friend give a categorical assurance that the money lost by British Rail will not be forced as a burden on the taxpayer in any way?

Mr. Mitchell: British Rail has not approached us for any financial recompense, and it is not expected to do so. But the losses may mean that it has to increase its borrowing. If it comes to us with that request, we shall consider it carefully.

Mr. Maclean: Will my hon. Friend make it clear to the chairman of British Rail that part of that money could be recovered from the British Rail unions which took illegal secondary action during the coal strike? Will my hon. Friend also make it very plain to the chairman of British Rail that if he wants extra borrowing powers and Members of Parliament to vote for them, we expect some genuine productivity gains to be made on the British Rail network?

Mr. Mitchell: It is regrettable that some £60 million of the losses during the coal strike were caused by railway men themselves. Action of this kind can do nothing but damage their own industry, the jobs which depend upon it and the future of freight carrying by rail.

Mr. Gregory: As many economists consider that the figure of £60 million is a considerable underestimate, why did my hon. Friend the Minister not advise the chairman of British Rail—as he did the south Wales road hauliers — that he could take legal action against secondary picketing? My hon. Friend would not then have to announce such a staggering sum to the House after the coal industry dispute, which will presumably have to be picked up by the taxpayer.

Mr. Mitchell: I must reassure my hon. Friend that the taxpayer will not pick up the bill. That is a problem for British Rail. British Rail is running a commercial freight business, and the consequences will be felt by those who work in it. They damage themselves, and there is nothing that the taxpayer can or should do to bail them out of the results of their own actions. The question of taking legal action during the strike was entirely a matter for the management of BR to decide. It must make its own judgment as to what is best for its business.

Mr. Rogers: Does the Minister accept that the alarming cost of the coal dispute, which is now becoming evident to everyone, is due to the Government's short-sightedness in not resolving the issue when they had an opportunity to do so?

Mr. Mitchell: The sum lost by BR was £240 million in revenue, of which £60 million was lost as a result of railwaymen's actions and not as a result of anything that was outside their ability to control and influence.

Buses

12. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish a response to the report by the Transport Committee on the financing of public transport services, the buses White Paper.

Mr. Ridley: The Select Committee report acknowledged the serious state of the bus industry and suggested as an alternative policy competitive tendering for all services. This is a much more restrictive system even than the present one; and will not secure the gains in productivity, and—more important—the concentration on the needs of the passenger, which deregulation will provide. We shall reply to the report as soon as possible.

Mr. Waller: My right hon. Friend has already referred to the Select Committee's main recommendation, but, as it has gained some support since the report's publication, why is he opposed to it?

Mr. Ridley: The system of competitive tendering for franchises on all routes would mean that once a franchise had been let, an unbreakable monopoly would exist on that route for the period of the contract. Consequently, passengers could be exploited, and the productivity gains and improvements in efficiency which we should be able to obtain could not be achieved. I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that if a major operator lost a franchise, it would be extremely difficult and wasteful if hundreds of buses and drivers were suddenly without occupation. The consequences for redundancy of a franchising system on that scale must be borne in mind.

Mr. Madden: Is not the main thrust of the Select Committee's report highly critical of the Government's policy and of the main provisions of the Transport Bill? In view of that, why on earth are the Government and the Secretary of State pursuing such crazy policies?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman may not know that the Select Committee was split four-four on whether to approve the report. However, I do not think that the Select Committee will find that the system of franchising that it advocates is by any means popular with large sections of the bus industry.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Bearing in mind what my right hon. Friend has said, will he give an assurance about the position in rural areas, given the substantial increase in the price of fuel that has occurred in the past few months and the increase that may sadly result from tomorrow's announcement in the House? Is he aware that where bus services do not now exist the abolition of the current regulation will not result in any more public transport? In addition, people may not be able to afford to run their cars. Will he consider the problems that will face rural areas as a result of that policy, and perhaps give some assurances to the House?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend will know that buses receive a fuel duty rebate. In addition, it is proposed to give a rural bus grant of £20 million in the first year, which will be added to that rebate to make the costs of running buses in rural areas that much lower. That represents an improvement for rural services. When he adds to that the powers of county councils to call for tenders to subsidise uneconomic routes in such areas, he will see that our proposals are likely to lead to an improvement in the quality and quantity of rural bus services.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Has the Secretary of State's attention been drawn to the article in The Observer on 10 March which shows that the Hereford experiment has been a complete failure? Since that experiment was the launching pad for the Secretary of State's proposals, what other evidence does he need to show that his policy is based upon a misconception?

Mr. Ridley: One of the astonishing omissions of the article was that it neglected to ask any of the passengers. When passengers in the Hereford area are asked what they think about the experiment, they will be seen to be opposed to any change in the system there. Those who seek to knock the experiment in Hereford and Worcester have ulterior motives based upon vested interests. What we can learn from that experiment is useful in designing a bus policy, but it is by no means the only basis upon which that policy is founded.

Mr. Foster: If the Secretary of State's proposals are so self-evidently supported, why are the Association of County Councils, the Association of District Councils and the National Association of Local Councils so much against them? Why is it that at a meeting in Teesdale on Friday night not one member of the right hon. Gentleman's party could be found to support them?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman is misinformed. The Association of County Councils supported the principle of the Bill, although it had some qualifications about some of the details. The Association of District Councils and many of the municipal and metropolitan counties are interested parties because they run bus companies themselves. That is why they are opposed to the policy.

Mr. Chope: Will my right hon. Friend arrange for the widest possible distribution of his Department's excellent paper setting out the problems associated with franchising?

Mr. Ridley: I recommend that paper to all hon. Members. If they believe that a system of competitive franchising might work, they should study the report to which my hon. Friend refers. They will find that there is severe objection to the course set out by the Select Committee.

Mr. Stott: Is the Secretary of State aware that he should not try to mislead the House about the Select Committee's report? Is he not aware that out of 44 Divisions the Chairman had to use his casting vote in only four and that when the report was presented to the House no vote was taken on it? Is the Secretary of State aware that the Committee found that there was no evidence that regulation had been an inhibiting factor to progress in the bus industry? However, the Secretary of State took no notice of that. May I ask the Secretary of State not to pre-empt the debate in Committee on competitive tendering? Will he keep an open mind so that we can fashion a better Bill in Committee?

Mr. Ridley: The vote of which the hon. Gentleman must take account is that on Second Reading. The Bill was given a Second Reading by a substantial majority in the House. All hon. Members had the right to participate in that vote. Only eight members of the Select Committee voted on the issue. The vote that matters is that in the House of Commons.

British Airways

13. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he can now give a date for the privatisation of British Airways.

Mr. Michael Spicer: It remains our firm intention to proceed with privatisation as soon as practicable within the next financial year. No date has yet been set.

Mr. van Straubenzee: I understand the legal problems facing my hon. Friend with litigation, and I understand also the financial prudence involved in placing the shares. Does he appreciate that he has very warm support from behind him on the Government Benches and from a wide range of the electorate for the next further extension of wider share ownership?

Mr. Spicer: I thank my hon. Friend for those remarks. As he rightly says, there has been some slippage due to the uncertainties arising from current anti-trust cases related to the Laker failure. I assure him that as soon as those are out of the way we intend to proceed with privatisation as quickly as possible.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Government allow a privatised British Airways the right to operate twin-jet aircraft on long-haul routes across the Atlantic?

Mr. Spicer: We shall have to consider that in the light of various arrangements which the Civil Aviation Authority is currently considering.

Gatwick Airport (Noise)

14. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on aircraft noise at Gatwick airport.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The noise climate around Gatwick has improved significantly over the last 10 years. Air transport movements have increased by 91 per cent. over this period, but the area in which people generally experience annoyance has decreased by 29 per cent.

Mr. Soames: Does my hon. Friend accept that although aircraft noise has considerably decreased, it is still very disturbing for those who live around international airports? Will he assure the House that he will release the report on aircraft noise as soon as conveniently possible?

Mr. Spicer: My Department has recently received the report and will be making it public by the end of the month. It will be sent to my hon. Friend as soon as it is available. The ill health of the CAA technical adviser has, I am afraid, caused a month's delay.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

"MI5's Official Secrets"

35. Mr. Winnick asked the Attorney-General if any decision has been reached on whether any prosecutions are to take place arising from the film, "MI5's Official Secrets".

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): I announced on 5 March that there would be no prosecutions under the Official Secrets Acts in connection with this film.

Mr. Winnick: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the makers of the film and the two former employees of MI5 will view that as an undoubtedly wise decision? Is he further aware that the serious allegations in the film about the malpractices and abuses carried out by the security service should be a matter of concern to his Department as well as to the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary?

Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not feel that if there is to be confidence in the security service it is essential that it should be able to carry out its duties without the political prejudice under which it clearly now operates?

The Attorney-General: I am very much aware of the allegations contained in the film. I obtained a copy, watched it, and asked the Director of Public Prosecutions to request the Metropolitan police to carry out an investigation. That is now under way and the Metropolitan police will report to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who, in turn, will report to me.

Sir Edward Gardner: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that during the debate on the Interception of Communications Bill last week a former Home Secretary gave it as his opinion and his knowledge that one of the allegations contained in the film was absolute rubbish?

The Attorney-General: I am aware of that. It is fair to say that many of the other allegations were vague and unspecific. However, I am sure the House will agree that the allegations should be investigated, and that is taking place.

Mr. John Morris: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that Lord Rawlinson, a former Attorney-General, expressed concern in another place on 28 February about The Times report that Ministers were saying that there was to be no prosecution in this case? Will he explain what ministerial consultations have taken place? Will he dissuade his colleagues, including the press officer at No. 10, from giving guidance in matters that are solely his responsibility?

Since the Attorney-General has, in another instance, taken the initiative, will he consider doing the same about the sort of prosecutions that he will authorise under the Official Secrets Act, which might help to kill any parallel being drawn with the 19th century courts of equity, where it was said that the jurisdiction in equity varied with the length of the Lord Chancellor's foot?

The Attorney-General: That criticism may have been apt then, but I do not think that it applies now.

I consulted my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Lord President—as a former Home Secretary with great experience—and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I consulted them on one issue only — the security implications of adducing evidence about interception and, in general, the implications of doing anything that might amount to confirmation or denial that particular interceptions had been made. I did not ask for their views on any other aspect of the case and they did not proffer any such views. I consulted no other Minister.

As the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) will be the first to appreciate, if there were any prosecution, even in respect of just one interception, that would implicitly amount to confirmation of it.

Coal Industry Dispute

36. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Attorney-General how many cases have been heard by the courts and how many are outstanding in connection with the recent coal mining dispute to the latest available date.

37. Mr. Adley asked the Attorney-General if he will update the information given to the hon. Member for Christchurch on 25 February, Official Report, column 13, concerning cases outstanding in the courts about offences alleged to have been committed in relation to the miners' strike.

The Attorney-General: During the period from 13 March 1984 to 5 March 1985, 7,917 persons were charged with a total of 10,372 offences alleged to have been committed during the course of the miners' dispute. Of these, 5,653 defendants had been dealt with by the end of that period and the cases of 2,262 remained to be heard.

Mr. Bruinvels: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give an assurance that, although the miners' dispute is now over, the 2,262 cases waiting to be heard will be severely dealt with, that any amnesty for those people will not be considered until they have been convicted or acquitted and that the sentences will be properly and publicly detailed throughout the country?

The Attorney-General: I should make it clear at the outset that I have no responsibility of any kind for the sentences imposed by the courts, and at no time would I seek to influence or interfere with the decisions of the justices. On the question of amnesty, whether to proceed with a case must be a matter entirely for the chief constable of the area concerned, and again I would not seek in any way to influence the decision.

Mr. Hardy: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that in some coalfields men have been dismissed simply because they face a charge, not because they have been convicted? Does he agree that that is scarcely a helpful contribution from the NCB to the reconciliation that is needed in the industry?

The Attorney-General: That cannot be my responsibility. It must be a matter for the National Coal Board.

Mr. Adley: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, with respect to him, not all of us share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on this? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree, however, that with all the demands for amnesty it would be most helpful if the NUM and leading members of the Labour party took a lead in ensuring that those making vicious and violent attacks on people who merely exercised their right to go to work in the absence of a ballot do not continue to hound those workers in a manner that gives affront to many millions of people?

The Attorney-General: I agree with my hon. Friend. I should have thought that the worst way of trying to persuade those considering whether to grant an amnesty would be to behave in the way that my hon. Friend has described.

Mr. Ryman: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman assist by providing the facts to the NUM and the NCB when individual applications for reinstatement are being considered? Is he aware that at present a conviction ipso facto constitutes dismissal in the eyes of the NCB and that when cases are reviewed under the appeal procedure the NUM and the NCB put forward different versions of the facts? Does he agree that it would be helpful if a short précis of the facts of the case were available, either through the Attorney-General or through the Home Secretary, when the appeals take place?

The Attorney-General: Yes, I shall certainly arrange for that to be considered, but I would hope that the magistrates' clerk would have kept a sufficient note, which would be available to the appeal tribunal.

Mr. Madel: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that industrial tribunals are set up to deal with dismissal cases, and that the impartiality of those tribunals is guaranteed by existing employment law?

The Attorney-General: That is right, but I think that what the hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Ryman) was suggesting was that there may be occasions when there is a conflict of evidence, when the tribunal's task will be assisted if there is an impartial note from, say, the magistrates' clerk.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: As one fifth of those arrested have never been charged and two-thirds of the offences involve relatively trivial matters such as obstructing the highway, and as the acquittal rate in Nottingham is running at about 38 per cent. of the cases that eventually come to court, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not feel that a conciliatory statement and intervention from himself would not only alleviate the present situation but would restore respect for law and order in mining communities which consider themselves to have been savagely treated by the forces of law and order over the past year?

The Attorney-General: The acquittal rate varies enormously. In one or two areas, it is nought. The hon. Gentleman has picked the largest one — Nottinghamshire. It is very important that Law Officers —indeed, Ministers of all kinds—should not be seen to intervene in any way in questions of conviction or sentence. Those are matters for the courts and perhaps subsequently for the NCB.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

40. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to restore development aid to Ethiopia.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): We provide development aid to Ethiopia mainly through our contributions to the European Community and the World Bank. We have also agreed to support postgraduate medical education and English language training in Ethiopia accompanied by appropriate training programmes in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lloyd: Does the Minister agree that his answer will not be acceptable to people throughout the country? There has been a massive goodwill exercise towards Ethiopia in terms of emergency aid from private sources and, of course, from the Government. Has not the time come when a massive effort must be directed towards development aid to make sure that Ethiopia does not face a crisis in the future? A blockage on that aid, caused by the ideological position of the Government, is in no one's interest.

Mr. Raison: It is not just a question of ideological differences. It is difficult to give aid in a country where the whole approach to agriculture — a collectivist approach—is very different from ours, and where a civil war is raging. However, aid will be provided through the medium of the World Bank and the European Community, towards both of which we make substantial contributions.

Mr. Bowen Wells: Is it not true that aid to the agricultural centres of Ethiopia needs to be directed towards the poor farmers in arid areas, who need support for small agricultural enterprises, and that the Government of Ethiopia are totally opposed to that obvious developmental need?

Mr. Raison: I agree with my hon. Friend's definition of developmental need, but I must repeat that there are great difficulties connected with the attitude taken by the Ethiopian Government towards the nation's agriculture.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Is the Minister not disappointed with the less than robust response from British industrialists towards development aid to Ethiopia? For instance, has he recieved any representations from the CBI?

Mr. Raison: I cannot recall offhand having received any representations from the CBI. However, overall, British industry is capable of playing an important part in development across the world, and I have done what I can to encourage it to do so.

British Volunteer Programme

41. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will increase the level of assistance to the British volunteer programme.

Mr. Raison: I propose, subject to parliamentary approval, to allocate £6·95 million to the British volunteer programme in 1985-86. This represents a 15 per cent. increase on this year's grant.

Mr. Soames: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply and also for the extra money allocated to the programme. However, will he acknowledge that there are an immense number of young people in this country who would very much like to go abroad to do their bit to assist the disaster areas and other places in the developing world? Will he bear in mind that this is a most attractive and useful programme to which the Government could perhaps devote a little more money in future?

Mr. Raison: I agree with my hon. Friend about the value of voluntary work overseas. However, from 1979-80 to 1984-85 we have increased our spending on the British volunteer programme by 94 per cent. in real terms.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I, too, am grateful for this increased support for the British volunteer programme. May I suggest that, in this year of all years — International Youth Year—it would be a token of the Government's good will if they allowed the enormous numbers of young people who are unable to get work here but who have expressed a desire to help in areas such as Ethiopia and Sudan to do so through a special programme, with additional funding?

Mr. Raison: The figures that I have announced show our commitment to the programme. The figure for the coming year will allow a small increase in overall numbers, although most of the extra money will help to meet increased costs overseas.

International Fund for Agricultural Development

42. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to ensure continued finance for the international fund for agricultural development.

Mr. Raison: We have been taking a full part in the negotiations for the second IFAD replenishment and we hope that agreement will be reached early next month. We would expect to contribute to it on a basis to be decided following the usual burden-sharing discussions among donors.

Mr. Holland: The Minister will be aware that IFAD needs between $500 million and $650 million—that is what it is asking for. It is the only United Nations agency which is concerned exclusively with agricultural development and, if we are to avoid storing up trouble or, indeed, starvation for sub-Saharan Africa, it must be supported on a sizeable scale. How much will the Minister be able to give?

Mr. Raison: I expect that the figure that is likely to be agreed will be about $600 million, which is within the range of that the hon. Gentleman quoted.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I welcome what my right hon. Friend has just said. Is he any closer to a decision on whether to untie assistance promised in connection with the World Bank's facility for Africa?

Mr. Raison: There is a question about this matter later on the Order Paper, but I do not think that it will be reached so I can tell my hon. Friend that the answer is yes, it will be untied.

Sudan (Grain Supplies)

43. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the amount of grain sent by the European Economic Community to Sudan in 1984; and what was the price paid for it.

Mr. Raison: The European Community delivered 13,000 tonnes of cereals, together with 3,117 tonnes of milk powder and 1,355 tonnes of butter oil to Sudan in 1984. The cost was about £6·8 million.

Mr. Cox: Is the Minister aware that there are now enormous stocks of grain in the EEC? Does he agree that it is deplorable that the figures that he has just given were the same last year? Can he assure us that this year much more grain will be sent to Sudan from EEC countries and that the price will be advantageous to Sudan? Can he assure us—this has happened with other commodities—that grain will not be sold at the cheapest possible price to eastern Europe? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that those who have given generously to help alleviate the famine in Africa look for such action from the Government? Will he ensure that it takes place?

Mr. Raison: The quantity delivered last year was not very large, but the House must remember that it was only late in the year that the Sudan Government asked for assistance. The Community and its member states have now committed almost 170,000 tonnes of grain for this year. That is a substantial amount. I have stressed to the Community, and the Commissioner, whom I saw two weeks ago, that it is important that large quantities should go and that they should go as soon as possible.

Mr. Robert Banks: I am aware that my right hon. Friend has a special knowledge of the Sudan. May I ask him, following his recent visit to that country, whether he hopes that larger quantities of grain from the EC can be got to that country? Is he satisfied with how it is distributed to the starving people there?

Mr. Raison: It is important that large quantities go from the EC. The committed amount is substantial. It is crucial to get on with delivery before the hoped for rains come in June. I believe that the grain will reach those who most need it, but one must always be careful about the business of distribution.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Minister remember that in the early 1970s the Euro-fanatics were telling us that one reason why we should go into the Common Market was that if the 10 nations got together they could help the Third world and enable the starving millions to be fed? Has not that dream faded as rapidly as the SDP has faded from our Benches?

Mr. Raison: The hon. Gentleman is exactly wrong. The European development fund—the Lomé convention—is one of the most valuable and positive aspects of the European Community. Whatever one may think about grain mountains and so on, they mean that substantial quantities of food are available to be sent to famine-struck areas, and that is now happening.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend will be aware that many of the problems of Sudan are the result of the civil war in Ethiopia. Will he avail himself of any opportunity that he may have to talk to the Ethiopian Foreign Minister, who is in London this week, and to impress upon him the fact that the House would be delighted if the Ethiopian Government would initiate peace talks with the Eritrean and Tigrean rebels, with a view to establishing a ceasefire that would allow food aid to get to all parts of Ethiopia and stop the people of Ethiopia from simply killing themselves?

Mr. Raison: The House will agree with the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend. He knows that there would be great difficulties in persuading the Ethiopian Government to have formal talks with the representatives of the liberation movements. On the other hand, many people have made clear to the Ethiopian Government the great importance of making sure that food reaches all the people who are suffering so badly at the present time.

Cervical Screening

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the shortcomings in the cervical screening system revealed by the recent death of a woman in Oxfordshire and evidence of a survey carried out in Nottingham last year.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Last year we gave all health authorities updated, comprehensive guidelines on an effective cervical screening programme based on the advice of an independent expert advisory group. This followed the circular which we issued in December 1981 telling authorities to establish local recall arrangements for cervical screening by April 1983. All authorities should therefore now be offering a full screening service to all women with a recall service to those at highest risk.

Responsibility for operating the cervical screening programme rests with individual health authorities. It is obviously important for each authority to have effective arrangements for following up positive tests, which should always be notified to the clinician who initiated the test, who should then ensure that follow-up action is taken.

We are looking into the circumstances of the Oxfordshire cases to see whether there are any general lessons to be learnt. We were already preparing a questionnaire to all authorities to update our information on local screening services and we will be issuing that shortly.

Mr. Dobson: Does the Minister agree that although the Government received expert advice in 1981 from the Committee on Gynaecological Cytology that they should set up a computer-based, local call and recall scheme in every part of the country, on strict national guidelines, they implemented only one of those recommendations and, consequently, are directly responsible for the present shambles whereby only seven districts in this country have a decent system?

Secondly, why did Ministers ignore the findings of the Nottingham survey, published in the British Medical Journal and publicised by me in December 1984, which showed that some doctors were failing to follow up positive smears?

Finally, will the Minister accept that, as he has never asked health authorities what cervical cancer screening arrangements they have made, he can neither dismiss the Oxford tragedy as an isolated incident nor confirm that such failures are not widespread? Does he not recognise that people will notice the contrast between the efforts that the Government have constantly made to harass health authorities into introducing privatisation and the fact that the Minister, and his Department, officials and ministerial colleagues have not raised one finger to try to find out what was happening in the health districts or to urge them to do the proper job that people expect them to do?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman's last question rather spoiled the remainder of his remarks. We are all concerned about the tragic cases in Oxfordshire and to protect women against the risk of cervical cancer, which is avoidable in many cases. We have been chasing up the authorities and it is wrong to make a political point in trying to draw a contrast between that and the tendering process.

It is right to say that in 1981 there was a recommendation that there should be a call system as well as a recall system. However, because of doubts about its cost-effectiveness, only seven authorities opted for a call system. We are financing research into a particular system at Manchester. When we have the results of that, we shall consider whether it is justified and whether a national call system would save lives, as it is claimed. Meanwhile, recall systems, including computerised recall systems, are rapidly being spread. The Government have made money directly available through information technology money. Ten family planning clinics set up computerised systems, more than 20 have computerised systems, and others are operating effective manual systems.

As I said in my original reply, we have been stressing to authorities the importance of getting on with screening and protecting women in their localities. We have not ignored the article in the British Medical Journal in October 1984; indeed, because of my constituency interest, I was involved in its appearance. The fact that it appeared publicised to all health authorities the problems that had arisen in Nottingham and that they had been put right. Obviously it is necessary—it is so obvious that it does not need to be stressed constantly by the Government—that authorities should have screening programmes, that clinicians should be told the results of all tests, and that all clinicians should ensure that women at risk are notified.

I share the anxiety of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). I am sure that women would like all avoidable deaths in this area to be eliminated. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the matter is being given high priority. For most of the country the present arrangements are working well, and women should not be unnecessarily alarmed.

Mrs. Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I urge my right hon. and learned Friend in no circumstances to stop his programme of privatisation, as the money saved by it is badly needed elsewhere. Is there any reason why general practitioners who have been notified of the positive result of a cervical smear should fail to inform the patient about it?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with the first sentiment. Regarding my hon. Friend's question, I agree that there can be no reason for that. I should have thought that all clinicians appreciate when they are notified that one of their patients has had a positive test that they should then notify the patient and take further steps as quickly as possible. One cannot prejudge individual cases because human error can be made and information mislaid. I certainly agree with my hon. Friend that the obvious step for a clinician is immediately to take a further test as soon as he or she is notified of a positive result.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): The Minister refers to the general lessons to be learnt from the inquiry, on which he will no doubt report to the House. What will happen if the inquiry finds either human error or administrative error in an individual case?

Mr. Clarke: There are procedures for dealing with individual cases of error and subsequent complaints, and they should be adequate to deal with what is sometimes a human tragedy which follows from a patient not being notified of a positive result of a screening test and that she is at risk. The Government's duty is to ensure that all authorities make themselves aware of this sort of survey, and that the standards of the screening service in all localities are brought up to the level of the best. As I said in my original reply, we were already preparing to update our information. It is not true that we had never got information before, as the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras implied. We normally get it through direct contact with health authorities. We are now preparing a systematic questionnaire, which was already in preparation, and it will soon be issued so that we can compare the standards achieved by every health authority.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, in so far as any conclusions can be drawn from the Oxfordshire case, they are that within the considerable resources already given to the National Health Service it is always possible to be more efficient and to make more effective use of the resources? Does he further agree that when the Opposition seek to denigrate the NHS by such instances it is of no benefit or help to anyone?

Mr. Clarke: I hope, as my hon. Friend plainly hopes, that the controversy does not deter women from seeking screening. All sexually active women should be screened for cervical cancer once every five years. The guidance that we publish makes that clear. Where abnormality is detected, the second test often shows that it is a mistake and that there is none. If there are early signs of cancer, it can be treated with a high probability of success, and lives can be saved. There is no serious resource problem here, and it is not one of the most expensive services being developed in the NHS. We must improve administrative efficiency and ensure that no errors are made at any stage of the process so that people do not forget or omit to act when a positive test has been notified.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Is it not worth emphasising the fact that, in the words of the British Medical Journal, 80 per cent. of those who develop cervical cancer have "slipped through the screening process"?

Is it not also true that in some areas there is a far better response to those tests, because they have gone beyond the Government's guidelines? One example is Cornwall. If the Government are committed to preventive medicine, they should emphasise such matters and make the guidelines much more appropriate to the need rather than being over-concerned about administrative details, which will not necessarily cover all the cases that could occur.

Mr. Clarke: I agree that plenty of individual practices and health authorities have developed effective systems, which have the important result of saving the lives of women who might otherwise die from cervical cancer. The Government's efforts are designed to ensure that those standards are achieved everywhere. All health authorities and all members of the medical profession should back our efforts to do so. What should come from tragic cases such as the one in Oxfordshire is that health authorities will now check to ensure that such errors do not occur in their localities.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Is it not clear from what my right hon. and learned Friend said that his Department, in issuing guidance, has discharged its duty in the matter and that the responsibility must lie with the general practitioner?

Mr. Clarke: We shall continue to discharge our responsibility by following up our guidance and ensuring that health authorities do what they have been clearly told to do. I agree with my hon. Friend. I am sure that most general practitioners will agree that a doctor does not need to be told that, if he is notified that a patient's test is positive, he should immediately contact that patient and submit her for another test. We know that errors can be made, but I do not believe that we are talking about a failure of policy or systems.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Does the Minister agree that it is equally important for women to be screened for breast cancer? He may be interested to hear about an example of a similar mistake, when a woman who had already lost one breast—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not about breast cancer. The hon. Lady should confine her question to cervical cancer.

Mrs. Clwyd: I am sure that the Minister would agree that women should be screened regularly for other forms of cancer. Does he believe that such screening is satisfactory for the other parts of the body where cancer can occur?

Mr. Clarke: We are already financing much research into screening for breast cancer, but people are not as certain of the cost-effectiveness of screening for breast cancer as they are of the screening for cervical cancer. However, we all hope that effective screening methods will be developed for all sorts of feminine and other cancers, and that when adequate methods are devised health authorities will press on to implement them effectively in their areas.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the confidence of many women will, rightly or wrongly, have been somewhat damaged by what happened in Oxford? I received three telephone calls at the weekend from people asking whether the process was effective in the west midlands. Would it not be possible at least to provide self-addressed postcards so that even negative tests can be notified? I should have thought that the cost involved was so small, compared with the confidence that could be re-established in women, as to be well worthwhile.

Mr. Clarke: Any woman who is worried should straightforwardly approach her general practitioner, who will inform her of the result of her smear test. Any woman who is sexually active and who has not had a smear test during the past five years should in any event contact her doctor to have a smear test carried out. I agree with my hon. Friend that what the Government and the health authorities must do is to reassure women that they can be protected, and then devise adequate systems. His suggestion that each woman should be notified personally of the results of a test will be considered. We shall certainly ask our expert advisory committee whether it believes that to be necessary. But the systems that are being devised and that work well in some areas already notify the doctor adequately and are saving many lives.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): But is the Minister aware that in Newham, if a positive test has been notified and, within a given period, there is no voluntary recourse to the clinic, the district health authority sends a reminder of that notification directly to the individual? Is not that a sensible long-stop system? Why was it not incorporated in the original guidelines that were circulated by the Minister? Is not the failure to require the use of such a long-stop administrative procedure prime facie maladimistration on the part of his Department?

Mr. Clarke: The East Ham arrangement seems to be very sensible. It is my belief that that arrangement is to be put in hand in Nottingham as well so that when no response is received after somebody has been notified of a positive test the authority can follow it up and ask the doctor concerned why there has been no response. It would therefore act as a reminder.

We can of course reinforce all the guidance, but I believe that the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that it is a matter of common sense. The health authorities do not need all these obvious steps to be spelt out to them in circulars. They are responsible public bodies which should be capable of taking the necessary elementary steps for a screening procedure under which the doctor is given the results and then tells the patient. Fortunately, as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) said a moment ago, that happens in the vast majority of cases, but we have to guard against exceptional errors and make sure that no such errors occur again.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Is not one of the keys to avoiding the kind of tragedy that occurred in Oxfordshire the greater use of computerised call and recall systems? Although the greater use of such systems is primarily a question for the management of the National Health Service which my right hon. and learned Friend is doing so much to improve, does he agree that private and charitable fund raising could join the NHS in providing the necessary computer hardware.

Mr. Clarke: We are steadily advancing with the computerisation of the records of all the family planning committees. The software that has been developed, which is based upon a model developed by the Exeter FPC, enables an FPC, if it wishes, to have a fully computerised call and recall system. I believe that about one quarter of all FPCs already have such computerised systems. Some of them are financed directly by the Government. I agree that computerisation needs to be more widely spread. However, I streas that many authorities provide perfectly good manual call and recall systems. There is no reason why a proper system should have to wait for the computer.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): May I remind the Minister that it is now over 20 years since this subject was ventilated in the House and pressed upon the then Labour Government? The Minister appears to get extremely cross when hon. Members refer to the system, but is he not aware that in previous years there was a recall system to deal with tuberculosis by means of mass radiography which worked perfectly satisfactorily without computers?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that good recall systems can operate without computers, but it is easier to operate such systems with computers. Computers are spreading throughout the NHS. We have ended the national recall system for the simple reason that it did not work. We took steps three years ago to instruct authorities to replace the national system with better local systems, and that is what they are doing. The number of deaths in this country from cervical cancer is dropping very slightly. I agree that it is not dropping enough. That is why we shall continue with our efforts to make sure that all authorities properly protect those women who are at risk in their areas.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): I well understand why the Minister is throwing up a smokescreen to disguise his Department's ineffectiveness in this area, but it comes ill from a Secretary of State who has continually interfered in the affairs of health authorities to ride roughshod over their decision making when he wants action to be taken. Will he now show the same energy in this direction as he has in the direction of privatisation?

Mr. Clarke: I referred in my original answer to a circular that was issued in 1981. I have also referred to the guidelines that were issued last year. We keep in contact with the authorities by telephoning to find out what progress has been made. We have part financed the computerisation of the system. We have been helping with the development of the software at Exeter which will lead to the development of call and recall systems. I believe that the system is steadily improving and saving lives.

I very much regret the tragic cases in Oxford where there appears to have been human error, as a result of which two women have died. However, I do not believe it is right to build upon the grandiose claim that we are not interfering enough or that there is a lack of policy. We simply have to make sure that no tragic and avoidable deaths of women occur elsewhere.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to protect the subsequent business on the Order Paper. We have had 19 minutes on this important matter.

WELSH AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That the matter of the consequences of the Budget and the Government's economic policies in Wales, being a matter relating exclusively to Wales, be referred to the Welsh Grand Committee for its consideration.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Common Agricultural Policy Prices

3.49 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jopling): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 4582/85, including Addenda I, II and corrigendum and III, No. 4637/85 on the situation of the agricultural markets in 1984, No. 6248/84 on the designation of milk and milk products, No. 11172/84 on the production refunds for starch, and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's unnumbered explanatory memorandum of 16th July 1984 on the payment of an additional national aid to German farmers; and supports the Government's intention to seek an agreement on 1985-86 farm support prices and related measures which builds on the success achieved in 1984 in introducing greater realism into the operation of the Common Agricultural Policy, is consistent with the financial guideline for agriculture, maintains a policy of price restraint in the Common Agricultural Policy, avoids discrimination against United Kingdom interests, and takes account of the interests of United Kingdom producers, consumers, traders and food processors.

Last year we made important steps towards a more realistic and cost-effective common agricultural policy. I remind the House that at the 1984 price fixing, common prices were reduced on average and, even after allowing for green currency changes, real prices were reduced in every member state. It was agreed that guarantee thresholds would be set for all products in or likely to be in surplus or for which expenditure was rising rapidly. Those were major achievements.

Additionally, the Council of Ministers agreed on a quota scheme for milk at a level of production about 6 million tonnes below that currently prevailing. Let there be no doubt that the quota scheme represents a major advance in bringing reality to the CAP. At the time it was introduced, every extra tonne produced could, on the Commission's own analysis, be disposed of only by applying subsidies at the level of the full target price for milk. In other words, every extra million tonnes of production — production was increasing by 2 million tonnes a year or more—resulted in an extra cost to the Community budget of 275 million ecu or about £165 million. Although we still have a substantial surplus in the milk sector things would have been very much worse without the quota scheme.

Other major advances made in 1984 included the conclusions on budgetary discipline, including a financial guideline for agriculture specifying broadly that from 1986 expenditure on the CAP should grow less fast than the Community's own resources base.

At the same time, it was agreed that our net contribution to the Community budget, much of which results from our disproportionate contribution to the CAP, which itself stems from our relatively small agricultural sector, would be offset to a considerable extent by a reduction in our VAT contribution to own resources.

There can be no doubt that in 1984 we made more progress than ever before in improving the CAP and in mitigating its adverse effects on the United Kingdom.

So far this year progress has been maintained by agreement——

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Is it correct to say that we have reached an agreement whereby the proportion of Community expenditure on agriculture will become less only if the absolute amount of expenditure on agriculture in the Community becomes more? If so, what is the advantage in that?

Mr. Jopling: I am afraid that my hon. Friend is not right. The agreement is that the growth of spending on agriculture will not be faster than the growth in own resources. That is slightly different from the way in which my hon. Friend put it.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): When the financial mechanism was agreed it became clear that it depended upon the political will of the main nation states. I recollect that my right hon. Friend, particularly in 1984, pointed to the determination of the West Germans to hold down agricultural prices. We now hear that the West Germans have entirely changed their position and are once again in favour of high prices. What elements of political pressure are now available which will ally with my right hon. Friend in order to protect the consumer and the taxpayer?

Mr. Jopling: If my hon. Friend would allow me to develop my speech, I shall be talking about some of the issues where there may be a divergence between member states, including West Germany.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): The right hon. Gentleman has just completed an important passage in his speech and I should like to refer to it. With regard to the statement about the CAP, will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the British Government opposed the milk quotas that he now describes as a major advance? Secondly, will he confirm that, within any framework of quotas, it is desirable that United Kingdom agriculture should at least retain its total share of Community production?

Mr. Jopling: Yes. The House knows very well that I thought that a better way to bring the milk surplus and the overspending on milk under control would be through the discipline of price rather than quotas. The hon. Gentleman will remember that I told the House that on 1 December 1983, and I have always said that. Even though we should have preferred to do it through price, we have had to do it through quota because we were isolated. As I told the House, I believe that the quota system has done a good deal to bring the surplus under control.

So far this year, progress has been maintained by agreement on regulations to implement the European Council's decisions on a reform of the wine regime, and also on a structures package which entails a significant cutback from the level of expenditure proposed by the Commission and has other advantages for the United Kingdom. I have already explained those two matters to the House in the past few weeks.

However, major problems remain. Sensible decisions over a period of years will be needed if all the problems of the CAP are to be solved. It is very important that at this year's price fixing we should consolidate the gains made last year and take further steps in the right direction. I believe that this is necessary not only for budgetary reasons but because only a well balanced and efficient policy can provide our producers with the long-term security that they need.

My attitude to this year's price fixing will be determined by a number of key elements. First, a realistic view must be taken of the market possibilities in each and every sector. This ought to go without saying, but too often in the past over-sanguine assumptions have been made. In accordance with the agreement on guarantee thresholds, action must be taken to restore market balance if circumstances so warrant.

Secondly, proper account must be taken of the financial situation, and in particular decisions should be consistent with the constraints imposed by the financial guidelines for agriculture that I have just mentioned.

Thirdly, all producers and all products must be treated on a comparable basis. In recent years some products, notably the Mediterranean products, have secured consistently greater price increases than others, and it is therefore no surprise that Community expenditure on them has risen by very much more than the average for the CAP as a whole.

Fourthly, proper attention should be paid to the need for policies to be administered effectively. I am very conscious that our producers are concerned that policies should be fairly and equitably administerd throughout the whole Community.

Judged against those criteria, I can give a qualified welcome to the Commission's proposals this year. In general, I think that they recognise the overriding need to put the CAP on to a sounder and more realistic footing, although there are specific points on which I am disappointed.

With regard to the financial aspects, the Commission has produced figures showing that, so far as can be judged, at present its proposals are consistent with the Financial Guidelines for Agriculture, and this is therefore satisfactory.

On commodity aspects, dealing first with milk, the dairy produce quota tribunal has now virtually completed its work and it will shortly be possible to finalise production quotas. In the Council of Ministers earlier this month we agreed on a method of introducing greater flexibility for producers with direct sales and wholesale quota. We also secured some temporary relaxation in the rules relating to liability for and collection of the levy in recognition of the particular problems that producers have faced in the first year of quotas. As a result, producers in Northern Ireland are unlikely to be required to pay any levy in respect of production in 1984-85. Those amendments will be of great benefit to the United Kingdom industry.

In its price proposals, the Commission reaffirms its commitment to the proper enforcement of the quota system, including the cut in quotas of about 1 million tonnes, agreed last year, for 1985-86 and the consequent cut of 1 per cent. in the co-responsibility levy. It has made it clear that the implementation of the proposed price increases is dependent on member states abiding by the rules of the scheme. There is no longer any excuse for failure to apply the system properly, and I shall continue to press that the rules be properly respected in all member states.

At the same time, the detailed regulations still present problems in some respects, and I am especially conscious of the need for more flexibility in the rules governing the transfer of quotas. I shall seek a solution on this point as part of the price fixing package if this seems tactically advantageous, or, otherwise, shortly thereafter.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I am grateful to the Minister for giving way to me, particularly as he answered a written question about this and we have not had an opportunity to question him about it. Why is he not prepared to press for a fully tradable system of milk quotas, which is preferred to leasing by the industry?

Mr. Jopling: For one particular reason. At this moment I do not believe that we are likely to get early agreement by the Council of Ministers and the Commission to sell and purchase a quota. I have taken the view that, while I am not philosophically opposed to that system, if we want more flexibility more quickly, the most practical way to get it is to go for the first stage of leasing. That was in the answer that I gave, if the hon. Gentleman cares to go back to it.

The Commission has proposed an increase of 1·5 per cent. in the target price for milk this year. Given the continuing surpluses in the milk sector — even with quotas fully operative, the surplus amounts to some 13·5 million tonnes—I do not believe that any price increase this year is justified. I shall press for a freeze, although it is already clear that some member states will press for an increase greater than that proposed by the Commission.

The Commission has proposed a further rebalancing of the butter and skimmed milk powder ratio which would result in a cut of 3·99 per cent. in the intervention price for butter. In this context, it would be acceptable to end the butter subsidy, as the Commission has proposed, as the two measures taken together should have no effect on the retail price of butter. I shall press for the freeze in the target price to be implemented by means of a smaller increase in the skimmed milk powder price than that proposed by the Commission.

Sir John Farr (Harborough) rose——

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow) rose——

Mr. Jopling: I have given way many times, but I shall give way once more to my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr).

Sir John Farr: Were representations made by Her Majesty's Government, and, if so, what response was there, on the abolition of the co-responsibility levy, which is desperately unfair to British producers?

Mr. Jopling: I have consistently argued against the continuation of the co-responsibility levy, even at the level of 2 per cent., after we have made, as I hope, the reduction this year. On many occasions, I have said that I believe that the best way to help dairy farmers is to reduce the co-responsibility levy rather than to increase prices.

Production of cereal expanded enormously in 1984, and it was only the increase in the value of the dollar which prevented a very great increase in the costs of this sector. The Community must take full account of the very great potential financial liability represented by the current levels of cereal production. Calculations made in my Department show that productivity increases in Community cereals production in recent years have been such that real returns per unit area have increased significantly despite a reduction in the real price. Firm action on prices is therefore needed.

In my view, the full 5 per cent. reduction required by the application of the guarantee threshold should be applied without any norm price increase—that is, the common price level should be cut by 5 per cent. rather than the 3·6 per cent. proposed by the Commission.

Further, the Council of Ministers should give a clear signal to producers of its intentions to keep close control on this sector in future years by agreeing that for three years there should be no increase in the norm price, or by adapting the guarantee threshold by abolishing the ceiling on the price reduction to which it can give rise.

In general, we must allow for a greater operation of market forces in the cereals sector. There is clearly scope for increased consumption on the domestic animal feed market and also for increased exports if the price is right. I hope that the Council will endorse radical measures, such as those that I have outlined, although already some of my ministerial colleagues have shown their reluctance to consider any reduction in prices.

Mr. Peter Hordern (Horsham) rose——

Mr. Jopling: I have already said that I had given way for the last time, but, as I know my hon. Friend, I shall make this the last time.

Mr. Hordern: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Commission's calculations show that there should have been a decrease of 8 per cent. in cereal prices but that it felt bound to recommend a reduction of only 5 per cent.? Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that, in view of the gross oversupply of cereals, which looks likely to continue, especially if the dollar should fall, he will press for an even greater reduction in the price beyond the 5 per cent?

Mr. Jopling: I hope that tomorrow morning my hon. Friend will carefully read what I have said, because 5 per cent. is the maximum allowed under the rules. I repeat that I did not rule out the option of adapting the guarantee threshold by abolishing the ceiling on the price reduction to which it can give rise. I hope that I have covered my hon. Friend's point.

I am concerned that there is an imbalance between the support we give to arable and to livestock products. Much the best way of improving this balance is to cut cereals prices, which would not only reduce support for the arable sector but reduce the costs of livestock production.

The Commission's price proposal for beef takes proper account of the difficult budgetary and market situation for that product. In 1984, FEOGA expenditure on beef rose by 18 per cent. to almost £1·3 billion and Community intervention stocks increased by more than 60 per cent. In these circumstances, the proposed price freeze is fully justified.

Intervention buying-in prices are now based on the carcase classification grid, and I hope to ensure that there is no delay in proceeding to the second stage of harmonisation, which is due to take effect at the beginning of the 1985-86 marketing year.

I support the Commission's proposal to maintain the basic suckler cow premium and to abolish the costly and discriminatory calf premium. However, I see no justification for the proposal not to renew the beef variable premium scheme, which has served United Kingdom producers and consumers well. The premium scheme has wide support in the House, and I shall be fighting hard to ensure its retention.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton) rose——

Mr. Jopling: I was not going to give way again, but I see that that is a lost cause.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Does my right hon. Friend recall that he told the House last year that he agreed to the extra milk quota for southern Ireland only on the condition that we were allowed to retain the beef variable premium? Will he make certain that the Irish lose their extra quota if we lose the beef variable premium?

Mr. Jopling: With some fear and trembling, I take issue with my hon. Friend, who is so nearly always right. If he looks it up, he will see that at no stage did I agree to the extra milk quota for the Republic of Ireland. I have made it clear that if there had ever been a vote on that issue, I should have been against an extra quantity of milk being given to the Republic of Ireland.

I shall not give way to any more interventions.

In the sheepmeat sector, the Commission has proposed a price freeze for the rest of 1985 with a 2 per cent. increase in January 1986 after a change in the starting date of the marketing year. It also proposes placing a limit on the variable premium payable each week so that if, as at present calculated, it would amount to over 25 per cent. of the guide price, in future the amount actually paid would be abated by up to 5 per cent. of the guide price. Further, it has proposed a "recovery bar" to prevent the annual premium from increasing to compensate our producers for loss of income due to abatement. It does not propose any changes to the seasonal scale of guide prices.

We have the largest interest in the sheepmeat regime as both producers and consumers, and it is therefore particularly reasonable in this case to insist that the regime should take full account of our interests. Overall, the regime introduced in 1980 has been reasonably successful, though clawback has hindered our exports.

I am naturally willing to consider any non-discriminatory method of reducing Community expenditure, and in that context I could agree to a price freeze for 1985. Nor do I see the case for a price increase in 1986. However, adjustments must operate in a non-discriminatory way. The recovery bar would discriminate unfairly against British producers, and I am therefore determined to resist it.

I also consider that the existing seasonal scale of guide prices causes instability in our market and that savings in expenditure could be made by adopting a better scale designed to promote more orderly marketing. Last autumn, the Commission appeared to accept that argument, and it is disappointing that it has not proposed amendments to meet that point.

I shall just briefly summarise the Government's policy on other products.

We support the Commission's proposals on sugar, including the price freeze on sugar beet.

On oilseeds, the rapeseed price should be reduced to the same extent as that for cereals, and a greater cut should be made in the sunflower price than the 1·5 per cent. proposed by the Commission.

There is no case for any increase in olive oil prices.

A price freeze for wine is clearly needed, given the problems in this sector, which I explained to the House a short time ago.

Taking account of the mounting cost of the market regime and the level of withdrawals, support for some fruit and vegetables should be reduced by more than the Commission has proposed. The Commission has proposed useful changes to the regime for processed fruit and vegetables.

[Mr. Jopling]

I support the price cuts proposed for tobacco and also the price freeze proposed for pigmeat.

The motion refers to other proposals on designations of milk and milk products and on starch. Both those proposals would have significant implications for our industry and consumers and therefore require further detailed consideration. I shall, therefore, do my best to resist any pressure from other member states to include those proposals in the price settlement, unless they have first been thoroughly considered.

Finally, given the current volatility of sterling, in my view, it is still too early to take a view on the proper level for the green pound. Any Commission proposal to adjust our green rate will be considered on its merits at the time.

These are very important proposals for United Kingdom taxpayers, consumers and food retailers and processors. I believe that the Government's policies are best designed to protect our national interests, and I commend the motion to the House.

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): Taken together, the documents before the House are about as long as "Gone with the Wind". However, they are not half as readable, and they lack any central theme. It is appropriate to consider them today for two reasons. First, today's debate is on the eve of our Budget. The £12 billion cost of this programme, taking up 75 per cent. of the total EEC budget, makes it especially important. Secondly, it is important to discuss them in advance of the meeting of Ministers. Although it is clear that there is no difference in sentiment between the two sides of the House in that all right hon. and hon. Members are determined to rein back the EEC Commission on this issue, it is a way of enabling the Minister of Agriculture to let his colleagues know the feelings of the House.

The one document that I have been able to read is the explanatory memorandum. It is a mere 110 pages long —a Booker prize entry compared with "Gone with the Wind". In that document the Commission itself makes noises of concern about the size of the surpluses now being produced. That being so, we shall be looking at achievement rather than at general sentiment.

The negotiations into which the right hon. Gentleman will be entering have changed radically in their nature. Perhaps one of the problems is that for a lot of EEC Ministers the negotiations are too often looked upon as a price-fixing operation for the coming year — in other words, an income operation—whereas it is now a matter of balancing what is an imbalance and of adjusting agriculture to the realities of the market.

I am disappointed that today's debate is somewhat limited in scope. I know the reason for that. But this occasion used to be the central debate of the agricultural year in parliamentary terms. Last year, it came on after 10 o'clock. This year, it is given a mere half day.

Notwithstanding the right hon. Gentleman's preference for price measures to control agricultural surpluses, there is now beginning a fairly wide debate on methods of controlling agricultural surplus. Even the National Farmers Union is considering the unconsidered—quotas in cereal prices. Therefore, whether it be in the Commission or at home, there will be a continuation of that debate.

I believe that Parliament should have a day devoted to a debate on this issue, possibly guided by a White Paper from the Minister. I know that White Papers of themselves do very little. However, they help to focus the debate and to set out the possibilities. I hope that the Ministry will agree both to publish a White Paper and to arrange for a debate on it so that right hon. and hon. Members can look in an open way at the future of agriculture.

I do not think that we could be more cruel to our farmers than to pretend that there will be no change in the next decade or no adjustments to which we need to turn our minds. That is instanced by the fact that, had we been debating the 1973 position today, the Commission area would not have been self-sufficient in cereals, sugar, wine, beef, veal, sheepmeat, goatmeat, eggs and tobacco. Now only sheepmeat, goatmeat and tobacco remain. Although we have passed the point of self-sufficiency in most of these products, the agricultural machine which has been set up carries on remorselessly.

I accept that it is unwise to aim for exact self-sufficiency in agriculture. We must retain some margin of surplus to buffer us against crop failure or a poor harvest and to enable us to play our full part in the fight against world poverty. But even overproduction would be tolerable if we could sell our surpluses on world markets. The tragedy of the common agricultural policy at the moment is that, although the strong American dollar has narrowed the gap between CAP prices and world prices, we still have dearer agricultural products than the United States of America.

The Minister rightly warns us that if the American dollar weakens, our prices will become uncompetitive and the cost of subsidising our exports will increase. I think that Mr. Pooley estimated that a 10 per cent. devaluation of the American dollar would cost us 700 million ecus. Consequently, as the recent very high levels of the dollar probably will not last, the present position, unsatisfactory as it is, is unlikely to be maintained.

We must also consider what will happen if the American farm Bill goes through without any change in farm support prices in the United States. It will force down the price of American products on world markets and will make EEC agricultural produce that much more uncompetitive. Although some surplus is justified, the present surpluses are intolerable and should not be supported. But if we cannot afford to sell our products, or cannot be sufficiently competitive in selling them on the world market, food mountains may well engulf us, and, I suppose, the wine lakes may drown us.

An idea of how inexorable overproduction has become in the EEC can be gained by looking at the intervention stocks in the United Kingdom since 31 January last year. We find that butter has risen by 15 per cent., wheat by 60 per cent., barley by 168 per cent., rye by 196 per cent., durum by 35 per cent. and beef by 49 per cent. That is an immense increase for one year and severe strain is being put on storage facilities. The EEC may say that the only answer is to extend storage facilities, but that is like saying that the answer to a crime wave is to build more prisons. Such a solution would be limitless, and we must tackle the problem at source instead of trying to treat the symptoms.

The Commission seeks to balance farm incomes with control of production. The disappointing aspect about the document and the Commission's proposals is that they do not do that, at least in their present form. Next year, there will be an increase of 138 million ecus. Although the figure falls in the following year by 34 million ecus, it is subject to so many assumptions as to be easily proved wrong by the time that we reach that date. The Minister knows that price discipline does not come into force until 1986, so his colleagues may be tempted, in negotiating with him, to bump up the prices in the following two years so as to anticipate the price discipline regime that will come into force in 1986.

The Minister rightly devoted much of his attention to cereals. The 1984 harvest was a record 144·2 million tonnes. But since 1978, cereal production has risen on average by 3 per cent. per year. To an extent that shows that, although we fear climatic change, some of the old fears about bad harvests and poor climates have been guarded against by the tremendous increase in crop yields. World production is at its greatest ever, and as a result farmgate prices have, as the Minister said, declined by 24 per cent. At least, that is the view of Mr. Capstick at the Ministry. Yet it is said that real revenue per hectare has risen by no less than 10 per cent. The reason for that is to be seen in the rising yields, where, in the case of wheat alone, we have a 43 per cent. rise in crop yield.

If there has already been a 24 per cent. fall in farmgate prices, yet the income from cereals has increased, what would a 3·6 per cent. reduction in cereal prices do that has not already been done? Despite the record nature of this year's crop, it is obviously not anticipated that it will be a freak crop. By 1990, the Commission expects cereal production to rise to 148 million tonnes, and many would say that it is being unduly conservative. At this rate, cereal production is more likely to be about 160 million tonnes.

However, consumption will not be rising very rapidly, and is likely to amount to about 115 million tonnes. Therefore, even on the Commission's figures, there will be a gap of some 33 million tonnes in 1990. That is why the Commission's proposal is so incredible. I agree with the Minister, and cannot understand how it can move from there to suggesting a 1·5 per cent. rise, to be set off against a 5 per cent. decrease. Obviously, there will be a 3·6 per cent. overall decrease. However, given the extra yield and the history of Britain in the past few years, that will not mean any real decrease in cereal incomes. Therefore, the idea that a 3·6 per cent. reduction will force people out of cereal production or will make such production unattractive does not bear examination. History has shown that better crop yields have more than offset price reductions.

If that price reduction is being brought about with a view to bringing surpluses under control some calculation must have been made of what a net reduction in the cereal price of 3·6 per cent. will do with regard to limiting cereal production. I hope that a calculation has been made of the decrease that will result. If so, perhaps the Minister will tell us, or ask for the figure to be produced. If the question of what reduction will flow from the 3·6 per cent. proposal has not even been considered, the Commission has failed at the first hurdle. Unfortunately, I believe that that calculation has not been made.

Nor is the logic of the attitude held on dairy products immediately apparent. The milk quota system was introduced with hardly any notice, and has caused the maximum dislocation and uncertainty within the industry. I refer the Minister to paragraph 34 of the explanatory memorandum, where it says:

"The introduction of quotas has proved difficult, and is not yet fully assured in all Member States".

That is a fairly ominous and guarded statement about milk quotas, which the Minister did his best to rebut. But I wonder whether his robustness on this issue is shared by all his ministerial colleagues. Clearly, many countries are reluctant fully to implement the milk quota scheme. But having done that, as if to make a futile gesture of conciliation, a 1·5 per cent. rise is then offered. The quota system has brought no benefit to the producers, or—with the pressure for higher prices—to the consumers. Thus, there is bound to be lower consumption of the very commodities now so heavily in surplus.

The Minister mentioned the butter subsidy. In Britain, surplus butter now stands at 25,000 tonnes more than last year. If that is the present situation, what of the future? The EEC forecasts that even in 1991 we shall be producing 13 per cent. more of those commodities than we need, and will be oversufficient. The Commission's proposal will do nothing to bring about a long-term solution to the problem.

The beef and sheep variable premiums deal nationally with two different systems generally in a satisfactory way. The Commission's explanatory memorandum succeeds in being neither explanatory nor logical when dealing with the recommendation to scrap the beef variable premium. Anyone who has studied the matter will agree that the variable premium has stimulated consumption at a time of increasing difficulty.

The long term future set out in the explanatory memorandum states that "consumption . . . is at best likely to stabilise."

Since the variable premium's abolition would, according to Agra Europe, add 10 per cent. to the price of beef or, according to the NFU and the Consumers in the European Community group, add 7p per pound to the cost of beef, it would cut consumption. All the pointers are for the retention of the scheme. However, the Commission leaps in logic from arguing the case to asserting it and it suddenly recommends abolition.

The reason is set out in a brief paragraph. The reason is that the scheme is not tidy. It is a national scheme which happens to be working well, but it offends the Commission's bureaucratic sensitivities. The House will support the Minister if he defends the system because it is good for the consumer and for the producer. Far too few of the Commission's proposals can be said to be that.

The sheep premium involves different problems. We are only 75 per cent. self-sufficient in the production of sheepmeat. The Minister admirably outlined the results and details of the change. As he said, the farming press estimates that the change will result in a 5 per cent. cut in income for sheep rearers in Britain. That must be borne in mind when the EEC considers raising by 2 per cent. the price of sheepmeat from next January. The Commission propose a 2 per cent. increase, not a freezing of prices.

The problems of wine and fruit must also be tackled. I commend hon. Members with a fascination for the horrid to look at the explanatory memorandum, which deals with fresh fruit and vegetables. It discloses the most Alice-in-Wonderland situation ever. For example, page 66 refers to the withdrawal of fruit and vegetables from the market. The memorandum says that that is "a major market outlet for growers."

That is an analysis of nonsense and devalues much of the good work that is being done. That way of looking at things causes worry to consumers and taxpayers about the control to which the system is subjected and about how it will be conducted in the future.

[Mr. Brynmor John]

When the right hon. Gentleman goes to Brussels he will represent the whole country. The remit for agriculture will no longer be—as it has been almost without break since the war—to produce at any cost, whether that cost is financial, to the taxpayer, or environmental.

The right hon. Gentleman has two serious problems. The first concerns the performance of the Council of Ministers. History is against him. I have expressed serious doubts about the Commission's proposals, but we must recognise that, although the Commission is fairly wobbly on prices, Ministers have not in the last five years even been willing to go as far as the Commission wants them to go.

On average, Ministers have allowed price rises which are 3·5 per cent. more generous to farmers than the Commission has proposed. If that happened on this occasion Ministers would wipe out at one stroke the cut in cereal prices and all the benefits that flow from that. It would be a total abdication of the Minister's responsibilities to the population of the EEC. In some cases—for example, in connection with cereals — the Commission does not go far enough. Sometimes its proposals do not do what it says that they will do. However, there is no case at present for being more generous than the Commission suggests, notwithstanding the remarkable German somersault on dairy products and wheat.

The right hon. Gentleman's second difficulty is his price restraint strategy, which is his preferred way of making the CAP more rational. I can see that there are many great attractions about that, but a year ago he adopted the same strategy for milk. He would be unwise to ignore the moves already under consideration for alternative methods of bringing surpluses under control.

In paragraph 50 of the memorandum the Commission states:

"A solution to these problems cannot be found solely in the policy on prices and markets."

Paragraph 1.10 states:

"There is no doubt that . . . price policy, except where it is extremely restrictive, cannot be the only instrument used in future."

If the price measures fail and do not reduce production and surpluses, other means might be sought to control the surpluses. The steady accretion of surpluses which are neither wanted nor capable of being dealt with constructively is becoming intolerable to all EEC inhabitants. We must bring surpluses under control. If the right hon. Gentleman intends to change tack, for heaven's sake let him negotiate a system which allows more time for preparation than was allowed for milk quotas. We must have a better scheme for those who will be forced to leave farming as a consequence.

My verdict on the EEC proposals is that they are radical in analysis and timorous in their practicality. The Council cannot possibly repeat its mistake. Heaven forbid if it should worsen it.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): I thank the Minister and his team warmly for their work over the past 12 months to reach this final stage in negotiations. The Minister made it clear that the 1984 price fixing marked a historic change in the attitude of all member states. For the first time, they accepted the need for a realistic price policy for the Community. That meant that we could hope to see an end to open-ended stock piling and the start of a policy to bring production more into line with consumption.

As I represent part of Dorset, I must tell the Minister that I thought that the milk quotas were too quickly introduced and not fully thought out. I do not blame the Minister. He has made it clear that the introduction of quotas was a Community decision made as a result of sudden agreement. However, it involved savage cuts for those least able to withstand them.

I know that in all discussions since quotas were introduced my right hon. Friend has made it clear that he understands the effects of the cuts upon the small family producers who represent the backbone of our farming industry, not only in their dairying capability on the family farms, but within the social structure of the countryside. I hope that my right hon. Friend accepts that it is the Government's duty to do all that they can to aid that particular group in the years ahead. Therefore, everyone in the House must welcome his statement and approach, especially on the need for quota mobility.

Once we dig beneath the harmonious layer on top of the European Community, we find that every nation plays its cards as hard as it can and will use every trick in the book at all times. I hope that my right hon. Friend—indeed, I know that he will as a practical farmer—will be up to all these tricks and that he will press his Cabinet colleagues to give even more support to every national scheme that we can use to help to alleviate the effects of quotas on smaller producers.

I fail to understand why we must still have the co-responsibility levy. We welcome the cut of 1 per cent., but what on earth does the co-responsibility levy actually do? Why do we have to have the 2 per cent? The architect of the co-responsibility levy was the late Finn Gunderlach, but within a short time of its institution he made it clear that he thought it to be a ridiculous instrument that was serving no purpose. It is not a co-responsibility levy in the sense in which it originally applied. It is a tax of 2 per cent., which could be used to give our farming community a much needed fillip in income in this and subsequent years without raising prices to the consumer.

The whole object of quotas has been to screw down the lid on production. Once that is done, every possible way should be found to help the small producer. Hon. Members will remember that when my right hon. and learned Friend returned from the final negotiations last year one great success was the retention of the beef variable premium for the United Kingdom. All hon. Members welcomed that. At the end of the negotiations this year, he must again return to the House and announce a similar success.

The movement of beef into intervention now stands at record levels. I wish to cite figures that show the absolutely astronomical rise of stocks going into intervention. In the Community as a whole in 1980, 302,000 tonnes went into intervention. By 1984, the figure had risen to 604,000 tonnes—a 100 per cent. increase. If the beef had not been boned, the figure would have been 660,000 tonnes. In the United Kingdom alone, the figure rose from 23,800 tonnes in 1980 to 47,000 tonnes in 1984. Where can we find the storage capacity for that quantity of beef going into intervention? It must be purpose built; it cannot be a converted aircraft hangar which might be suitable for dumping corn. We cannot support such increases in the years ahead.

It is in that context that I wish to make my final point. The United Kingdom has a beef variable premium without which prices would rise by 7p in the pound. Evidence given to the Select Committee on Agriculture last week by the Ministry team and the Meat and Livestock Commission showed that consumption would fall by 8 per cent. if the premium disappeared. What on earth is the Community thinking about when, at a time when all our efforts should be directed towards increasing consumption, it is trying, purely for the sake of dogma, to impose upon the United Kingdom the end of a system that has worked well and has helped to increase consumption? Instead, the Community should adopt a similar scheme, coupled with a positive policy of lowering prices to the consumer.

What can we do with 660,000 tonnes of beef in intervention? How long can it stay there and what is the cost of keeping it there? That is one area—although not the only one—that makes the Community look very stupid. Unless the other Council members are prepared to be flexible on this point, my right hon. Friend should go into the negotiations with that issue as a sticking point. He should try not only to obtain a year's extension of the premium, but to get it written in on a longer-term basis.

As we stand in the negotiations now, year after year our Ministers, both Labour and Conservative, have defended the beef variable premium and, in doing so, have had to trade off unnecessarily in other areas. That is an insupportable position. I hope that my right hon. Friend and his team will go into the negotiations determined to retain the premium and that they will hold firm for the sake of the United Kingdom farmer and consumer. My right hon. Friend has many long nights ahead of him, and I wish him and his team well in these negotiations.

Mr. James Nicholson (Newry and Armagh): I rise to speak mainly with the aim of bringing hon. Members face to face with the problems of agriculture in Northern Ireland. I do not want in the limited time available to go into the more heavy aspects of the CAP. I wish to emphasise that agriculture in Northern Ireland has been through a traumatic time during the past 12 months. The imposition of dairy quotas caused great difficulty because in Northern Ireland, when the dairy industry sneezes, everyone else catches a cold. That is what happened with the dairy quotas.

Northern Ireland has also had difficulties in finding storage for intervention beef. We have witnessed the continuing decline of our intensive sector. Although Northern Ireland is an integral part of the United Kingdom, because of its peripheral position both in the United Kingdom and in Europe, it has suffered. Our raw materials cost more, and when we have produced the finished products we have the added costs of shipping them to the markets.

The Commission's proposals will damage agriculture, and because of our greater dependence on agriculture than any other part of the United Kingdom the proposals will hit our farmers hardest. I am opposed to them because they do not offer any opportunity for our farmers even to cover inflation. Greater realism about the needs of agriculture is required.

In Northern Ireland the pig and poultry sectors, which have limited coverage in the proposals, are half the size they were when the United Kingdom entered the Common Market. That speaks volumes about what the EEC has done to the intensive sector in Northern Ireland. I shall not labour the point today, but a system must be developed to give us greater access to intervention grain at prices which will allow our farmers to compete on an equal basis not just with the rest of the United Kingdom but with the rest of Europe, especially as Northern Ireland is a net importer of grain. I am asking not for any special advantage but for parity—for a position closer to parity in the prices for the grain that our intensive sector requires to sustain. Nor am I asking for a great increase in production. I am asking for the stabilisation of the half that remains of the industry that we had 11 or 12 years ago. We have the expertise and the health standards to produce bacon and other intensive products as well as, if not better than, other parts of the United Kingdom. We merely ask for equal treatment.

The beef industry requires a period of stabilisation which has not yet been possible. Annual discussions about the variable premium have not helped the industry, as the hon. Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) has said. I appreciate that the Minister has constantly expressed his determination to retain the variable premium for the United Kingdom, but he should now strive to have it taken out of the price negotiations and agreed by our partners as an acceptable form of support. That would be a major stabilising factor and would give confidence to the industry. Other EEC countries can no longer object to that form of support to the United Kingdom beef industry since the introduction of clawback last year.

The premium not only assists the producer but keeps down prices for the consumer. I believe that its disappearance would mean an increase of 10p in the pound in the price of beef to the housewife. This form of support is most suited to the United Kingdom because a far greater percentage of our heifers are slaughtered, mainly for home consumption, than is the practice in other European countries. Dependence only on intervention support, which at present applies only to steers, would have to be modified to take that into account. Moreover, intervention as a support system gives cause for concern because it is costly and creates surpluses rather than helping the consumer.

The Minister should give greater encouragement to the suckler cow herd and consider increasing the suckler cow premium which has remained static since 1982. With the cuts in the dairy herd, the number of calves coming into the beef herds can only decrease, so we should be acting to avert the shortage that will occur in the future. We should also encourage a gradual expansion of sheep farming as this is the only commodity that is not at present in surplus and the United Kingdom has the stock and the capacity for expansion.

The milk industry has been an experiment in how not to implement quotas. It is important that the United Kingdom as a whole retains its share of the quota in Europe. It would be outrageous and deplorable if we lost any of the share that we now have. In Northern Ireland, the implementation of quotas has caused many people to consider production costs and has brought a new awareness and realism to the industry. It is no longer sensible to feed expensive concentrates merely to increase the milk surplus. Northern Ireland opted for an on-farm quota rather than a dairy quota, which was the right decision at the time because it placed the responsibility on the individual farmer. Northern Ireland has responded positively to the implementation of quotas, with a cut of 6·5 per cent. up to the end of January, compared with the rest of the United Kingdom which had greater drought problems last summer. That shows the responsible attitude of the vast majority of Northern Ireland dairy farmers.

For the coming year, Northern Ireland will join the rest of the United Kingdom with a quota on the dairies, but that will not of itself solve all our difficulties. Last year Northern Ireland was supposed to have received an allowance of 65,000 tonnes which would have placed us in an intermediate position between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland, recognising our dependence on grass-based sectors, but many of us would still argue that that allowance was never received. Of one thing I am certain, and I hope that the Minister is also certain of it: we need the same 65,000 tonnes from the Community reserve next year. Indeed, I suggest that the Minister should aim to increase the amount not just for Northern Ireland but for the whole of the United Kingdom.

A further difficulty, of which the Minister is well aware, is the lack of uptake in the buy-out scheme. All these matters are intricately related to the imposition of dairy quotas in Northern Ireland. The buy-out scheme was reintroduced some weeks ago. We now have 12·5 million litres available instead of the 66 million litres that the Minister proposed to purchase. Dairy farmers in Northern Ireland are entitled to expect the Minister to strive to give them the same conditions as the rest of the United Kingdom. I refer to his proposal that diary farmers in England, Wales and Scotland with less than 200,000 litres annual production should be brought up to 1983 production levels. Northern Ireland farmers were told that they had to accept a 10·35 per cent. reduction on the 1983 level because of their extra expansion since 1981 while farmers in other parts of the United Kingdom faced reductions of only 6·25 per cent. to 6·39 per cent. Producers in Northern Ireland, especially the smaller producers, are entitled to the benefits that producers elsewhere in the United Kingdom are to receive.

I add my voice to the call for the abolition of the co-responsibility levy. That is the one way in which dairy farmers could achieve an increase in income without any harmful effect on the consumer. The levy should never have been introduced. It never achieved its aim and there is no chance of its doing so in the future. It is no longer necessary and the industry should not have to bear that burden any longer.

Northern Ireland farmers not only suffer from the imposition of quotas but have to take lower prices for what they produce. When the Secretary of State goes to Brussels to complete the final negotiations, I hope that he will remember that he has the livelihoods and responsibilities of many thousands of people at his disposal. I wish him well during the long nights of negotiation and urge him to bring back a package that will assist farmers not only in Northern Ireland but in the United Kingdom as a whole.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) will be supporting the Government in the Lobby tonight, and I am not clear why the Opposition are voting against us. I believe that the hon. Gentleman should thank my right hon. Friend for what he has achieved in the switch in levy, saving a great deal of expenditure by Northern Ireland.

Farming has been a great success story and farmers and farm workers have done so much in terms of productivity that they deserve our congratulations. It is ironic that that success is now marred by overproduction — whether caused through our domestic policies or through the CAP and price-fixing—which has caused uncertainty and lack of confidence.

We hear those views at conferences and in the press and, more importantly, in the market place and in talking to farmers themselves. High interest rates, overdrafts and loss of investment allowances, too, have all led to low and declining profits. The problem now is how to maintain income while curtailing uneconomic production and ensuring fairness throughout the EC on the issue of price fixing.

I know that our Ministers wish to help farming through this transitional period, which is really not of farming's making. We are at a watershed, and it is vital that we should use the mechanism of the CAP prices to our best advantage. That will be a difficult task, but not as difficult as it would be under a Labour or an alliance Government, when we would have to cope with rates on farms, planning controls and other thoroughly disagreeable policies.

We can lose ourselves in a mountain of statistics, but, whatever the statistics may say, our contacts with farmers and experience of farming tell us more about the facts of life. We know that livestock farmers have done far less well than those who grow cereals. It is unfair that generalisations about all farmers enable the statistician to show that 1984 was a thoroughly good year for profits. No livestock farmers whom I know would agree with that. Profit is a most misleading concept. If one spoke to the members of any branch of the Scottish National Farmers Union or of the National Farmers Union, it would be brought home to one that there is great anxiety in the world of livestock and that it must be—as I believe that it is—the Government's highest priority to redress the balance and to help the dairy, beef, pig, sheep and poultry sectors.

As part of that process, we must begin to develop a truly rural policy. There are some glimmers of light that encourage me to hope that we shall do so in future. We must develop all aspects of the countryside—the village school, the village hall, the bus services, the shops and post offices — in order to maintain a viable rural community of which, of course, profitable agriculture must be the keystone. My right hon. Friend has done exceptionally well in assisting the less-favoured areas. I am glad that he has been able to extend them. It is now the duty of the Commission to consider these areas specifically.

I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend on what he has achieved in terms of conservation. He has achieved a great triumph. There has been a major swing in policy among all the major European agriculture departments. When he negotiates with the Department of the Environment and his own Department I hope that he will be able to ensure that the assistance that may be available to agriculture will be simple in form and will include support for habitats and other aspects of conservation and especially for afforestation.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will reconsider, in that context, the issue of capital grants for draining and fencing. The conservation lobby may wish to persuade us that all drainage is a bad thing. I accept that we do not wish to see the marshes and the wetlands drained unnecessarily, but the regular tile drainage of arable fields and grassland must go on in a rotation system. The tile drains must be replaced regularly. That grant should be maintained at as high level as possible, for obvious reasons.

I welcome what my right hon. Friend has done for the less-favoured areas in respect of livestock in general. There is the hill compensatory allowance, which is vital, the beef premium, the suckler cow subsidy and the sheepmeat regime. He should look carefully at clawback and the seasonal weighting, and at the impact of those factors on the export market, which we should be developing.

I quite agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) that it is most important in the interests of the housewife and the farmer to keep beef out of intervention. Let us eat beef and avoid putting it into store. That is the right policy.

The crucial issue is the dairy sector. This has been a dramatic year. I pay tribute to the Scottish NFU and to the Scottish Milk Marketing Board for their constructive approach throughout the year to helping the dairy farmers in Scotland to come to terms with a very nasty surprise. The panels and tribunals have all done good work. However, we must not underestimate the effect on farms and creameries.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West about the co-responsibility levy. Once we are locked into a quota system, we must look at the levy again. The figure is 3 per cent., of which 1 per cent. has been rescinded this year to help the transition to the quota era. Let us now try to rid ourselves of the other 2 per cent. It is a tax on dairy farmers. It will not affect the price to the consumer but it will have a tremendous impact on the price to the producer. Let us try to remove the rest of the co-responsibility levy. The dairy farmer has really been hit twice, with the dairy quota and the co-responsibility levy. That double impact is less than fair on an industry that works long and hard to produce a worthwhile product.

I am pleased about what my right hon. Friend has been able to do for the producer-retailer and for the cause of flexibility in quotas within the United Kingdom. In the circumstances, the outgoers scheme has been a great success. I hope that when we have additional quota from that scheme my right hon. Friend will be able to move it to the most hard-pressed areas and to some of the producers who have suffered most but who have not received much response from tribunals.

It is not easy to diversify without large resources. Investment is stagnant and bank borrowing is increasing. Interest rates are high and, in Scotland alone, will lead to an increase of some £20 million in 1985—half of last years' supposed income. In 1984, incomes were 7 per cent. lower than in 1982 and only half, in real terms, of those in 1975. That is why we need renewed confidence through the CAP prices system.

Our aims must be to keep grain at a standstill price, to avoid putting it into any form of quota system and to switch any resources from that standstill to livestock, especially with a view to retaining some profitability in the milk sector. As to beef, my right hon. Friend should remember that the suckler herd is now 29 per cent. smaller than it was in 1975, so it is essential to keep up all possible help to less-favoured areas and the uplands. As for sheep, I know that my right hon. Friend is doing his best with the variable premium and the ewe premium. All hill farmers look forward to another increase in wool prices.

My right hon. Friend has done exceptionally well through a most difficult period and has never deserved the criticism that he has received from many directions. He has stuck up for farmers in the CAP negotiations and gained the enormous advantage of environmental assistance. He should keep up the good work. If so, he will get all support from his colleagues who are determined to ensure that agriculture remains profitable and provides employment for the best workers in the world.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I am happy to follow the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro). Although I shall not comment on much of what he said, his reference to the possibility of quotas on cereals is important.

I get tired of Conservative Members reminding us of our experiences under a Labour Government, but today I cannot resist, having listened to the Minister, recalling the things he used to say to Labour Ministers. I welcome the change in the Minister's stance on the cost of intervention buying. I remember when beef stocks were belittled and intervention buying was presented as a great system for farming. Far from the costs of the CAP and intervention buying declining, they have increased in the past few years. The CAP is a grotesque misuse of resources, just as it was under Labour. It involves massive spending on supporting agriculture, and most inefficiently. A more effective system of support would enable us to sustain our farmers and the small producers in, for example, France and Italy.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that, under Labour, British farmers were occasionally paid 45 per cent. less than their counterparts in Germany because of the green pound, and that my right hon. Friend and his predecessor, now the Secretary of State for Energy, have got the CAP into far better shape than did the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin)?

Mr. Strang: If the hon. Lady knows anything about agriculture, the level of production, the level of investment, what happened from 1974 to 1980 and compares that with what has happened since, bearing in mind the fact that investment is the key test of the industry's future, she should be a little restrained. She and the National Farmers Union know that such statements have no basis in fact.

I do not wish to make party political points, but the fact remains that CAP expenditure is continuing to rise sharply. In 1983, it increased by 28 per cent., in 1984 by 14 per cent., and in 1985, on the basis of the Commission's current proposals, it is estimated to rise by 16·5 per cent. Moreover, CAP spending has risen as a proportion of total EEC spending.

I do not blame the Minister for that increase. He knows that it is the consequence of strategic decisions taken by the Government. The Prime Minister and the Government made a great mistake when they put all of their effort into getting a clawback of our contribution to the EEC budget rather than into a more long-term view and trying to change the CAP to help us to get a bigger share of CAP spending.

[Mr. Strang]

I hope that we shall not have the Prime Minister telling us that Spain and Portugal should not enter the EEC because that would increase CAP expenditure. It is equally valid to argue that their accession will help us to get to grips with the problems of the CAP. The Government's policy has been to support the entry of Spain and Portugal. I hope that that continues to be the Prime Minister's policy when she goes to the EEC summit. The Select Committee on Agriculture, of which the hon. Members for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) and for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Nicholson) and I are members, has examined this matter closely and is anxious that British interests, not least fishing interests, are protected, but in my view the case for Spanish and Portuguese entry is overwhelming on political grounds.

I hope that the Government will obtain a quid pro quo in the lamb sector if we have to have a change in the system of payments for premium. The Minister of State knows that there is a strong case for moving away from the sharp fall in price guarantees in June. I put that argument on behalf of Scottish industry. With lamb production the way it is in hill areas, especially in the north of Scotland, lambs will not be finished in June. There is a good case for altering the sharp fall in price, although many of the lambs are bought by lowland farmers and sold in winter. The problem with the lamb regime, as the House was told in the debate on the sheepmeat regime, is that it has been designed to keep our lamb out of the French market. It would be much better to tackle the problem of clawback.

The Labour Government negotiated the beef variable premium scheme in 1975 as part of our renegotiation of the CAP. No doubt Ministers will correct me if I am wrong, but I recall that when the Labour Government left office the regime provided for other member states to implement a variable premium on beef. That regime was changed under the present Government. I do not suggest that there is collusion between the Commission and the British Government, but I do not believe that the removal of the variable premium is a serious possibility. That indefensible proposition is put forward every year, but, even in terms of managing the EEC market, let alone in British terms, there is no case for it.

I hope that we can at least make progress towards a change in the regime that will enable us to make it more permanent, which will probably mean the inclusion of a provision to enable other member states to operate a premium.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: The hon. Gentleman is reminding us of what the Labour Government did, but did not that Government sign the agreement whereby, when we send beef into Europe, we have to repay the subsidy, but when Eire sends beef into Great Britain it does not have to repay the subsidy? That gives southern Irish farmers an unfair advantage over own own farmers.

Mr. Strang: I believe that was the deal that was negotiated by Lord Wilson of Rievaulx when he was Prime Minister. It at least secured some offsetting benefits for manufactured goods.

The Minister of Agriculture is right to take a stand over cereals. We must have no moves towards quotas in cereal production. The right hon. Gentleman rightly said that there has been an imbalance between cereal and livestock production. That is one reason why it is important that we should not introduce cereal quotas. There is an overwhelming case for a free market in cereals and for tackling the problem of cereal surpluses by a policy of price restraint. Quotas mean higher prices in the long term.

Some arguments that apply to cereals do not apply to milk. For example, cereals are a major input in other sectors of agriculture. I should like to make a number of other points about cereals, but I shall confine myself to saying that we are stuck with intervention, though I hope that the emphasis will be on holding to the Commission's proposal for a price cut. The motion makes no reference to that.

I reminded the Minister of Agriculture that his Government were opposed to the introduction of milk quotas. I was not trying to make a party political point, because I have reluctantly accepted milk quotas. I noted at the weekend that the Farmers Union of Wales has come round to accepting milk quotas as a means of achieving a balance between production and demand—though there is still a long way to go.

The cut in United Kingdom production required as a consequence of the quota negotiated by the Minister of Agriculture is greater than the Community average. I acknowledge that it is not as bad as the cut accepted by some member states, but it compares unfavourably with the position of Ireland and France — neighbouring countries which could easily supply the British market.

It is crucial that there should be no further erosion of the British quota as a proportion of the Community quota. The Minister of Agriculture met a deputation from the Transport and General Workers Union on Thursday. I was a member of that deputation. I assume from what he told us that there is no likelihood that we shall be able to increase our share of the quota. Therefore, I urge him to get a settlement in the price fixing round that maintains the 1 per cent. Community cut for the next milk marketing year. We do not want anything worse than that to cope with.

If we have to go to great pains to establish a quota system, we want it to work. I stress to the Minister that that may require a few more civil servants. We also want to maintain the maximum share of production within the Community and to help the parts of this country that have been hard hit by quotas. I refer particularly to west Wales, the south-west, the north-west and west Scotland. As I said at Question Time last week, many of those farmers do not have an alternative to milk. They can only grow grass. Beef and lamb are not viable options because of the size of holdings. Therefore, we have to build into the quota system a means of minimising the damage done in those areas. I visited west Wales with members of the TGWU a few weeks ago and we saw the determination of local people to fight for their communities and their production — just as the miners fought. It was a sign of the importance of this matter to that local economy.

I hope that the Government will not adopt the policy of a free market in quotas proposed by the SDP in the person of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). Such a policy would not be in the interests of milk producers and the areas that have been hardest hit by quotas.

The Minister of Agriculture says that he is committed to leasing, but I urge him to recognise that that must be within the framework of a central agency and controls. It has been suggested that the milk marketing boards could take on that role, but I am not so sure about that. The Government might be well advised to do the job themselves or to set up an agency for that purpose.

It would be unacceptable if wealthy farmers, who may have made a fortune out of cereal production, were able to bid for quotas in an open market against smaller producers in Wales and elsewhere. Even with the system of panels and tribunals, some producers have been hit unfairly by the quotas.

The system of buying quotas, establishing an outgoers scheme and redistributing quotas was a good idea, and there may be a case for pushing it even further. I agree with the Select Committee on Agriculture that we need a parallel scheme to the outgoers scheme offering compensation to workers in agriculture and to those in the dairies, the feed compounders and the milk dependent industries, who lose jobs as a consequence of the implementation of quotas.

Eventually, there will be a horse trading session when the Government will have to make some concessions. The price-fixing exercise should be judged, above all, on what is achieved on cereals and milk. We want changes in lamb and the retention of the beef variable premium, with a commitment to change in the beef regime, but, above all, we need a cut in cereal prices — which is of great importance to the future of the CAP and of our industry —the removal of the co-responsibility levy in milk and the maintenance of Britain's share of the Community quota. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept that we are confident that he will be able to retain the variable beef premium. We wish him well in his efforts in that direction, but he will be judged by the House on the other issues.

5.30 pm

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): When my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was generously giving way during his speech, I intervened to ask him whether he would not have agreed to the extra quota for Eire, had it not been for the quid pro quo of the variable beef levy. He replied that my memory had let me down, and that he had not agreed to the extra quota for Ireland. I therefore remind the House of what he said on the occasion that I had in mind. He made a statement to the House on the final meeting of the Agriculture Council to settle details of the quota. The record reads:

"Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Is my right hon. Friend aware that a settlement that allows Southern Ireland, which greatly contributed to creating the problem, an increase as compared with others members of the EC is disgraceful and not a basis on which many right hon. and hon. Members would regard it possible to grant any more resources to the EEC?

Mr. Jopling: I opposed the proposals for Southern Ireland throughout the discussions, but was forced in the end to accept the package because there would otherwise have been no way in which to have got all the other things that are of benefit to us, especially the continuation of the beef variable premium." —[Official Report, 2 April 1984; Vol. 57, c. 667.]

It was therefore wholly right to ask my right hon. Friend whether, if we lost the beef variable premium, he would insist that Eire should lose the corresponding advantage which it got when we agreed to that increase on condition that we had the continuation of the beef variable premium. If the one does not continue, nor must the other. That was the point that I sought to press on my right hon. Friend. As I have refreshed his memory that his memory, not mine, is at fault, I again ask him to assure us either by intervention now or through his hon. Friend the Minister of State who will reply.

I shall draw attention to only two matters because of the short span of the debate and because many of my hon. Friends wish to speak. First, there are cases in which tribunals have misdirected themselves, because either they have read the regulations wrongly or they have arrived at conclusions that no reasonable person could reach. Under the present system there is no redress for that, as my hon. Friend the Minister told me in a letter. Therefore, a farmer who is ruined by a wrong decision from a tribunal can only go to the High Court and ask for a judicial review. However, that is impossible for most of them, unless they do so in person without a lawyer — because in many cases they cannot get legal aid—or unless my right hon. Friend gives an undertaking that the dairy produce quota tribunals will not ask for costs. That is a wicked way of depriving farmers who have been done down by clear errors of tribunals from getting the only source of justice left to them.

Secondly, the quota system is proving to be the only system which could bring excess milk production under control, as some of us said as long ago as 1977. I am still of the opinion, as I was then, that to have relied on massive cuts in prices to producers would only have resulted in a reduction in milk production at the point of multiple bankruptcy. That system would then have been far worse. The tragedy is that the milk quota system was not introduced when some of us foresaw that happening, in 1977, before the massive French and Irish expansions and, to a lesser extent, expansions in other countries. If it had been introduced then, the quota that could have been allocated would not have resulted in personal disasters, many of which resulted from expansion schemes financed by taxpayers until the day before quotas were introduced with the full encouragement of the national agricultural advisory service, for which my right hon. Friend is responsible. Those facts will not go away.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) is entirely right in saying that if the Government had considered the introduction of milk quotas earlier, done their homework and made contingency plans, the hardships that have been felt this year by the dairy sector, especially in his part of the country and in west Wales, would not have been felt. I am frightened that the Ministry is equally unprepared to deal with the problem of a continuing imbalance between supply and demand in the cereal sector. It was notable how little the Minister had to say about what the Commission had said about that. The Commission drew attention in its explanatory memorandum to the probability that price restraint alone would not in the long term deal with the problem of surplus. Apparently the Minister is not prepared, even now, to take that problem on board. As we suffered hardship in the dairy sector, we can expect also to suffer hardship in a few years' time in the cereal sector.

I do not know why the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) is so rootedly opposed to the introduction of cereal quotas. He did not explain why today. Although I recognise the considerable administrative problems involved in introducing cereal quotas, it is right that both the National Farmers Union and farmers' representatives should consider how best to tackle them, and the Government Departments that will be responsible when the Community tackles the problem.

Mr. Strang rose——

Mr. Maclennan: This is a short debate and the hon. Gentleman has made a speech. I must press on. He misrepresented me when he spoke about the attitude of the Social Democratic party to milk quotas. I remind him that before the Government were prepared to talk about that, we advocated the introduction of milk quotas, subject to three important conditions being met: first, that the position of the small dairy men in particular should be safeguarded; secondly, that there should be a regional framework for the introduction of quotas; and thirdly, that the position of new entrants should be considered. None of those matters was properly considered by the Government before they followed this path. That is partly why we have seen so much suffering, so many bankruptcies and an impossible position created for tribunals, to which the hon. Member for Tiverton properly addressed himself.

I fully support what the hon. Gentleman said about legal costs. It would be outrageous if those who sought judicial reviews were forced to bear the legal costs of the public agency that is responsible for the administration of the scheme. I hope that the Minister has listened to that.

The Minister showed today that, as ever, he is far from having a firm hand on the tiller. Once again, he showed the limitation of his capacity to steer the industry. He has no clear sense of the direction in which he wishes to go. It was noticeable that when he discussed the tests that he would apply to the ultimate settlement in the Community he did not for one moment consider the incomes of British farmers. He talked about what he called a realistic view of market possibilities, and said that the settlement must follow the financial guidelines. He said that all producers and products should be treated on a comparable basis, and talked about the need for effective administration of the schemes throughout the Community.

No doubt each of those factors is worthy of debate, but he failed to mention the predicament of the farmers upon whom we depend, not only for the prosperity of our food production but for the prosperity of rural economies. He has not faced the fact that, under his administration and that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the indebtedness of the industry has become a crippling burden. According to his White Paper, last year borrowing increased by no less than 14 per cent. Thanks largely to the favourable weather, incomes — in the cereal sector especially — recovered substantially, in global terms, from last year's figures. However, tables 26 and 27 of the White Paper show the reality of what has happened to farm incomes: in the livestock sector, the position remains bleak, and for the milk industry as a whole incomes decreased by 50 per cent. during the past two years. It is extraordinary that the Minister should come to the House for the most important agriculture debate of the year and fail to draw attention to the need to tackle those matters, and to have them in mind when negotiating for our national interests in Brussels.

I share the Minister's objective — I hope he is successful—in eliminating the co-responsibility levy. As has been said, it is a tax on food which is naturally treated by farmers as though it were an additional input cost to be recouped by a quota addition to the support price. With the reduction in milk profits such as I have described, perhaps an increase in quota price is justified, notwithstanding the remaining surplus production. It is wrong to try to switch milk production on and off as though it were a light bulb. It is impossible for farmers to adjust to such sudden lurches in direction without tremendous hardship and bankruptcies.

The Government must give some help to milk producers. Beef production has been especially hard hit by the increased cow culling following the introduction of quotas, and there is a considerable case for an increase in the suckler cow premium to encourage quality beef production.

No doubt the Government will attach their usual high priority to the proposal to end the variable premium scheme. Hon. Members on both sides of the House recognise the necessity to resist that proposal, but it must be regretted that, once again, it will not feature as a central objective of the British Government. No doubt when the Minister succeeds in retaining it he will trumpet it as a great success. Every British interest that has been surrendered to save the beef premium, because the Minister failed to put it on a proper lasting basis, will be overlooked. It is an entirely unsatisfactory way to proceed. It is time that the beef premium was put on a longer-term basis, because it is a wholly sensible measure introduced by the previous Administration.

We must change last year's arrangements for lamb, especially the seasonal scale. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East was right to say that it is outrageous that there should be a drop in support in June at the level that was agreed by the Government. The litmus test of the Government's commitment, especially to the hills and uplands, will be whether they succeed in effecting an appropriate change in the seasonal scale.

On cereals, which from a budgetary point of view and the point of view of the expenditure involved are the greatest problem, the Minister will be assisted by the bad spring in continental Europe. The harvest this year is likely to be much below what was thought likely. Although it is true that, to some extent, weather is no longer the conditioning factor that it was, the Minister need only travel through the cereal-growing prairies of France to see what a bad spring it has been. Therefore, I hope that it will not be necessary to attack cereal production too savagely in one year. I recognise the need to edge down prices, and farmers are satisfied that that can be done without undue hardship to the cereals sector and with great benefit to the cereals-using sector. A reduction along the lines proposed will be acceptable.

I commend to the Minister the need seriously to start thinking about the introduction of cereal quotas. It is imperative that we are not caught late again, with the Minister trailing behind the rest of the Community saying, "I was the odd man out and there was nothing I could do. I was outvoted. The package is not mine, but I will do my best to make it work." That will not wash next year.

Mr. Jim Spicer: Throughout his speech, the hon. Gentleman has referred to the British Government beating the table hard. He is the only representative of his party in the Chamber, and he has no support from the Liberal party. What would happen if we had a representative of his party at the negotiations? The alliance has sold the pass in advance and said that there will be no veto and no standing firm, because it is communautaire. What would happen if the alliance were conducting the negotiations?

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman must come to terms with the fact that it is being communautaire to try to tackle the problems of surplus in a way that has a chance of succeeding. That is what the Government have plainly not grasped. Not only is it not communautaire to proceed down the road which the Minister has taken this year and last year; it is profoundly against the interests of the British farming community, about which I have talked during my speech——

Mr. Jim Spicer: No veto.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman keeps saying, "No veto", from a sedentary position. I do not know what he is talking about. The two alliance parties have always been in favour of maintaining the Luxembourg agreement. Where the national interest is at stake, properly defined, we would use the veto, but only then. In any event, the Minister is always the odd man out and does not attempt to wield the veto.

I conclude with a matter that the Minister mentioned but with which he did not deal at great length—the green pound.

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman has made a very clever speech. He has avoided coming to grips with the central question, with which, to do him justice, the official spokesman for the Opposition did deal. Will he tell us what is the view of his party and also of the Liberal party, if he can speak for its members, too——

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): They are not here.

Mr. Jopling: I know that the Liberals are not here, but presumably the hon. Gentleman is speaking for both parties. Can he tell us about the attitude of his party or the Liberal party to the general price proposals that the Commission has put forward? The hon. Gentleman has alluded rather obliquely to cereals, but could he tell us whether the Commission's proposals are too stringent or whether he believes that we ought to be a little more stringent in certain ways? The hon. Gentleman ought in justice to give the full picture to the House.

Mr. Maclennan: I am very gratified at last to have received some praise from the Minister. He has described my speech as a very clever speech. I shall find it useful to refer on other occasions to that bouquet from the Minister. May I say to the Minister, as he said to so many hon. Members who intervened during his speech, that if he reads carefully in Hansard what I have said he will find precisely my reaction to the specific proposals and also my reaction to what he has had to say about them. The Minister will have to do rather better than that.

I want to deal with two points before I sit down. The first relates to milk quotas and their tradability. It is a great disappointment not only to me but to many in the farming industry that the Minister does not appear to understand the need to move towards tradability. It is another example of the Minister running behind opinion instead of leading it, as he ought to do.

As for the green pound, in recent months a small, negative monetary compensatory amount has come into effect in this country. Although I acknowledge the force of what the Minister had to say about the uncertain level of the pound, I believe that during the price fixing negotiations we ought to lay on the table, as undoubtedly will be done by Germany and France, the case for a green pound devaluation. Although there is some instability in the rate of the pound, it is more noticeable in relation to the dollar than in relation to the other European Community currencies. I hope that the Minister will be no less trenchant in his defence of British farming interests than his colleagues in the countries of continental Europe will be in defending theirs.

Sir Paul Hawkins (Norfolk, South-West): May I first refer to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) about the unfairness of tribunals. In Norfolk there is a fairly large number of dairy farmers. One dairy farmer, not a constituent of mine, sold his herd but retained all his in-calf heifers and young stock from a pedigree breeding herd because he had been prosecuted by the Anglian water authority and made to spend a very large sum of money upon putting right the means of disposing of his effluent. Having retained all his young stock, including the in-calf heifers, he wanted to return to milk production. In fact he is producing milk again but he has not been awarded one single gallon of quota. This kind of treatment is grossly unfair and it is one of the injustices that needs to be looked at again, as my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton pointed out.

I apologise for having arrived halfway through the speech of my right hon. Friend. However, I congratulate him upon his forthright and clear explanation. He has received a hell of a lot of stick from those who ought to know better, in particular from the National Farmers Union. Although it cannot be compared to a carthorse, like the TUC, the NFU seems to be rather like an ancient and perhaps valuable motor car that is running on only a couple of cylinders. It does not appear to be looking after the interests of the smaller farmers. The Tenant Farmers Association and the Small Farmers Association would not have developed as they have if the NFU were looking after their interests.

The speech of the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) was excellent. I am grateful to him—as, I am sure, are other hon. Members—for the support that he has given to the Minister in his battle in Brussels. As has already been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), farming has been a tremendous success story in recent years. We are now able to go to the supermarkets and obtain anything that we want. In Poland they have to queue for the smallest rations of meat, butter and other commodities. Who would prefer to live in Poland rather than in this country? British agriculture has been a great success.

Farmworkers are often thought of as walking about with a piece of straw in their mouths. In my part of the country they are highly skilled men. They are very well equipped to look after the very expensive machinery that is used in farming today. When farming falls upon difficult times it seems as though a pack of wolves or hyenas gather round the farming community and try to pull it even further down. Although I am in favour of caring for the environment, I believe that some of the environmentalists have gone much too far. The best way of ensuring the preservation of a lovely countryside and the retention of a beautiful England is to have a profitable farming industry. Farmers look after their farms well, 99 per cent. of them.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): There are no profitable farms in Scotland.

Sir Paul Hawkins: I do not know about Scotland. I have been there only once, although I should love to go there again. However, the opportunity has not arisen.

May I continue by referring to Norfolk, not Scotland, although we had an invasion of Scotsmen in the 1920s and 1930s. The farmers of East Anglia are modern, scientifically minded, and highly efficient, and are quite prepared to accept cuts by increasing yields by using modern strains of seeds and by the use of up-to-date equipment, sprays and artificial manures. If the cutbacks in the amounts of sprays and artificial manures were to mean an increase in livestock on land previously cultivated for grain, this would be a very welcome move. The beef premium is absolutely essential.

Mr. John: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not encourage unduly diversification on cereal farms. It is comparatively easy for farmers in Norfolk to diversify but the reverse process cannot happen on the western side of the country. The hon. Gentleman's suggestion regarding diversification would spell ruin for many farmers in the west who are dependent upon livestock.

Sir Paul Hawkins: East Anglia has always had a high head of livestock. Pig fattening is one of the largest industries in East Anglia. In my youth there were always fattening cattle in the yards in winter. That produced fat cattle when supplies were short from the west country, the Welsh hills or anywhere else. There is room for livestock production on the grain farms, which can use some of their own grain, thus creating more employment in East Anglia, which has been cut back so much recently.

The beef premium is essential. Beef consumption must be increased. The price is far too high at present. Sadly, the best beef is being put into intervention. That is ridiculous.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will agree to the request of the hon. Member for Pontypridd for at least a day's debate. If there were not so much nonsensical legislation we would have time for three days' debate on agriculture. I hope that my hon. Friend will press his colleagues for at least one day. Half a day on this most important subject at what is a turning point for so much in agriculture is essential. We should discuss not just EC prices, but the structure of farming and the rural communities. We have lost far too many family farmers, particularly in my area. They are the backbone of the countryside. We must help and encourage them in the same way that many smaller farmers are encouraged in Germany and France.

I wish my right hon. Friend the best of luck and good fortune in the further meetings that he will have in Brussels.

6.1 pm

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I agree with much of what the hon. Member for Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins) said, particularly his remarks about the contribution which farm workers make in agriculture, especially in his part of the country. He should have added that they are not well paid. One of the aims of agricultural policy should be to try to do more for them without at the same time necessarily giving all farmers higher wages.

I apologise to the Minister and to my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) because I cannot be here for the wind-up speeches. I have a previously arranged outside engagement and must leave at about 6.30 pm. I hope that they will forgive me.

The motion assures us that the Government will ensure that we shall obtain an agreement consistent with the financial guideline. That is a matter of great importance, although it has not been considered in this afternoon's debate.

It would be difficult for us to know whether any agreement which emerges in Brussels will be within the financial guideline. Will the Minister give us some guidance on that? An anomaly goes on from year to year. We are dealing with farm prices in the agricultural marketing year 1985-86 but the financial guideline relates to decisions taken in 1985 which affect expenditure in 1986, the calendar year of the Community. On that ground alone it will be difficult to tell whether any final agreement in Brussels will be within the financial guideline, although we have the Government's assurance that the Commission's proposals come within that.

The new own resource legislation will come into effect on 1 January 1986. No doubt that will come before the House later this year. The own resources available to the Community next year will increase by 15 to 20 per cent. Out of that extra amount must come the cost of accession, and, in particular, the integrated Mediterranean programme which has not yet been agreed within the Community. That will still leave a certain increase for what is called ordinary agricultural expenditure on the present members of the Community whose prices we are debating this afternoon.

I do not understand—I hope that the Minister will give us some guidance — by how much, if the Commission's present proposals come within the present financial guidelines, those proposals could be increased and still remain within the financial guideline. There must be some limit. Are we talking about an extra 1 or 2 per cent. or 5 or 10 per cent? Can the Minister give us an idea? We must bear in mind that we are debating price proposals within the guideline, but the outturn in terms of agricultural expenditure could be well in excess of that. We shall have to watch that this year and in future years.

We have debated the problem of surpluses time and again in the House since the mid 1970s. It was a theme of the Minister's speech and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd. Milk has created major problems of surplus production, intervention stocks and sales on world markets at knock-down prices at a fantastic cost to the CAP, the taxpayer and the consumer. Over several years price restraints on milk and milk products did not achieve their objective and suddenly quotas were introduced. As the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) said, quotas were introduced suddenly and we should have prepared for them, but it is the principle that worries me.

In the circumstances of the CAP I tend to agree that quotas are a good idea, but why is the Minister so optimistic that we can get away with reducing cereal production without considering the need for quotas? He is optimistic. Cereal productivity has increased apace in the past decade or more under the impetus of higher prices in the Community and the investments that cereal producers, large and small, are putting into production—good luck to them—and will go on doing so.

One of the dilemmas of the CAP has always been that we cannot always control the volume of production by price incentives or disincentives. Farming is not like a factory where production can be turned off. It is not always based on economic incentives. There is such a thing as the farming way of life. There are many instances in the post-war history of British agriculture where producers whose whole production was relatively uneconomic have nevertheless gone on producing because of their addiction to the way of life. Who can blame them for that?

We should consider carefully whether a price cut in cereals in particular, which is what we are being offered and what the Minister is supporting and thinks should go further, will be a disincentive. My forecast, for what it is worth, is that it will not and that cereal production in 1985-86 — subject to the weather because obviously there may be a bad harvest—will continue to grow in the long term despite the price disincentive. Therefore, we should be prepared to consider other means.

Cereals are important and will form the crux of the arguments which the Minister will have in Brussels. Government policy on that is unclear. In parliamentary answers in the past week the Government have admitted that neither the Commission nor the Government are proposing that the Council should take any direct action on the volume of cereal production in the CAP. The Government's objective is a better balance, not merely between cereals and livestock, which has always been an objective of British agricultural policy, but a better balance in cereals, whatever that may mean. When I asked the Minister during Question Time last week whether the Government were in favour of an increase or decrease in cereal production in the Community he avoided giving a direct answer. I hope that we are in favour of a decrease in total cereal production because surpluses are getting larger and larger.

Even if all the Commission's price proposals are agreed by other members of the Council, they will be subject to green currency devaluations and revaluations which can make a tremendous difference. Moreover, we have heard from the Minister that there will be difficulties and that it is unlikely that they will be agreed in their present form. The notional prices in the Community as a whole for cereal production for next year are all well and good—perhaps there is a cut—but when we learn what the Commission is proposing on green currency devaluation for France, and appreciate, as Agra Europe has pointed out, that the effect of that green currency devaluation will be to increase the prices to French cereal producers by 1·9 per cent., no wonder the French are sitting back and saying, "Yes, we will accept the Commission price package". It is coupled with a green currency devaluation which will make life for French cereal producers, if not rosy, a lot better than for other countries in the European Community — and France is the largest cereal producer in the Community. That is another reason for our being concerned even about the present Commission price proposal.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd said from the Opposition Front Bench, we have to consider the position of the United States. It will not necessarily affect cereal marketing in the coming year, although, if the dollar were to begin to slide, that could have an effect. My hon. Friend mentioned the United States farm Bill, which will make more surplus grain available from the United States for export to world markets at lower prices, with the cutting back of the Federal budget and the efforts to reduce the United States deficit, and so on. That is with a very strong dollar, which makes United States farm exports relatively uncompetitive in world markets. As hon. Members know, when a country has a very strong currency it is much more difficult for it to export, because the country's goods are so much more expensive for the rest of the world.

If in addition to the United States farm Bill—if it goes through—there is a weaker dollar, that will add even more to the pressures on the Community in regard to costs of disposal of surpluses, because it will be competing with much cheaper world prices which are in large part determined by American export prices. We have to consider that for this year and for the future.

Agra Europe has estimated that the extra cost of the common agricultural policy by 1988-89 could be as high as 1·5 billion ecu as a result of what the United States proposes to do this year.

My last point on cereals—it has not been mentioned in the debate so far—is that the Government and the Commission are looking favourably on the use of surplus cereals for other purposes. I refer to a recent answer by the Minister of State:

> "The Government are always prepared to consider the merits of new uses for grain but we would have to be convinced that a project involving the conversion of grain into plastic or other non-food materials was viable."—[Official Report, 14 March 1985; Vol. 75, c.266.]

In support, the Commission has proposed that there should be some investigation into the possibility of using cereals —the French have taken it up, as naturally they would —for conversion into starch, ethanol and chemicals. Is not that disgraceful when there are millions of hungry and starving people in the world, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa? Yet here we are considering not making food available more cheaply to the rest of the world—there would be some argument for that—but continuing to produce surpluses, not to feed human beings but to turn them into industrial products.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Shame.

Mr. Deakins: We shall be paying for that, and at the same time other people in the world will be going hungry.

The Minister of State's answer could not have been off the cuff because it was a written answer, but I hope that he and his Department will at least reconsider the policy. I believe that there would be tremendous public objection throughout Britain if we were to subscribe to a policy which enabled cereals grown for human consumption to be turned into plastic, ethanol or some other non-food material.

I apologise again to the Minister for the fact that I shall not be present to hear his reply, but I shall read it with great interest. I hope that the debate will enable the Minister to approach his colleagues much more firmly next time so that we may have a full day's debate on a very important subject. We are dealing with between £1 billion and £2 billion of public expenditure from Britain in support for the CAP, the EC and all its works. It is wrong that we should be given only just over three hours in which to debate the matter.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I add my congratulations to those already given to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food not only on his remarks to this House but on the stance that he has taken in negotiations in Brussels.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins) congratulated the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John), on his remarks. I also found myself in agreement with the hon. Gentleman from time to time.

Like my right hon. Friend the Minister, I found the speech of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) clever. Indeed, it was a cunning speech. It reminded me of those exciting, interesting, but rather esoteric discussions that one used to have in the students' union at 2 am over innumerable cups of coffee on the subject of existence or "Am I really here?". I say to my right hon. Friend the Minister that by the time I sit down he will be in no doubt whatever about what to do concerning the price of milk or cereals. The hon. Member for Pontypridd touched on a wide range of subjects, with many exhortations to the Minister. It may have been my fault, but at times I was at a loss to know what specific point the hon. Gentleman was urging on my right hon. Friend.

I agreed with much of what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro). I think he said that it was the efficiency of farming that had brought us to our present problems. That is certainly the case. When I was a lad on the family farm, we were urged to expand and to produce more. Our whole mentality in the industry was that it was our moral duty to produce more from our land, and eventually to hand over good farms to our children and successors, so that they in turn would be able to produce more.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: "Food From Our Own Resources."

Mr. Maclean: Yes, that may have been the slogan, but the attitude of mind to which I referred arose from the fact that during the war we were dependent on the convoys. There was a feeling in agriculture that never again should the British Isles have to depend on food from abroad, and that we should grow as much as we could. That attitude has continued through two generations in farming, and it is still present.

Now, suddenly, in 1985, we find ourselves in surplus in nearly every commodity. If we had not joined the European Community or if we had put the brakes on earlier, it might have been another two or three years before Britain was self-sufficient in dairy products — New Zealand produce is another factor — but in any event we were heading for self-sufficiency. We are self-sufficient in beef and we shall become self-sufficient in sheepmeat, especially if we continue our present expansion, as many farmers are doing. We must seize more export opportunities for sheepmeat. Marvellous things are being done, but we must maintain the pressure. Great quantities of sheepmeat are going into the middle east from Australia and New Zealand. We may soon have a surplus in sheepmeat.

We are now at a watershed in agricultural production, and I feel lost. I wish I could give guidance to farmers. Indeed, I wish I could give guidance to my brother on the family farm. I wish I were able to say, "This is what I think you should do over the next few years," but I cannot see the way ahead. I know that some things cannot continue. I know that we must have a subsidy system to support the small family farm. But if one has a small mixed arable and beef unit, with 70 acres of grain, the subsidy system which gives a cereal grower a reasonable, just and fair living gives to the man with 1,000 acres of grain a grossly inflated income. That is what has caused most of the cereal side of agriculture to get a very bad name in recent years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries complained that farmers are purported to have had a 14 per cent. increase in profits last year when the increase in the capital value of their land is added. That is like saying that hon. Members had a 15 per cent. increase last year because they had a 5 per cent. pay increase and house prices rose by 10 per cent. When we analyse farming income sector by sector, we find that the increase was caused by the grain farmers, who have had an exceptionally good time in the past few years, but it cannot and should not continue.

The Commission's proposals on surpluses are gutless. There should have been an 8 per cent. cut because of the market last year, but it did not ask for that. It could have cut the maximum allowed under the rules by 5 per cent., but it settled for 3·6 per cent. The NFU says that producers need time to adapt to lower prices, but farmers did not need time to adapt to higher prices on the way up. What is good enough on the way up should be good enough on the way down.

We all know that cereal prices are causing distortion in the market. Some of my hon. Friends might not like what I am saying, but they will be left in no doubt of my feelings. Many of my constituents wish that they had 1,000-acre grain farms. In my constituency I have five times the national average of dairy farmers and livestock producers. They, the few poultry producers in my constituency and the few pig producers that are left, together with the beef producers, want lower cereal prices.

A few weeks ago I saw one of the Sunday farming programmes. It may have been the Border Television station Tyne Tees, or it may have been the BBC. Mr. Rowan Cherrington was interviewed on lower input farming. He was asked how big a cut would be needed in cereal prices before it would drastically reduce the surpluses, or before farmers would say, "This is all too much. I am getting out of cereals or cutting down." He replied that it would take a cut of about 30 per cent. before there was any serious difference.

Sir Paul Hawkins: Cherrington always makes funny remarks.

Mr. Maclean: I was naive enough to believe his reply.

If we have evidence to the contrary — that a 10 per cent. cut in cereal prices would solve the problem — let us hear it. However, does any hon. Member believe that a 3·6 per cent. decrease in cereal prices will cure the surpluses? There is no way that it will. That is why we hear demands for quotas. I am gravely suspicious about talk of quotas in cereal production. I am afraid that we would end up with a quota system that might take 10 or 15 per cent. of land out of production, but farmers would then pile on the concentrate, and, with the new grain strains, produce every bit as much as before. The product would be pegged at a price that would be too high, and with the remaining land they would go into beef production and we would end up with beef in Norfolk once again. I do not mind that, provided that it does not destroy the living of my beef farmers in Cumbria. That is what it is all about.

Sir Paul Hawkins: There is much better beef in Norfolk.

Mr Maclean: I regret that my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West has been to Scotland only once. All good Border men and Scotsmen came south for their cattle and their women, in that order. As a good Border man, I assure my hon. Friend that if he comes to Cumbria he will find not only food cooks and women, but, more importantly, the best stockmanship in the country.

My right hon. Friend is right to argue for a price freeze in milk. It gets me no votes in my constituency to say this, but there is no doubt about it. Even quotas have not solved the problem of surpluses. Much as I should like to say to my dairy farmers, "Here is a bit more, because it has been tough over the past few years," I could not put my hand on my heart and justify a price increase in milk. We are now seeing reports in the press that there has been an increase of 17 per cent. in gross margins over concentrates. We are beginning to see what my right hon. Friend said would happen. Although quotas were rushed in, things have settled down. Farmers are beginning to plan, to adjust and to change their inputs to live with the quota system.

I know that many farmers have shown incredible hostility to the quotas, but they were necessary and had to come. I was critical of my right hon. Friend because of the speed with which he introduced quotas. However, it is interesting to note that I now find many farmers who are saying that it is not as bad as they thought it might be, and they feel that they can live within the system. Now we must have the flexibility in all of it that my right hon. Friend has brought to some parts of it.

My right hon. Friend has been good in getting the transferability quotas and in working hard on leasing, but I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) that some hard cases are not covered by the quota legislation, or, if they are, they are being misinterpreted. Farmers will not be able to afford to go to the High Court, so the only solution will be to find a quota from some other source. We shall have to examine the matter again and keep the tribunals open for another year. We shall have to look at it again and find a little more quota from another source to deal with such people.

In my constituency some farmers, who have been on a development scheme, intended to go into milk production later this year. They went to their tribunal and were asked how many cows they would be milking on 1 April. When they said, "None", they were allocated no quota. Other farmers took the advice and played cautious. They were on a development scheme to go up to 60 cows, which is about the minimum viability level—one is not a big farmer at that level—but they played cautious and had about 40 cows. They did not want to expand because they were not sure about the effect of quotas. When their neighbour, who bought all the cows that were going at a cheap price a few months ago when there was uncertainty in the market, was asked the magic question, "How many cows will you be milking on 1 April?", he was allowed a quota of all that he wanted, minus 9 per cent. But the person with 40 cows had to cut production even on that level. We must redress that injustice.

Let us get rid of the co-responsibility levy. There is no longer any case for it. As for the super-levy, I should like my right hon. Friend to say that it will be assessed and collected, if it is to be collected next year, on an annual, not a quarterly, basis. Many dairy farmers are way over in the first two quarters, frantically have to adjust, and may have to pay the super-levy. However, in the third and fourth quarters they may be under, and, at the end of the year as a whole, they may be in balance or even under the level. It would be unfair if they were clobbered because they are making adjustments. Let us average out the whole thing.

The Commission's proposals for lamb would reduce the benefits available to Great Britain under the lamb regime. There is no doubt that they would discriminate severely against British producers. The proposed limitation of the variable premium is acceptable only if there is also a change in the seasonal price scale. That has to be changed to reflect British marketing patterns, if the revenue lost through the cut-off in the weekly variable premium is to be taken into account in determining the annual new premium.

There is no doubt that every hon. Member, and even the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland, feels that the beef premium scheme must remain. We all acknowledge that the United Kingdom is out on a limb on this one. The United Kingdom seems to be the only country arguing for the system, because the Europeans do not like it, but we all know that it is eminently sensible. It puts the best bits of beef down the throats and into the stomachs of the housewife and her family, and that is where it should be. The prime cuts of beef should not be stuck into intervention.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West spoke about the success of British agriculture. I saw a slogan on the rear window of a young farmer's car in Cumbria, a slogan that all hon. Members should remember. It said, "Don't criticise British farmers with your mouth full." Other countries have to queue for grisly scraps of meat, but we have some of the best beef. Let us keep the variable beef premium scheme and make sure that beef is eaten.

What can my right hon. Friend do in Brussels? How can he keep the scheme? He should not make any concessions on milk, except possibly to permit a small price increase. I should like to see a freeze in prices, but as a fall-back position, to keep the beef variable premium, I should concede a small price increase in milk. We cannot make any concessions on lamb or sheep. We must demand a larger cut in cereal prices. I should concede only the 3·6 per cent. reduction, if we must do that, to keep the beef variable premium scheme. If we go in threatening that we want a bigger cut in cereal prices, that may be the quid pro quo for keeping the beef variable premium. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will say that that may form part of his negotiating stance.

6.30 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I rise just in time to speed my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) on his way out of the Chamber with the bad news that for some years millions of pounds of British taxpayers' money have gone into converting British grain into starch for chemical feedstock. My hon. Friend's fears are not only well founded; unfortunately, they are already to be seen in fact.

[Mr. Nigel Spearing]

I am glad that we have heard from hon. Members who represent Norfolk constituencies. I want particularly to take up one remark by the hon. Member for Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins) about family farms. It appears that the EEC is incapable of providing the policies for which it is ostensibly in being. I thought that it was the very objective of keeping people on the land that was one of the reasons for having a common policy.

The hon. Gentleman also dealt with another important topic, bearing in mind that Halvergate marshes are in that county. It concerns conservation. The hon. Gentleman was a little hard on some people because today we have a system of high inputs and high outputs and, if maximum profits are based upon such a system, land values are related to that system of farming.

We need a system of farming of reasonable or medium inputs and reasonable and medium outputs which both provides the farmer with a reasonable margin on which to live and at the same time is good husbandry so that our farms can be passed on in good heart to those who come afterwards.

I put it to the House and especially to hon. Members representing Norfolk constituencies that that is not happening. The common agricultural policy neither encourages it nor permits it.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Spearing: I regret very much that I cannot give way. The Government have chosen to devote only half a day to this debate, and I have only four or five minutes left to me.

It is neither right nor proper to debate the price mechanism for British agriculture in three hours. It is disgraceful. The Leader of the House and the Government have been criticised heavily about their parliamentary timetable and their attitude to Parliament. This debate is a prime example of the way in which they treat hon. Members and of their apparent contempt for agriculture. I appreciate that we have had only three hours or so in the past three years, but I do not feel that this is an adequate way to treat the House.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State was good enough to appear before the Select Committee on European Legislation, of which I happen to be the Chairman. The hon. Gentleman gave us an hour of his time last week. As a result, we have produced not a "Gone with the Wind" volume and not a 100 page memorandum, but we have tried to present a 22-page summary, which is in the Vote Office and will be published as House of Commons Paper 5/XIV in due course, of the whole of these difficult negotiations.

Let us be under no illusion. Unlike tomorrow, when the House will be invited to decide on a system of taxation, and unlike the Estimates on a system of expenditure, the House has lost control of British agriculture. We do not know what the prices will be. There will be no real estimate of the expenditure, although it is in a notional budget. Even the Commission's best efforts are only estimates. We do not know the price level. All that we know from what the Under-Secretary told us last week is that the likelihood is that the Council will decide on price scales which are higher than those that the Commission has proposed. That is bad news for the British taxpayer, even though it may be preferred by some other members of the Community.

Contrary to the Government's wishes, and contrary to the terms of the motion, the Under-Secretary will not be able to get what he wants. He may not even be able to salvage what the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) wanted him in logic to salvage—the beef premium.

Life in the EEC does not work like that. It is package bargaining all the time. A lot of people foresaw it, hence the speech and the interventions by the hon. Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) which, welcome though they may be, echo some of our remarks 10 years ago. I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the club.

I take up a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow, which was also touched upon during the Select Committee's proceedings, about the prospects for the control of agricultural expenditure. I am sure that the Under-Secretary will agree that the so-called mechanism will not be assessable until this debate two years hence, in March 1987, for the reasons that my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow and I gave the other day during Question Time.

Secondly, this agricultural disciplinary mechanism, of which there was talk at Fontainebleau, is applicable only in respect of the guarantee scheme. It does not include guidance money which may be given out in some form of compensation.

Thirdly, we do not know whether the mechanism will work at all because it is not obligatory and it is not written into the legislation. It is only a conclusion and a desire of members of the Council.

Fourthly, the base from which the mechanism is to be started is the average of prices in 1984 and 1985. Therefore, there is every incentive for other members of the Community which do not agree with the Government's point of view to up prices in 1985 so that the threshold from which we start is higher than it would be otherwise.

I fear from the examination of the Under-Secretary by the Select Committee and from the contents of its report that there is naught for our comfort and naught for our desire in the prospects for this agricultural price round, which is outside the control of the House. The Minister of Agriculture may be a tiller of the soil, but his hand is not on the tiller because the House has no rudder on its agricultural ship.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Mr. John Home Robertson.

Mr. McQuarrie: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will recall that earlier today we had a private notice question after Question Time which took up half an hour of the time of the House. This debate was supposed to continue until seven o'clock. It has been reduced by that half hour. I seek your guidance——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. We are governed by a decision made by the House some time ago that this debate should end at seven o'clock. I am afraid that there is no question of injury time.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr.

Spearing) has had to cut short his speech. We all know what a deep interest he takes in these affairs, and I have no doubt that he could have enlightened our proceedings considerably more than the limited time available to him enabled him to do.

We have had an interesting debate on the farm price proposals. As my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) said, the documents are physically weighty —to be precise, 1·6 kilos. They cover everything from sunflower seeds to silk worms. This mass of detail cannot conceal the failure of the Council of Ministers to address itself to the scale of the problem which the CAP has generated. I rather doubt whether mere amendments to the policy will ever succeed in achieving the policy's stated objective of protecting both consumers and producers.

The hapless Commissioner, Mr. Frans Andriessen, looks rather like the Dutch equivalent of the sorcerer's apprentice about to be overwhelmed by the surpluses being generated by the common agricultural policy, which are massive. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State should know that even in British terms we are set to have a carry-over of about 3 million tonnes of wheat in intervention stores into the next crop year—wheat which was harvested in 1984 and which will still be in intervention stores after the harvest of 1985. That is a sign of the scale of the problem.

The difficulty with the CAP is that it is paying too much cash to the wrong farmers for producing too much of the wrong food. The original intention was to support the incomes of smaller farmers. I suppose that it is predictable that an indiscriminate high-price intervention system has created a disproportionate incentive for bigger producers and perverse penalties for consumers. The result is a grotesquely distorted agriculture industry. We have farmers growing for intervention rather than for a market. We also have excessive food prices for consumers, and there is still a continuing struggle to survive in the so-called less-favoured areas. The CAP appears to be failing on practically all counts.

The debate has demonstrated growing despair on all sides about the basic concept of the CAP. It is time that we thought of more constructive and positive ways of supporting rural areas and agricultural enterprises which need to be sustained in order to protect Britain's rural economy. It is worth remembering that some farming areas already face a crisis. It has been drawn to my attention that even now in Scotland the net farm income for the current year is likely to be about £141 million, while bank borrowings for farmers in Scotland stand at £870 million. Thus, it is not surprising that, despite all the money supposedly thrown at the industry, some people face bankruptcy in certain sectors.

I wish to mention some specific commodities, starting with cereals. As has been repeatedly said, we have 30 per cent. too much grain in the EC. On the one hand, the Commission proposes a 3·6 per cent. net cut in prices for cereal producers, and, on the other, the Minister suggests that there should be a 5 per cent. cut. However, both of those proposals would have only a minimal impact on the level of cereal production in the EC. Tinkering with prices will not solve the major problems. The minor adjustments which the Minister or the Commission suggests would not be sufficient to encourage a significant rise in consumption or to deter effectively the increase in production.

It is too late anyway to do anything about surpluses in 1985-86, because the crops have already been planted. But even for the future, minor price cuts will probably stimulate extra production as farmers try to maintain income by boosting production. In that sense, I disagreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang), who referred to the possibility of quotas.

It would take absolutely savage price cuts to have a significant impact on cereal production. Indeed, I think that that was the point made by the hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean). Such cuts would lead to bankruptcies among many small farmers, and that sort of measure would be politically intolerable for any party.

When I hear the Minister going on about price restraint I cannot help thinking that I have heard some of the arguments before. Only a year ago, the same Minister said the same things about milk. Perhaps we are going full circle, because the NFU and the farming press now publicly canvass the idea of quotas for cereal production. Quotas could be a fairer mechanism for controlling cereal production, because they can protect the interests of the smaller growers. The concept of quotas has, however, been given a bad name, probably because of the shambles that the milk sector has been suffering from for the past 12 months, largely due to the Minister's hasty introduction of quotas.

But with that in mind, I sincerely hope that the Minister will at least consult the industry about contingency plans for cereal quotas. Incidentally, before we all go overboard about cereal surpluses, we should pay heed to the fact that some areas would dearly love to have the volume of surpluses that Europe has. I hope that the Commission will do more about exporting some of them to areas that desperately need them, such as sub-Saharan Africa.

I shall deal briefly with beef and sheep. The variable premiums must be retained. They are good for consumers and producers, and scrapping them would simply put 7p a pound on the price of meat for consumers. There is nothing to be gained from doing that. I agree with all those who have referred to this issue. The Minister must ensure that the premiums are retained.

The Minister already knows what we think about the way in which he has handled the dairy sector in recent years. He has been stampeded into a quota system that has discriminated unfairly against British farmers, and which falls miles short of the objective of bringing dairy production into line with demand — about 12 million tonnes of milk short per year. National quotas will presumably have to be revised downwards sooner or later in order to get surpluses down to a strategically sensible level. But the House must make it clear that British dairy farmers have already borne more than their fair share of last year's cuts. We must demand that other nations bear an appropriate share of the next round of cuts, whenever they come.

The quota system and the super-levy give us ample power to control production, and I agree with all those who have said that the co-responsibility levy should be scrapped. There is no need for it, in addition to the other measures that are available to the Minister. The Minister should be familiar with our views about how the quota system should be made to operate more flexibly and fairly. At this stage, my only observation is that British dairymen have taken a hammering over the past year, and our objective should be to ensure that dairy farmers can make a reasonable return from producing milk within their quota restrictions, in so far as that is compatible with the interests of consumers.

Farming organisations are deeply concerned about the Government's lack of leadership. We know that the Government's main objective in life is to cut public expenditure, and they are doing that in relation to national support for agriculture and things such as agricultural research. We also know that the Government have no positive strategy to sustain the British rural economy. They must stand condemned for that. I wholeheartedly support the call of my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd for a White Paper on British agricultural policy. It has been too long since my right hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) published the last White Paper on that subject.

This package will not achieve any radical change. Inasmuch as the Minister says that he is prepared to fight for effective controls on production while defending the special British interests, we support him. However, his performance in opening the debate did not inspire great confidence—[Interruption]. I listened carefully to what he said and on no fewer than four occasions he said that he would give way just one more time. On the fifth occasion, when the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) stood up, he threw up his hands in despair and said that it was a lost cause.

Sir Richard Butler has said that the Minister is ineffective and inept. I sincerely hope that the Minister will prove that judgment wrong in the coming negotiations. The British housewife, British farmers and the British taxpayer depend on his ability to get a fair settlement.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): The debate may have been relatively short, but it has been very constructive and thoughtful, and much has flowed from it. The tone was set by the speech of the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John), which was positive and reflective in its analysis. However, the tone of the debate was slightly let down towards the end of the speech of the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson). The example that he chose to show a lack of determination on the part of my right hon. Friend the Minister was both trivial and far from the point.

The debate has also been marked by a recognition in all parts of the House, perhaps for the first time in such debates, that we face a new situation because of the arrival of persistent surpluses in a considerable number of products. They are the result of what my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) rightly called a great success story. In that sense, it has been a realistic debate, with the exception of the contribution of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). As so often happens with the alliance, he tried to make his speech appeal to all outside interest groups without facing up to the critical policy decisions. It was a cunning speech, but I think that the House saw through it and I hope that others will. He failed to say precisely what the alliance would propose on prices, yet that is what we were looking for. He knew that it would mean difficult decisions, but he was not prepared to face up to that.

Mr. Maclennan: Read the record.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall read the record, but I heard what the hon. Gentleman said.

I was anxious to let hon. Members speak in the debate, so I have had to cut short my speech. Consequently, I shall have to concentrate on only a few of the main points raised, which involved the cereal, milk and beef sectors. I have taken note of what has been said about all the other matters to which I do not have time to refer.

The cereal sector is at the heart of this year's negotiations. The projected expenditure in the cereals sector is running at a high level, although nothing like as high as in the milk and dairy produce sector. The latest Commission estimate for the 1985 calendar year is about £1,420 million, with the possibility, depending on what happens to the dollar, of a further increase. The estimates suggest that that could mean a further 700 mecu to 1,000 mecu, depending on what is included, for every 10 per cent. weakening of the dollar. We do not know if and when that will happen, but it is a possibility about which we must be fearful. It is right to concentrate on that sector, not only because of that, but because of the importance of achieving an even better balance between the livestock and cereal sectors.

Hon. Members have commented on our approach this year and urged further restraint on prices than that proposed by the Commission. There are a number of reasons why it is right for the Government to take their present line on prices rather than the alternatives. First, the proposal is on the table and it is likely to be negotiated this year. Secondly, price restraint linked to the guarantee threshold, if properly applied, can be effective. The House should not underestimate its effects.

We are not talking about the price support level alone. A 1 per cent. cut was made at last year's price fixing. We are urging a 5 per cent. cut this year and the Commission is proposing a cut of 3·6 per cent. In addition, if harvests follow their present trend for a number of years, the guarantee threshold will bring about further reductions.

The delay in intervention payments introduced at the beginning of 1984 cut prices by about £5 per tonne. The reductions in the premium for the intervention buying of bread-making wheat and the 3 million tonnes quota for that type of intervention in 1984, followed by this year's proposal almost to eliminate intervention for bread-making wheat, will also have their significant effect.

We are talking about significant reductions in support prices in real terms after taking account of inflation. The National Farmers Union, in the memorandum that it sent to hon. Members in advance of today's debate, said that the Commission's proposals would "reduce cereal prices by over 4 per cent. in nominal terms. Such a cut, following last year's price reduction and changes in intervention payment arrangements, will substantially reduce producers' returns and discourage production."

The scheme must be rigorously applied over a period of years. If it is not, we shall have to face more disruptive and less attractive alternatives. We have done our homework on all the alternatives so that we are prepared for any future debate. That work points out the real disadvantages of such alternatives as quotas in the cereal sector. The current favourite among those who are looking for alternatives is the co-responsibility levy, to which so many hon. Members have objected today in relation to milk. That is the alternative that is most likely to be put forward. I believe that we are right in this year's price negotiations to take the line that we are taking on the reduction in support prices.

The hon. Member for Pontypridd asked whether the Commission had made any estimate of the likely production under the 3·6 per cent. proposal. Such calculations involve many imponderables, not least the forthcoming harvest. I am not aware of any precise estimates by the Commission. We shall certainly discuss that in relation to our position.

The milk price review for this year attracted attention to concentration on the co-responsibility levy. My hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) referred to this and many other hon. Members urged that the co-responsibility levy be abolished. My hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West asked what effect it was having. The levy still produces funds of about £380 million, or 530 mecu. The key programmes, in order of expenditure, are milk powder stock-feed, the use of butter in ice cream and pastries, the school milk scheme and publicity and promotion within the Community. If the co-responsibility levy disappeared this year, those programmes would disappear, or alternative means of financing them would have to be found—or a combination of both.

We certainly want the co-responsibility levy to be phased out, although other member states do not. Some other way would then have to be found of financing such measures or of achieving savings. I am aware of the feelings in the House and the agriculture industry about the co-responsibility levy. We share those feelings because it is clear that the levy has not reduced production.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) referred to what my right hon. Friend the Minister said on 2 April. I wish that I had more time to go into the details and the background. My right hon. Friend never suggested that there was a direct trade-off between increased Irish milk production and the beef premium scheme. What happened was much more complicated than that. Many other things were of benefit to us as well as the beef variable premium scheme.

At the ultimate stage of negotiations, if we had voted against the increase in milk quotas to southern Ireland—which we opposed throughout, but which other member states supported — we should not have defeated the proposal. However, we should have lost the beef variable premium scheme because no one else would have supported that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton also asked about the costs of judicial reviews. I have taken note of what he said, and I shall reflect on it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries urged that we should consider other hard-pressed areas, in relation to the quota system, which are not at present taken care of by the tribunals. We hope to make an announcement soon about secondary quotas this year as the tribunals reach the end of their work, and about money for the outgoers scheme. Our declared aim is to help the small producers next year and the exceptional hardship cases through the outgoers scheme. We shall then have to consier what scope we have to help others, and how to allocate that help. We have been keeping a list of the cases that current regulations exclude. I cannot make any promises, but we shall be examining that aspect.

From all sides a call has been made for the retention of the beef variable premium scheme. We have made it clear, and we shall do so in the negotiations, that retention is the United Kingdom's wish. Several speeches have emphasised the argument that we have constantly used about the scheme.

Regret has been expressed that the scheme has to be renewed annually. We have been urged to make the scheme more permanent. The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland mentioned this. His Government and that of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) negotiated that annual renewal originally. I do not know whether there were difficulties, but it is more difficult to negotiate a permanent retention once the original decision has been taken.

I regret that it has not been possible to answer all hon. Members. We have heard interesting comments on what the Government should be doing in the current negotiations. I warn the House that they will not be easy. There are already signs that some member states are losing sight of market and financial realities. It is extremely helpful to know that in taking the line outlined by my right hon. Friend we are carrying with us a surprisingly wide spectrum of views in the House, coming from quarters that do not usually agree. However, on this occasion they have agreed with us, and have given us support in what we are seeking to achieve.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 4582/85, including Addenda I, II and corrigendum and III, No. 4637/85 on the situation of the agricultural markets in 1984, No. 6248/84 on the designation of milk and milk products, No. 11172/84 on the production refunds for starch, and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's unnumbered explanatory memorandum of 16th July 1984 on the payment of an additional national aid to German farmers; and supports the Government's intention to seek an agreement on 1985-86 farm support prices and related measures which builds on the success achieved in 1984 in introducing greater realism into the operation of the Common Agricultural Policy, is consistent with the financial guideline for agriculture, maintains a policy of price restraint in the Common Agricultural Policy, avoids discrimination against United Kingdom interests, and takes account of the interests of United Kingdom producers, consumers, traders and food processors.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can you help me on a matter of some difficulty? I wonder whether you have seen the 15th report of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments for the Session 1984-85, which deals with the regulations that we shall be discussing tonight. Paragraph 3 states:

"In oral evidence, the Departments pointed out that while the England and Wales Regulations carry one alphabetically arranged list, the Scotland Regulations carried three separate alphabetical lists. There were still, however, differences between the two Regulations which were not intended and which had arisen through printing and compilation errors."

It went on to say that the lists were not accurate and would have to be amended by subsequent instruments.

I recognise the difficulties of the Committee as regards what was or was not in the list. It was a morass of different lists which were difficult to cross-reference. It was thought that there were substantial differences between the English and Scottish appendices. It has now become clear that, thanks to a great deal of effort at the last minute, most of the discrepancies have been ironed out. However, some still remain, and I think that that is common ground between the Government and the Opposition.

I understand that the Scottish list leaves out Vicks coldcare capsules, and that a cough syrup called Guaiphenesin will still be available for prescription in Scotland under the NHS. On the English list, Vicks inhalor has been missed out, but I presume that it can be prescribed under the NHS in Scotland.

It is clear that those are errors and that the Government's intention was that the appendices to the two sets of regulations should be identical. However, they are not identical. That is a mark of the chaos and confusion, the muddle and haste, with which the whole scheme has been thrown together by the Scottish Office and, I suspect, its colleagues south of the border. I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, where that leaves the House. We are being invited tonight to accept regulations which, by the Government's public declaration, do not have the effect that was intended. That is bound to lead to a great deal of confusion and difficulty in Scotland and in England.

I also wish to ask you about the Scottish schedule, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is a remarkable document to lay before Parliament. Pages 31 and 32, for example, are spattered with pen emendations. It looks as though a Victorian clerk with an inefficient quill pen has been trying to improve the draftsmanship before the fair copy was ultimately made. I wonder about the standing of the pen additions interpolated between the lines and added at the bottom of the page. Do they carry full authority and are we to take them seriously?

The main point is: what is the standing of the regulations and how can we amend them? We are in the ludicrous position that, because of the incompetence and inefficiency of the Scottish Office and the DHSS, Ministers are asking us to accept regulations that, quite clearly, are not the ones that they intended to lay before Parliament. That is a thoroughly unsatisfactory position. I ask your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on how we can protect ourselves from the results of such maladministration.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In view of the serious anomalies that have been disclosed by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), can you guide us on whether there should be a separate debate for Scotland so that we are not forced to debate something that applies to England and Wales and into which, by cross-reference and the sort of notations made in the statutory instrument alluded to by my hon. Friend, Scotland will be brought without a debate of its own?

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When I raised this matter last week during business questions, I thought that the Leader of the House was extremely helpful and constructive when he said that the anomalies and discrepancies that the DHSS and the Scottish Office had admitted in evidence to the Joint Committee would be dealt with by relevant Ministers. Obviously, that would clear up many of the difficulties faced by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

I appreciate that the choice of Ministers in any debate is not a matter for you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but Scottish Members face the difficulty that departmental Ministers, the Minister of State and the Secretary of State for Social Services, will be delivering the opening and concluding speeches. While I do not doubt that they will refer to the difficulties facing Scotland, it is predominantly a matter for the Scottish Office. Therefore, it is incomprehensible that Scottish Members should be asked to accept the regulations.

An official, in reply to a question relating to the difficulties, said:

"I think, Sir, that there may be difficulties, but we cannot, at the moment, gauge the extent of that. This has only just been drawn to our attention and we have not had an opportunity to collate the lists in any detail."

If the Departments have not had an opportunity to collate the two lists, surely it is utterly unreasonable, without a speech from the Scottish Office Minister responsible for the Health Service in Scotland, for the House to make a decision on the lists.

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As the acting Chairman of the Joint Committee, it may be for the assistance of the House to know that the report is available in the Vote Office as is the evidence that was taken and the written memorandum. If hon. Members avail themselves of the opportunity to consult the report, they will be in a better position to assess the merits or otherwise of the regulations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The House is grateful to the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy). The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) referred to the Ministers who would speak in the debate. That is not a matter for me, but I do not doubt that what he said will have been heard by Ministers.

I must tell the hon. Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) that the decision to debate the two prayers together was agreed by the House on 12 March.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) for giving me advance notice of his point of order. I have looked at the 15th report, and I must tell him that there is nothing that invalidates the regulations before the House. I do not doubt that what he has said will be taken into account in the debate and in any subsequent Divisions when the Questions are put to the House. There is nothing that I can do this evening. The Ministers will have heard the hon. Gentleman's remarks and will, no doubt, take them into account.

Mr. Dewar: I do not wish to delay the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, is it not unsatisfactory that the House should be presented with regulations which, on the Government's admission, are not the ones that they intended to lay? The result is that a minor number of drugs —although significant in themselves—will be available in either England or Scotland but not in both? Is there no way in which a manuscript amendment could be tabled, given the fact that the Scottish regulations are already spattered with manuscript amendments?

I hope that you will not think that I am in any way seeking to take advantage of you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but, as an ordinary Member, I have the greatest difficulty in deciphering the last item added in ink at the bottom of page 31. Perhaps you could help by telling me which drug is referred to there. If so, you are certainly a better man than I am.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): Perhaps I can help the House. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) is correct in saying that there are one or two differences. I think he will concede that they are very minor differences. There are three drugs at issue out of a list of about 1,760. The main complaint was of spelling mistakes. For instance, "Scott's husky biscuits" came out as "Scott's husky buscits". I think, however, that the hon. Gentleman's acumen is such that his comprehension of the regulations will not be affected. In direct reply to him, I should state that we shall be putting amending regulations before the House to amend the mistakes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No doubt the House will take into account what has been said by Members on both Front Benches.

7.10 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the National Health Service (General Medical and Pharmaceutical Services) Amendment Regulations 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 290), dated 1st March 1985, a copy of which was laid before this House on 1st March, be annulled.

In explaining why the Labour party strongly opposes the regulations I shall begin with three quotations. The first is:

"It is almost impossible to establish whether the introduction of a limited list of drugs will in itself produce any financial saving for the NHS. What does seem apparent is that any attempt so to do is likely to arouse hostility, result in higher administrative costs, affect the pricing of drugs and the industry, generate unwelcome pressures for GPs and pharmacists, and possibly cast some doubt on the Government's intentions towards the standard of provision of general medical services in the NHS."

That quotation comes not from the British Medical Association, the Royal College of General Practitioners, the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry or the Labour party but from the DHSS itself in evidence to the Greenfield committee in 1981. Perhaps the Secretary of State should read that.

The DHSS document summarising the consequences of introducing a limited list states:

"Export sales of pharmaceutical products would be likely to suffer (countries with central control of the supply of medicines would tender to purchase only those products on the list); research would suffer (the uncertainties of whether a product might eventually gain acceptance on the list might inhibit research); competition would suffer (although competition in pharmaceuticals is imperfect, it does arise because companies seek to produce alternatives to existing successful medicines and a limited list would discourage this); investment would suffer (one of the attractions of the UK as a base for research and production of active ingredients is the existence of a local market open to all licensed products)".

Perhaps the Secretary of State should read that, too.

The third quotation reads:

"we have resisted any system of limiting the freedom of a doctor to prescribe whatever he thinks his patient needs. Not for us are such devices as limited lists, black lists, the compulsory substitution of generics, or the financial pressures involved in reimbursement regimes or the like. We talk about the doctor's freedom to prescribe. But what we should really talk about is the patient's freedom to be treated as his doctor recommends."

Those are not the words of the last Labour Minister for Health. They are the words of the Tory Secretary of State for Social Services on 2 April 1981 and they reveal beyond any doubt the complete somersault on thinking that the Government are trying to palm off as a common-sense development.

That is a devastating indictment. The present Secretary of State has answered none of the objections of his Department or of his predecessor. In previous exchanges on this we have been treated to one of the most unconvincing exercises in justification of an over-hasty, half-baked scheme that I have ever heard in the House. I can think of no starker example in recent years of a Secretary of State being so entirely contradicted by the evidence of his own officials. By any standards, this is a rushed, ill-thought-through and damaging measure. It has been condemned by almost every organisation associated with the National Health Service and it is being forced through precipitately before essential parts of the scheme are in place.

From the Department which gave us the housing benefit scheme which the Tories described — that was a Freudian slip—which The Times described as we now have the limited list, which has all the same hallmarks in terms of sensitivity and sophistication.

"the biggest administrative fiasco in modern times"

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): This may sound strange coming from the Conservative side, but many of us think that the Opposition are playing the drug companies' game. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that many of those companies are trying to force through changes in their favour to safeguard their profits? This is the only country to allow an entirely unlimited list. Why is what is good for other countries —including Scandinavia, where there are some Socialist Governments—so bad for this country? Will the hon. Gentleman address himself to those points?

Mr. Meacher: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we are not playing the ABPI game. We are playing the patient's game, as the previous Secretary of State did until the Treasury proved too strong for him. In fact, important countries such as Sweden do not have a limited list.

Mr. Thomas Torney (Bradford, South): Is my hon. Friend aware that the proposals will cause considerable unemployment in the drugs and chemical industry? Evidence to that effect has been submitted to me by my trade union, the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, which organises people in that industry.

Mr. Meacher: I repeat that none of us is playing the drug companies' game and I shall certainly not be using the arguments and techniques of the ABPI, of which I disapprove as much as anyone else.

The measure will certainly lead to significant unemployment. The Secretary of State has yet to answer that point or to give his estimate of the likely job losses.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: No, I should like to make some progress. Many hon. Members wish to speak. The hon. Gentleman may have a chance to contribute later.

This measure was introduced without a shred of consultation with the medical profession. At 3.15 pm on 8 November, during a routine negotiating meeting, DHSS officials pushed towards the chairman of the general medical services committee of the British Medical Association a brown envelope containing a letter from Dr. Acheson, chief medical officer at the DHSS, setting out the proposals which the BMA then saw for the first time at the same time as the Secretary of State was making his announcement to the House.

Because there was no consultation, the earlier proposed list was so ill concocted and so abbreviated that it looked like the thin end of a very thick wedge. It resembled an ill-disguised attempt to begin the shift to the privatisation of clinical medicine. Even with the longer final list, that suspicion has by no means been fully removed. There is a report in The Guardian today that the Government are considering requiring patients to pay for treatment by their doctors through a voucher system. The Secretary of State should immediately disown that report if it is not true. I will gladly give way to him if he will do so. If he does not do so, our suspicions will be substantially increased.

Perhaps the clearest sign that these proposals are being rammed through in far too precipitate and ill-digested a form is that there is still, with only two weeks to go, no appeals machinery in place, no agreement with the BMA to allow general practitioners to prescribe black-listed drugs in special circumstances, and no settlement of the appalling shambles of the arrangements in Scotland.

A week ago, officials of the DHSS and the Scottish Office admitted to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments that Parliament was being asked to approve a Scottish black list that was inaccurate in several items. When asked why the English and Scottish lists did not tally as they were supposed to do, the DHSS official said:

"It was because they were laid in something of a hurry that there were some errors of compilation".

It is monstrous that Parliament should be asked to pass regulations that are known to be significantly inaccurate. The Government should withdraw them until correct regulations can be put before the House.

There have been so many zigzags and voltes-face in the Government's handling of the matter that it is beginning to resemble the terminal voyage of the Belgrano, with exactly the same smokescreen of innuendoes and misinformation.

In 1980, the then Minister for Health said that he was not yet persuaded that a limited list would of itself produce lasting economies in the cost of the NHS or necessarily be in the best interests of patients.

That is not all. As late as 22 November 1983, the present Minister for Health said—[Interruption.] It is not funny. To people outside this place this is an extremely serious matter. What the Government are doing offends millions of people. The Minister for Health said:

"We are not convinced that such a list confining the judgment of doctors"——

hon. Member should note that phrase—

"would be in the best interests of patients."—[Official Report, 22 November 1983; Vol. 49, c. 112.]

Now we are told, in a complete reversal of policy, that the interests of patients will not be jeopardised. I wonder who is persuaded of that.

On the comprehensiveness of the limited list, the original DHSS letter of 8 November of last year stated, referring to the original list of 31 items:

"An adequate range of cheap and effective generic drugs will remain available for those cases where doctors feel that the clinical needs of individual patients genuinely require such medication."

If the Government originally claimed that 31 items were adequate, why has the Secretary of State now increased the list three and a half times to about 113 items, and why should his assertion that it is now comprehensive be any more credible?

On the question of flexibility, the DHSS was at first totally uncompromising. In a letter of 4 February this year to the BMA, Mr. Pilling, a DHSS official, said:

"From 1st April GPs will not be able to issue NHS scripts for any listed drug under any circumstances. To do so will be a breach of their terms of service."

A month later, the Government are having second thoughts yet again on that point. BMA leaders met the Minister for Health at 6·15 pm last Thursday to discuss a Government concession on that issue, and I understand that there is to be another meeting later this week.

On the question of generic drugs, the Minister for Health stated on 28 January this year in a parliamentary answer:

"There is no, and never was any, element of generic substitution in the limited list proposals".—[Official Report, 28 January 1985; Vol. 72, c. 59.]

A month later, in his statement of 21 February, the Secretary of State told us that generic substitution is to be enforced by the Government wherever possible.

The whole story is a sorry one of constant backtracking and indecision. However, wriggle though they have in U-turn after U-turn, the fundamental fact remains that——

Dr. M. S. Miller: Will my hon. Friend make it clear that generic prescribing and generic substitution are two very different matters? It is one thing to persuade doctors to prescribe generically—which is not necessarily a bad thing—and another to leave it to the whim of the chemist to substitute generic equivalents for the substance prescribed by the doctor.

Mr. Meacher: That is another question that the Secretary of State must address. In the past two months the DHSS has given contradictory answers. We need to know exactly what the Secretary of State's policy is well before the scheme comes into operation.

The objections to a limited list raised by the DHSS's own evidence to the Greenfield committee in 1981 are as valid today as they were then, and the Secretary of State must know it. Those objections have in no way been answered. In its evidence, the DHSS referred to "the concern of individual doctors at having to take account of a patient's financial circumstances when deciding whether to continue treatment with drugs not on the limited list".

That still remains true. It referred to "the confusion and worry—and possibly hostility—of patients who found themselves with a changed regime of treatment as a consequence of the limited list".

That still remains true. It referred to the fears of "those who saw in the very act of delineating which drugs the NHS could afford to provide the introduction of an explicit system of second-class medicine."

That still remains true. Lastly, it stated that "in the new dispensation there would be little distinction between a private patient of a family doctor (who would, as now, pay the full economic rate for any drugs prescribed) and the NHS patient of that doctor who was prescribed drugs not on the limited list (and would also have to pay the full economic rate for the drugs prescribed)".

That was the view of the DHSS in 1981, and the Secretary of State has failed to answer any of those central points. How could he do so when not even his own officials believe him?

In trying to defend the indefensible, Ministers have given three main reasons for standing on their heads, each of which is specious. First, they say that a fuller study of the health system in other countries has convinced them that financial savings of the order indicated by the Secretary of State can be made. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] That comforting illusion is clearly shared by some Government Back Benchers. It must also please the Treasury, but it will not convince me. The DHSS's own document of 1981 once again reveals what a two-faced confidence trick the Ministers are trying to pull off. I quote again from that invaluable document:

"Examination of the schemes"—

"suggests that no simple comparison of them is possible and that evaluation of them to determine their suitability for adoption by the NHS is extremely difficult . . . representatives in the UK of the countries concerned have suggested their schemes do not serve to effect the economies expected of them."

Secondly, the Government have tried to justify their somersault over the limited list by complaining that the number of prescriptions dispensed each year by doctors has been rising too quickly, thus implying some profligacy. The opposite is the case. Britain is at the bottom of the spending league of prescriptions per head of population in developed countries. In the United States, 16·6 prescriptions are issued per head of population each year. The equivalent figures are 11·2 for Germany, 10 for France and only 6·9 for the United Kingdom. There is therefore no justification for introducing this scheme from that quarter.

Thirdly, Ministers fall back on the £75 million savings to explain the exercise. I must tell them that analysts in the industry think that it could turn out—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] I am not saying that they are right, but they are worth quoting. If the Secretary of State thinks that they are wrong, he can tell us why. Analysts in the industry say that savings are much more likely to be about £20 million to £35 million—so low that presumably even the Secretary of State would not claim that it warranted blacklisting 1,800 drugs.

I hope that the Secretary of State will read the DHSS document. I shall be glad to make a copy of his own document available to him. It suggests that the industry is probably right. This is my last quotation. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I shall be glad to send every Conservative Member who votes in support of the regulations a copy. It says:

"The Department would be forced to ensure that only a fair share of costs and a fair profit were accepted, and this would lead to the control of the price of each item separately—a difficult and costly administrative exercise."

It does not suggest much of a saving.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that some savings might be made in the £140 million a year that drug manufacturers spend on promoting their products to general practitioners?

Mr. Meacher: That is an excellent proposal. I entirely agree with it. I hope that the Secretary of State will stop these regulations and listen to his hon. Friend, who is making a much more sensible suggestion. I shall be glad to give way to more hon. Members such as the hon. Gentleman.

Ministers have tried to save face by suggesting that limited lists have long been used by hospitals locally and that this is merely an extension. Presumably they know that hospital formularies are a completely different mechanism. They are arranged and agreed by the doctors who do the prescribing—that will not be the case here. They are adaptable and subject to change in the light of the effectiveness of new drugs—that will not be the case here. In hospitals, drugs are given under close supervision—that will not be the case here as patients will be at home. There will be confusion, especially among elderly people, with changing colours and shapes of drugs as different generics are prescribed. It is clear, therefore, that what we are debating is quite different from hospital formularies.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Has the hon. Gentleman read his speech of 8 December 1983 in which he asked:

"Is the Minister aware that . . . £25 million could be saved by substituting unbranded versions of the branded drugs that cost the NHS £60 million a year? Does he agree that an enormous saving could be made in this area? Does not his rejection of generic substitution owe much more to the arm-twisting of the drug companies"?—[Official Report, 8 December 1983; Vol. 50, c. 476.]

What does the hon. Gentleman have to say about that?

Mr. Meacher: I am delighted to hear my words repeated—they are extremely sensible. I hope that they will be taken on board. However, that is not what we are discussing today. This is a completely different matter. What I said was sensible and I should like to repeat what the Minister for Health said on 28 January:

"There is no, and never was any, element of generic substitution in the limited list proposals we announced on 8 November 1984."—[Official Report, 28 January 1985; Vol. 72, c. 59.]

Perhaps the hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) would have a word behind the Chair with his right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health. I think that he could learn a lot from him.

For the reasons that I have given, none of the Government's arguments about the regulations wash. The motives for its introduction are wrong and we oppose the entire framework of the scheme. It is not, as the Secretary of State claims, comprehensive. I have been briefed by doctors that, for example, the white list includes Sudafed, a decongestant, while three alternatives are blacklisted. Sudafed leads to hyperactivity and cannot be given to children late at night because it would prevent them from sleeping. Orovite is omitted from the white list, but it is needed to control alcohol withdrawal symptoms. Cologel, which is designed to counter chronic soiling problems, is on the black list, but Celevac, which contains the same substance, is on the white list. Celevac is in the form of granules and I understand that its consistency is frogspawn-like. It is clearly unacceptable to children and is therefore not suitable. I am simply quoting information that I have been given by doctors.

Another example concerns a drug which controls temporal lobe epilepsy. A GP who has contacted me finds that Tranxene controls it well, but Tranxene and its generic equivalent are on the banned list. The alternative, called Clobazam, is on the white list. The GP believes that changing the drug to Clobazam could well result in the patient having a fit. That also clearly is unacceptable.

I quote those merely as examples. I have no doubt that doctors could—and will—provide many others. Once the Secretary of State's claim that the list meets all of the clinical needs of patients is significantly breached, the rationale of the list falls to the ground. And so it has.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): If, by any chance, there are still any omissions from the list, does the hon. Gentleman agree that they could have been avoided if the BMA had co-operated with the Government in the interests of patients and tried to get the list right? Does not the hon. Gentleman feel slightly embarrassed to use information supplied by BMA-inspired doctors when it is saying now what is would never say in the consultation process?

Mr. Meacher: It is typical of the Conservative party, in its defensive mood, to lay the blame elsewhere. The BMA was never consulted. The Secretary of State made his statement in the House on 8 November without a shred of consultation with the BMA.

Mr. Butterfill rose——

Mr. Meacher: No, I shall not give way.

There have been further meetings with the BMA, including that of 10 January. At none of them has the Secretary of State taken the BMA into his confidence or shown any desire to take account of its opposition to the scheme, or the reasons for it.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: I shall not give way. I understand that many Conservative Members wish to speak and I do not wish to prevent them from making valid arguments.

There is serious doubt about whether the list is legal under EEC law. I understand that the Duphar case in the Netherlands, which was decided on 7 February—I am sure that Ministers know what I am talking about—showed that if a limited list was not to infringe EEC law it must not be discriminatory concerning the origin of products, be carried out on the basis of objective and verifiable criteria and be capable of amendment whenever compliance with the specified criteria so required. It is arguable that none of those conditions applies here, and that is yet another reason why we believe this over-hasty, pig's ear of a scheme should not be rushed through.

There is also the question of job losses resulting from the package. Despite the small savings that we believe will result from the likely switch in prescribing patterns, there may be a disproportionate loss of jobs because of the huge length of the black list. For those reasons, too, we reject the regulations.

The central point for us is that, because the list is not comprehensive in meeting the clinical needs of all patients, it runs directly contrary to the fundamental principle of the National Health Service — that the individual's ability to pay determines his tax, but not his medical treatment. Once that principle is breached, a two-tier system of care within NHS general practice is established. The regulations could turn out to be the thin end of a very thick wedge.

Our policy is that prescribing should be exclusively on the basis of clinical need. The regulations would inevitably mean that the treatment that patients require may be influenced by their ability to pay. That is why we reject them.

There was a word that gained currency on the Western Front, SNAFU — situation normal, all fouled up. Perhaps we are seeing a variant of it—situation normal, all Fowlered up.

We all know that the scheme is being introduced as a simple, straightforward, squalid little cost-cutting measure. It is being introduced because the Secretary of State caved in to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Cabinet, and we all know that the present Chancellor is the most heartless, arrogant, and dogmatic holder of that office in modern times. A little less kow-towing to the Chancellor and a little more standing up for patients would not come amiss from the Secretary of State. If he will not do that, we will. We shall not only vote against the regulations, but we shall be taking the issue into the country, along with the Secretary of State's obnoxious £2 prescription charge.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): In the long debate on the selected list, nothing has been more remarkable than the policy that has finally emerged from the official Opposition.

Given the terms that the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) has been using today — "half-baked", "two-faced", "confidence trick", "squalid" and so on—one would think that when I announced the policy it met with his instant and outraged opposition. No one would ever accuse the hon. Gentleman of understating his case. "The destruction of the Health Service" is a phrase that falls as easily from his lips as does "Have a nice day" from an American waitress, but the extraordinary fact is that at the time of the announcement in November the hon. Gentleman said absolutely nothing—not a thing. It was not until four weeks later that the Opposition came out against the policy.

The House may take the view that the indignation welling up in the hon. Member for Oldham, West was of such a quality that it took a four-week gestation period to find expression. Alternatively, it might take the view that he was labouring long and late to find a way to reconcile his opposition to the Government's proposals with his previous calls for a reduction in the drugs bill.

Only last July, the hon. Member for Oldham, West said:

"while the drug companies are permitted to rip off the NHS, with excessive profits this year probably in excess of £250 million, Government talk of 'Can't afford any more for the NHS' is simply stinking hypocrisy."—[Official Report, 5 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 481.]

After years of campaigning for cuts in the drugs bill, the hon. Gentleman is now inviting his hon. Friends to oppose a reduction and to oppose the resources thereby released being made available for health care. The House can judge whether that is "stinking hypocrisy" or just a typical taste of Meacher humbug.

On the subject of humbug, the hon. Member for Oldham, West mentioned an article in The Guardian. I say frankly that that article is a load of nonsense. The Government have no plans to introduce a voucher system and never have had. Indeed, the article did not suggest that was the case.

The essential issue of the debate is that in the next financial year the Government will be spending over £17 billion on the National Health Service. That is the biggest budget that the Health Service has ever had, in both cash and real terms. However, to say that is not remotely the end of the responsibility of the Government.

The Government must ensure that the money is being spent to the best effect. That is why we have followed a series of measures to achieve value for money in the Health Service. It would be indefensible if the drugs bill were to be exempt from that examination.

Clearly, there are a number of factors to be balanced. The drugs bill is now £1,500 million a year. That is 10 times as much as it was 15 years ago and represents an increase of about 5 per cent. a year more than price rises over the past 10 years. The aim has been to find a way in which that bill could be reduced, while, at the same time, giving the medical profession a choice of drugs to meet all clinical needs and not harming the essential interests of our research-based pharmaceutical industry.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us the cost of drugs as a percentage of total NHS spending? Has that percentage altered over the past few years?

Mr. Fowler: The proportion has kept more or less the same, but it is £1,500 million out of a total budget of £17 billion. The hon. Gentleman seems to be arguing that we should not seek any economies in the drugs bill. Even the hon. Member for Oldham, West is not proposing that view.

A number of options have been put forward to contain the drugs bill. The BMA apparently now favours what I can best describe as a modified Greenfield approach—an entirely voluntary form of generic substitution. That approach might make it easier for doctors who wanted to prescribe generically to do so, but the trouble is that no one thinks that it would much reduce the drugs bill.

Others would favour compulsory generic substitution across the whole range of drugs, including what are undoubtedly life-saving drugs. That would be totally opposed by the pharmaceutical industry. It would mean that a company could lose the market for any drug the day after its patent expired. There is no doubt that the industry's research efforts would be seriously undermined by that sort of action.

The Labour party would go one step further. It would add to all this by taking major pharmaceutical companies into public ownership. That would cost money, not save it; it would destroy the British pharmaceutical industry; and, if the record of eastern Europe is anything to go by, it would put an end to innovation and research.

The Government adopted a different approach. We began by asking whether all the drugs being prescribed needed to be prescribed. Having examined the evidence carefully and having looked at what happened in other countries, we concluded that there was room for improvement and that the Health Service was not getting the best value from the money that it spent, particularly in the groups of drugs we identified and which are covered by the selected list. These are basically tonics, antacids, laxatives, cough and cold remedies, vitamins, analgesics and tranquillisers.

It was clear to us that in those groups the Health Service could achieve a more economical pattern of prescribing without harming the interests of patients, without infringing the clinical freedom of doctors and without discouraging research into medicines for the more serious conditions.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Before my right hon. Friend proceeds further, can he tell us, regarding the clinical freedom of doctors, whether he has been able to work out some method by which there could be an appeal, if a doctor considered it essential for a drug not on the list to be prescribed in a particular case?

Mr. Fowler: I shall come to that point shortly. I realise that many of my right hon. and hon. Friends and, perhaps, some Opposition Members are worried about it. I promise to deal with it in my own time.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many general practitioners are worried that this may be the thin end of the wedge and that it could be taken on a broader basis later? I should not like to think that this is the thin edge of the wedge. Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that the list will be restricted to those categories only?

Mr. Fowler: I can and shall come to precisely that point shortly.

The mechanism that we chose was the selected list. That is a list of drugs selected from all those available in the seven categories which will cover patients' clinical needs as effectively as the full range.

Schedule 3A to the regulations lists all the drugs which we have not selected for NHS use. Copies of the much shorter selected list have been sent to every doctor and pharmacist to help them to operate the new system when it is introduced.

The selected list has been the result of a thorough process of consultation and consideration. Not only did we seek views from all the interested organisations but the chief medical officer also wrote to every doctor in the country asking for comments. We received comments from about 2,000 doctors. Those comments have been taken fully into account. What is more, the chief medical officer brought together a group of eminent doctors to help him in a detailed examination of all the medicines covered by the list. That group contained experts practising in all the relevant specialties. It included a clinical pharmacologist, a physician, a geriatrician, a paediatrician and a psychiatrist. It also included three practising general practitioners and a practising community pharmacist. It is ludicrous to suggest that the group was anything other than highly qualified for its task. It is absurd to seek to belittle its experience and expertise or to deny the authority of its recommendations. That group prepared the selected list which we are now introducing. It recommended it unanimously as providing a sufficient range of drugs to meet all clinical needs. I accepted the group's recommendations in their entirety, and I hope and believe that most doctors will do so.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Does my right hon. Friend agree, despite the fact that he has attempted to get a broad spectrum of opinion, that one swallow does not make a summer, one doctor does not represent the whole specialism in his profession and that there are many conflicting views in the specialisms that were represented on the panel?

Mr. Fowler: I entirely accept what my hon. Friend said. We tried to produce and provide as wide a range of specialities to deal with the problem as we conceivably could. From the beginning, I made that clear to the House and indeed, I announced the proposals to the House first. I make no apology for that because it is vital to announce proposals to the House before announcing them elsewhere. At the same time, I invited the British Medical Association to consult me. It is a matter of deep regret that it did not accept that invitation.

Mr. Meacher: Before the right hon. Gentleman reads Department of Health and Social Security briefs, he should ensure that he reads from the correct one. What he said had nothing to do with the question asked by his hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd). Will he now answer the question? Does he or does he not propose to extend the principle of the limited list to other clinical areas?

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend asked whether this was the thin end of the wedge, and I said unequivocally that it was not. I shall come precisely to that point in a moment.

Mr. Meacher: The Secretary of State must answer what is perhaps the single most significant question in the debate: does he propose to extend the principle of the limited list to other clinical areas? Will he answer yes or no?

Mr. Fowler: I made it absolutely clear that I did not intend to extend the list. I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) that assurance. The hon. Gentleman had better calm down and listen to what is being said. Then he might get a glimmer of understanding about the debate. He made a most pathetic speech, even by his standards. Now he must relax, sit back and educate himself.

The final selected list contains about 100 drugs, compared with the 30 on the provisional list, demonstrates that we meant what we said about consultation, and that we have listened to the comments made to us. Indeed, the final list contains almost all the drugs on which substantial representations were made by doctors. Many of the changes were made for convenience—to enable patients to take more than one drug in a single medicine—or for greater palatability. But the result is that the list contains not only what is essential, but sufficient choice to ensure that it can meet the clinical needs of all patients.

The House will be aware that the selected list contains not only generic drugs, but some branded ones. That is because the chief medical officer's group advised that in some cases there was no suitable generic drug available and that we should retain a branded drug, or a number of similar branded drugs, for the time being. Wherever possible, it is the generic name which will be used on prescriptions, not the brand name. That is to allow other manufacturers to bring their own generic versions of the branded drugs on to the market. That will introduce an element of price competition into the supply of medicines, for which the promotion of brand names has, until now, been the main determinant.

The regulations provide that from 1 April general medical practitioners may not prescribe at NHS expense the products listed in schedule 3A. Nor may community pharmacists and dispensing doctors dispense them. General practioners will, however, be able to issue a non-NHS prescription for schedule 3A drugs, if their patients wish it. They will not be able to charge a fee for such a prescription. Doctors will not be able to sell or dispense schedule 3A drugs, except that dispensing doctors will be able to supply and charge for those drugs to patients on their dispensing lists when they are prescribed as part of the patients' NHS treatment. For dispensing doctors the regulations will, therefore, effectively maintain the status quo and their dispensing patients will look to them for the supply of all prescribed medicines.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I acknowledge that that maintains the status quo and that patients in remote rural areas will be able to get drugs which are on the so-called black list from dispensing doctors, but what message would the Minister give to dispensing doctors who find it repulsive to be brought into such a commercial relationship with their patients?

Mr. Fowler: With respect, I should say that we are trying to take the point that has been put to us by dispensing doctors. The Liberal party had better make up its mind before the end of the debate what it wishes to achieve for dispensing doctors in rural areas.

When I announced the final selected list last month, I explained that there were several issues about the operation of the list on which I would be ready to hold discussions with the professional interests concerned. There were two major points. First, there should be a committee of professional and independent advisers to review the contents of the list on a continuing basis. The committee will be asked to consider whether new drugs coming on to the market fall within the scope of the selected list and, if so, whether they should be added to it. It will also be asked to review the existing list on a regular basis to help to ensure that it still gives the best possible value for money. I wish to consult on the arrangements for the new committee as soon as possible, so that there is no delay in the important task of maintaining the list.

Secondly—I come to the point that was raised a moment ago—as I have already made clear, I am also ready to consider with the profession whether in exceptional circumstances doctors should be allowed to prescribe drugs not on the list when they believe their patients need them. My expert advice is that the list is comprehensive as it stands, and obviously I have accepted that advice. None the less, I have said persistently that if the profession believes that there are real problems here, I shall be ready to consider with it any proposals that it might make to overcome such difficulties. Clearly, I could not agree to exceptional arrangements that would enable a doctor simply to ignore the selected list. There must be adequate safeguards. But, given that, it should be possible to reach an agreement.

Perhaps I can tell the House about the latest developments here. In my statement on 21 February, and again at Question Time last Tuesday, I made it clear that I was ready to discuss this matter with the representative medical organisations. The result was that on Thursday I received a request from the general medical services committee of the British Medical Association to discuss with me an appeals mechanism. A meeting was immediately arranged, and it took place the same evening. We were agreed on several points. We agreed that any mechanism should be non-bureaucratic and should be applied locally. The crucial issue is the exact nature of the mechanism: whether it should operate on the basis of prior approval or monitoring; in what circumstances appeals should be allowed; and whether the proposed committee should be based on the local medical committees, on family practitioner committees, or on the sort of system that is common in hospitals. Clearly, we shall need some time to work out the details, but I have asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health to convene a meeting on Wednesday this week with the general medical services committee and representatives of the Royal College of General Practitioners. That means that the matter will now be pursued with urgency. As the discussions have started at such a late stage, it will be impossible to bring any mechanism into effect from 1 April. But it will be my aim, provided that a satisfactory agreement can be reached, to introduce a system as soon as possible after 1 April.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Since the Secretary of State has accepted the principle that, in certain circumstances, appeals might be necessary and that an override mechanism would be valuable, would it not be better to delay the implementation of the regulations until after 1 April? If it is right in principle to have an override mechanism, is it not right to delay the implementation of the regulations?

Mr. Fowler: I cannot accept that, and I made that entirely clear to the general medical services committee when it came to see me. I shall tell the hon. Gentleman why. I made it clear at the beginning of November, when I announced the proposals, that I was willing to talk to the general medical services committee of the BMA. I repeated that invitation frequently. The fact is that the GMSC came to see me last Thursday. I cannot take the responsibility for the delay, which was entirely the fault of the GMSC, not of the Government.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Will my right hon. Friend deal with the unscrupulous campaign carried out by some pharmaceutical companies? Will he accept from me that, of 47 letters from people who were scared that their sick relatives would be unable to receive specific drugs, having checked with the DHSS, only two proved to be justified? Is that not a case of sick advertisements being made at the expense of sick people?

Mr. Fowler: I shall come to that point.

I recognise the anxiety of some pharmaceutical companies about the implications of the list for their activities. As sponsor of the industry, I appreciate the enormous benefits for patients and for the country as a whole that have resulted from the existence of a strong and independent research-based pharmaceutical industry. But it is unreasonable for the companies to expect the NHS to accept responsibility for providing a continuing market for all the products of all manufacturers.

We have a responsibility to be selective in order to achieve the best value for the money spent by the NHS, where that can be done without harm to patients. I should make it clear that we were selective in the groups to which we decided to apply the selected list. This is not, as some have described it, the thin end of the wedge. It is a sensible, limited measure that has enabled more Health Service resources to be applied to the development of new services.

It is important to retain a sense of proportion about the impact of the selected list on the industry as a whole. For example, the groups of drugs covered by the selected list account for little more than 10 per cent. of the United Kingdom drugs market. In any case, more than 95 per cent. of the drugs affected can be bought over the counter from a pharmacist without a prescription.

That sense of proportion—this deals with the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark)—has been absent from some of the campaigning against this measure. Some of the tactics used to frighten patients have been disgraceful, and I much regret that any general practitioner should have had any part in suggesting to patients that a drug would not be available before the consultation was completed. It is easy now to see that the vast majority of those scare stories were simply untrue. To use the phrase of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, they were humbug. It is less easy to allay the unnecessary fears and anxieties that have been caused to patients during the campaigns.

One campaign especially that helped to cause those fears and anxieties was run by the Association of British Pharmaceutical Industries. The ABPI has spent about £1 million on a highly misleading series of advertisements. Its latest tactic has been to pose publicly as the defender of old people, while behind the scenes suggesting that to save money reductions could be made in the range of exemptions from prescription charges—exemptions that benefit old people more than any others. The time has come to ask the ABPI where it believes that it is leading the industry—and I speak as a supporter of the industry. It now appears to be lining up with the Labour party, whose policy it is to nationalise the drug companies. I leave it to the ABPI's members to decide whether they should have allowed themselves to be dragged into such an alliance.

The question over the campaigns goes further. We have seen a crude exercise of political pressure, advertising, poster campaigns and the rest. One company sent to all general practitioners a completely distorted standard letter on to which general practitioners were asked to put their surgery stamps before sending it to their Members of Parliament. The same stock letter warned Members of Parliament in these terms:

> "Your reply will undoubtedly be of interest to my patients and I shall consider the best way of informing them. It may be appropriate to post a copy on my surgery notice board."

That was a deeply insulting campaign, and I say to the company and to those involved that it would be a sad day for this House if such crude threats were ever to work here.

The selected list has achieved one thing—far wider recognition than ever before of the need for action on the scale and quality of prescribing. The debate that has taken place over the past few months has probably been the most extensive on prescribing in the history of the National Health Service.

I should like now to build on that base — not in extending the list but in promoting other wider action on prescribing. All the professionals involved in the debate have acknowledged that there is room for more effective and economical prescribing. Therefore, I propose to convene a conference involving the relevant professional interests which will set the agenda for detailed discussions of further ways in which we can voluntarily raise prescribing standards and reduce costs. I hope to announce details of this new proposal shortly.

One of the benefits of such a conference would be to set in its proper perspective the selected list proposal. The selected list is about putting resources to better use in the Health Service while protecting the clinical needs of patients, preserving the freedom of doctors to prescribe and recognising the legitimate needs of the pharmaceutical industry.

On those grounds, I commend the regulations to the House.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will know that there are a considerable number of Conservative Members of Parliament in the pay of the drug companies. In view of the very disparaging remarks made by the Secretary of State for Social Services about the despicable behaviour of these private enterprise companies, will you make sure that every single one of those Conservative hacks is called in this debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Because of the large number of hon. Members who wish to speak, the hon. Gentleman knows that that is bound to be beyond my power.

8.12 pm

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): I agree with the Minister's remarks about the drug companies. They have waged not only a disgraceful campaign but a most inept and counter-productive campaign. We were bombarded not with a letter a day but with several letters a day from the association as well as from individual drug companies. As the Minister stated, we received letters from doctors who did not even sign those letters but merely put upon them their practice stamp. Neither I nor my hon. Friends will be influenced in any way in the view that we take tonight by that inept and counter-productive campaign.

I was more impressed by the letters I received from doctors who are genuinely concerned about their right to prescribe being undermined and about the effect that this will have upon their patients. Care and thought had obviously been put into the typed and handwritten letters that were sent to me by those doctors. However, what impressed me most were the scores of handwritten letters that I received from ordinary people in my constituency, many of them old and most of them chronically sick. Nearly all of them said that they had never before written to a Member of Parliament. They are seriously worried about their own medication being affected.

It is all very well for the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) to quote figures to the House and say that many of the drugs to which he referred are not blacklisted. They were originally blacklisted. Only about 30 drugs were at one time able to be prescribed. The Minister has trebled the number of drugs which can be prescribed. Therefore, one cannot blame the patients for being afraid. The patient does not read Hansard or see the list. All he knows is that the drug which his doctor correctly prescribed for him at the time will have to be paid for in future, although he cannot afford to pay for it because he is old and chronically sick. That is the kind of thing that has influenced the Opposition, not the counter-productive efforts of the drug companies.

I am a little surprised that no hon. Member has mentioned the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. That society has got nothing whatever to do with the industry. It sets the examinations for pharmacists, registers pharmacists and disciplines both retail and hospital pharmacists in a way similar to that by which the Law Society disciplines the legal profession in England and Wales. Neither my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) nor the Minister saw fit to mention its views. The society is opposed in principle to the Government's proposals. In its letter to me it says:

> "It is our view that appropriate treatment should be available without restrictions, at the time of need. It is the prescriber's responsibility to make the clinical judgment. These proposals are a further attack on the very basis of the health service."

That is the view of this statutory body, the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. The society is also completely opposed to the disgraceful increase in prescription charges to £2. Almost every week the National Health Service is under attack in one way or another from the Government.

The Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain discussed with the Minister ways in which to reduce the drugs bill. The society believes that much could be achieved by the elimination of excessive prescribing. It wants prescriptions to be made available to long-term patients. However, it wonders whether the 28-day period, even as a maximum, is sensible, provided that we look after the chronically sick. Even in the case of the chronically sick the society has proposed a triple prescription scheme. This was agreed with the doctors and the medical profession generally but the Minister steadfastly sets his face against it.

The society also suggests that money could be saved if doctors used the box on the prescription form to indicate the number of days for which treatment is needed. Although the inclusion of this box on prescription forms was agreed by the professions and the Department, doctors seldom use it. Money could be saved in that way rather than by means of the bull-in-a-china-shop scheme that the Minister has put before the House today.

Generic substitution is a subject upon which people hold many different views. The society has written to me and said that it is not opposed to generic substitution. However, before giving its blessing to it, it says that pharmacists would need to be reassured by an independent sourse of the quality of the generic substitutes that would be made available. That is a perfectly fair point of view for a responsible profession to hold.

May I put one question to the Minister, which is causing great concern to the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. If a doctor writes out a prescription for a blacklisted medicine it is the pharmacist who, under the regulations, will bear the financial responsibility. That is the complete opposite of the present method. The society believes that the best way to ensure that doctors write correct prescriptions is to place the financial responsibility not on the pharmacist but on the doctor. That is a technical point affecting the regulations, but my main point is that the statutory body which is responsible for the registration, examination and policing of the pharmaceutical profession in this country is opposed to the Government's proposals.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that hon. Members will follow the good example set by the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) because many hon. Members wish to speak.

Mrs. Sally Oppenheim (Gloucester): I shall detain the House only briefly. I declare an interest in that I am on the main board of Boots plc which is affected both as a drug company and as a retailer of drugs. I shall not, however, be playing what has been referred to as the drug company game. I shall not be speaking with a forked tongue and I make it clear from the beginning that I support the regulations.

Many points have been raised by the Opposition which cloud the issues and important principles which have arisen. The principle which concerns the pharmaceutical industry is, first and foremost, whether this is the thin end of the wedge. If the Labour party came to power and nationalised the pharmaceutical industry, would widespread and wholesale generic alternatives be imposed which would not be in the patient's interests?

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): Why not?

Mrs. Oppenheim: Many generic substitutes are imported. They are not made under the same quality control as drugs with proprietary names made by British companies. That is why one has to approach generic substitution with the greatest caution. That is why I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, when listening to the review committee, to pay attention to the quality control of the generic substitute drugs that are being prescribed. That is a valid and important point.

A point of principle has been raised by the doctors and, in particular, the BMA. They have got on their high horse about their clinical judgment in prescribing. Yes, fair enough, they are entitled to that because if they make a mistake they must carry the blame for it. But we must ask those same general practitioners and doctors about their clinical judgment in prescribing such things as are on the black list at the moment—raspberry tablets, buttercup syrup, rhubarb mixture, male gland double strength supplement, skin-glow capsules and rock salmon cough mixture, to name but a few.

That brings me to the main point of my right hon. Friend's objective, which to is to make available resources in the Health Service where they will be most useful. Those placebos may have some sort of psychological value —I am not saying that they have not—but it is not for the medical profession to conduct a scare campaign among patients on the basis of drugs which are being prescribed for which there are alternatives or which their patients can go into any chemist and buy without a prescription at a reasonable price.

However, it must be said that many people, not just the elderly, will be confused during the transition period by different names, different coloured tablets, and, in some cases, different drugs. It is up to the medical profession not to frighten them but to reassure them that in most cases there will be no difference in the treatment. I can tell those who say that my right hon. Friend is trying to fob people off with cheap drugs that there is still an antacid on the white list which costs £96 for about 50 tablets and that is still prescribable because it is considered the best remedy. Anybody who thinks that my right hon. Friend has been partial in the way that he is trying to save money and thinks that he is trying to fob NHS patients off with cheap drugs is wrong.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will tread carefully during the transition period. I hope that he will listen quickly to any complaints from the review committee about standards and quality control and make available to the public, if possible, a list such as I believe exists in America, published by the Food and Drugs Administration, of drugs of no proven efficacy, a number of which I believe appear on the black list. That would be a constructive step which would complement the measure, which I support.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): If the Government had followed more closely the recommendations of the Greenfield report instead of going down the wrong road, we might already have arrived at a more sensible conclusion. A number of alternatives were proposed, particularly the introduction and encouragement of generic prescribing. It suggested that a box should be provided on the prescription form to enable general practitioners to show whether a branded or generic drug was desired.

It should be noted that the report also categorically rejected the idea of a limited list. But the Government, with their usual obstinacy, decided to ignore that good advice. The Greenfield committee rejected a limited list on the ground that > "We have not seen any convincing evidence that suggested financial benefits would outweigh the administrative problems in drawing up and maintaining the list."

That committee is not the only body to oppose a limited list. The BMA has stated its concern that the proposal will undermine a fundamental principle of the parent NHS Act that a patient's ability to pay should not dictate the treatment that he or she receives. It has also pointed out that on 22 November 1983, after consideration of the Greenfield report, the then Minister for Health told the House:

> "We are not convinced that such a list confining the judgment of doctors would be in the best interests of patients."—[Official Report, 22 November 1983; Vol. 49, c. 112.]

In the course of a year that sound judgment has been overturned.

The Royal College of General Practitioners has also stressed its opposition to a list. Although the Minister for Health assured the House in a written answer of 21 December 1984 that the drugs still available after the first limited list had been published would "meet all clinical needs", the college rightly described the provisional list as "clinically inept".

Scottish Members have been informed by the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. McKay), the Minister with responsibility for health matters in Scotland, in a letter of 22 February 1985, that the new revised list will "meet every clinical need". I accept that the revised list is far less damaging than the original one, but I can only say that we have heard that promise somewhere before.

I share the doubts of bodies such as the BMA and the Royal College of General Practitioners that the introduction of a list will save much money. Doctors, who will obviously still regard as their first and greatest priority the effect of the drug that they will have to prescribe for their patients, will always try to prescribe the best and most effective treatment available. It may not necessarily be the cheapest alternative to a drug on the banned list.

It may be that we shall not save much money, but I am sure that it is the patients who will suffer because of the introduction of a list and those who will suffer most will be the poor and the disadvantaged.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): The right hon. Gentleman has quoted rather selectively the BMA and the Royal College of General Practitioners. Will he deal with the fact that the Royal College of Physicians, the Royal College of Surgeons and many general practitioners and pharmacists have written to hon. Members and the Government supporting the measure?

Mr. Stewart: Like every other hon. Member, I have received submissions and representations. It is rather odd to describe the views of the BMA and the Royal College of General Practitioners as being rather selective in a debate of this kind.

Most doctors and the bodies who represent them have nothing against the idea of generic prescribing where generic drugs of a reasonable and consistent quality are available. But the BMA in Scotland said:

"It should not be necessary for doctors to be required to enquire into their patient's financial status as part of the consultation before deciding what to prescribe".

That brings me to a particular problem that will be faced by doctors in rural areas such as my constituency where doctors are also the dispensers of drugs. Some patients in my constituency live 60 miles from a chemist's shop. They may now have to be advised by the doctor to have a particular drug. That will put the doctor in an unfair position. It represents a fundamental and potentially damaging change in the doctor-patient relationship.

When the limited list becomes law, some of the dispensing doctors in the rural areas will be left with large stocks of expensive drugs that cannot be disposed of by sale. Small practices cannot bear the financial cost. There is no way of getting rid of the drugs, and some of the doctors will be in severe financial difficulties as a result.

What arrangements will the Government make to compensate dispensing doctors for stocks of drugs that they are unable to sell but which they have been required to stock heretofore under their obligations in the terms of service of the NHS?

I underline the total opposition of my colleague and myself in the Scottish National party to any attempt to introduce a two-tier National Health Service. The introduction of any kind of limited list is bound to lead towards that. I realise that the banned category of drugs has been curtailed since the original list was published last November. Nevertheless, I believe that, as has already been said in the debate, it is the thin end of the wedge. It will mean second-class treatment for the less-well-off people. It is shameful and unacceptable, and should be strongly opposed.

Mrs. Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I was brought up in a fairly hard and thrifty school in which waste was regarded as wicked. I believe that waste is not only wicked but very wrong, and it is never so wrong as when what is being wasted is desperately needed elsewhere.

It makes me feel sick when I hear members of the Labour party screaming for more and more money to be spent on the National Health Service, for when we seek to make savings they fight us all the way along the line.

The waste of expenditure on drugs in the NHS is a national disgrace. There are hundreds of thousands of medicine cupboards in ordinary homes throughout the country that are jammed with NHS medicines that have not been used. [Interruption.] I am sorry that Labour Members are so incredibly ignorant, because many details have been published about it.

Anyone who claims that general practitioners prescribe only what is necessary should ponder on the fact that some general practitioners give repeat prescriptions for years without ever seeing the patient. The regulations being discussed this evening may not alleviate that practice, but over the years many efforts have been made to get doctors to do something about waste in drug prescribing. Unfortunately, they have repeatedly failed to listen or to take note of the fact that the money they are wasting could be used to great benefit in another part of the NHS.

Many doctors prescribe merely to get the patient out of the consulting room. Some doctors will admit that they do that. My right hon. Friend referred to the placebo syndrome.

Some elderly patients are already receiving seven, eight or nine different drugs. Some of them have pink pills, blue pills, purple pills, heart-shaped pills, square pills and all sorts of other pills, and no one monitors them.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North) rose——

Mrs. Knight: I know that many hon. Members wish to speak and I am anxious to finish my speech, so I shall not give way.

No one monitors whether elderly people take their pills. It is very confusing for many of them to be told that they must take four pills after breakfast, seven at 11 am, seven more at lunch time, and so on. I am told by pharmacists that many elderly people, having run out of one of the seven or eight types of pill that they have to take, always return to the pharmacist and ask for the whole lot to be prescribed, whether they need them all or not. That is something that will always happen. It is largely due to the confusion that people feel when they are taking so many different drugs.

My mother had to take about seven different kinds of pills, and then she developed a duodenal ulcer. [Interruption.] I am sorry that hon. Members will not allow me to recount a personal experience that is relevant in the context of the debate. My mother had to be rushed into hospital for an operation and very nearly lost her life. The surgeon asked my father to take to the hospital any drugs that my mother had been taking. When he did so, the surgeon pointed to one of the drugs and said, "That is the one that has caused the duodenal ulcer." Therefore, I question whether all the drugs prescribed in the great torrent which go down British throats are really needed.

Recently, at a meeting in this House, two working pharmacists told us of their experiences with drug prescribing. They said that it was a common practice in any pharmacy covering an average number of persons to have people coming in two or three times every week with suitcases, with bags, and sometimes with prams, full of medicines. Perhaps auntie Mary or uncle Bill had died and it was felt that the best thing to do with the drugs was to take them back to the pharmacy to see whether they could be used.

There is a campaign, which I strongly back, for the disposal of unwanted medicines and pharmaceuticals. The campaign, known as DUMP, is active in various parts of the country. There was a recent campaign in the Bradford area, and 1,950 lb of unused medicines were handed in. Those medicines were costed, and in that one region alone the cost was £170,000. We cannot go on wasting money at that rate. It is ridiculous.

My right hon. Friend and the Government have had six charges levelled against them in relation to the proposed regulations. The first is that the money saved may not be used on the NHS. My right hon. Friend exploded that allegation at once. The money that is saved will indeed be used on the NHS. [Interruption.] I know that it is painful for Labour Members to try to understand that money does not grow on trees, and that even needed medicines have to be paid for somehow. They should recognise that this is an important saving and that the money is needed elsewhere in the NHS.

The second charge is that the Government are seeking a two-tier system so that only the wealthy will be able to get the drugs they need to make them better. My right hon. Friend and others have made it clear on many occasions that the limited list will meet all medical needs, and that there is no question of a two-tier system coming into operation. Many of the fears instilled into elderly and sick people by doctors are totally unfounded.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Knight: No, because I want to finish my speech.

The third charge is that the Government have refused and still refuse to consult. No one can accuse my right hon. Friend of that. There have been offers of consultation and there have been consultations. His door has been open, and time and again — [Interruption.] His door has been open——

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Knight: No. The hon. Gentleman has already heard what I said.

Every doctor in the country was consulted. Every one had the opportunity to make representations about the list and about what would be in the list. If the medical profession wished to consult on the—

Mr. Hoyle rose——

Mrs. Knight: I have made it clear that I shall not give way.

If the medical profession—

Mr. Hoyle rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady has made it clear that she will not give way.

Mrs. Knight: I am anxious to assist you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in the task of calling all hon. Members who wish to speak.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has also said that if the medical profession wishes to consult on the mechanism for dealing with exceptional individual problem cases, it can do so. There could be no Minister more ready to listen to what others outside have to say than my right hon. Friend, so that charge goes as well.

The charge was made that this scheme will ruin the drug companies. Indiscriminate generic prescribing would do so, and that is why those of us who are interested in this matter are aware that the Greenfield suggestions could not be introduced. We recognise — although we think that they have been wrong in the way that they have handled this campaign—that the pharmaceutical companies make a substantial contribution to our economy through exports and in medical research. The list will help, not harm, pharmaceutical companies.

The fifth charge is that this is a new, revolutionary and unique attack on the freedom to prescribe. I am sorry that Labour Members are so ignorant about this matter. They should know that nowhere in the world can doctors prescribe anything that they wish for their patients at taxpayers' expense. Hospital doctors have had similar restrictions — [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] If Labour Members go on like that, I shall read on for a great deal longer, and they will be sorry.

The restrictions that have always obtained — [Interruption]. Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I cannot read, I shall repeat, because Labour Members are making such a racket that I shall not be heard and what I am saying is very important.

Hospital doctors have had similar restrictions to those now being imposed on GPs. Hospital doctors have approached my right hon. Friends and myself asking why the Government do not bring in for GPs the regulations to which they have to submit in hospital. We must also bear in mind that of 17,000 drugs being prescribed reasonably regularly, only 1,000 will be affected by the list.

Finally, it is said that nobody else agrees with what is being done, in particular, none of the professional organisations. However, apart from the bodies mentioned by my right hon. Friend — the Royal College of Physicians and the Royal College of Surgeons — as agreeing with what the Government are doing, the pharmaceutical services negotiating committee, which knows a great deal about drugs, and the dispensing pharmacists agree with it because they have to work at the sharp end.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his patience and determination in getting together a new regulation, which will benefit the Health Service and improve prescribing.

8.44 pm

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): We had a ray of light at the end of the Secretary of State's speech, when he said that he would set up a conference to look into various aspects of prescribing. Having listened to most of his speech, I was in a doleful mood, and I was taken a little unawares by what he was proposing. For my sake, and perhaps for others who were taken aback by what the Secretary of State said, I hope that the Minister, when he winds up, will enlarge upon that point.

[Dr. Roger Thomas]

As a general practitioner, I feel that this matter is worth investigating. Over the past 15 or 25 years, prescribing in general practice has become chaotic. It has become a quagmire. The main reason for this is that every year hundreds of preparations for family medical practitioners to use are added to the list. Every month, a book called Mims is published. It has nearly 300 pages and contains a list of between 17,000 and 20,000 preparations.

As general practitioners, we also have at our disposal a book that is published by the much maligned Association of British Pharmaceutical Industries, which is a huge tome of 16,000 pages. I would never say that therapeutics was one of my strong subjects at medical school, but at least in those days therapeutics was simple. We appreciated that there were certain confines to it, but now it has flooded over the plain. It is no longer confined to the river bed. It has flooded the whole area, which means that doctors are falling down on their job and their work. They are not able to get adequate knowledge of even 3 per cent. of the drugs that are available to them out of a list of 17,000. It is an impossible task.

We often say that Members of Parliament need research assistants. I assure the House that general practitioners as well as Members of Parliament need research assistants if they are to be able to understand the complexities of prescribing. The fault lies also in our medical education. Young doctors are not taught enough about the economics of the medical profession. It is essential that they realise the immense amount of money that they will have to spend on their patients when they qualify. It is said that on average a GP will spend about £40,000 a year on his patients. That is a tremendous amount of money, but the pressures on GPs through the activities of the pharmaceutical industries — they have magnificent techniques — are immense. Saatchi and Saatchi are duplicated many times within the pharmaceutical industry. Doctors become victims of calculated advertising techniques used to put across the highlights of the properties of certain drugs to the detriment of other drugs.

At the front of the vast book published by the pharmaceutical industry is a little warning that medical representatives should not knock the products of rival firms. However, some medical representatives do not stick to the Queensberry rules in this matter.

I am one of those who feel that, for the sake of bringing a degree of rationality back into prescribing, we must have limited lists, but not limits that are pushed through at the behest of Ministers in the Elephant and Castle, who feel that it is high time that they delivered a sharp left and gave the medical profession a bloody nose. They tried to do that about the introduction of substitute doctors, but they had to retreat. They tried to do it with a limited list of drugs which could be prescribed, when they listed 30 and had to expand it fourfold.

What has gone wrong here is that this method should have been rehearsed. There should have been consultations with all branches of the pharmaceutical, medical and paramedical professions. At the end of the day, I am sure that we could all have agreed a method to bring some rationality to prescribing and, by so doing, increasing the safety of our patients.

I have great sympathy with what the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight) said about elderly people who are on eight or nine different drugs. This form of polypharmacy is one of the curses of the medical profession. What we do not appreciate is that often these drugs have adverse effects one upon the other. Until we research them, we are on very unsafe ground.

In advocating a limited list I suggest to the Minister that most certainly he should extend it if there are savings to be made and if those savings can be translated into extra cardiac surgery, extra renal dialysis, and so on. But we must make sure that if these savings are to be made, they are not made at the expense of the poor patient. They must be made at the expense of the drug companies, because they are still the people who will benefit.

By all means have limited lists. However, I cannot help feeling that the proposals before the House are little more than window dressing. I ask Ministers to go to the heart of the matter. In that way, they will have far more support in the House and throughout the country.

8.52 pm

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State did not disguise the fact that there had been real problems in getting this list together and before the House. I suggest that that is very much of his Department's own making. In fact, we heard a great deal from my right hon. Friend about the refusal to co-operate and to discuss the subject. I am indebted to the British Medical Association, which wrote to me only yesterday saying:

> "Neither Ministers nor officials have communicated, consulted or discussed prescribing . . . with us since 4 February 1983, despite our sending detailed comments on Greenfield to the Department on 25 February 1983."

That is the answer. Perhaps the BMA was wrong to sulk in its tent, but it was understandable. It is a complete disgrace that neither Ministers nor officials took into their confidence a great organisation such as the BMA.

I declare an interest. It is well known in the House that I have been associated with the British pharmaceutical industry for nearly 20 years. At one stage in my life, I worked in it full time. I also advise a number of companies involved in pharmaceuticals. However, that does not debar me from speaking what I believe to be the absolute truth in these circumstances.

I am against the regulations for two basic reasons. The first is that they erode the prescribing independence of members of the medical profession. The position has improved since the initial shock of that rather absurd list introduced the first time round, which bore no relation to reality. Thank goodness, it has been improved upon. However, I fear that future health Ministers of whatever political persuasion will undoubtedly wish to undermine that freedom further as time goes by, ostensibly in the name of economy but probably in reality for more bureaucratic reasons.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that, above all, there must be no inclusion on any list which results in tampering with the right to prescribe drugs, such as life-saving antibiotics, preparations for the treatment of arthritis, and so on? It could happen.

Sir Dudley Smith: My hon. Friend is right, and that is my point. It may be that some of what we are dealing with today is trivial. We all know of so-called drugs which have not been prescribed for years. They have been on lists, but they are, to all intents and purposes, dead. They present no problem. I have asked a number of parliamentary questions about them. There is no information available on them. However, when we come to the life-savers, who is to say that a future Health Minster will not lay down his diktat to members of the medical profession and tell them exactly what they can and cannot do?

My second objection is that the regulations do great harm to one of our really successful industries which we can ill afford to damage. We have not got so many industries which are successful. Here is one which has been a winner. I do not suggest for a moment that it should not be kept in control and that there should not be proper supervision because of its unique relationship with the Department of Health and Social Security, but I believe that this is not the way to do it.

My right hon. Friend said that his Department was the sponsoring Department of the pharmaceutical industry. Listening to some of the remarks in this debate, one would have thought that my right hon. Friend was its main enemy.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): My hon. Friend says that this proposal is very damaging to the drug industry. I have some difficulty in understanding that.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): That does not surprise me.

Mr. Hogg: It may not surprise my hon. Friend——

Mr. Winterton: He knows nothing about it.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is a man of very little understanding.

Mr. Winterton: Except that I have pharmaceutical industries in my constituency, which he does not.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend makes my point that he is a man of limited understanding.

Mr. Winterton: Clever boy.

Mr. Hogg: I was putting a specific question to my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith), which I am sure he will treat more seriously than my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). My hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington said that the proposal was very damaging——

Mr. Winterton: Arrogant, just like his father.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend said that it was damaging to the pharmaceutical industry——

Mr. Winterton: He was wrong more often than he was right.

Mr. Hogg: We know that these seven classes apply only to 10 per cent. of the drugs prescribed. Bearing in mind the exemptions, which cover about 70 per cent. of the drugs prescribed, and the fact that pharmaceuticals enjoy an international market, I do not see why the proposals should damage the industry.

Sir Dudley Smith: It is true that the industry is not being swept aside. No one could pretend that. However, a number of companies will be affected quite seriously. Their production is being eroded. If I am not interrupted too many times, I shall give my hon. Friend a few figures which may help bring him on to my side. I shall not give way again, because that was a rather long intervention, from various sources.

There must be effects on the profitability of the various companies which operate in the United Kingdom. The move will depress the industry and undoubtedly it will curb its expansion and hamper its sales. The pharmaceutical industry has a very good export record. But, worst of all, the regulations will make those responsible for the industry, particularly the multinational companies, think very hard about the wisdom of further investment in the United Kingdom, especially where original research is concerned. We should not lightly dismiss that point.

My ministerial colleagues at the DHSS may feel that the regulations will be carried, and no doubt they are right. My only regret is that too many of my right hon. and hon. Friends do not fully understand this very complex matter. I make no criticism of that, as the subject is very complex. However, I can assure my colleagues that, although they may well demonstrate their ministerial virility, the whole sorry episode will be long remembered. If the pharmaceutical industry in this country eventually declines, they will have to carry that unhappy tag of responsibility with them for many years. They will have been the architects of its decline——

Mr. Tracey: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Dudley Smith: I shall not give way, as I do not wish to speak for too long. In such a debate, giving way to interventions can encourage others to make further interventions, and the hon. Member speaking is left up in the air.

The United Kingdom's pharmaceutical industry is one of the most highly developed and rapidly growing sectors of British manufacturing industry. That perhaps is the answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). The majority of companies that operate in the United Kingdom operate worldwide. Until now, they have regarded the United Kingdom as pretty enlightened. The industry employs about 75,000 people, and no other industry in the United Kingdom has a higher proportion of qualified scientific staff.

The price of medicines has always been an easy target in this country compared with the cuts that could be made in more sensitive areas, and particularly in NHS staffing. That is where the major costs are, as can be seen from looking at the figures that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave. Although I was not particularly enchanted with the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), it was true when he said that general practitioners in this country are at the bottom of the spending league per head of the population. The United States is at the top with 16·6 prescription items per capita, and then the league goes right down to Italy, West Germany, and France. Australia is just above the United Kingdom with 7·7 items, and the United Kingdom has 6·9 items per capita. Therefore, we have nothing to be ashamed about in terms of the amount of money involved in the pharmaceutical products dispensed by doctors operating within the NHS.

I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham that a recent survey showed that the Government's limited list proposals have been responsible for investment projects to the value of £143 million in pharmaceutical production or research being either cancelled or postponed since last November. It may be a "limited" list, but it is the thin end of the wedge. If £143 million have been lost, what will be lost next year and the year after that? We need to pay attention to that point. We have had great economic trouble in this country. I support the Government, and believe that they are doing the right thing in that respect, but I shall vote against them tonight because this is a crass move on their part.

We very much need to take account of the experience of other countries. I think of the sorry story of the Australian pharmaceutical industry. It was clobbered very hard and there was excessive state intervention in Australia. As a result, many companies were driven away, and the Australian pharmaceutical industry is now nothing compared with what it used to be, to the detriment of Australian residents. We must be very careful that that does not happen here. We have taken the first step. Let it be the only step, and let us ensure that in future we attend to things rather more circumspectly than in this case.

9.3 pm

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): The Government seem to have an infinite capacity to botch good ideas. In their passionate haste to implement the limited list they have introduced a statutory instrument that is defective on one major and two minor grounds. Without the assurance that my right hon. and hon. Friends and I have asked for on the vital question of an appeal or of some override, we shall be unable to support the regulations.

I turn first to the whole principle of prescribing by a limited list. If any assessment were made of the political line-up on this issue, one would have expected to find a Labour Secretary of State introducing the measure on the ground of curbing the excesses of the drug industry, and one would have expected it to be opposed vehemently by a Conservative Secretary of State, defending the commercial interests involved. Indeed, I cannot see why Conservative Members are so concerned about the advertising campaign that has been launched by the ABPI if they believe that the object of private enterprise is to maximise profits and the amount of cash that comes in from profit-making enterprises.

The concept of a limited list for good prescribing challenges two well worn and deeply held beliefs about the nation's health. The Government deserve some commendation for their courage in standing up to the twin spectres of clinical freedom for GPs and the limitless expectations of health resources. They might appear to be self-evident truths, but they inhibit new attitudes to healthy living and the power of any health service to assist.

In the health sphere, more than any other, expectations grossly outrun resources. There is a case for higher NHS spending, particularly to buy time until new attitudes can be implemented, but at any level the treatment of the sick is intrinsically constrained by infinite resources. Whatever limit one sets for NHS spending, and however far one wishes to extend spending, it is impossible to deal with what everybody expects or to cope with the demands made upon it.

The trouble is that the limits are currently imposed in random and illogical ways. For instance, GPs can prescribe and order treatment regardless of cost, but if the district health authority has to reduce its staff or equipment the patients' freedom is eclipsed by the waiting list. It is odd and illogical to try to inhibit clinical freedom by the blunt instrument of the waiting list. In practice, inevitably, the glamorous side of the NHS gains a disproportionate amount of resources and the preventive side — the geriatric and mental handicap work—suffers.

Those involved in other services that we have to support from public resources such as housing, education and social services do not believe that whatever invention comes on to the market should be available to all. Alas, that is the general expectation within the Health Service. It is intellectual and political cowardice to continue as we have over 10 years of declining national resources. No Government of any political colour will be able to continue in that way.

The key is in allocating finite resources to achieve the greatest benefit for the greatest number. The limited list is a conscious decision to change from prescribing expensively for the few to improving the health of the many.

I cannot understand why the Government should have decided to put up prescription charges by such a draconian amount at the same time as trying to save money through the limited list. The Government say that they might save £75 million by the limited list. I doubt that sum, but to pretend that they then should raise £19 million by increasing prescription charges is a ham-fisted way to argue about the public's health.

The family practitioner committees' drugs bill is open-ended and demand-led. There is little incentive to prescribe generically or economically. Alas, GPs are excessively influenced by drug companies' advertising. Surveys show that drugs that are currently advertised in the press are those that are most often prescribed out of order with the general run of prescribing.

Mrs. McCurley: The popular drugs that are often heavily subsidised and advertised are quite effective. When a drug is not effective general practitioners and other practitioners of the medical arts cease to use it and it is withdrawn from circulation by the drug companies.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I wish that that were true generally. The suggestion is that advertising by the drug companies leads doctors to prescribe drugs simply because of their novelty value. We are pressed to accept that doctors prescribe because of careful scrutiny of the thousands of drugs available. Alas, the evidence does not bear that out.

The overspend on the notional budget for GPs is taken off the hospital budget which causes more spending to be thrown back on the family practitioner committees. The hospitals have automatically and voluntarily adopted generic substitution and their own limited lists. The financial benefits may be limited, and possibly not anything like that predicted by the Secretary of State. However, at least it is something that challenges the belief that we can simply continue to pour more and more money into the NHS and thereby gain continuing advantage.

It is important to challenge the attitude towards the use of drugs. The current edition of World Health Forum, the magazine of the World Health Organisation, states bluntly that:

"Throughout the world, unnecessary drugs are prescribed for self-limiting conditions. Sometimes the physician uses the prescription as a substitute for counselling or to satisfy the expectations of the patient. Usually it is a mixture of the two, where both doctor and patient have come to see a prescription as an essential outcome of the visit. The most common examples are antibiotics for the common cold, sedatives for mild insomnia and vitamins for nearly everything."

Faced with that, something needs to be done about some form of limitation on prescribing.

The view that a prescription is a substitute for doctors' advice, sympathy and expertise is not only illusory but harmful. One of the problems of our modern age is the tremendous dependence on professionalism and expertise as a belief that they can actually do more than they can. Ivan Illich's polemic about the overestimation of the powers of the health services deals with the failure to come to terms with genuine health care. He says:

"The pharmaceutical invasion leads industrialised man to medication by himself or by others that reduces his ability to cope with a body for which he himself can still care."

A MORI poll last month showed that 3·5 million adults — 8 per cent. of the population — have taken tranquillisers for more than four months at some time in their lives.

Dr. M. S. Miller: The hon. Gentleman is not doing justice to the experts. He is not in the medical profession, so he does not accept that medical students, in their training, are taught from the beginning that sometimes the best form of treatment is masterly inactivity. I assure the hon. Gentleman that doctors keep that uppermost in their minds. Nearly every doctor I know clearly tells the patient that it is his own defences that will cure him. All that the doctor can do is to give a little assistance.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Doctors who take that attitude are precisely those who do not need the encouragement of the proposals—it is the other doctors for whom the list is important.

Pharmacists have told me that on one prescription for one patient there has been prescribed an anti-diarrhoeal and a laxative, or an antussin and an expectorant. That is ludicrous. We are aiming to deal not with the good doctors but those who overprescribe or who see a prescription as a means of getting a patient out of the surgery. The NHS, regardless of the resources made available to it, can be expected only to supply what patients need and not what patients want.

The matter of dispensing doctors has already been mentioned. If those who live in urban areas can obtain what they want because they have access to a pharmacy, it would be illogical to say that those who do not live in urban areas cannot receive what they want because they have to obtain it from a dispensing doctor. I appreciate the Secretary of State's point in putting the commercial problem before doctors, but I see no way around that unless he intends to do something about all two-tier medicine. There cannot be a differentiation between rural and urban areas.

The ability of drugs to improve health is constantly being challenged by efforts to improve preventive medicine—healthier eating, nutritional food labelling, well woman clinics, and so on. The Consumers Association publication, "The Wrong Kind of Medicine?" is crucial to understanding those efforts. The author, Charles Medawar, writes:

"The benefits of our huge drug list are essentially to do with trade, not health. The advantages of a restricted drug list include having fewer bad drugs and a reduction in drug-induced disease; and better information about drug use and less confusion about which drugs to use."

If this were a Bill, I should have no problem in voting for its Second Reading and seeking to amend it in Committee, but it is not a Bill and the regulations as they stand are defective. First, they do not deal with the problem of patent life, which will have to be faced if this principle is extended to other categories. If the Government believe that it is right in principle to limit prescribing in some categories, I cannot see why they say that they do not wish to extend it to other categories. If it proves effective in this regard, it seems inevitable that it will be extended to other categories. To deal with the drug companies' research problem at the same time as extending the categories it would be necessary to extend the patent life of drugs so as not to inhibit research.

Secondly, the regulations do not deal with pharmacists' remuneration, which will be significantly affected if the proposals are effective. A GP who tries to prescribe as little as possible and to prescribe generically has told me that the pharmacist across the road from his surgery told him that, although he agrees with the doctors' approach, it is putting him out of business because the method of remuneration for pharmacists is not adequate to cope with the proposed changes.

The most significant defect, however, is that no appeal mechanism is likely to be in operation when the regulations come into operation. My hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) raised this at DHSS Question Time last Tuesday and said that it would help alliance Members to support the regulations if the Secretary of State would give an undertaking that an override mechanism would be in place when the regulations came into force. No such undertaking has been given and I do not see why the Secretary of State should shelter behind his desire to force the BMA to negotiate with him on this. Once he accepts the possibility that the list may not be complete he ought to delay its implementation until an appeal procedure is in place.

A list may be 95 per cent. or even 99 per cent. comprehensive and satisfactory, but if one cannot claim that it is 100 per cent. correct an override mechanism is essential. I believe that every other national limited list has such a machanism as part and parcel of its operation. The key principle of the NHS, providing for need, means that such a mechanism is crucial. If the Secretary of State would delay implementation until such a mechanism is in place, we could support the proposals, but we cannot support the way in which the Government have introduced the measure although the principle behind it is to be commended.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft), not least because it was a relief to return to the real issues and to thoughtful debate after the somewhat hysterical and at times unintentionally hilarious opening comments from the Labour Front Bench.

I agreed with much of what the hon. Gentleman said, but I part company with him in his failure to understand why some Conservative Members were concerned about the ABPI campaign. Only a few weeks after the initial announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, Members in all parts of the House were caught in the crossfire of what was nothing less than a propaganda war. As the saying goes, in all wars truth is the first casualty, and I believe that it has been the need to sort out truth from fiction which has led to parts of today's debate being somewhat overheated.

The parliamentary lobbying campaign set new and dangerous precedents. The first shots in the propaganda war were fired by the ABPI. However, I believe that the pharmaceutical industry—for which the ABPI purports to speak—has a somewhat better case than the one so far made on its behalf in an entirely counter-productive advertising campaign. The leaders of the ABPI seem to have been infected throughout that campaign by Scargillitis. In matters of exaggeration, hyperbole, and, at times, misrepresentation, the only difference between the ABPI and the NUM is one of degree, not of principle.

Against that background of propaganda, I am glad that my right hon. Friend stood firm against the tidal wave of pressure unleashed against his proposals. I am glad that megaphone lobbying is to be defeated in tonight's vote. I am glad that our Ministers have the common sense to hold the ring between competing interest groups. They have done their job well. They have struck just about the right balance between the interests of the pharmaceutical industry, the concerns of the medical profession, the need to make efficient use of the resources of the NHS, which the hon. Member for Leeds, West rightly identified as the kernel of the matter, and, above all, the worries of patients — the least vocal but most important group to be affected by the regulations.

I have a constituency interest in the pharmaceutical industry.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Aha.

Mr. Aitken: At his age, the hon. Gentleman should be able to see the difference between a constituency interest and a financial interest.

My constituency contains the great pharmaceutical company of Pfizers — a well-managed and successful company that employs 1,500 people in an area where jobs are precious.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: It is one of the worst.

Mr. Aitken: Pfizers is not one of the worst. To all intents and purposes, Pfizers is unaffected by these regulations. Its total sales of some £70 million a year could be affected to the tune of about £250,000 a year. The impact will be infinitesimal.

Pfizers is a good company. It invests regularly every year and its sales and exports increase every year. Last year it invested more than £10 million in its plant at Sandwich, a large part of which was spent on the new research department which my right hon. Friend very kindly came to open.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Does not the hon. Gentleman take seriously the possibility of Pfizers not going ahead with a £20 million development, to which the representatives of Pfizers have referred?

Mr. Aitken: I take that possibility extremely seriously. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman, like myself, appears to take some cognisance of the good case for the pharmaceutical industry.

As Pfizers is largely unaffected by the regulations, one might expect the company to be somewhat laid back about them, but it is deeply concerned about what it describes as the wider picture of the growing climate of hostility towards drug companies. Even making allowances for a degree of multinational paranoia, it should be noted that there is a degree of hostility towards the drug companies in this country, although not, I believe, within the Government. It certainly exists on the Opposition Benches. For example, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was quoted in The Observer yesterday as making some remarks that reek of ignorant prejudice, accusing the drug companies of "ripping off" the NHS because they are allowed a return of 16 per cent. on their investment. In fact the drug companies, which are operating in what is undoubtedly a high-risk business, have suffered four compulsory price reductions via the pharmaceutical price reduction scheme in the past three years and are now only allowed to make profits — on those of their products that are successful—at a level smaller than those that the Government allow to companies in the defence industries. No great bonanza is taking place.

Pfizers regards the regulations as part of a wider picture that causes concern. The company sees business becoming more difficult; the Government becoming more interventionist; and confidence declining. One local sign of the state of confidence is that, as the hon. Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) has pointed out, Pfizers' current plan to build a £15 million pharmaceutical finishing plant at Sandwich is in jeopardy and has a large question mark hanging over it.

When drawing my right hon. Friend's attention to these anxieties, I am not for a moment suggesting that he is wrong or was wrong about the limited list, but that business confidence—and the investment and employment that go with it — is a fragile plant in today's pharmaceutical industry. We need a strong manufacturing base and do not want it eroded. When the dust of this battle has settled, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister should consider some confidence-building measures for this great industry. It needs some reassurance beyond the time-honoured parliamentary phrase, "I have no plans to do so at present." We need some assurance that the limited list is not the thin end of the wedge and that large extensions of it are not envisaged.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will examine other means of increasing confidence in the industry. For example, he might consider some recent United States legislation on patent term restoration and extension to see whether we might benefit from similar measures. Just because the ABPI has made an enormous hash of its propaganda, we should not lose sight of the fact that it is strongly in our national interest to have a strong, vigorous and healthy pharmaceutical industry.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton My hon. Friend has rightly mentioned Pfizer. Does he agree that one of the most successful pharmaceutical companies — Imperial Chemical Industries — which is also unaffected by the proposed limited list, is also in principle totally opposed to what the Government are doing, as it believes that it will be damaging to its future investment and the additional employment that it could create?

Mr. Aitken: When I hear phrases such as "totally opposed", I can hardly believe that the rather modest nature of the limited list is enough to trigger such enormous opposition.

Mr. Winterton: It is totally opposed.

Mr. Aitken: My hon. Friend has made his point. We must try to see the issue in the proportion that it deserves.

I am sad that leaders of the British Medical Association have had their moments of going over the top at their end of the propaganda war. When I recently heard Dr. John Marks, the chairman of the BMA, solemnly telling BBC television viewers that it is only a matter of time before amputation patients would be compelled to wear Fowler artificial limbs, I realised that the clock at Tavistock square had struck 13 and that the BMA too had got a touch of Scargillitis.

Members of the BMA are much more sensible than their leadership. Of course there are anxieties but, with few exceptions, doctors in Thanet to whom I have spoken are not in outright opposition to the plans. That is logical, for in medical terms there is no great issue of principle here. All the slogans about the end of clinical freedom and the beginnings of a two-tier NHS do not stand up to serious examination when one studies the limited list. It is a modest proposal. However, there are lingering doubts among doctors on, for example, how to discharge responsibilities to special case patients such as the terminally ill patient who may be dependent on one sedative or analgesic. I am glad that the appeals procedure is likely to take care of that.

Above all, there is a vague general worry that the regulations are a first step on the road to more centrally directed prescribing restrictions. My right hon. Friend's assurance should put an end to some of those worries.

The key issue is the efficient deployment of resources in the NHS. We should all recognise that £75 million worth of savings on the drugs bill is money badly needed in other areas of health priority. If the Beecham's powders and the male sex hormones on the list have now to be bought over the counter so that patients can have more kidney machines——

Mr. Winterton: How often are they prescribed now?

Mr. Aitken: —more ventilators for premature babies and more and better arrangements for cervical screening, most patients will recognise and accept the trade off, whatever the pressure groups and lobbyists may say. My right hon. Friend has a duty to be a good housekeeper for the patients of the NHS. That is a great deal better than being a parrot for the ABPI, which is what the hon. Member for Oldham, West was today. In a world of finite resources, good housekeeping means difficult choices about areas of priority. Nearly every other country has some form of limited prescribing to keep its drugs bills in check and to get health priorities right. My right hon. Friend has got it just about right.

9.29 pm

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): The Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) complained about the ABPI campaign, but surely they are both seasoned enough Members to be able to relegate such propaganda activity to its proper position. I must have received as much information from the industry as anyone else, but I did not read it, and I relegated most of it to the place where it belonged. However, the industry had every right to lobby hon. Members, and I did not notice the Secretary of State or the hon. Member for Thanet, South complaining when the National Coal Board went overboard with its advertisements during the miners' strike or when other organisations, such as British Telecommunications, went overboard.

I have no pecuniary interest in the drugs industry, but I jump to the defence of the underdog. Conservative Members may not regard the ABPI as an underdog, but the Government are prepared to emasculate the trade unions and they did not blink a collective eyelid at spending £4 billion to bring down the miners. Any organisation that wishes to withstand the Government's might needs a bit of help.

The Secretary of State made great play of the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) did not leap to the attack when the Government announced their intentions. Perhaps, like me, my hon. Friend did not believe that the Secretary of State would go ahead with his ridiculous scheme. The hon. Members for Thanet, South and for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) described the scheme as a mouse of a proposal. I am not opposed to a clean-up of the methods of prescribing, but this is not the way to do it.

The Secretary of State said that the drugs bill amounted to £1,500 million out of a total NHS budget of £17 billion. In percentage terms, that is a reduction. When I was in practice, the drugs bill was 50 per cent. more than what was paid to doctors. Drugs accounted for 12 per cent. of total costs and doctors for 8 per cent.

Conservative Members have said that no country can afford to produce for its citizens an unlimited list of drugs. But there has not been such a list in this country for at least 25 years. When the NHS started, it was said that there would be an unlimited list, and doctors used to prescribe Ribena and many other commodities that were not drugs. However, that soon stopped and we have settled into a pattern. It may not have been entirely satisfactory, but we do not live in a perfect world. Expecting a cohesive system in the NHS, without any waste, is expecting the impossible. One has only to compare the British Health Service with health provisions in other countries—they are not services—to find that in every way ours is less expensive than that of any other country in the western world.

Mr. Tracey: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of this matter, but the 1983 Labour party manifesto stated that the Labour party would seek to make drugs more economic. Will the hon. Gentleman explain what that means in the light of what he has just said?

Dr. Miller: I shall come to some aspects of that shortly. If the hon. Gentleman is not then satisfied, I invite him to question me again.

I do not understand why the Government embarked on this matter, creating such antipathy to it from the medical profession and causing patients a great deal of anxiety. I accept that drug firms may have gone overboard in fostering that anxiety, but it was started by the Government's stated intentions.

There are other ways of reducing the drugs bill. I am not opposed to reducing the cost of drugs to the country. Other ways include careful monitoring of prices, checking research and development costs, allowing for the reasonable recouping of the costs of research and development, watching carefully, and having consultations with drug firms and the medical profession. Sometimes it would be a good idea also to consult patients.

As the hon. Member for Thanet, South pointed out, profits have been cut four times already. Why not use that system? Why embark on this sort of activity which, whether Conservative Members like it or not, creates a two-tier system? It is all very well to say that many drugs can be bought for less than the prescription charge, especially when the prescription charge is raised to £2, but people on supplementary benefit do not pay prescription charges and they will have to pay for these drugs, if they want them.

I am in favour of a campaign to persuade the medical profession to prescribe generic drugs as far as possible, but we should persuade, not force, it to do so. It should certainly not be done by substitution. The practitioner, not the pharmacist, must write the prescription and state what medicines he wants for his patients.

We must be careful where drugs are manufactured. Generic drugs can be manufactured in parts of the world which cause headlines, such as that which appeared in the The Observer yesterday. It stated:

"Wave of killer capsules sweeps the Third world."

We know that can happen. The article states:

"Growing quantities of faked antibiotics—potentially lethal to those who take them—are being smuggled into Africa and other parts of the third world."

These "killer capsules" are being manufactured in places as far apart as Taiwan and South Korea. We must be extremely careful about that when we buy generic drugs. It is possible to embark on a policy of generic drugs, but we have a highly responsible and large drugs industry, and the Government may be putting it at risk.

The issue of polypharmacy — of people taking medicines which they may not need or the effects of which are not well established—has been referred to obliquely. Doctors prescribe for some patients who take drugs because of the psychological factor in treatment. I must emphasise that this is an extremely important element in the treatment of patients. As I said in an intervention in the speech of the hon. Member for Leeds, West, doctors try not to prescribe potent or potentially dangerous medicines.

I should draw to the attention of the House an interesting article on this subject which appeared in last week's General Practitioner. It talks about placebos, which are often prescribed. The doctor who wrote the article describes his patient as a pleasant middle-aged woman who, five and a half years ago, was diagnosed as a hypertensive. He said:

"She had been registered in another practice and her raised blood pressure had been picked up at their 'MRC hypertension trial' screening clinic."

It was a Medical Research Council trial screening clinic. After she was discovered to have significantly raised readings, she was started on treatment in a double-blind trial. That meant that neither the doctor nor the patient knew what drug the patient was receiving. It was either a placebo or an anti-hypertensive drug.

"When she left the practice area and registered with me, her previous GP dropped me a line to say that as the five years on the trial was up, they had broken the double-blind code and had discovered that she had been taking a placebo, and that this could obviously be discontinued at an appropriate time. An appropriate time presented itself a few days later when she turned up to see me to get a repeat supply of her tablets. I took her blood pressure"—— which was normal at 125/80—

"told her I had been in touch with her previous doctor, and that we both felt her blood pressure had settled so well that she could probably try without her treatment. She seemed quite happy with this, stopped taking the tablets, and arranged to see me after a month for a check up."

Then the doctor said:

"You've guessed it. Her blood pressure after a month off the placebo was 195/110. I waited a week and checked again. 190/110. There was no doubt about it, she needed treatment again. When I told her this she wasn't in the least surprised, told me her tablets had suited her so well and had made her feel so much better that she would like to go back on the same ones now."

He gave her the same tablets, and her blood pressure went down again.

Another case is even more intriguing, but I shall not labour the point. This is something that doctors see time and again. Incidentally, that doctor had a good recommendation to make to the Secretary of State. He believes that a proportion of patients should be given placebos and that some of them will get well. I do not say that I agree with him.

The list has some ludicrous aspects. For example, one drug on the list is called Capramin; another drug, which is exactly the same and cheaper, is not on the list. One wonders why there should be such discrimination.

The doctor-patient relationship is precious, and Conservative Members will accept that it must be fostered. The British medical profession in not a business as it is in the United States. There is no incentive in Britain to give patients treatment that they do not need, because no money is involved. The doctor gets the same capitation fee from the Health Service whatever he prescribes for his patient.

Let there be limits but very generous limits within which the doctor should be permitted to prescribe. The doctor's freedom to prescribe what he believes to be best for his patient should be paramount. At the end of the day it is the patient in this relationship who matters.

Mr. Nicholls: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. While placebos are being discussed, should it not be pointed out that there are no hon. Members sitting on the Liberal Benches, despite their great interest in this matter, and that they have not been in their place for a considerable period of time?

9.45 pm

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller). He held the attention of the House by emphasising the importance of the patient-doctor relationship. Before I go any further, I should like to declare an interest. Long before the limited list was drawn up I was an adviser to two pharmaceutical companies and I have been married for 24½ years to a dispensing practitioner who is a senior partner in a group practice. I have lived with this industry and the doctor-patient relationship for as long as any hon. Member. May I also pay tribute to Ministers and officials for the courtesy I have received in all the representations that have been made to them. It is right that that fact should be placed on the record.

Originally savings of £100 million were looked for. Those savings have now been reduced to £75 million. Ministers said from the start that there had been extensive consultations following the Greenfield report. The statement made on 8 November by my right hon. Friend came like a bolt from the blue to the Opposition, Conservative Members, the British Medical Association, the pharmaceutical industry, the community health councils and to everybody who takes an interest in medicine in the United Kingdom. At that time my right hon. Friend said that the initial list was open to discussion and that he would give everybody 12 weeks, including Christmas, in which to put forward proposals to modify the list. However, he said that we would not be told what the criteria for that modification would be. When I asked my right hon. Friend about the extensive reports that had been undertaken overseas, I was told that they were confidential to the countries concerned. Some of us were a little sceptical and thought that this was because holes would be found in the reports if they were published.

Ministers also said on 8 November that they had not decided how the review was to be carried out. However, after further reflection an independent review body was set up. There was already in existence the Committee on Safety of Medicines and the Committee on Review of Medicines. A number of other medical organisations were in existence but our party had to set up yet another quango, despite the fact that the Government's own medical advisory committee had recommended against the whole concept. But even that quango was not set up properly. After it had been set up somebody remembered that one-fifth of the savings were to come from benzodiazepenes and that there was no psychiatrist on the panel. He was appointed immediately.

What happened is almost history but the proposals produced the biggest adverse reaction from the pharmaceutical industry, doctors, community health councils and patients that this country has ever seen since the introduction of the National Health Service. Everything stopped for the limited list. Representations were made that it should be abandoned. People flew in from the United States and Europe. Members of the Social Audit and the World Health Organisation rubbed their hands in glee as they saw true Socialism being put into practice.

The consultation period resulted in the limited list being extended from 31 to just over 100 products. The new list bears so little resemblance to the initial list as to make the mind boggle. I ask seriously what possible faith can Members of Parliament, doctors, patients or anybody who takes an interest in medicine in Britain have in the chief medical officer and those who advised my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the initial list. Presumably it was not a cockshy; it was meant to be a serious suggestion for a limited list. If it was not, it is a disgrace that it was put forward in the first place.

Now we have a better limited list. By definition, it cannot meet all clinical needs. Every hon. Member who has spoken is right. It may meet 98 or 99 per cent., but it cannot meet 100 per cent. of clinical need.

My right hon. Friends on the Front Bench may be asking why I will not accept the new extended limited list. Let me try and explain. First, it removes clinical freedom from general practitioners. Aneurin Bevan was sensible enough when he set up the NHS to recognise that that was one of the basic principles of a successful doctor-patient relationship.

Secondly, the list is supposed to save £75 million. It will not. Look what has happened in Germany which has a comparable system. The Germans are not fools. They are every bit as efficient as we are in the United Kingdom and in most cases a darn sight more efficient. They set themselves a target of savings of over 500 million deutschmarks. They achieved 50 per cent. of that. They are not idiots in Canada, either. They set themselves a target and they achieved about 50 per cent. of that. What did Holland find? They found that costs rose and they have abandoned the section similar to our limited list. No, we shall not obtain savings anywhere near the figure that is talked about.

I hope that when my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health replies he will explain in some detail what monitoring he will do on the limited list to demonstrate the savings. Some of us will be looking carefully to make sure that the savings on the pharmaceutical prices regulations scheme are not transferred across to the savings that are sought on the limited list.

Thirdly, there is the point about the fallback position. The hospital formularies have such a position, as has been said. I was astounded when I heard my right hon. Friend say—I hope that I quote him correctly—that because the BMA has not consulted him he is not in a position tonight, nor will he be on 1 April, to announce a fallback position for those who have intolerances or allergies, which are the two most likely problem areas. That is an irresponsible position but there are enough doctors in the Department to have at least done the groundwork on the fallback position. It would be irresponsible to introduce this scheme on 1 April and make patients suffer because of an argument between my right hon. Friend and the BMA. That is not acceptable to the House and it should not be acceptable to the country.

Fourthly, apparently there are to be amendments to the statutory instrument that we have before us tonight. The Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments highlighted two problems that it had with the proposals. How often will those amendments come forward? Will that be a quarterly process? This statutory instrument has errors and it is questionable to have Parliament push through inaccurate legislation.

Fifthly, what will happen to all the research that is going on in these categories? At present 130 compounds are in some form of trial in Britain. What is the criteria for those products to get back on to the list? Is it to be the nebulous criteria of need that the DHSS has, or is it to be a scientific criteria? It should be a scientific criteria and I hope that when my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health replies he will make that clear.

The list is riddled with errors. The hon. Member for East Kilbride mentioned Capramin and Levius, the cheaper one being the one that is on the black list. Presumably it should have been the other way round, but that is just a minor clerical error. Vitamised iron and yeast tablets have been blacklisted. Vitamised iron tonic tablets with yeast—the same thing the other way round—have not. There are other examples with which I shall not bore the House because representations have been made to the Department. Presumably, in due course, they will be put right, but they should have been right before they were brought before the House.

Mr. Nicholls: Will my hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mr. Morris: No.

Finally, and most insidiously, despite the Minister's disclaimers, there is another force at work. There is substitution of generics for branded products, and that is a vital area. This country needs branded drugs if it is to maintain the industry as a sunrise industry. If we take away the right to brand, we take away fundamental research from this country. If we do that, we begin to undermine the successful exports industry. Then we take away employment, and we take away investment, as my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) said earlier.

I find it incredible that some of my hon. Friends do not understand that there is no such thing as a single generic product. Some of us remember when, not so long ago, the below-specification Indian bandages came into Britain. The country will be flooded with all sorts of different generics. The Minister says that they will all have to be licensed. That is only partially true. The premises of a wholesaler in Belgium or Italy will have to be licensed but no one will check what that wholesaler imports, and he will then export unchecked products into the United Kingdom.

Some of us remember the 1960s and the scandal that the Birmingham medical officer of health exposed over Tetracycline and the imports of sub-standard products from Poland. Could it happen again? Of course it could. While the active ingredients in a generic are supposed to be the same, their palatability, their rate of release and their rate of absorption can differ very greatly.

Every manufacturer in the United Kingdom—and we are all proud of the standards of production of our pharmaceutical industry—is inspected under the good manufacturing practice laws. I ask the Minister: who will do the inspection of the overseas plants? How many inspectors are there? I should be grateful if we could have a firm answer to those questions.

The policy is wrong. The regulations would be open to a charge of hybridity if an affirmative resolution were required this evening; unfortunately, it is not. It may be open to challenge, as has been said, under article 30, dealing with competition. But, whatever challenges may be made, the regulations have been introduced in a shambolic way and put through with unprecedented speed.

I do not believe that the savings are there to be made. The impact of the regulations has already caused loss of employment for one manufacturer and stopped investment —and to what purpose? Patients are worried, and they will be even more worried after 1 April. They may settle into the new regime—let us hope they do—but at best many thousands will have to move from a settled regime into an unsettled one. Others, whether my right hon. Friend likes it or not, will be forced to buy, so for the first time we shall have, even if in a modest manner, a two-tier Health Service.

When 10,000 people in Northampton, with no instigation from me, sign a community health council petition complaining about the regulations — [Interruption.] I hope that the Secretary of State is not making an adverse comment about my constituents or about the community health council in Northampton. He can make comments about my speech, and sometimes the truth does hurt. Ours is supposed to be the party of enterprise with a caring face. We should hide our faces with regard to these regulations. If they are not rejected, as they should be, they will return to haunt the Government as amendment after amendment is laid before the House, night after night, as the savings fail to materialise, as the adverse drug reaction reports increase, as people lose their jobs and investment goes elsewhere.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): I take part in the debate for two reasons. First, like my hon. Friends, I believe that the Government's handling of this matter has been ham-handed and arrogant, to say the least. They have caused great but avoidable distress and concern among many people who have been confused by the statements. It is no good the Government arguing that either the drug manufacturers or anybody else has overreacted to their statements. The fault clearly lies with the Government because of the way that they have handled this matter.

A great deal has been said about the effects of the regulations on the drugs industry, doctors and so on, but little has been said about the effects on patients. Most hon. Members have received letters which show that many people are concerned and will remain concerned while this list prevails.

Secondly, I have an interest in that I have a drug manufacturing company in my constituency and I am concerned about the jobs of constituents. I do not apologise for saying this when there are 4 million unemployed. It was not the will of those employed in the drug industry to join that industry. Like most working people, they found their way into it because of the communities in which they live and the job opportunities there. They have no control over their destinies. Therefore, it is my responsibility to fight for the jobs of those people, and I hope that my hon. Friends will agree with me.

We have seen the reaction of people who have spent many years in the drugs industry, who have been unnecessarily concerned and disturbed by the Government. Regardless of what the Government have been saying, this measure is merely a way to cut Health Service expenditure, and the hand of the Treasury is involved in the affair. There is no medical or other justification for the arguments advanced by the Government, and this is clearly a Treasury policy. We all know where that policy will lead us.

There has been a move towards great dependency on drugs, and that is part of how we approach health matters. There has been no serious attempt to seek alternatives, and maintaining dependency on drugs has become part of the role of the NHS. I have seen or heard nothing under this Government to suggest that there are positive and acceptable alternatives to the drugs industry. Unless those alternatives have been pursued and established, we shall have to depend on the manufacture and use of drugs. In other countries many lessons have been learnt.

We should not let this occasion go by without expressing some concern about the way in which drugs are monitored and about how the drug companies and the Committee on Safety of Medicines appear to disregard the extensive misuse of drugs. However, those are not the issues under discussion in this debate.

If there is to be a movement away from drug dependency, and if we see more moves towards preventive medicine, we should join Conservative Members if they say that that is the direction that they intend to take. However, there is no evidence that that is the reasoning behind the Government's proposal.

More and more people are becoming aware that the main, if not the only, purpose of this exercise is in the first instance to cut the costs of the National Health Service. There is no suggestion that there will be any benefit in the longer term.

The National Health Service has been under constant attack from this Government since 1979. The Secretary of State and his junior Ministers always argue that more money is being spent on the NHS. However, the right hon. Gentleman should recognise that we have an aging population and that there are new illnesses which need the constant attention of the service. As new remedies for, new methods of curing and new ways of stabilising diseases are brought in, they will bring in their wake further costs. There should be no limit on our perspective of the needs of the Health Service. It must be primarily to improve the health of the people.

The Government's proposal is a ham-handed way of dealing with the problem. I hope that the House will consider most carefully what is being said by hon. Members on both sides of the House. If nothing else does, the contributions that we have heard from Government supporters ought to influence the Secretary of State.

I take into account at all times the jobs of those employed in the pharmaceutical industry, for the reasons that I have stated already. The Government's proposal will have a widespread effect throughout the drugs industry. Until there are alternative jobs, I shall continue to take that line.

10.8 pm

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): When the provisional list was published last November, I had grave anxieties about it. I found it objectionable on two counts. First, it did not pay sufficient heed to the needs of people in rural areas. Secondly, I thought that the list of 30 medicines within the seven classes was insufficient to meet clinical needs. The House has to decide whether the revised list takes account of those two major criticisms.

The first of them clearly is met. My right hon. Friend has made it clear that in a rural area a dispensing doctor will now be permitted to prescribe and supply to a patient drugs which are not on the National Health Service.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): At a charge.

Mr. Hogg: Yes, at a charge. That is perfectly true. But what worried people in rural areas was that they would be unable to obtain their medicines without going into the nearest towns. My right hon. Friend has met that criticism. On that point, there is no cause for anxiety.

Mr. Kennedy: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hogg: I shall give way in a moment.

But a much more serious anxiety is whether a list of medicines, set by the Government, can meet the clinical needs of patients. I have little doubt that when we were dealing with the list of 30, the answer was no. The criticism was powerful and vociferous. It concentrated on pain-killers and laxatives. It was pointed out that there was an inadequate range of both. Had the list remained unexpanded, I would have voted against it. But the Government have moved substantially and we now have, I think, 128 on the white list. We must ask ourselves whether that list meets the patients' needs. That is a matter of judgment. Unlike the hon. Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller), I am not a doctor, but I have talked to doctors in my constituency and read the literature. I have also tried to listen to sensible criticism. I think the ultimate judgment is that for the vast majority of patients, their clinical needs will be met by the drugs——

Mr. Ewing: What about the rest? Do we just let them die?

Mr. Hogg: If the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) does not mind, I shall take the argument in stages.

I am confident that well over 90 per cent. of patients will find that their needs are met by the white list. I accept that that leaves a small number of patients for whom the white list may not be adequate. We cannot quantify it, but I think that more than 90 per cent. will have their needs met. I suspect, therefore, that we are dealing with a core of 3, 4 or 5 per cent. The House must pay attention to that real and serious figure, but it is, nevertheless, small.

We must then ask where we go from there. Does that fact disqualify the policy, or can the problem be met in some other way? My conclusion is that it can be met in some other way, and that the problem does not disqualify the policy. The other way is the appeal system. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will know that ever since publication of his provisional list, I have pressed him for an appeal system. One can call it various things — residual discretion, or whatever — but it is quite clear that an appeal system is needed. Without it, the policy is not particularly attractive.

We have to face the fact that we are going into this policy without an effective appeal system. After all, there will not be an appeal system on 1 April. The question that then arises is whether, as an appeal system will not be available on 1 April, we should refuse to support the policy. But again, the answer to that must be no.

There are two reasons why the absence of an appeal system is not fatal. First, I do not believe that an appeal system can be made to function efficiently, or will be acceptable to the medical profession, if doctors have not played a part in devising it. The BMA has not been active in consultations with the Government. I suspect that until these regulations are passed, the BMA will not be ready to enter into negotiations with the Government. Therefore, it is the BMA's fault that has prevented an agreed appeal system from being put into place.

Mr. Nicholls: I, too, have pressed the Minister to adopt an override position to take account of the problem. If the BMA ultimately decides not to co-operate, surely it cannot be allowed to hold the whip hand over the working of this proposal. Does my hon. Friend agree that if it will not co-operate, the appeal procedure may have to be forced upon it?

Mr. Hogg: I agree with that.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: What knowledge does my hon. Friend have of the industry? Because the Government have displayed very little, we have little confidence.

Mr. Hogg: I have greater confidence than my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) has in the good faith of the medical profession.

Mr. Robert Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am seeking to follow the hon. Gentleman's argument closely, but unfortunately when he turns his back on me I cannot hear what he says.

Mr. Hogg: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. I hope that he will accept that I meant him no discourtesy.

[Mr. Hogg]

I was accepting the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) about the appeal system. If the medical profession is unwilling to negotiate a workable appeal system, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will impose one. But I do not think so ill of the medical profession. I am fairly confident that when these regulations are passed, a viable appeal system will be negotiated with the doctors.

Mrs. McCurley: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government set out, in their policies for two general elections, to rid the country of bureaucracy? What my hon. Friend suggests is tantamount to additional bureaucracy. It will cost a great deal and it is extremely complicated.

Mr. Hogg: That is a fair argument generally, but we must consider the appeal system in the context of the proposals. I think that the proposals are good, subject to the existence of an appeal system. I see no reason why that appeal system should be bureaucratic. I see no reason why it should not be expeditious and accepted by the medical profession. If it meets those criteria, the appeal system will be viable. I hope that the medical profession and the Government come to terms quickly on the question of an appeal system.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Is the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) saying that he is satisfied that no one will be denied the drugs that their doctors believe they need because they cannot afford them?

Mr. Hogg: That is what I am saying. If there is a viable appeal system, and since we are talking about a greatly expanded list, nobody will suffer.

I do not believe that this is an unwarrantable attack on a profession. All professions accept some constraints on their ability to act as they wish. For example, in my profession no one asserts that a solicitor or barrister should have an unqualified right to prescribe legal aid simply because a person comes within the financial eligibility criteria. That is left to the legal aid committees, and we accept that.

No one suggests that doctors are entitled to order as many kidney machines as they want simply because patients need them. We accept financial constraints and that the taxpayer and the Government have a voice.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) is rightly anxious about the drugs industry. But is his anxiety realistic? We are dealing with only seven classes of drugs. They are not the major drugs, but drugs that cover about 10 per cent. of the market. Exemptions total about 70 per cent. The drugs industry is international in its scope. The seven classes do not involve the major life-enhancing, life-preserving drugs on which major research is being conducted. I have respect for my hon. Friend, but he overestimates the danger that could be done to the drugs industry.

I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) is not here, because I agree that we are dealing not with an issue of great principle but with a pragmatic issue. If it be right that the saving is real——

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: It is not.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield must accept that we disagree——

Mr. Winterton: I would take a bet.

Mr. Hogg: I would never bet with my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield because I might not see my bet when I won it. I like to bet with people who pay up when they lose.

Mr. Winterton: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) has described me as a dishonourable Member of the House, and I ask him to withdraw his remark immediately.

Mr. Hogg: If I so described my hon. Friend, I withdraw my remark. However, I was not conscious of doing so.

We are dealing with a pragmatic issue. If there is to be a substantial saving—and I believe that there is—if there is no real danger of injury to patient care—and I do not think that there is—and if the fears of my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington about the drugs industry are misconceived—and I think that they are—the proposals are sensible and should attract the support of the House.

Mrs Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): My hon. Friends the Members for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) and for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas) are two doctors who grace the Opposition Benches. They emphasised strongly that in trying to bring about the changes that the Secretary of State is introducing, he has gone about it the wrong way if he wished to win the support of the medical profession.

That is rather surprising because it is the Opposition who are usually accused of not knowing how to talk to doctors, how to deal with them or how to carry them with them. We have had a lesson in how not to gain the support of the doctors from the Government on the issue of drugs. Had the medical profession been consulted in the first place, it would have gone along with the proposals. The fact that the Secretary of State did not consult the medical profession has created unnecessary opposition and animosity that has led many people to believe that the proposals have no merit.

I do not go along with that view because I believe that the proposals are very much in line with many of the ideas put forward by the Opposition. We support generic prescribing while at the same time understanding that that will create difficulties for the drugs industry.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) said, employment problems are involved. Indeed, members of my union — the Transport and General Workers' Union—are widely employed in the drugs industry and we must take their problems on board.

The Health Ministers have shown ineptitude, which is rather surprising, in their handling of the problem. How could they have thought that by coming to the House on 8 November to announce their limited proposals they would get away with it? The British Medical Association was represented on the working party which produced the Greenfield report in 1983. The report recommended that limited lists should not be introduced. The Minister for Health said on 22 November 1983:

"We are not convinced that such a list confining the judgment of doctors would be in the best interests of patients."—[Official Report, 22 November 1983; Vol. 49, c. 112.]

What has happened since then to change his mind? It is certainly not an animated discussion with the profession. We know that neither Ministers nor their officials have consulted with the profession about the prescribing of drugs since January 1983.

The Opposition support the Greenfield report. If it had been handled properly, many doctors would have co-operated in the introduction of its proposals.

It has not been made clear to interested parties that the Government are proposing a swingeing increase in prescription charges. The Secretary of State did not mention prescription charges today. I understand that it is proposed that there should be a charge of £2 per item—not per prescription. Therefore, it will be a higher increase than that indicated by Ministers.

According to my information, a large number of commonly prescribed drugs on the Minister's list cost much less than the proposed prescription charge. Some cost as little as 79p for a month's supply. A month's supply of digoxin would cost only 40p and a month's supply of the diuretic bendrofluozide would cost only 14p. It is clear, therefore, that a prescription charge of £2 per item would be a rip-off for the patient. The Minister must realise that patients cannot be exploited in that way by what would effectively be a tax on patients.

Even if the House approves the Government's highhanded action, I understand from my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) that the proposals will have to go to the European court. Perhaps the Minister for Health will tell us how much delay that will entail.

I hope that the Minister will be persuaded that he has handled this matter incompetently and that he will have continued difficulties with the medical profession if he does not consult it. I hope that he will go back to the profession to discuss how the proposals should be introduced to ensure that the necessary drugs are provided for all patients in the relevant categories and that the cost will be presented in such a way that patients are not out of pocket, paying £2 per item when that is exorbitant compared with the actual cost of the drugs.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): I am seriously disappointed that a great gulf has become evident between a large section of the medical profession, the DHSS and the Scottish Home and Health Department.

I can understand why doctors used the form of lobbying that they did. They are not politicians and they are usually very slow to rise to the bait. On this occasion, however, there was so little time to consult that they found themselves led by the nose by others lobbying against limited list prescribing.

Many general practitioners are satisfied—although not all of them are convinced—that the revised limited list covers most eventualities. More particularly, certain groups of hospital doctors believe that they will be seriously hampered by the list. In the past few weeks I have spoken to consultants and junior hospital doctors in Scotland. Unlike some of the panel who made these controversial decisions, those doctors see and treat patients every day. They have a very heavy clinical load, so they know what they are talking about. Those who are particularly anxious about the restrictions are psychiatrists, those responsible for the care of the elderly in hospital, and those who treat painful arthritic conditions, cancer, stomach disorders, and so on.

It would be most unwise for the Government not to listen to what those doctors say as they are the main prescribers of the categories of drugs subject to axing. Personally, I cannot avoid listening because my husband is a consultant psychiatrist of many years' standing. Even at a distinguished level in politics there is woeful ignorance about the nature of psychiatry and geriatric medicine, so I shudder to think what it must be like at other levels. Failure to distinguish between psychiatry, psychology and psychoanalysis has bedevilled the profession in the public mind, so I take this opportunity to make Members of Parliament aware of the situation.

I was amused when I saw some of the glorious remedies on the revised list. I saw on the proscribed list some of the remedies that my grannie used as patent medicines. At that stage I did not believe that they had ever been subject to Health Service prescription charges. At first I thought, "Good show. That is right. We should get rid of those things." However, when I consulted members of the profession, they told me that they could not prescribe those medicines anyway. It was then that I thought that the list was a bit of a con.

Everyone has had a good laugh at the oddities that are still available in the original published list of banned substances, but it should be realised that many of the substances are effectively banned either because they fall into the non-prescribable preparation category, such as foodstuffs, or are not advised, being directly publicly advertised.

Everyone is in favour of rational drug prescribing and ensuring the best uses of finite resources. It is widely accepted that part of this is generic prescription. The Government are right to attempt to restrict the list, but the list before us is another matter and to many it is unacceptable. Setting aside the unacceptability in principle, I believe that the administrative structure that would have to be set up for continuous review of appeal and rejection beggars description.

Doubtless such a structure and the time that it would involve would prove a delight to the bureaucrat, but it would be unacceptable to the patient and his doctor. I believe that that would be the view of many hon. Members were they to be aware of it. Family doctors and hospital medical staff alike will be affected. A significant number of prescriptions for proposed banned drugs are initiated by hospital consultants, either as a continuation of treatment after discharge or as a recommendation following outpatient or domiciliary consultation.

The National Health Service consultant will therefore be clearly restricted in his choice. Here is a problem that he might face if a drug is not on the limited list and is decided to be appropriate. Should the patient be in a privileged position to pay, how can that be administered within hospitals? Patients successfully maintained on a banned analgesic or laxative must be allowed to continue after hospital admission to use that drug. If drugs are available privately to outpatients, they must be available also to inpatients. Do the Government therefore propose to set up two separate prescribing systems which invariably mean twice the cost, twice the administration and twice the risk? Is it envisaged that hospital pharmacists will deal with private sales, or will the relatives of some patients be sent out for a "take-away" from the high street chemist?

Monitoring on the ward which drugs are owned by the patient and which are the property of the hospital would be well nigh impossible. The overall cost of implementing any of these schemes would be considerable. The benzodiazepine tranquillisers have a particularly poor public image and we know that at times they have a justifiably bad press. Indeed, I have many times counselled my constituents—some of whom have come to me in a frightful state—against the use of just such tranquillisers. I do not know whether it is ethical or not to do so. However, misuse is a continuing cause for concern. Restriction would not improve matters as the chosen few are very popular on the illicit market. Benzodiazepines are not merely crutches for the mildly anxious. In various forms they are essential for anxiety states and other forms of mental disorder and for the relief of a number of physical conditions. I believe that quite recently skin diseases have been treated by them. There is considerable variation in these drugs, and restriction to the present proposed list is unacceptable to many.

Paradoxically, one member of the group—Clobazam —may be prescribed for epilepsy only. Are random checks on GPs proposed? Will neurological evidence be demanded in each case? Faced with the restricted list, the prescribing doctor might end up having to prescribe from another category of substances to avoid the restriction to achieve the symptoms of relief. Barbiturates, from the unrestricted list, would be a bad buy for the Health Service if chosen in preference to the benzodiazepines. Similar cases can be made for analgesics and laxatives. Regrettably, the restricted list applies to groups of compounds which superficially appear unimportant but which are often vital in treatment, especially in the elderly.

The Bulletin of the Royal College of Psychiatrists states:

"The proposals put forward are unacceptably rigid in view of the range of widely differing olinical conditions that are treated with one compound and of the complex and varied nature of compounds that may be needed to treat a single clinical condition. For instance, in the case of benzodiazepines, what applies to the treatment of a neurosis does not necessarily apply to the treatment of epilepsy or spastic paraplegia, nor is it appropriate to their use in intubation procedures. Benzodiazepines vary widely in their profile of action, their formulation and aspects of pharmacokinetics. Moreover, the pharmacokinetics of drugs varies in sometimes unpredictable ways, e.g. in the elderly."

Combination drugs cannot be done away with. Any doctor who is treating arthritis will say that. One GP in my constituency told me that he took more than 20 shots to get the correct medicine for a sufferer. That is not as bad as it sounds. It is an example of a careful doctor who understands the nature and variety of medical products Even then, especially in the elderly, tolerance of drugs alters and the search for another appropriate drug which will ease a condition begins again. To take away the doctor's choice is not good for the patient.

Some hospital doctors whom I know think that there is no logic to the list. I am speaking of some who are involved in research as well as clinical work. It worries them that the analgesics available are of the opiate, or addictive, variety. Rheumatologists to whom I have spoken and who use non-steroidals say that they do not do everything and that they require the use of a variety of analgesics. The opiates cause constipation, as do some antacids. A wider variety of laxatives is needed, especially for cancer patients for whom constipation is often a result of drug therapy and primary disease. The same is true for patients with hiatus hernia and stomach ulcers. The number of antacids has been chopped, but each antacid has specific side effects. Sometimes constipation and sometimes the opposite results.

To treat a patient as an individual requires a broad spectrum of drugs. Many hon. Members might say that too many are produced, but I hope that they remember that, for every one drug that sees the light of day, 10 are rejected at the research stage. Of those that appear, those which are unpopular or are regarded as less than efficacious by the medical profession get withdrawn.

Many of my hon. Friends have been supportive of drugs companies. I am not a hack in this—I have no interest in drugs companies. Dista makes Distalgesic, which has been taken off the prescribing list, but, through its profits from that drug, it has made another drug called Penicillinamine. That drug is kept on the market, at no proft to the company, to help a few specific patients who are suffering from the very rare Wilson's disease—an accumulation of copper in the body. Sufferers of rheumatoid arthritis also benefit from it.

Another drug, Prostcyclin, which has given us the means to understand better how the body and blood vessels work, is a natural substance discovered by researchers at Wellcome, who won the Nobel prize for their work. It is used in cardiac transplants, and Wellcome ploughs the profits from other drugs into research on such products. Hospitals do not have that sort of money and researchers in the NHS do not have the money that drugs companies have. We depend on drugs companies to do the research for us and the restrictions of the limited list will, I fear, severely curtail their ability to do such research.

I am upset that the problem has induced fear in the elderly. I strongly encourage the Government to explain matters properly, at least in a leaflet, to the elderly patients who have been caused most anxiety by the upheaval and give them at least a little comfort.

I hope that we never find that drugs are available to private practice but not to the NHS. It would be a difficult ethical conflict for doctors to choose between prescribing the best treatment available for patients and prescribing the treatment that patients could afford. I hope that we can ensure that that does not happen.

I urge the Minister to have another look at the list. After all, mistakes have already occurred. The British Pharmaceutical Journal wrote:

"It is unfortunate that the draft black list contains the no doubt inevitable crop of errors, which illustrates the difficulties of bureaucratising medicine. Thus, Optimax, possibly because of its vitamin components, is erroneously included. For the same possible reason, Reactivan is black listed, contrary to any indication in the original limited list proposal that it would be. What is to be made of the fact that Frisium capsules are black listed but apparently to be available for treatment of epilepsy without doctors having to indicate the diagnosis but having to indicate the Schedule that refers to epilepsy! The drug is white listed, but black listed under its brand name, under which name it can be supplied. Again, dextropropoxyphene and paracetamol tablets are in the white list, but Distalgesic and Cosalgesic which are the only products of the stated formula available on the market are black listed! So the medicine cannot be ordered as Distalgesic or Cosalgesic but can be supplied as such."

That seems to be a strange anomaly in the system and I hope that it will be ironed out.

I believe the medical profession when it says that it is anxious to cut the drugs bill. I hope that it will do that, but we must ensure that patients who have come to expect and deserve the best from the Health Service continue to enjoy that right.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Unlike the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley), I propose to make a party political speech, because the debate is about the Government's approach to the National Health Service and to the principles on which it is based and on which the Labour party wishes to treat it.

Aneurin Bevan would turn in his grave if he had heard the speech of the Secretary of State who whinged on about the savings that he would make and would transfer to the patient. We know that neither proposition bears a minute's examination.

We all remember when the Minister for Health made extravagant claims about charging overseas visitors, and what a cock-up that was. The hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) made a devastating attack on what he sees as the creation of a two-tier system: a first-class Health Service for the rich, who can afford to pay whatever is asked, and a second-class service for the poor, the unemployed and the old. That is why, especially in Scotland, there has been the most enormous turmoil since the scheme was announced in great haste and without any sort of consultation with doctors, patients or anyone else.

Simply because the fellow who will be the star tomorrow wants £100 million from the Secretary of State, the Secretary of State thought that this was the best way to find it and, as every hon. Member knows, almost overnight announced this take-it or leave-it scheme. After that, he discovered that his sums and the number of drugs included were all wrong, and so he tripled them. He had a row with the Secretary of State for Scotland because he did not realise that the Health Service in Scotland and its problems were completely separate and needed separate treatment. It is a great tragedy that we are not having a separate Scottish debate and a Minister replying for Scotland, because there are particular Scottish aspects of the matter.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland was written to by one of my constituents, Dr. G. Lindsay Smith MB ChB D Obst, but he did not reply to the specific questions that he raised. When we put the specific cases to the hon. Gentleman, he drafted a circular letter which he sent to all Scottish Members, without fail, irrespective of our specific representations. That was a contempt of hon. Members who sought to do their jobs. The doctor was treated no less cavalierly by the hon. Gentleman.

On 21 January the doctor wrote back to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary and said

"I must stress the following points:—

1. For N.H.S. patients, the statutory list of drugs must alter the doctor/patient relationship by seriously interfering with a doctor's clinical freedom."

No one can deny that. He continued

"2. The treatment of individual N.H.S. patients will be constrained by the rigidity of a statutory list."

It is not Willie Hamilton who writes that, but a doctor of consequence who knows what he is talking about and who is at the sharp end. He continued:

"3. The machinery for a national list can only be slow to respond to meet changes in clinical practice and new therapies.

4. Rather than use simple cheaper therapies, more expensive and complicated drugs may be used in an effort to reduce patients' financial hardship. These may well cost a great deal more.

5. Once this list has been introduced there is nothing to prevent the Government extending it to cover other groups of drugs."

Despite the Minister's assurance this afternoon, we do not believe him. Despite what he says, this is the thin end of a sinister wedge.

"As to the question of generic prescribing I myself will be willing to do so once the Government has shown that it has taken steps to ensure the quality of imported drugs."

We all accept that, do we not? I have had experience of the prescribing of generic drugs, which did not provide adequate treatment when compared with the branded alternative. I have quoted that letter to show the reaction of a responsible doctor to the absurd and irresponsible treatment of Members of Parliament and doctors by the Scottish Office, which did not reply to questions about genuine problems.

In passing, I should say that one or two Conservative Members have declared a financial interest in Boots and other drug companies.

Mr. Donald Stewart: There were three.

Mr. Hamilton: I heard only two. There is an enormous pressure group in the House, comprised mainly of Conservative Members, which plugs the line of the drug companies. One of them read the apologia for the drug companies tonight. I hope he earned his corn. We do not know what fees the companies pay them, but we have a right to know what sort of pressure groups are operating in the House on such matters.

I agree with the Secretary of State to this extent: in this matter, the drug companies have displayed a despicable attitude in trying to pretend that they are looking after patients' interests. They are looking after their shareholders' interests, and nothing else. To their great shame, general practitioners have allowed themselves to be used, to some extent, by the drug companies. Some general practitioners in Fife sent me the petition forms that were provided by the drug companies. There was no comment on them; they simply put out the forms in their surgeries, got their patients to sign them and then sent them to me. It was counterproductive. I wrote back to the doctors and said, "If you want to influence me, do not send me petitions that were handed to you by the drug companies."

If the Secretary of State wants to save money, he need look no further than the balance sheets of the drug companies, which have made fortunes out of the National Health Service. I was a member of the Committee on Public Accounts when it received confidential information from the drug companies, which was excluded from our reports because the profits were so large that it would be devastating if the House knew precisely what they were. Some of them were making well over 100 per cent. profit on some drugs. The Secretary of State has a fertile furrow to plough if he wishes to save money in the NHS. Do not consider cutting out patients' drugs; consider the profits of the drug companies. We cannot even test their efficiency, because many of them are international companies over which we have no control.

At a dinner given by the Institute of Chartered Secretaries and Administrators—I expect the Minister was talking to them because they will have to administer the scheme—the Minister for Health described the drug companies as, "hysterical," "alarmist" and "misleading." I congratulate him on being right on all counts. But the Government's response is not to tackle them. They try to save money through a bureaucratic nightmare, as the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde said. Incidentally, I hope that she will vote against the Government tonight. If her speech was her vote, she would be in our Lobby. However, I suspect that she will not, because she expects a little promotion and must behave herself. The hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) can say goodbye to any promotion prospects that he may have had.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: The hon. Gentleman has made a vicious and I believe unjustified attack on the pharmaceutical industry. I wish that he would spell out some of the accusations that he makes about it. I would say only that ICI, the largest single employer in my constituency, has just contributed £130,000 from its profits to the East Cheshire hospice, which is being constructed for the terminally ill. Does he believe that that is obscene?

Mr. Hamilton: No, it is the profits that are obscene. ICI can give away that money only because it has got a nice, cosy relationship with the Department of Health and Social Security, which guarantees it a profit of 20 per cent. It is the only industry in Britain that is guaranteed an overall profit of 20 or 21 per cent. It is even more mollycoddled than the farmers. Reference was made earlier to money not growing on trees. Sometimes I think that it does. The Government say that it is important to save £25 million or £50 million on the National Health Service but in 1985-86 this country is to spend £552 million on protecting 1,200 Falkland islanders who live 8,000 miles away. In 1986-87 £450 million will be spent on those 1,200 people and in 1987-88 we shall spend another £300 million on them, a total for those three years of £1,300 million.

Mr. Butterfill: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Does consideration of the expenditure on the Falkland Islands have any relevance to this debate?

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman may not like these figures but it behoves the Opposition to repeat them time and time again whenever the Government attack the social services. If only a fraction of that expenditure were to be translated to the National Health Service for the protection of the good health of the people of this country instead of for the protection of 1,200 people who live 8,000 miles away, there would be no talk about penalising the old and the poor and those who will suffer because of this nightmare of a scheme. The Government have made a cock-up, they know that they have made a cock-up and they should withdraw the regulations. If the Minister were to say that the Government propose to withdraw them, he would be greatly thought of by the people of this country. They would say, "There's a man who is big enough to realise what a monstrous nonsense this is and who is willing to confess."

10.57 pm

Dr. Brian Mawhinney (Peterborough): I hope that the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) will forgive me if I do not take up his remarks, but it is very hard to debate a matter with someone who categorically refuses to believe the statements of right hon. and hon. Members. However, he referred to one matter which was mentioned by the hon. Members for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), to whom I always listen very carefully, and for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller). They said that they would prefer a policy that led to a continuous reduction in the profits of the pharmaceutical companies. The problem with a policy of that kind is that it allows the pharmaceutical companies to decide whether they should reduce the number of drugs manufactured in a balanced way or whether they should leave some areas of clinical concern totally uncovered. I do not believe that such a policy would commend itself to the Government.

My comments will be directed towards the medical profession and the role of the profession in the development of policy. General practitioners in particular have had a bad press. That is unfair because there are many good general practitioners in Britain whose reputations have been damaged by the actions of a minority. I say that asking the House to bear in mind that I have spent all my working life teaching medical students. So I have a commitment to the medical profession in its training which cannot be gainsaid and which does not put me in the corner of being an antagonist towards the medical profession.

That having been said, it is a matter of considerable service that a number of general practitioners have behaved in the way that they have in the past few months. We have rightly castigated La Roche for sending out that letter to general practitioners to be forwarded to Members of Parliament. The fact is that general practitioners accept that letter and they bear the responsibility for that lack of judgment. Some of them, as has been mentioned, have improperly influenced people, particularly elderly constituents, inducing a state of fear that in many cases has been quite misplaced. I remember being told some weeks ago by a doctor with great glee that he had just told an elderly patient that morning that the drug that he was prescribing would not be available to her after 1 April. I asked him for the basis for that statement and he had none.

The third thing that has brought disrepute on all the profession has been the activities of the leaders of the BMA. I say "the leaders" because again many general practitioners in my constituency and elsewhere have taken the opportunity of consultation to write to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, to respond to the consultation list, to make sensible suggestions and to express genuine concerns which were taken into account in the production of the extended list. I can understand that the BMA may have felt that it should have had more consultation, but there comes a time—I hope Labour Members will accept this—when a refusal to consult and take part in the consultation process on behalf of patients becomes a self-indulgence, and that is what we have seen in recent weeks.

One must ask why that is the case. It is the case in part because the medical profession has, rightly, a privileged place in the NHS, which could not exist without it, and in relation to the Government. I think that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health would agree that over the years when the medical profession has clashed with succeeding Governments it has frequently been the Government who have given way rather than the medical profession. I think, for example, of the recent dispute over where consultants' contracts should be held, on which, as my right hon. and learned Friend knows, I believe the Government made the wrong decision, and the many additional payments to the tune of almost £100 million a year to general practitioners for doing what many of us would think was part of their normal contract.

I am pleased that the Government have reaffirmed to the medical profession that while they wish to consult, and while they wish and need to take the profession with them, ultimately it is the Government and Parliament who govern, not the medical profession.

A minority of the medical profession have got themselves into that particular difficulty because of their special relationship as medical practitioners with the drug companies and because they have what I can only term a spurious belief that in some sense their clinical freedom is threatened. That is not the case, and I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg).

In the hospital sector consultants have come together and have voluntarily agreed in many cases to forgo the drug that they would have chosen in order to come up with an agreed list. It could be argued that that was an abrogation of their clinical freedom. The fact is that nothing in principle that is different is being asked of the general practitioners than is already voluntarily agreed by the hospital consultants. That is why I say to my right hon. and learned Friend that his appeal mechanism is necessary, and I greatly welcome it. Just as the hospital consultants found it necessary to have an appeal mechanism for 3 or 4 per cent. of the cases where the doctors wanted to prescribe, so I accept that there will be a minority of cases with general practitioners that need to be covered by an appeals mechanism. Therefore, I welcome it. The BMA has given a commitment that after tonight it will co-operate with my right hon. and learned Friend. If the will is there on both sides, I believe that an appeal mechanism could still be in place by 1 April.

Doctors are central to the Health Service, and it is a matter of considerable concern that at present relations between Government and Parliament, on the one hand, and the profession, on the other, are such that the degree of mutual trust and credibility that is necessary for the benefit of our constituents who are patients has been damaged. The BMA leaders appear no longer to believe Ministers when they speak. That position must be changed. It must be made clear to doctors that their position is not threatened but that they are not on a pedestal which puts them above the democratic will of this House. It needs to be brought home to them that they have a greater economic accountability than they seem to perceive. Changes in medical education are needed to bring home that economic accountability. Our constituents who are patients also need to be educated as to the limits of what medicine can achieve.

The House should understand that, while the limited list will make a substantial contribution to saving, it is not the end of the story. There will be need to direct our attention again to the prescribing habits in the primary sector. To that end I would encourage my right hon. and learned Friend to think next time by way of incentives to the doctors to co-operate — perhaps financial incentives, because most people respond to financial incentives. [Interruption.] Some thought needs to be given to the way in which we can build on this initiative in order to tackle, at an even more fundamental level, the prescribing habits in the primary sector.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): The hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney) seems to want to save money, yet he concludes with a proposal that would seriously undermine any potential savings to be made from the new regulations. He wants to have his cake and eat it.

I heard one or two speeches from the Conservative Benches in favour of the Government but, despite those efforts, the handling of the issue by Health Ministers has been both insensitive and inept. As the alliance has prayed in particular against the Scottish regulations, I should like to go back to the references that were made on points of order, at the beginning of the debate, to the incompetence with which the Health Minister for Scotland has handled the issue. It gives rise to very great concern.

I object strongly to the approach adopted by Back Bench Members and by Ministers—that somehow the public, the elderly and the sick are so stupid as to be completely duped by the propaganda of the pharmaceutical industry. They are also questioning the ability of hon. Members of this House, when they receive mail from their constituents, to discriminate between a campaign inspired, organised and oriented with the purpose of trying to frighten Members of Parliament, and the genuine concern being expressed by patients.

To hear the Secretary of State for Social Services, who sits in a Cabinet that owes so much to Saatchi and Saatchi, saying that it is intolerable that marketing methods are being brought into the world of politics, and that it is unacceptable that doctors should threaten Members of Parliament by saying that they will pin up the Member's reply in their surgery so that the public know what he thinks about an issue, is to know the contempt that Health Ministers feel.

The evidence given to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments by the official from the Department of Health and Social Security was that the Scottish Health Minister, at the time of the revised limited list, had said:

> "I am confident that the assurances that I have given all along that the final list will meet all medical needs have been fully honoured."

That can be compared with what the assistant secretary at the Department said when giving evidence. He said:

> "I think that there may be difficulties, but we cannot at the moment gauge the extent of that. This has only just been drawn to our attention, and we have not had an opportunity to collate it in any detail."

The Minister of Health shakes his head, but I can quote from the report, as I have done. It is disgraceful that he is lounging on the Treasury Bench shaking his head, when the Scottish Health Minister should have been at the Dispatch Box explaining the shambles and administrative chaos that his Department has created by this proposal.

What should have been introduced is what the alliance has argued for all along—generic substitution, which need not be indiscriminate and need not damage the interests of the pharmaceutical industry. As my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) made clear, the important thing to look at is patent life and the amount of return that the pharmaceutical companies will get on their research.

Ministers are surprised, but are they not aware of what the Department of Trade and Industry is doing? In a written reply to me last week, the Under-Secretary of State told me concerning drug patent life that the Government's standing advisory committee on patents is seeking the opinions of the industry with a view to trying to seek to extend them.

In other words, the Government are realising, in reverse order, that instead of trying to go for a limited list, they should first have gone for the conference to which the Secretary of State referred, then examined patent life extensions for the industry, and then, with those reassurances, started off towards a sensible system of generic substitution, based on the Greenfield report. That would have commanded support across the Floor of the House and would have allayed many fears that have been unjustifiably, and ridiculously, aroused by Ministers by the way in which they have handled the matter.

The way that Ministers have handled this matter is nonsensical. The fact that the person who seems to be presiding over the greatest administrative chaos of all, at the Scottish Home and Health Department, is prepared only to make remarks from a sedentary position, and does not have the guts to come to the Dispatch Box, is a poor show for the Health Service in Scotland. On that basis alone, I and my hon. Friends will oppose the regulations.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I shall not attempt to summarise all the speeches that have been made in opposition to the Government's proposals — virtually every speech that has been made.

The Labour party objects to the Government's proposals for four major reasons. First, they have been a bodge-up. Secondly, they undermine the principles of the NHS and will damage patient welfare. Thirdly, the main savings from the proposals will result not from people getting cheaper drugs but from many of the most badly off patients getting no NHS drugs. Fourthly, they will lead to even more unethical and objectionable activity by some drug companies. If people think they can smear us by some form of pharmaceutical McCarthyism on grounds that we are in cahoots with the drug companies and they listen to what we say, they will soon discover that our interests are different from theirs.

I deal first with the bodge-up. The first extremely limited list produced by Ministers was totally indefensible, so much so that even they have not attempted to defend it. Then we had a shambolic consultation arrangement. For a year before the Government introduced these proposals, they had not talked to the medical profession about restraining drug costs. Not a word had passed between them. Then they suddenly announced what was to happen, and they expected everyone to say, "We accept the principle. We are bound to. We should just like to make a few minor adjustments." Those who object on principle do not like making minor adjustments. But what reveals the Government's incompetence most clearly is their failure from the outset to recognise the need to establish local appeals machinery before the list came into operation.

It is no good Ministers blaming the British Medical Association for not coming up with proposals. Ministers are responsible for the organisation of the National Health Service, and they are responsible for prescribing, as they are demonstrating by these proposals. They are responsible for the arrangements necessary to protect patients. They have quoted all sorts of arrangements for limited lists made abroad. Each of those systems has an appeals machinery for those limited number of people who cannot cope with the drugs on whatever limited list prevails.

Finally, we have had the farce revealed today of the inconsistency between the Scottish and England lists. We discover, for instance, that a Scottish doctor, presumably in Scotland, can dispense Vicks cold care capsules but that his English equivalent cannot. Conversely, the English doctor can dispense Vicks inhaler, but the Scottish doctor cannot. I am not suggesting that the old rieving instinct is so dominant in the Borders that we shall have cross-border drug running as a result of the Government's incompetence. But it is an indication of how stupid their proposals——

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dobson: I gladly give way to an old riever!

Mr. Home Robertson: As my hon. Friend knows, I live very close to the English border. I am registered with a general practitioner from across the border in Berwick-upon-Tweed, in England. When I get a cold, what will he be able to prescribe for me? Will it come out of the Scottish list or the English list?

Mr. Dobson: I am afraid that I cannot help my hon. and somewhat bifurcated Friend. If he really wants to know, he must ask Bodgers Anonymous on the Treasury Bench.

The National Health Service is based on the principles that the best health services should be available to all and that money should not be the passport to better treatment. Most people accept those unimpeachable principles, and no one in political life dares challenge them—at least in public. Unfortunately, some people, including the Government, seek to undermine those principles by stealth.

When considering these proposals, we should bear in mind that this Government have promoted the establishment of commercial hospitals, they have promoted private insurance, they have abolished National Health Service spectacles, and now they are proposing two-tier prescribing.

The limits proposed by the Government will apply only to drugs prescribed on the National Health Service. Doctors will be able to prescribe any drug but, if it is not on the list, the patient will have to pay for it.

That is the main reason for Labour's opposition to these proposals. They would bring back two-tier care into every National Health Service surgery, from which we all thought it was banished permanently in 1948. Patients who cannot afford to buy privately are bound to be disadvantaged.

If a drug is worth while, it should be available on the National Health Service. If it is not worth while, it must be dangerous, fraudulent or superfluous and consequently should not be available to any patient, NHS or private. I also believe that the Government's approach reflects a lamentable ignorance of real life. But there is nothing novel about that. They proclaim that their current proposals do not affect the more important or life-saving drugs. So what? Most health care is about not life and death, but pain and relief from pain, and comfort instead of discomfort. I do not know when the Ministers here tonight last went to see their doctors, but it is highly unlikely that their lives depended on the outcome.

It must be accepted by all those who consider the problem that there has been too much unnecessary prescribing, heavily promoted by the pharmaceutical industry. Everyone knows that. It should be reduced as a result of action by doctors, restraint by the drug industry and a better informed public. We need to get away from people thinking that they have not been treated properly if they come away from the doctor without a prescription. But we can do that only by starting with younger people. The Government's proposals to outlaw the prescribing of proprietary medicines, obtainable without a prescription, will start at the wrong end, among the old. For most of their adult lives they have been used to obtaining prescriptions every time they visit their doctors. No less than 81 per cent. of those who obtain proprietary brands on prescription get them on free prescriptions. Their decent, kind, humane, and sensible doctors provide them, for example, with free cough mixtures to stop them from coughing all night.

Despite the Government's efforts to divert public attention, it is clear that many familiar remedies, particularly for the old, for symptoms of minor ailments, will no longer be available, and people will have to go without. For a rich society such as ours—we are still one of the richest countries in the world—to target its efforts to cut the drugs bill on free remedies for the oldest and poorest, seems perverse, even by this Government's standards.

It is also safe to predict that if the current proposals go through, the drug companies will respond by stepping up their promotion, on television and elsewhere, of the excluded products. At a drugs industry conference on 22 January, which was addressed by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, delegates heard lectures from leading marketing experts on

"Limiting the Damage—the Marketing Options"

"Developing the Market for Private Prescriptions—Can it be Done?"

As people at that conference were paying £137 a throw to attend, I can assure hon. Members that the marketing experts did not say, "I'm sorry lads, you'll need to throw the towel in." Their object is to create a demand which cannot be satisfied within the NHS, but which can be met by more over-the-counter sales and private prescriptions.

In case anyone should doubt that—apparently there is a doubting Thomas or Fred on the back row—I shall quote what one of the marketing consultants said. He said that only about 2,500 of the 30,000 general practitioners regularly write private prescriptions

"but that number is going to increase and you will get your share if you think creatively."

That marketing consultant also said that doctors should be offered free samples with "starter packs" for patients, and with leaflets and posters in doctors' surgeries and chemists shops to encourage them to seek private prescriptions. Sales forces should apparently "educate" — note that word — doctors' receptionists on the cost of private prescriptions when patients seek repeat prescriptions of drugs that are banned. Health insurance companies should apparently be approached to provide reimbursement for drugs, and banned products should be attractively repackaged to persuade patients that they are getting value for money if they buy drugs privately.

The other person giving such advice—a Mr. Ron Clifford, marketing director of Eli Lilly, another drug company, said that companies should consider free gifts, redeemable coupons, and advertising allowances to chemists to "entice" people to buy over-the-counter medicines, and should use a much wider range of press and television advertising. For those reasons, we are convinced that, whatever the Government's motives, the introduction of a limited list within the NHS will lead to grotesque unethical promotional activity by drug companies whose products are excluded from the list.

The Labour party has made it clear for some years that it does not object in principle to a selected drug list. However, if it is to be anything other than voluntary, conditions must be imposed. First, it should apply across the board, not just to drugs prescribed under the NHS.

Secondly, the criteria for including drugs should be made public, not furtively in private. The criteria should include safety, efficacy, the ease with which the drugs can be administered and palatability, even if that means using a branded product. The cost should be secondary.

Thirdly, machinery for selecting and assessing drugs for inclusion in the list should be established. That machinery should involve representatives of the drug companies, the relevant trade unions and patients, as well as the Government. The machinery should provide for the open assessments of drugs. The organisation should be empowered and equipped with the resources to deal with applications for inclusion in the list, appeals against exclusion from the list and, if necessary, to commission or conduct clinical trials. The machinery should also be able to establish local and national means of meeting the needs of the small number of patients who need drugs outside the list. Unfortunately the Government's proposition meets none of those sensible criteria.

The Government's desire to save money by reductions in the prices paid to drug companies and by the extension of generic substitution is recommended in the Greenfield report. The propositions in that report command the support of almost everyone in the medical profession, yet they have been rejected—for reasons that no one seems to understand.

If the Government are interested in rational prescribing, they could help GPs to improve their prescribing. Doctors are hampered by the absence of regular and easy access to their own prescribing data, because the prescribing pricing authority has not yet been computerised.

The Government have referred to support from some peculiar outfits. The Minister of State gave a most curious reply to the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Arnold), who asked for "a statement on the conclusions of the article, 'Prescribing: the Power to Set Limits', by J. M. Harding and others in the British Medical Journal of 9 February, a copy of which he has received."

The Minister of State said:

"The article referred to by my hon. Friend concludes that generic prescribing and a limited list of drugs may improve the quality of prescribing and be the only way to curb prescribing costs."

[Mr. Dobson]

For good measure, he added:

"We fully agree with these conclusions." — [Official Report, 25 February 1985; Vol. 74, c. 65.]

Unfortunately for the Minister, those who prepared the paper have written to me from their practice in my constituency. The most material sentence states:

"We are extremely angry that our paper has been misrepresented in this way to support a position in complete contradiction to the one we hold."

So much for the Minister's reading of these articles.

When Conservative Members denounce the response of the BMA and of the Royal College of General Practitioners as wholly reactionary and unhelpful, all I can say is that it is not the most reactionary doctors who have made the strongest representations to me, it is the extremely progressive doctors working in good premises, running group practices and, in many cases, with their own voluntary selected list of drugs. They are the doctors who are most violently opposed to the imposition of the Government's ill-thought-out list.

Something else that we cannot ignore is the impression that the Government have created that if they do this everything will be all right with prescribing, dispensing and the pharmacy aspects of the NHS. The fact is that in many parts of the country many people still have difficulty obtaining their prescriptions. Rural pharmacies are still in retreat and dispensing doctors remain dissatisfied with their position. All sorts of things are wrong with that part of the NHS. The Government are doing precious little, other than to introduce this scheme.

We believe that, in the long run, the public interest would be served by taking a major stake of the British pharmaceutical industry into the public sector. Just as the NHS and its non-competitive principles have produced a better health service for our people than any competitive commercial system anywhere in the world, we are convinced that those principles could be applied to substantial parts of the pharmaceutical industry.

The Government complain about escalation in drug prices. Let them remember the largest escalation. When they first took office, prescription charges were 20p per item. They are now £2 per item. There is not one item on the drugs bill that has shown an increase of 1,000 per cent., yet that is what we have had from the Government.

The Government's proposals are unacceptable. They were ill thought out in the first place, they will damage the NHS, they will undermine the welfare of the patients and the burden of the savings will fall on those least able to bear it. There is nothing odd about that. That has been the Government's attitude to everything relating to the NHS, social security and the social services since they took office. This proposition is on all fours with what they have been proposing. We believe that these ill-thought-out and ridiculous proposals should be rejected and that the House should stick by the basic principles of the NHS which have served us so well until now. They are that the best health service, including the best pharmaceutical aspects, should be available to all and that money should not be the passport to better services.

If the Minister really believes in these proposals, he should insist that they apply to the private sector also. But he will not do that, because, like his colleagues, he is committed to a two-tier system. This is part of that story, and that is why we reject it.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): At times the speech of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) reminded me of one of the blacklisted drugs. The marketing and packaging were rather better than were justified by the contents, some of which seemed a little out of patent—old and familiar arguments which, had they been adopted, would have resulted in unnecessary public expenditure.

At times, however, the hon. Gentleman seemed to be drifting very close to agreeing with us, leading one to wonder why we were debating this prayer at a not altogether civilised hour with a view to dividing the House at the end of it. I am not surprised about that as almost all our vehement critics — especially those in the Opposition, who find themselves in embarrassing alliance with the more extreme critics in the industry — sail rather close to supporting roughly what we have proposed. That is also not surprising. There should not be differences in the House on this, let alone the ferocious differences shown by some sections of the professions and the industry.

I do not know whether anyone can contradict this, but I have not yet met a doctor or a pharmacist in practice who does not agree that something ought to be done to reduce the growth of the NHS drugs bill. That should be the starting proposition for the whole debate. At present the bill is £1·5 billion, rising each year by about 5 per cent. more than inflation. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight) has said, we all know and can describe, either anecdotally or as a result of drug recall schemes, that a great deal of wasteful overprescribing of all kinds has been going on.

The starting point should be that we are searching, in the interests of the NHS, for some greater economy than has been achieved so far in the total drugs bill. I have been at the Department for about three years and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for about three and a half years. Throughout that time we have had substantial discussions about economies in the drugs bill. Just about every interest has been mentioned repeatedly throughout those discussions, as well as in debates in the House.

Before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made his announcement we had reached the stage when people were all very clear about what they were against when it came to doing anything to achieve greater economies in the drugs bill, but it was difficult to find any clear consensus about what people supported, which would have real, practical consequences of benefit to patient services.

For that reason, we concluded that it was time for a decision to be taken. Contrary to the assertions of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, the interests of the service itself demanded that somebody should take a decision that would work. We set out a policy with one clear purpose—none of this two-tier rubbish that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras always argues about and none of the sudden streaks of hostility towards the industry that one or two of my hon. Friends thought that they saw behind it. Our purpose was to achieve a saving of up to £100 million—it now seems more likely to be about £75 million—for the NHS each year without damaging patient care. By avoiding unnecessary expenditure on drugs dispensed, the money could go into developments in other forms of care.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I support the Government's policy on this issue but inasmuch as the drugs bill amounts to £1·4 billion, or whatever the figure may be, and inasmuch as within that figure about 9 per cent. is represented by promotion—£135 million — 21 per cent. — £32 million — by advertising, £60 million by representatives and 11 per cent.—£17 million—by literature, will my right hon. and learned Friend examine that area for savings? Could we not find £100 million there as well?

Mr. Clarke: We have examined that area—we are continuing to do so—and we have acted upon that examination. We are reducing by 10 per cent. the amount of promotional activity that is supported by NHS drug prices in the forthcoming year. We cannot make savings of the order that my hon. Friend describes but he has referred to an area that is ripe for savings and it is one in which we have acted. The drug companies spend a great deal of money on promotion and this has some good effect in that new drugs are introduced to the market. The companies persuade quite a few members of the medical profession vehemently to campaign on their behalf when the companies' interests are threatened. Indeed the companies, have an easy sell in the form of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), who appears to use the marketing and promotional activities of the ABPI when it comes to putting together his speeches on this subject.

It is clear that our policy is aimed at saving £75 million. That is the sum that will be available for other forms of basic care in the service. Every time that the Government come forward with such proposals there is a tendency for everyone to urge us to spend more upon the NHS, despite the fact that Government spending is now 20 per cent. ahead of inflation compared with the spending of the previous Labour Government. Every time that we do anything that might raise additional revenue — for example, examining charges—we receive criticism from Labour Members. Whenever we examine any measures that might save expenditure within the service by avoiding unnecessary spending, thereby diverting money to better patient services — for example, when we discuss tendering or residential services — we find critics, invariably on the Opposition Benches—but sometimes on the Government Back Benches as well. They all declare a constituency interest or a personal, financial one in the pharmaceutical industry. It seems that they are somewhat worried when we start to examine expenditure in this area.

We are pursuing a saving of £75 million for the Health Service and its patients in an area where, so far as I am aware, every professional agrees that savings can and should be made. Our critics should be saying that it is about time that something was done and that positive action should have been taken before now instead of raising objections and preparing to vote against the proposal that is before us.

We have spent a protracted time in discussions to seek an effective method of making savings that will not jeopardise patient care. We had many discussions before the Greenfield report and we had many after it. Generic substitution was recommended by the Greenfield committee and rejected by the BMA, the industry and by us, the Government, for reasons to which I shall return. Thereafter, we continued to search for ways in which we might be able to make advances without jeopardising professional or industrial interests that are important to Britain.

I have been accused of rejecting a limited list in responding to the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Dr. Thomas). I rejected the concept in reply to a parliamentary question from the hon. Gentleman and I still reject it across the entire range of therapeutic categories. Before we made our announcement shortly before Christmas, we decided that the selected list approach was not justified across every therapeutic category. Had we gone outside the categories that we have chosen—tonics, vitamins, cough medicines, tranquillisers and sedatives, for example—we would have threatened research into life-saving drugs and entered very much more difficult professional areas. I do not regret the reply to the parliamentary question which has been much quoted by the ABPI and, therefore, by Labour Members this evening.

We also examined international experience which, again, has been much misquoted today by the use of briefs. The hon. Member for Oldham, West talked of Sweden. Sweden is much more restrictive than we are in its use of drugs. It has a licensing system which requires safety and efficacy and will not license products unless there is a demonstrated need. It has a selected system across the whole range of therapeutic products.

Nor is it true, as has been suggested, that the Netherlands is abandoning the selected list system. It is making one change and keeping to the system. I do not agree with those who say that the Germans cannot demonstrate any savings. That is not the opinion of the German Government, but that of some of the lobbyists who have been briefing some hon. Members who have taken part in this debate. It is not true tht arrangements such as this wiped out the industry in Canada. There was a change in the licensing system in Canada, not just a change in the selection of products.

International experience shows that we are unique in taking the full range of products at the behest of each practitioner—all paid for on the NHS. I even got an executive of an American drug company to admit that our arrangement—by which we take any product that comes on the market at any price so long as a doctor can be induced, often by heavy promotion, to prescribe it at the expense of the NHS—is pretty silly. We examined the practice of other countries and endeavoured to introduce a variant of other systems that we think appropriate to the NHS.

Of course, we noticed that 40 per cent. of hospitals have formularies that extend across the full range of therapeutic categories. They are far more extensive than what is proposed. We also considered the fact that many good general practices, including the ones mentioned by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras have their own formularies. On that basis, my right hon. Friend made his announcement in November. Thereafter followed a process of consultation, discussion and consideration of the proposal, which produced our final selected list a few weeks ago.

The Government believe in consultation. I believe that consultation improves the quality of decision-making. We all know what happens when one consults on such matters. There is an inevitable tendency for those who do not like the drift of policy to demonstrate or mount expensive and irresponsible press campaigns rather than discuss while the policy is evolving. We consulted and got a substantial number of the medical profession to respond. We got agreement from some royal colleges. Others, which oppose us, gave opinions about the content of the list.

I actually met the BMA. It has been one of those occasions when an organisation refuses to consult and discuss, but which one nevertheless meets with embarrassing frequency. I have attended three formal meetings with my right hon. Friend or officials and I have addressed the BMA at Tavistock house. It restricted what it would talk to us about, but that was its choice. I met the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain and the pharmaceutical services negotiating committee. We did not make a political judgment about the contents of the final selected list, but put together an expert panel.

I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) that each member of the panel was a practising clinician. Three were GPs, one a pharmacist and another a psychiatrist—the interest she mentioned — and we accepted the unanimous professional view of that panel based on the reactions to the consultation about what ought to go on the list. That was sensible, and I discover to my astonishment that the Liberal party, and, if we believe the last speech from the Labour party, the Labour party, favour a list, but believe that the manner in which we have put ours together entitles them to vote against this one.

Mr. Robert Hughes: The Minister makes much of consultations, but I sent him a number of letters—not standard letters—from GPs who were worried about their own specific patients because certain drugs were left off the list. They asked for a clinical explanation, but I have not had a single reply from the Minister. That is why the Government's proposals stand condemned.

Mr. Clarke: It is in the nature of organised letter-writing campaigns that it becomes impossible to give detailed replies to each letter. Hon. Members were objecting earlier to standardised replies. If one gets thousands of standardised letters, one sends standardised replies.

Many of the letters from individual patients who had been told that their drug was not available were based on untruthful allegations, because the consultation and the final selection of drugs had not taken place. Many of the drugs cited by GPs or by patients who had been advised by GPs were not affected by our proposals.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I am not giving way again.

I think that, with the exception of my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde, every one of my hon. Friends who spoke against our proposals declared an interest in the pharmaceutical industry, on either a constituency or a personal basis. I do not object to that; the industry is important to our economy and requires the protection of the DHSS, as the sponsoring Department, not least because it has considerable export earnings and provides considerable employment.

However, the facts that the DHSS is the sponsoring Department, that the industry has been successful during a recession, that it earns considerable sums for this country and that we need to foster a strong, research-based industry to gain export earnings do not mean that the industry's profit margins and promotional activities are inviolate or that the NHS can never be free to consider the product range. We have a twin duty — to look after the legitimate interests of the industry and to make sure that the NHS does not buy products that it does not require or pay excessively for those products. We are following that balance of interests.

I have been questioned about profit margins and promotional costs and asked whether we will look for alternatives.

Mr. Malcolm Thornton (Crosby): As someone who has neither a constituency nor a financial interest in the pharmaceutical industry, may I tell my right hon. and learned Friend that the industry is a little worried about the somewhat arbitrary nature of the way in which certain products have been excluded from the list or included in it? There are some major inconsistencies. Will my right hon. and learned Friend give an assurance that the review body or the appeals machinery will allow that matter to be looked at carefully?

Mr. Clarke: It has certainly not been done arbitrarily. The final selection of the list was made on clear criteria which have been set out in answers to parliamentary questions. The selection was made by members of a professional panel using their medical and scientific judgment. They received submissions from all the companies affected, making claims for the therapeutic quality of their products. Of course companies argue about inconsistencies if they find that their products have been unsuccessful compared with others.

The review procedure, which we shall set up as soon as we can, when we have consulted about its details, will be able to keep the list under continual review. It will be able to look at cases if people wish to return to the argument with the review committee. But the decisions will be made on professional, medical and scientific grounds and we shall put a drug on the white list—that is, those selected for prescription on the NHS—only if we are satisfied that it meets a clinical need that no other product can meet or that it meets more cost-effectively a clinical need that is also met by other products.

We are looking at the price we pay and the profit margins we allow under a system that we inherited from the Labour Government. We took over from that Government the PPRS scheme which had not been reviewed for many years and was producing extremely generous returns for an industry which most Labour Members usually curse. They often threaten to nationalise substantial parts of that industry. We have reduced the target rate of return for the industry from 25 per cent., which was appropriate when we had higher inflation, to between 17 and 18 per cent. now. Profit margins and price levels must be reduced. A 25 per cent. target rate of return when inflation was at 15 per cent. or more, is no better than a 15 per cent. rate of return now, although it has not decreased so far. The profitability of the industry was increasing while inflation fell, and we cannot be accused of being hostile by reviewing profit levels. If promotional activity reaches £130 million, the time has come to check it.

The climate remains favourable for investment——

Mr. Dobson: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that he means that in real terms the profits of the drug companies have increased, although their notional profit levels have been reduced?

Mr. Clarke: The profits of the drug industry remain fair because, unlike the Labour Government, we have reviewed the PPRS. We are adjusting prices, not revealing a new hostility to the industry. We believe that the industry is valuable, and that investment will continue to be attracted to the United Kingdom because of the reputation of the NHS, our licensing arrangements, and the attraction of the United Kingdom as a base for research and for academic work, on which so much of the drug industry depends.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) that one must make a practical judgment about how to create a fair climate for the industry, but that does not rule out changes of policy of this sort, which hold the balance fairly between the industry and the NHS. The industry suggested, not alternative ways of saving money, but ways of raising £70 million or more, not at the expense of the companies. It suggested reducing wholesalers' profit margins and stopping the NHS supply of medicines for trivial and self-limiting conditions. It wanted to take products off the NHS list and to attack the exemptions for children and the elderly.

Neither of the Opposition parties nor that part of the medical profession which is opposed to the proposals have put forward alternatives. I expected arguments in favour of generic substitution, but only the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) believes that that is still his party's policy. Generic substitution suggested by Greenfield was opposed by the BMA and ABPI. It would create great problems if a doctor prescribed one drug and a different formulation was dispensed by a chemist, and those problems could not be resolved. It would have damaged research in key areas. Given that the BMA and, I thought, the Labour party were advocating voluntary generic prescribing, and that compulsory generic prescribing can save only between £30 and £35 million, voluntary generic prescribing would save peanuts.

We can answer the criticisms of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras by setting up the appeals mechanism of the sort that we have said we are anxious to discuss with the BMA. I am sorry that the BMA has come so late. In the past the appeals mechanism has been mentioned by many doctors, but they suggested one when the full list was available. At that time, the list had not been subjected to the opinion of the panel and was not extended to its present full selection. We have since received a few letters, and last Thursday the BMA responded to our invitation to talks about an appeal mechanism. We shall certainly hold such talks.

I therefore believe that we have handled the policy as well as possible. We seem to be strikingly near to the policy of both Opposition parties, who are finding foolish reasons for opposing the measure. The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) made it clear that the alliance is in favour of a selected list approach. Certainly, I read a speech by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), whose absence today is notable, which set out, in the ABPI's propaganda, his clear views that the time had come to get rid of "me-too" drugs and those which had enjoyed a spurious form of protection. But the Labour party suddenly set out criteria for a limited list system today, which comes late in the day.

Another Member whom we have missed is the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), who normally has considerable influence in the Labour party on such matters. On 27 November 1984 he said to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State:

"Is the Secretary of State aware that his first attempt to introduce a rational prescribing policy is to be very warmly welcomed, that he should strongly resist the selfish and distorted propaganda of the pharmaceutical industry, which is now screaming blue murder, and that the only advice he should accept about implementing this very good proposal is independent advice?" —[Official Report, 27 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 761.]

The right hon. Gentleman may have had an excellent reason for staying away, but it was probably out of shame at what the Labour Front-Bench spokesmen said.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) cited Nye Bevan. I am sure that Nye Bevan would not have liked the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, which was taken from an ABPI brief——

It being Twelve o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question pursuant to order [12 March].

PETITION

Central Workshops, REME, Newark

12.26 am

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of Newark town council concerning the proposed closure of 33 Central Workshops, REME, in Newark.

The petition reads:

And your petitioner prays that your honourable House will (i) Urge the Secretary of State for Defence to reconsider his decision to close 33 REME Central Workshops and (ii) afford the hon. Member of Parliament for Newark the opportunity to speak thereon in the House.

And your petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

I do not propose to address the House on the petition — I appreciate that that is not allowed on these occasions — but I assure the House that it has my unqualified support. I hope that, as the petitioner requests, time will be given for the matter to be debated in the House and for the responsible Minister to reply.

To lie upon the Table.

Dulwich Picture Gallery

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

12.27 am

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): I rise on the Adjournment to draw attention to the financial plight of the Dulwich picture gallery.

The gallery, which houses a remarkable collection of very high quality works of art of international repute, is a living tribute to the public spiritedness of private patrons in the past. Indeed, it was a curious sequence of events which allowed this collection to be housed in Dulwich.

Noel Desenfans, between about 1750 and 1790, collected a number of pictures for the king of Poland. However, before the king could house them in Poland, he was deposed and the kingdom was abolished. The pictures remained in London and were eventually passed on to Desenfaus' friend, Francis Bourgeois, who was seeking a suitable place in which to house them where they could be used for public instruction, and so that young artists could look at the pictures and learn from the old masters of the past.

At this time, discussions took place with the Government of the day suggesting that they might like to house the pictures or make use of them. Unfortunately, in those days the request fell on deaf ears. I am sure that today the ears of the Government are more alert to the collection that we are discussing in this debate. The pictures were eventually housed in Dulwich. Interestingly enough, the founder of Dulwich college and the Alleyn's College of God's Gift Foundation, Edward Alleyn had himself built up a small collection of pictures. Those pictures had been augmented over the years, from 1630 onwards, and were housed in Dulwich college.

The bequest of Francis Bourgeois meant that the Dulwich collection was enhanced by a magnificant range of new works. A new gallery was built for them in about 1811, which became the first gallery to be open to the general public. It was established some 10 years before the National gallery.

That bequest is a matter of great pride to Dulwich. There is great pride in a possession which is there not on a limited parochial basis, but which forms an international collection which we are proud to house in my constituency. It consists of 650 works of art, about 350 of which are on view. They are mainly 17th and 18th century paintings of high quality.

The gallery has about 25,000 visitors a year. It is run on a very limited staff and budget. The number of full-time staff amounts to a mere eight. The cost of running the gallery is about £105,000 per annum. Of that, about £58,000 is contributed by the foundation of the Alleyn's College of God's Gift. The foundation supports three schools almost entirely, and several other charitable foundations. The amount that can be contributed towards the gallery is strictly limited by the Charity Commissioners. There is no opportunity to expand resources from that source.

The shortfall of about £47,000 is made up in a variety of ways. There are several investments. The GLC has given a grant of £6,500 per annum. There are also admission fees to the gallery, and several special fund-raising events. But I should like, in particular, to allude to the work of the Friends of the Dulwich Gallery. That is a very lively body of volunteers and friends who contribute not only financially to the membership of the friends, but in terms of time and service in helping to maintain the gallery. They sell postcards, conduct tours, arrange flowers and generally do all that is necessary to make the gallery as secure as it can be through their voluntary help. They also organise several fund-raising events, including concerts and lectures in the gallery, and so on.

That means that the gallery is not just a dead picture gallery, but is a lively home where many cultural activities take place. It is perhaps interesting to note that the Minister's predecessor, my right hon. Friend for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) — now Minister for Trade—was enrolled as the thousandth member of the gallery when he visited it in 1983. I wonder whether any other Ministers feel that they, too, in that personal way, want to join the Friends. They would be most welcome.

One of the main problems about the future of the gallery is that it lacks any financial security or endowment. Under its imaginative and energetic director, the gallery has plans to extend its present range of activities and to develop its potential as a cultural centre, educational base, and a leisure-tourist attraction in south-east London. In order to fulfil those plans, it is necessary to have some endowment to ensure the gallery's security. Unfortunately, a Rembrandt has been stolen on, I think, no less than four occasions. There is a feeling that it has now gone for good. It may not have been destroyed; it may be secretly gloated over in solitude somewhere. The necessity for security is very real and important.

We also need to improve the maintenance of the buildings. Facilities should be provided for organised school parties in order to improve the educational role. There must be some augmentation and adaptation of the buildings. A building works plan is needed.

Publicity is needed. Recently an education officer has been appointed whose responsibility is to contact schools so that the gallery may be thought to be a place of excitement where people can learn and enjoy themselves. It is necessary to approach the matter on more than an educational wavelength. We must publicise the gallery on a wider front. That also costs money.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): I very much enjoyed visiting the gallery last month when I saw a most impressive collection of paintings. My hon. Friend said that 25,000 people a year visited the gallery. Does that figure include the increasing number of school parties?

Mr. Bowden: The figure includes school parties for the current year. It is hoped that with the development of opportunities for school children to visit the gallery, with an education officer to cater for their needs, the number of visits by school children could be greatly increased. We see a potential for educational purposes in south-east London. That would be of benefit.

The gallery and its friends are conscious of the need to raise an endowment of about £500,000. An appeal committee was formed, under the vigorous leadership of Mr. Peter Bowring, which in March 1984 launched that £500,000 appeal.

A number of fund-raising events and enterprises have been organised in the last year to tap the good will and financial resources of those who wish the gallery well. Indeed, Mr. Speaker organised a reception in his apartments here for those interested in the appeal. That was a great encouragement and boost to the morale of the appeal committee and assisted in raising money.

We are now a year into the appeal and almost half the sum sought has been raised. About £225,000 has been raised to date. A number of fund-raising events are due to take place. Twenty-six pictures are being sent on tour in the United States to stimulate interest and to ensure that there is an awareness of Dulwich in Washington and Los Angeles, and from coast to coast.

I urge the Government to support the Dulwich gallery. We have support in goodwill and general will wishing. But a token of financial support to show that the Government see this as an important aspect of our heritage would boost and encourage the commitment of those who are raising money in other ways. I ask the Government to consider this seriously and to give support to the Dulwich picture gallery.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): I am delighted to be able to respond to this short debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) on raising a topic which is of importance not only to his constituency and to all the south London constituencies but to Britain's heritage. He was correct to say that the gallery opened before the National gallery. It can claim to be the oldest picture gallery in the country.

My hon. Friend gave a full and interesting account of its origins and of the great man, Edward Alleyn, who left an endowment which has done so much good in many other areas, above all in the great schools funded by his foundation. He recounted the contribution of Sir Francis Bourgeois and listed the great pictures now to be found in the gallery. Indeed, the gallery is in a fine building designed by Sir John Soane, whose own house in Lincoln's Inn Field is another interesting museum.

Most of the charity from which the gallery derives its income is devoted to the schools. It is understandable that in recent years mounting costs have taken their toll. The gallery has sought other income — from investments, catalogue sales, commissions, charges and a small grant from the GLC. It has been doing what it can to meet the ever-mounting costs that such a collection must incur.

My hon. Friend mentioned the sad tale of the wandering Rembrandt whose return we hope to see. Lady Bracknell might have some remark to make about the loss, four times, of the Rembrandt. It clearly shows the need to expend money on security arrangements, sad as that might be.

My hon. Friend rightly mentioned that those who have held the post of arts Minister have shown their commitment to the gallery. The late Lord Wolfenden in 1982 first approached my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), then the Minister with responsibility for the arts, about the plight of the gallery. My right hon. Friend became the 1,000th friend of the gallery. I should be delighted to join the list of friends. My hon. Friend did not mention the minimum donation, so I might be incurring serious expenditure. I follow the suggestion of my noble Friend Lord Bruce-Gardyne who recommended that Government Ministers should be impelled to support projects on which Government money was expended. He thought that it would improve the quality of Government investment. It is a stimulating idea. I am perfectly willing, in this small matter, to put my money where my mouth is and to join the interesting list of friends of the gallery. Perhaps my hon. Friend will arrange for the necessary paperwork to be sent to me.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): I am glad to hear that my hon. Friend is to contribute to the gallery. Others who have not done so already might also do so. I understand that the charity is called "Of God's Gift", and now it is to be of ministerial gifts also. Many of us hope that there will be a generous contribution from the Government to ensure the future of the gallery in its superb building.

Mr. Waldegrave: I know that my hon. and learned Friend has close family links with the gallery. I do not know whether I am in danger of making jokes in bad taste, but of God's gifts the Lord will provide and a noble Lord is involved in this.

I am pleased to see that my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) is present. He is a governor of the foundation. I am delighted to announce that my noble Friend has agreed to make available, out of the special grants budget of the Office of Arts and Libraries, a special contribution to the appeal. It is well known that the principal burden of running the great museums falls on the recurrent budget of the Office of Arts and Libraries, but my noble Friend has some relatively restricted funds available to help with special appeals. He has authorised me to say that the Government will contribute £25,000 to bring the appeal up to and perhaps a little past the halfway mark, which I hope will be symbolic of the Government's commitment and will help towards achieving the final appeal level.

I wish the very distinguished committee—on which not only Mr. Speaker but many other good friends of the arts in the House are represented—well in completing the second part of the appeal and congratulate those involved on their vigour in taking action themselves to help the future of that great museum.

I should add that it may be worth the appeal committee's while to investigate my noble Friend's business sponsorship scheme under which matching grants are available for sponsorship. It might not fit so well with a simple grant to the fund, but a matching sponsorship grant might be relevant to some part of the gallery's work.

With that little bit of advice, with thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich for raising this important subject and with very strong good wishes and hopes for the future of this important gallery, I am delighted to have been able to respond to this short debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes to One o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Secondary Education

1. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will review the progress of secondary education reorganisation.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Sir Keith Joseph): Local education authorities are on target to remove 1 million surplus school places by 1986. When I consult their associations to set targets for 1987 and later, I shall stress the need to review progress in reorganising secondary schools where the decline in pupil numbers will be at its sharpest for the rest of the decade.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that just as a backlog of building repairs and maintenance for hospital buildings can damage health care, so, with needy education expenditure, a backlog of maintenance, repairs and modifications, particularly where reorganisation of secondary education is taking place, can damage educational provision? Is he further aware that people are willing to pay higher taxes to ensure that such modifications take place and that — for example, in my constituency—without them secondary reorganisation will be threatened?

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government always respect the need for capital to implement approved school reorganisations, as occurred in Cumbria this year. Backlog in maintenance has been going on under one Government after another for many years.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend accept my thanks and those of many people in Lancaster for preserving the girls' grammar school, for enabling it to work on harmoniously in its present buildings and for preventing chaos and disruption at Greaves and Castle schools?

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government try to take decisions that are in the best interests of the children. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those remarks.

Mr. Freud: Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that no reorganisation will be undertaken if it gives a higher priority to the selected sector than to the benefit of all children?

Sir Keith Joseph: The record shows that we try to make decisions which are in the interests of all the children concerned. I do not use strong language frequently, but it was absolutely wicked of the Labour party, when in government, to abolish direct grant schools.

Student Grants

2. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to complete his review of student grants.

4. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish a consultation document on the future funding of higher education by parents and students.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Peter Brooke): As my right hon. Friend announced on 24 January 1985, a consultative paper will be issued as soon as practicable. After an appropriate period of consultation, the Government will decide on any changes which they may wish to introduce and will publish proposals accordingly.

Mr. Atkinson: Will my hon. Friend, in his review, investigate what savings can be made, perhaps by computerisation, to reduce the current bureaucratic duplication of the administration of student grants that goes on both by the university departments concerned and by education authorities?

Mr. Brooke: Local education authorities administer the system effectively. We shall have to consider the administrative implications of any changes in the awards system arising out of the review.

Mr. Fatchett: What steps is the Minister taking to ensure that the widespread anxieties that are felt about the real level of student grants and about the Government's possible intention to move to a student loans system will be taken into account, and that a future system will ensure that children from low income families have a right of access to higher education?

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has always made it clear that the review will take into account the interests of both the taxpayer and parents. I am always slightly puzzled by remarks from Opposition Members about low income families, in view of the fact that they bequeathed to us a parental contribution scale that was regressive in its effect.

Mr. Stern: In his review, will my hon. Friend take into account the strong desire of parents, students and, as expressed this week, the Association of University Teachers for an expansion of higher education? Does he agree that the only way to achieve that is to find a fresh source of funding which does not involve either the taxpayer or a forced levy on parents?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for opening up the possibilities of the review. The review will cover all possibilities.

Mr. Wilson: If it proves impossible for the Under-Secretary of State to complete the review before the next academic session, and bearing in mind that, in real terms, the grant has fallen over five successive years, will he undertake to give a top-up to the proposed grant for 1985-86 so that students are not placed in a position of virtual poverty?

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already announced the grant levels for 1985-86. We shall have to see how we get along in terms of the timing of the consultation.

Mr. Rhodes James: Will my hon. Friend, who has many friends on both sides of the House, look especially in his review at the problem of discretionary grants and the inequities between one county and another?

Mr. Brooke: I cannot give my hon. Friend a commitment that the review will be that wide. I understand his interest in the matter.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that this review is a sham because all the money will be pre-empted today in the Budget? Does he accept that what is really needed is more money for student grants in order to give students a decent basic income? If the hon. Gentleman cannot find that much money, will he at least return student grants to their 1979 real value?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman knows that £600 million is spent on student support at the present time. That is the most generous level of support in any Western country.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will my hon. Friend affirm the general principle that, where possible, students should be funded by their parents and not by other people's parents in the form of the general taxpayer?

Mr. Brooke: The consultative paper will not prejudge any particular method of student support. Parental contributions may well continue to have a role to play in student support in the future.

Teachers (Pay)

3. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received as to comparability of teachers' pay with other groups.

Sir Keith Joseph: Comparability with the pay of other groups is a recurring theme in representations to me by teachers about their pay. The prime factors in settling pay are the employers' capacity to pay and their need to recruit and retain teachers of appropriate quality.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Secretary of State aware that the report of the Burnham committee's pay data working group shows that, over 10 years, the pay of teachers compares unfavourably with that of many other groups in the public sector? Surely comparability is important, because it gives some idea of the Government's perception of the importance of the teaching profession.

Sir Keith Joseph: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman. Chasing past relativities means a return to a self-defeating inflationary spiral, which would price even more people into unemployment.

Mr. Madel: As the unions involved in the current dispute are due at ACAS tomorrow, should not classroom disruption end at once to give ACAS a reasonable chance of solving the dispute?

Sir Keith Joseph: I cannot believe that classroom disruption is in the interests of teachers themselves, let alone of children. I hope that they will give up disruption.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not a fact that teachers' pay—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Perhaps hon. Members will listen.

Is it not a fact that teachers' pay has fallen a long way behind the pay of other people? Is it not disgraceful that a teacher, who has taken A-levels and undertaken four years of training, should earn less when he or she begins to teach than an ill-qualified young policeman with only three months training? Has that not driven teachers to industrial action which, without the type of provocation in which the Secretary of State has engaged, would never have needed to be taken?

Sir Keith Joseph: I do not for a moment denigrate the hard work, the difficult job and the devotion to duty of most of the teachers, but they should bear in mind that they have one of the most secure jobs in the country, that they are important and that they have been offered, and have refused, a 4 per cent. pay increase and all arbitration measures. They have refused even to discuss proposals for appraisal. I cannot believe that that is in their interests.

Mr. Key: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the National Union of Teachers is seeking to prove that might is right because it is the biggest teaching union, that it has divided the teaching unions, and that the other teaching unions disagree with it fundamentally and are prepared to conciliate, arbitrate and negotiate to solve the problem? [Interruption.]

Sir Keith Joseph: It is no good Opposition Members jeering at my hon. Friend. The teaching unions seem to be split.

Mr. Boyes: Is it not a fact that local government officers have had a much greater pay rise than teachers during the 10 years between 1974 and 1984? I welcome the rise in pay for officers in local authorities, but is it not a fact that those delivering the service and teaching in the classrooms should have had at least as big a rise as administrators in the service? Is that not a reason why teaching morale is as low as it has ever been? Is it not also a fact that teachers' resources have been continuously cut and that our most precious asset, children's education, is suffering as a consequence?

Sir Keith Joseph: I do not think that that justifies the return to a particular year, which the teachers' union leaders advocate, as every other group would seek the same argument of comparability, which would start another inflationary spiral, with even more unemployment.

Mr. Colvin: Will my right hon. Friend acknowledge that there are not enough policemen, yet there are too many teachers?

Sir Keith Joseph: My hon. Friend is surely right that the pay rise for the police was necessary to staunch an extremely sharp outflow of policemen at the time. I do not accept that there are inherently too many teachers, although the House knows that, because of the fall in the number of school children, a small decrease is being brought about in the teaching force.

Mr. Radice: Will the Secretary of State tell the House and parents what he is doing to help solve the dispute?

Sir Keith Joseph: The function of the holder of my office is to play a certain part in the negotiations, which are primarily between the employers and the teachers.

Mr. Tracey: Can my right hon. Friend say how many representations in favour of the teachers' pay claim he has received from parents and taxpayers because, if my constituency is anything to go by, it will be few?

Sir Keith Joseph: A significant minority of the representations reaching us from parents are in favour of the teachers; but I suspect that the purpose of the teachers in disrupting children's education is not calculated to win the esteem of most parents.

Education Meals Service

5. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the education meals service.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): The school meals service is the responsibility of the local education authorities. A number of individual authorities have made substantial net savings in expenditure in this area since 1979-80, and the Government expect others to do the same.

Mr. Eastham: Is the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State aware that when the Government issue circulars, especially about the privatisation of school meals, there is no reference to the supervision of school meals, which forms a considerable part of the school meals' costings? In the city of Manchester, for example, the supervision of school meals costs £750,000. Will the Minister ensure that if authorities privatise school meals the cost of supervision is included?

Mr. Dunn: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but I believe that, far too few local education authorities are embarking on the privatisation of the school meals service. If they did, a great deal of money could be saved and spent in other areas of the education service.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Does my hon. Friend agree that, apart from the possibility of privatisation, authorities, such as the Inner London education authority, could raise a substantial sum merely by keeping their school meals' prices in line with the cost of living?

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend is entirely right. He knows, and the House must know, that ILEA has not increased school meals charges since 1979. In that sense, a great deal of Londoners' money is being spent unnecessarily on the school meals service, instead of being a saving for ratepayers.

Teachers (Pay)

6. Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next plans to meet representatives of the Professional Association of Teachers to discuss the current pay claim.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have no current plans to do so, but I meet representatives of the Professional Association of Teachers fairly frequently and I know their position.

Mr. Heddle: Does my right hon. Friend applaud members of the Professional Association of Teachers and others who, through moderation, conscience and conviction, are continuing to set a standard of dedication to our schoolchildren? Is not the answer to settling the teachers' pay dispute for them to adopt the new assessment procedures already adopted and approved by the local education authorities?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with my hon. Friend in applauding those teachers, whether members of the PAT or not, who stick to serving the children, as is their professional duty.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Secretary of State agree that on Sunday, in a public statement on the pay dispute, he made it clear that in his opinion only a minority of teachers were unsatisfactory? Would it not be more appropriate, in the second half of the 20th century, to provide all teachers with the support to make them better teachers, without arbitrary and impossible forms of assessment? Would not that approach get the agreement not only of the PAT but of all teachers in the profession?

Sir Keith Joseph: An appraisal system for all teachers is very much in their interests. It will permit the career development of every teacher. After all, appraisal is now going on informally. All that I am seeking is that it should be done formally for the benefit of all teachers.

Mr. Greenway: Is it not sad that some teachers, who are not members of the PAT, have got themselves into a cycle of striking and refusing to teach examination pupils, mark books, and so on, thereby increasing classroom difficulties, which makes them suffer from extra stress when they return to the job?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Radice: May I remind the Secretary of State that he is actually responsible for running education in this country? [Interruption.] Hon. Members should read the Education Act 1944. The right hon. Gentleman therefore has a duty to answer the question that I asked earlier: what is he doing to help solve the teachers' dispute?

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman knows that we have a decentralised system of education in this country and that I have certain statutory duties, but he also knows that both the employers and the teachers' representatives are today, and I believe tomorrow, having a meeting with the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

Student Grants

7. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the purchasing power of (a) the minimum and (b) the maximum student grant expressed as a percentage of the value in May 1979.

Mr. Brooke: The purchasing power of the minimum and the maximum student grant for 1984-85, expressed as a percentage of the value in September 1978, is 58 per cent. and 91 per cent., respectively. Grants are paid from September, and it is appropriate to apply the corresponding price indices.

Mr. Canavan: Is the Minister aware that the Government's last reported climbdown on the student grants issue was of benefit to only a minority of better-off parents, and that students in general have suffered a vicious attack on their living standards since the Tory Government came to power in 1979? Is it not about time that the purchasing power of the student grant was restored and parental contributions phased out completely so that students can study in peace instead of having to worry about poverty and financial hardship?

Mr. Brooke: It is because the issue of student grants attracted the attention that it did in November and December that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the review that is taking place this year.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Why should an apprentice bricklayer in my constituency pay tax to support grants for people who are better off than he is?

Mr. Brooke: There are many who share my hon. Friend's view. It also underlies the review.

School Meals (Nutritional Standards)

8. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce legislation to lay down minimum nutritional standards for the provision of school meals.

Mr. Dunn: No, Sir.

Mr. Fatchett: I am grateful to the Minister for that detailed reply. Does he not recognise that in many parts of the country, particularly those areas under Conservative control, there has been a fall in nutritional standards? Does he not also recognise the impact of that, particularly on low-income families? Should not a Government who claim to be a caring Government do something about it and make sure that children from low-income families have a proper and decent meal as part of their daily diet?

Mr. Dunn: I challenge the hon. Gentleman to prove the first part of the allegation contained in his question. The law makes it quite clear that children from families which are in receipt of supplementary benefit or family income supplement should receive free meals at school. I remind him and the House that the responsibility for a balanced diet for children rests with parents. It is parents, not the state, who bear children.

Mrs. Rumbold: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is more important to encourage local authorities to undertake the private sector provision of meals in schools, as my authority in Merton has done, than to hound local authorities by asking them to do things that are rightly the responsibility of parents?

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend makes a fair and correct distinction between those essential elements of the education service which are concerned with education and those which are not. Making savings on school meals does not bring about the provision of junk food. It can mean savings on expenditure, which can go elsewhere in the education service to bring about better results and standards in the schools.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Is it not staggering that the Minister should ask my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) to prove whether school meals are good or bad? Should not the Minister be able to say to the House that he knows? That is his responsibility as a Minister charged with responsibility for the schools system.

Mr. Dunn: I challenged the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) to prove the allegation that he made. If he can do so, I am prepared to sit down and talk to him. If he cannot, it is up to him to apologise to me and to the House.

Mr. Adley: Is not nutrition related to content? Can my hon. Friend explain why we spend so much time and trouble warning people about the dangers of cigarettes, but seemingly spend no time at all warning them about the dangers of either alcohol or foods which can induce heart disease? Will he consider the problem seriously, in consultation with his ministerial colleagues, and ensure that the branding of foods is undertaken?

Mr. Dunn: I understand the point my hon. Friend is making. I am aware of the concern felt by many about the link between diet and disease. The Department of Health and Social Security has commissioned a survey of the diet of schoolchildren. It is hoped that the results will be published in the very near future. I shall take on board the points made by my hon. Friend.

Mrs. Clwyd: Why do the Government continue to provide a subsidy for full fat milk, but no subsidy for skimmed milk, which nutritionists say is better for all of us?

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Lady may be right; she may be wrong. I do not know.

Open University

9. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the future of the Open University.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Open University will continue to play an important part in the Government's programme for higher education by providing degree level education for those who missed the opportunity earlier in life and through continuing education relevant to the updating needs of industry, commerce, the professions and public services.

Mr. Bennett: Does the Secretary of State accept that the visiting committee totally repudiated his view of the Open University and that it set out clearly that the Open University is doing an excellent job? Would it not be fair for the Secretary of State to say to the House that he has got over his prejudice against the Open University and will give it money so that it may continue to do a first-class job?

Sir Keith Joseph: No, Sir. The Government value the Open University and the work that it does, but they believe that, like other institutions, it has to seek to cover its costs by economies, where possible.

Mr. Alexander: Bearing in mind the value of the new technology courses of the Open University in broadening the skills of our work force, what reassurance can my right hon. Friend give that those courses will be continued, despite the drop in income?

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government have used taxpayers' funds to meet some of the needs of the Open University in the light of the visiting committee's report. But the visiting committee thought that there was scope for the Open University to make some economies, and it was disappointed that the Open University did not have the management figures to enable it to consider the economies that it might make.

Mr. Donald Stewart: The cut in funds to other universities, though deplorable, is understandable in view of the policy of the Government, but why do students of the Open University, who appear to meet the criterion of Conservative philosophy because they are doing their own independent study without the use of buildings, and so on, not receive assistance from his Department?

Sir Keith Joseph: They do. Open University students, whose initiative and enterprise the Government admire, meet only 14 per cent. of the costs of their studies, or 19 per cent. if one includes summer school fees. The taxpayer bears 86 and 81 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Sumberg: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Open University is one of the most cost-effective centres of higher education? Is that not a reason why we should give it more rather than less support?

Sir Keith Joseph: I grant that it is cost-effective on one form of reckoning. On another form of reckoning it has about the same public cost significance as other such institutions.

Mr. Fisher: Does the Secretary of State recognise the importance of the Open University to unemployed students? Will he undertake to protect the unemployed students' fund in the Open University, to ensure that that part of its work is increased rather than decreased?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That is why the fund for the unemployed in the Open University budget has been protected.

Mr. Hannam: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Open University offers special opportunities to disabled people, who cannot gain access to other university campuses? Will he therefore ensure that the number of disabled places is maintained in any future reorganisation?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes. The visiting committee took special care about that.

Mr. Freud: Will the Secretary of State reconsider the visiting committee's report and try to meet its demands a little more closely?

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government have met £4 million of the visiting committee's proposed suggestions and are considering a number of others.

Student Unions (Expenditure)

10. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made with his discussions about the controls which are available over expenditure of public money by student unions.

Mr. Brooke: Discussions are proceeding between officials of the Department and representatives of higher education interests. These are preliminary discussions intended to inform the Government as a basis for decision upon appropriate next action. The Government will make a statement in due course.

Mr. Latham: Is it not deplorable that Jewish students at Sunderland polytechnic have been denied the right to a Jewish society of their choice? Surely Jewish taxpayers should not have to pay for a union which operates such blatant discrimination.

Mr. Brooke: I share my hon. Friend's vivid anxiety that the principles of freedom of speech and association should be maintained, especially in places of higher education. I understand that the authorities at Sunderland polytechnic are actively examining the issues raised by the student union's refusal to ratify the constitution of the proposed Jewish society, and that the matter will be considered by the polytechnic governors at their next meeting. My right hon. Friend is minded to make inquiries of the authority and the director if second thoughts do not prevail.

Mr. Janner: May I thank the Minister for that reply? Has he considered whether the Sunderland students' action is in breach of the Race Relations Act 1976 and whether it should be referred to the Commission for Racial Equality by the Government, as it has been by the Jewish community in this country?

Mr. Brooke: I have noted what the hon. and learned Gentleman said. He will also be aware that the National Union of Students has taken up with the student union at the polytechnic the inappropriateness of what it is doing.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Does my hon. Friend agree that student unions are abusing their role and spending far too much money subsidising trips for students to miners' picket lines—when they existed—to anti-Government meetings in London and all that sort of thing? Is it not time to calm them down once and for all?

Mr. Brooke: Limitations on the use of student union funds are set by charity law. That was made clear by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General in the guidance issued to institutions in 1983. Expenditure must further the interests of students as students.

Mr. Sheerman: While the Minister is being urged by his colleagues to introduce a final solution to this matter will he try to remember that this is the International, Year of Youth, whose aims are peace, participation and development? Participation—growing up and learning about democracy—is an important part of a student's development. Would it not be more sensible for the Government, when they are investigating and discussing, to discuss matters with the National Union of Students, which represents the students of this country, and which has not been approached by the Minister? Could he not talk to it and get that democracy moving?

Mr. Brooke: I applaud International Youth Year, of which the hon. Gentleman reminds me each month. I hestitate to say to him that it is arguable that voluntary participation is sometimes preferable to participation in which there is a greater degree of coercion.

Mr. Leigh: Have the Government given consideration to making universities, rather than student unions, responsible for the funding of recreational activity by students, thus enabling us to have voluntary rather than compulsory membership of student unions and achieving a considerable saving of public money?

Mr. Brooke: The matter is obviously one for the universities. In some universities that provision is rendered by the universities.

Mature Students

11. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many mature students entered further and higher education in 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Brooke: In 1982 and 1983, 37,400 and 39,000 home students aged 21 and over entered a course of full-time higher education in Great Britain for the first time. Figures for 1984 and directly comparable figures for non-advanced further education are not available.

Mr. Wallace: Does the Minister accept that if economic revival is to become a reality in the country it is necessary to have as much retraining and as many opportunities for developing the skill resources of the population as possible? What part does he envisage further and higher education playing in this, and what steps is he taking to encourage mature entrants?

Mr. Brooke: The Department of Education and Science is participating in the adult training strategy, which was launched in collaboration with the Department of Employment. The projections for mature students in higher education show a continuing increase on the projections which we published last year.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the Minister take on board the recommendations in the report of the Association of University Teachers published this week entitled "Expansion, Expansion, Expansion"? In terms of the House of Lords Select Committee report on the shortage of high tech qualified people, whom we need, and in terms of reports from Government Ministers about the appalling lack of high tech graduates, would not adult students be attracted into this kind of course, and is this not where it is vital to have the expansion about which the AUT speaks?

Mr. Brooke: The AUT has been good enough to send me a copy of its booklet, so I have had an opportunity to read it. The hon. Gentleman will know that in the booklet the AUT is arguing for an expansion in all subjects, and not simply in high tech.

Secondary Schools (Reorganisation)

12. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations have been made about secondary schools reorganisation by parents organisations.

Mr. Dunn: Such representations are received, in the form of statutory objections and deputations to the Department, in respect of most proposals to reorganise secondary education. The views so expressed are one of the factors that my right hon. Friend takes into account when deciding these proposals.

Mr. Loyden: Now that the Secretary of State has exercised his power to keep open Bluecoat school, will he also exercise his power to ensure that the necessary finance, assessed at some £3 million, is available to the local education authority to enable it to carry out the wishes of the Secretary of State?

Mr. Dunn: A letter along those lines has been sent to the Department of Education and Science by the chairman of the education committee. That letter is being considered.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend agree that his right hon. Friend's welcome decision about Bluecoat school as a school of high excellence shows that the Government listen to parental views on these matters?

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. and learned Friend is right. When my right hon. Friend considers proposals on their individual merits, he must take into account not only the views of the parents but the proposers' case for the proposals and all other relevant circumstances, including his own policies.

Mr. Alton: While I welcome the decision to keep open Bluecoat school in my constituency, will the Minister now reconsider the decision to close state schools which are scheduled for closure this year in Liverpool? Will he accept that, when decisions of this kind are being made, it would be an improvement if the Ministers concerned could visit the schools affected by closure proposals?

Mr. Dunn: To take the latter point first, if I were to visit all the schools under consideration for closure by the Department I would spend no time in the House of Commons or at home in my constituency. Additionally, it is not possible for the Secretary of State to change an earlier decision. Those decisions are now legally binding on the local education authority unless fresh proposals are made by the local education authority itself.

Mr. Batiste: Can my hon. Friend assure parents in Leeds that he will give full weight to their representations opposing the closure of sixth forms in that city on grounds of viable numbers and proven worth?

Mr. Dunn: On behalf of my right hon. Friend, I shall be happy to consider all the views and points put to us on any proposals in any part of the land.

Polytechnics (Degree Courses)

13. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he expects the proposed new centralised student admissions scheme for degree courses in polytechnics to be in operation for the academic year 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that the new polytechnic central admissions system is already in operation in respect of the admission of students to full-time and sandwich courses at degree level for the academic year 1986-87.

Mr. Madel: The new system will help both polytechnics and students. Can my hon. Friend confirm that the Government welcome the increase in numbers attending polytechnics for degree courses, which is of benefit not only to industry and commerce but to the individuals concerned?

Mr. Brooke: I am delighted to give the welcome for which my hon. Friend asks.

Centre Européen Recherche Nucleaire

14. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the future of the British subscription to the Centre Européen Recherche Nucleaire (CERN).

Mr. Brooke: Last March my right hon. Friend announced the formation of a review group, chaired by Sir John Kendrew, to examine the whole question of British participation in particle physics research, including our membership of CERN. I understand that the group will report to the chairmen of the Science and Engineering Research Council and the advisory board for the research councils in May, and when we have considered their advice my right hon. Friend will be able to make a statement. Meanwhile, the United Kingdom continues to participate fully in CERN.

Mr. Dalyell: Would it not be humiliating throughout the international scientific community if this country were to fail to cover its subscription to CERN?

Mr. Brooke: The purpose of the review is to examine the matter that I have described. We shall go through the whole process of receiving the report—[Interruption.]—and determine our conclusions on the advice received.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. Members to refrain from chatting.

Teachers (Pay)

15. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress made towards settling the teachers' pay dispute.

Sir Keith Joseph: Following the teachers' rejection of management's offer of 4 per cent. and their refusal of arbitration, the management panel has invited the teachers to agree to conciliation. ACAS has offered its services. It today opens exploratory discussions with the management panel and has invited the teachers' panel to similar, separate discussions.

Mr. Thompson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the present confrontation in our schools is harming our children's education for the second year running, and will harm it further if it continues into the examination period? Does my right hon. Friend further agree that the teachers' leaders would be well advised to encourage their members to go back into the classrooms and to return to the negotiating table so that talks can proceed?

Sir Keith Joseph: I answer yes to both of my hon. Friends questions.

Campaign for the Advancement of State Education

16. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met representatives of the Campaign for the Advancement of State Education; and what he discussed with them.

17. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met representatives of the Campaign for the Advancement of State Education to discuss standards in education.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have not yet met representatives of CASE, but shall be doing so on 1 April, principally to discuss the resolutions from their last annual conference.

Mr. McKay: When the right hon. Gentleman meets that organisation, will he discuss the lowering of morale of teachers and pupils due to his intransigence? Why does he think that people should go to arbitration when he refuses to fund any increase and when local authorities cannot afford to do so because of rate capping?

Sir Keith Joseph: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman accepts that what local authorities can afford is a key issue. I expect that the people coming to see me will raise some such question.

Mr. Jim Callaghan: The future of education is dependent on high morale among the teaching staff. In view of the current low morale, what will the right hon. Gentleman do about increasing teachers' pay?

Sir Keith Joseph: I have offered the interest of myself and the Government in the introduction of an appraisal system that might offer teachers the possibility of better career earnings for effectiveness.

Government Purchasing

18. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he proposes following the conclusions of the recent report by the Management and Personnel Office on Government purchasing.

Sir Keith Joseph: Officials of the Department are preparing an action document on the conclusions of the report. The document will shortly be submitted for my approval.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. Friend do all in his power to simplify Government purchasing procedures so that small firms can play their part in achieving the potential savings of £400 million a year?

Sir Keith Joseph: Although the Department is a relatively small public purchaser we shall certainly, on the basis of the report, do our best to ensure clear responsibilities and efficient procedures for purchasing and obtaining better value for money.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Stanbrook asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 19 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Mr. Stanbrook: At a time when we, the people of a comparatively wealthy and successful country, are about to consider the distribution of our wealth, would it not be right to remember how lucky we are compared with the thousands of people dying from starvation in Africa—a continent in which Britain has hitherto made an immense contribution to human progress? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that Britain will play a leading role in the international campaign to find long-term solutions to the problem of famine in Africa?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Mr. Speaker. At the United Nations conference last week on the emergency in Africa my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development stressed the need to sort out the underlying difficulties of some of the problematic countries in Africa, and pledged £125 million in development aid to 20 of the worst affected countries in Africa. That is in addition to the £60 million in emergency aid, and covers the coming financial year. On a longer term basis, my right hon. Friend has pledged £75 million to the World Bank special facility for Africa. We are well aware of the problem that my hon. Friend has highlighted.

Mr. Beith: Does the Prime Minister share the view of The Times that the Foreign Secretary's speech on the American star wars programme was muddled, mealy-mouthed and damaging to the Alliance? [Interruption.] Does the right hon. Lady believe that that statement represented a realistic assessment of the dangers of the star wars strategy?

The Prime Minister: I reject the language and the conclusion in the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question. The policy was, and remains, in the four points set out at Camp David and reaffirmed when I was in Washington. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary was speaking in pursuance of that policy.

Mr. Hayes: Is my right hon. Friend not greatly encouraged by the Manpower Services Commission's quarterly review, published today, which shows that 10 per cent. of the work force are now self-employed? Will that news encourage my right hon. Friend to make the very successful enterprise allowance demand-led?

The Prime Minister: I noticed the report and the increasing numbers of people who are self-employed. That augurs well for the future of small businesses, as the self-employed gradually come to employ other people. I am afraid that for the answers that he sought in the last part of his question my hon. Friend must await the statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Kinnock: The four points agreed with President Reagan are rather vague in several respects. For instance, can the Prime Minister tell us what veto she has that will ensure there will be no step from research into development, with all the consequent experiments, without her permission and the permission of the House?

The Prime Minister: It is not a question of a veto. Research is permitted, and the constraints on deployment are those contained in the anti-ballistic missile treaty, signed in 1972 by both the Soviet Union and the United States, which fully permits research, but requires negotiation before testing and deployment, in accordance with the terms of the treaty.

Mr. Kinnock: As these are matters of great concern, will the right hon. Lady tell us very clearly where she draws the line between research and development?

The Prime Minister: Where it is drawn by the anti-ballistic missile treaty.

Mr. Forth: Will my right hon. Friend undertake to instruct our representatives in the negotiations to enlarge the EEC that all details of costs to the United Kingdom and the Community should be given to the House before we are asked to approve such enlargement?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, we reached agreement at Fontainebleau, and this included the proportion of enlargement costs that would be borne by this country. It is not possible to say precisely what they are while the negotiations are still incomplete. However, I shall do my best to see that they are laid before the House at the relevant time.

Mr. Wilson: Has the Prime Minister seen the report from the Australian Royal Commission, which surfaced yesterday, that previous British Governments had entertained a proposal for holding nuclear device tests in Scotland? In view of the anger about that proposal in Scotland, will she join me in condemning it as an act of aggression against the Scottish people?

The Prime Minister: A letter used in evidence at the Australian Royal Commission showed that in 1954 a location near Wick was considered as a possible area for a minor trial of a triggering device in support of nuclear weapon development. It was not a nuclear device. The area was quickly rejected because it was considered unsuitable.

Q2. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 19 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Atkins: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the French Government's deliberate procrastination over the development of the European fighter aircraft for use by the air forces of the United Kingdom, Germany, Italy, Spain and France is preventing the collaboration in that industry that we all want? In view of the imminence of international ministerial discussions on this matter, will she use her considerable influence with President Mitterrand to resolve, as a matter of urgency, French obstructiveness?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, a good deal of work has been done on the European fighter aircraft. A common staff target has been agreed between the five air forces, and the industries of the five countries are now doing a feasibility study. I expect that the Defence Ministers will meet in May to make their assessment. However, my hon. Friend is right to say that it will be difficult to resolve some of the problems. Should intervention be necessary, I shall not hesitate to make it.

Mrs. Renée Short: Does the Prime Minister agree with the statement made in the debate on the west midlands last Friday that a low wage is better than no wage at all?

The Prime Minister: I believe that it is better to work for a low wage and to have it topped up by family income supplement than not to have a job.

Sir Edward du Cann: Will my right hon. Friend make time today to note the mounting anxiety being expressed in all quarters of the House and outside it about the serious decline in the British merchant fleet? Will she consider whether she should appoint a senior Minister with responsibility for co-ordinating constructive Government policies to reverse that very worrying trend?

The Prime Minister: I am aware of the decline in the British merchant fleet, because of severe competition from other parts of the world. I recognise my right hon. Friend's point that it is of strategic significance to have a good British merchant fleet of considerable size. I shall take his point to heart.

Q3. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 19 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Lloyd: Is it not apparent to the Prime Minister that today we have another Budget for jobs? Will she specifically tell the House and the millions of unemployed people in the country when unemployment will begin to turn down dramatically? If the Prime Minister will not do that today, will she at least tell us that this Government have neither the wit nor the compassion to do anything serious about mass unemployment?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is probably aware that the number of those in jobs increased by 342,000 over the year to September and by 480,000 over the last 18 months. The rise in the working population is still continuing. The proportion of the population of working age who are in work is higher in this country, at 66 per cent., than in West Germany at 61 per cent., France at 61 per cent. and Italy at 55 per cent. We shall create more jobs and begin to reduce the number of unemployed when industry is even more competitive and produces goods and services that people both here and overseas will buy in greater quantities.

Mr. Hill: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Russians have breached the 1972 anti-ballistic missile treaty so many times in the last 10 years that there will have to be many safeguards if we are to develop the strategic defence initiative? Has my right hon. Friend had discussions with President Reagan about the safeguards?

The Prime Minister: Various accusations about breaches of the anti-ballistic missile treaty have been made, in particular about radars and the direction and position of those radars. The place to sort those out is in one of the consultative committees provided for in the anti-ballistic missile treaty. I believe that this subject will be taken up at the Geneva talks.

Q4. Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 19 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pike: When will the Prime Minister take steps to stop the widening rift between the north and the south? When will the Government take steps to deal with the deprived regions of the country? Would not the first step be for the Government to take a positive decision and say that no development will take place at Stansted and that any public money that would have been used at Stansted will be used in the regions instead?

The Prime Minister: With regard to the alleged north-south divide may I point out—[Interruption.] It is not right to talk of a straightforward divide between north and south. Parts of the north are very prosperous—[HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."]—while other parts have very high unemployment. There are also parts of the south which have very high unemployment. However, public investment per head of the population in the last year for which figures are available was £89 in the north, compared with £76 as the English average. It was even higher in Wales and Scotland. Public investment was purposely higher in the north to help with the unemployment problem.

Q5. Mr. Heddle asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 19 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Heddle: Is my right hon. Friend aware that council house rent arrears have risen from £74 million in 1980 to a staggering £188 million today? Is my right hon. Friend aware that many local authorities are thus denying to thousands of single homeless people the right to rent a home? Are not these local authorities flying in the face of the interests of their ratepayers?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is correct. Rent arrears are far too high, and they are rising. The management is not good enough. Both the Department of the Environment and the Audit Commission have issued comprehensive guidance. It would be as well if the authorities followed this guidance and reduced the arrears, in the interests of their ratepayers.

Mr. Ewing: To return to the number of people in work, is it not true that 2 million fewer people are in work now than when the Prime Minister came to office in 1979 and that her economic policies have effectively destroyed 2 million jobs in this country?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the amount of overmanning in British industry due to the refusal of the Labour Government to face fundamental problems, such as the steel industry, left us the problems to deal with. Had we not been able to deal with them, Britain would have had no industrial future because it would have had no competitive industries. It now has, thanks to this Government.

Q6. Mr. Hannam asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 19 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hannam: Is my right hon. Friend aware that development and exploration activity in the North sea is reaching record levels? Is this not due to the success of free enterprise, backed by a helpful tax regime? Will she apply similar tax incentives to the rest of the British economy?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right. The development of the North sea was a great tribute to private enterprise. It was done quickly and with great profit and benefit to Britain, especially to the north-east of our country, where it has provided many jobs for industries associated with North sea oil development. That was added to and assisted by the right framework of taxation policy. That is the right recipe—the Government set the framework and people take advantage of it in private enterprise.

Budget

3.30 pm

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make the Chancellor of the Exchequer more accountable to Parliament on budgetary matters and to monitor his economic performance; and for connected purposes.

I am pleased to see such a good attendance for the First Reading of my Bill. I hope that there is a similar attendance at Second Reading and thereafter. My Bill was originally entitled the Finance Bill, but once the parliamentary establishment discovered that this would mean that the Treasury would have to rename its Bill the Finance (No. 2) Bill, pressures were put upon me to rename my Bill. Therefore, it is called the Budget Bill.

The purpose of my Bill is to bring our financial affairs under more public scrutiny, because I and an increasing number of people in the country believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is getting away with economic murder. He is a record-breaking Chancellor. He has probably broken more records than has Kenny Dalglish, except that the Chancellor is in the habit of scoring own goals. For example, he presides over record unemployment. He has a record deficit in manufacturing trade and a record low value of the pound against the dollar. We have record interest rates, a record number of bankruptcies, and the record of £3 billion of taxpayers' money spent on a 12-month vendetta against the miners. The Chancellor—where is he?—had the brass neck to tell us that that was money well spent. The British economy has been reduced to a shambles by an incompetent Chancellor, who has the brass neck to tell us to pull in our belts while he seems to become plumper and smugger. He does not seem to practise the austerity of the monetarist policies that he preaches.

At present, parliamentary accountability is limited. The Chancellor comes along here once a year in March to present his Budget statement. I have noticed that as soon as the Chancellor — where is he? — stands up, Mr. Speaker, you vacate your seat. I have often wondered about that. The content of his speech must make you as sick as it makes me. Then the Chancellor comes along with a mini-budget statement in the autumn in a vain attempt to repair some of the damage done by his main Budget in spring.

Under my proposals, there would be more scrutiny before and after the Budget. For example, many hon. Members on both sides of the House will have had mailbags full of letters from constituents complaining about the possibility of VAT being extended to children's shoes or books and periodicals, or about the taxation of pensions, or the need to have more public investment in jobs instead of giving tax handouts to the rich. What most of us do at present is photocopy the letter and send it across to the mandarins in the Treasury with a letter of support from ourselves, perhaps. Some bureaucrat at the Treasury just presses a key on the word processor and we get back a three-sentence reply. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Three months later."] Three months later, very often. To my mind that is not genuine consultation, and I hope that this is a point which appeals to hon. Members on both sides of the House.

I listened with interest to what the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), had to say recently. He proposed the idea of a pre-Budget Green Paper—or a green Budget. I think that there is a lot of merit in that, and that is the principle of my Bill. But I also want post-Budget scrutiny so that we have continuous assessment of the economic performance of the Chancellor. A progress report would have to be presented to Parliament at least quarterly, and the Chancellor would have to come to the Dispatch Box and answer personally.

I have an example of the kind of progress report for which my Bill would provide. I do not want a subjective assessment; I believe in objective assessment. There would be chosen economic and other indicators and the performance of the Government would be measured on those indicators. Here is a progress report on the present Government since it took office in 1979; unemployment up 173 per cent.; job vacancies, down 50 per cent.; the pound against the dollar, down 47 per cent.; interest rates, increased 17 per cent.; company liquidations, up 201 per cent.; balance of trade in manufactures, down 175 per cent.; output of manufacturing industries, down 10 per cent.; economic growth rate, down 85 per cent.; council house rents, up 128 per cent.; prescription charges up 900 per cent.—and I suppose that we are in for another dose of the same medicine from the Chancellor this afternoon.

In case anyone disputes these statistics, I should say that the Library helped me to compile them, and I know for a fact that the Chancellor has a great respect for the Library staff.

So far the Chancellor has scored 0 out of 10. When I was a teacher I was always very reluctant to give any pupil 0 out of 10. I would try to give them 1 out of 10 if I thought that they were making an honest endeavour. So I looked at the whole Government record very hard and I found one small success. I am sure that when the Chancellor eventually comes in he will puff out his chest at the Dispatch Box and tell us all about it. He has managed to keep inflation to single figures. Even I would admit that that is an achievement, but I must remind him that we could have a zero rate of inflation if we reduced all economic activity to zero.

That is the economics of the graveyard and that is the direction in which this Chancellor is leading us. He is making Britain into an industrial and economic graveyard. If we are looking around for uneconomic units, he is the most uneconomic unit in this country. He should therefore be made redundant, and my Bill will make provision for that.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

3.40 pm

Sir Michael Shaw (Scarborough) rose——

Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) seeking to oppose the motion?

Sir Michael Shaw: Yes, Sir, I wish to oppose it, first because it is a quite unjustified misuse of the practice of the House and, secondly—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) has as much right to be heard as the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan).

Sir Michael Shaw: The hon. Member's motion is a most excessive way of drawing one's virtues to the attention of the Committee of Selection so as to sit on a Finance Bill Committee.

More seriously, if it becomes a precedent, it will endanger a small right of the Back Bencher to be heard on important occasions. There are many other, more serious, objections to the proposition put by the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan), but I shall not dwell on them today.

The hon. Gentleman and I have in common a desire that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be accountable to Parliament for the Budget. By happy chance, the Chancellor, whom I wish well, is here to account to Parliament this afternoon. Therefore, I shall limit my objections to the motion by allowing them to remain vocal, and I shall certainly not propose that the matter go to a Division.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order, No. 15 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of Public Business):—

BUDGET

Mr. Dennis Canavan accordingly presented a Bill to make the Chancellor of the Exchequer more accountable to Parliament on budgetary matters and to monitor his economic performance; and for connected purposes; And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 103.]

WAYS AND MEANS

Budget Statement

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Before I call the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it may be for the convenience of hon. Members if I remind them that at the end of the Chancellor's speech, as in past years, copies of the Budget resolutions will not be handed around in the Chamber but will be available to hon. Members in the Vote Office.

3.52 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): In last year's Budget statement I charted the course for this Parliament. Today I reaffirm the Government's determination to hold to that course, the purpose of which is nothing less than the defeat of inflation. We have not wavered from that purpose. Nor will we, but the defeat of inflation, essential though it is, is not enough. We must also do what we can to combat the scourge of unemployment. Nor is there any conflict between these two objectives. So my Budget today has two themes: to continue the drive against inflation and to help create the conditions for more jobs.

I shall begin by reviewing the economic background to the Budget. I shall then deal with the medium-term financial strategy, with monetary policy, and with the fiscal prospect, both this year and next. I shall then turn to the Government's strategy for jobs, and the measures to implement that strategy. These will involve action on a number of fronts, including both tax reduction and tax reform.

As usual, a number of press releases filling out the details of my tax proposals will be available from the Vote Office as soon as I have sat down.

THE ECONOMIC BACKGROUND

I start with the economic background.

Once again, we can look back on a year of steady growth and low inflation. During 1984 as a whole, inflation remained at around 5 per cent. Output grew by a further 2·5 per cent., with investment up by 6·5 per cent. and non-oil exports by 9 per cent., to reach all-time record levels in each case.

Manufacturing industry recovered particularly strongly, with output up by 3·5 per cent.—the biggest rise in any single year since 1973—exports up by 10 per cent. and investment by 13 per cent. The current account of the balance of payments has remained in surplus, for the fifth successive year. By international standards, too, the economy has performed well. Our growth was above, and our inflation below, the European Community average.

Moreover, this progress has been achieved in the teeth of the coal strike, for which, in the short term, the nation has had to pay a heavy price. In the current financial year, the coal strike has reduced the level of national output by over 1·25 per cent. and worsened the balance of payments by some £4 billion. It has increased public expenditure by £2·5 billion and public sector borrowing by £2·75 billion. It has cost us confidence abroad and jobs at home.

But the costs, both economic and constitutional, of submitting to this strike would have been infinitely greater than the costs that have been incurred in successfully resisting it, and it is a remarkable tribute to the underlying strength of the British economy that it has been able to withstand so long and damaging a strike in such good shape.

Looking ahead, we are now about to embark on what will be the fifth successive year of steady growth, with output in 1985 as a whole set to rise by a further 3½ per cent. Inflation may edge up for a time, perhaps to 6 per cent. by the middle of the year, but should then fall back to 5 per cent. by the end of the year and lower still in 1986.

While there can be no disputing the strength and durability of the economic upswing, there is equally no disputing the fact that it is marred by an unacceptably high level of unemployment—and this despite the fact that the latest figures suggest that employment has risen by half a million over the past two years, with a further increase likely over the year ahead.

If at home the past year has been overshadowed by the coal strike, internationally it has been dominated by the relentless surge of the dollar, which rose by a further 30 per cent. against all the major European currencies. To finance its massive budget deficit, the United States is importing a large part of the rest of the world's savings and exporting some of its own inflation.

This is not a sustainable state of affairs. As Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker last month testified to Congress, the United States is living on borrowed money and borrowed time; but meanwhile, it is not only America that is paying the interest.

All this has led to one of the most turbulent years in the financial markets within living memory. It has been, and will continue to be, a time for strong nerves and sound policies.

THE MEDIUM TERM FINANCIAL STRATEGY

We have already shown that we are not afraid to take action, however unpalatable, to keep the medium-term financial strategy on course in an unpredictable and uncertain world. That strategy was first launched five years ago next week. Our commitment to it remains as firm today as it was then. It was designed to bring down the rate of inflation and to ensure a reasonable growth of demand in money terms, and it has succeeded on both counts.

We are determined to maintain steady downward pressure on inflation. It is not in the gift of any Government to eliminate short-term fluctuations along the way, but the underlying direction has to be downwards. It is this objective which governs the desirable growth of total spending power in the economy, as measured by money GDP.

The Government's economic strategy has two key components: a monetary policy designed to bring down inflation and a supply side policy designed to improve the competitive performance of the economy.

The supply side policy is rooted in a profound conviction, born of practical experience both at home and overseas, that the way to improve economic performance and create more jobs is to encourage enterprise, efficiency and flexibility; to promote competition, deregulation and free markets; to press ahead with privatisation and to improve incentives.

The argument over which will have a bigger impact on demand—increased public expenditure or lower taxation — completely misses the point. The case for lower taxation rests on supply side policy: lower taxes will help to enhance incentives, eliminate distortions, improve the use of resources and heighten the spirit of enterprise.

The great mistake of post-war demand management, which still has some devotees today, was to react to rising unemployment by injecting more money into the system, whether through the Budget or through the banks. So far from halting the upward trend of unemployment, this simply generated runaway inflation. That course we will not follow.

A policy for demand expressed unambiguously in terms of money provides a further important advantage, for it ensures that wage restraint will provide more jobs. I repeat today the undertaking I gave the National Economic Development Council last month: the medium-term financial strategy is as firm a guarantee against inadequate money demand as it is against excessive money demand.

MONETARY POLICY AND THE EXCHANGE RATE

Within the MTFS, the central role is played by monetary policy, for it is by controlling the growth of money in the economy that the Government are able to influence the growth of money demand. Last year I set target ranges of 4 to 8 per cent. for narrow money and 6 to 10 per cent. for broad money. Over the 12 months to mid-February, the targeted measure of narrow money grew at around the middle of its range, and that of broad money at just below the top of its range.

For next year, I shall be retaining the same two target aggregates. I attach equal importance to both. The target ranges for 1985-86 will be those indicated in last year's MTFS—that is to say, a reduction in monetary growth of 1 per cent. in each case.

There are those who argue that if we stick to sound internal policies, the exchange rate can be left to take care of itself. In the long run that may well be true, but significant movements in the exchange rate, whatever their cause, can have a short-term impact on the general price level and on inflationary expectations. This process can acquire a momentum of its own, making sound internal policies harder to implement. So benign neglect is not an option.

That is why I have repeatedly argued that it is necessary to take the exchange rate into account in judging monetary conditions. There is no mechanical formula which enables us to balance the appropriate combination of the exchange rate and domestic monetary growth needed to keep financial policy on track, but a balance still has to be struck, and struck in a way that takes no chances with inflation.

There can be no doubt about the Government's commitment to maintain monetary conditions that will continue to bring down inflation. Short-term interest rates will be held at the level needed to achieve this.

PUBLIC SECTOR BORROWING

While monetary policy is at the heart of the medium-term financial strategy, it needs to be buttressed by an appropriate fiscal policy.

The outturn for the public sector borrowing requirement for 1983-84 was £9¾ billion, or 3¼ per cent. of GDP. In my Budget last year I planned to reduce it substantially in 1984-85 to £7¼ billion, or 2¼ per cent. of GDP. In the event, this year's PSBR looks like turning out at £10½ billion, or 3¼ per cent. of GDP—the same as last year.

All but half a million pounds of this substantial overrun is directly attributable to the cost of the coal strike. I believe it was right to meet the large but once-for-all cost of keeping the economy going throughout the coal strike by borrowing, thus in effect spreading the cost over a number of years, but it is now necessary to return to the path I outlined last year.

That means that the PSBR for the coming year, 1985-86, will be set at £7 billion, equivalent to 2 per cent. of GDP. As this year, some £3 billion will be financed through national savings.

I have been urged by some to provide for a still lower borrowing requirement in order to impress the financial markets. Others have argued that the present high level of interest rates would justify a more relaxed fiscal stance.

There is nothing sacrosanct about the precise mix of monetary and fiscal policies required to meet the objectives of the medium-term financial strategy, but this is not the year to make adjustments in either direction. The wisest course is to stick to our pre-announced path. This means that, for the coming year, a substantial reduction in the PSBR must take precedence over our objectives for reducing the burden of tax.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURE

Given the need to ensure that the Budget deficit is of a size that can and will be soundly financed, lower taxes can be achieved only by maintaining the firmest possible control of public expenditure.

Controlling public expenditure is one of the most difficult tasks facing any democratic Government in the modern world. Public expenditure acquires its own momentum and creates its own vested interests. To control it requires constant vigilance, and a determination to succeed despite the inevitable setbacks. We have that determination, and have succeeded in bringing the growth of public spending below that of the economy as a whole. This achievement has required difficult decisions in successive public expenditure reviews, but there is no benefit to sound economic management or effective control from sticking to public expenditure figures which subsequent events have made unattainable.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary made plain in the recent debate on the public expenditure White Paper, the normal pre-Budget review of the fiscal prospect has had to take account of changes in the economic scene since the public expenditure review in the autumn. Of these, the most important has been the coal strike, whose public expenditure cost in 1984-85 is estimated at some £2½ billion—about £1 billion more than allowed for in both the autumn statement and the public expenditure White Paper, which explicitly assumed that the strike would end at Christmas. There will also be some further cost in 1985-86.

It now looks as if this year's public expenditure planning total will be exceeded by nearly £3½ billion, of which over two thirds is attributable to the coal strike, but, quite apart from the coal strike, the upward pressures on public spending remain intense, not least from increased take-up of social security benefits and further local authority overspending. In addition, since the White Paper was prepared, we have had to accommodate the effects of higher interest rates and a lower exchange rate.

I have therefore reassessed the adequacy of the reserves for 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88 which were provided in the January White Paper. In order to provide a more realistic basis on which to plan and control the level of public spending, I have judged it prudent to add £2 billion to the reserve and thus to the White Paper planning totals for each of the three years. At the same time, I have further increased the estimate for debt interest in each year.

These increases in the size of the reserve will raise the planning totals for the next three years by about 1½ per cent., but let there be no misunderstanding: the new totals still represent a tough target. No extra cash has been allocated to individual programmes. Calls on the reserve will still be judged on the strictest criteria. There is no slackening in our determination to curb the size of the public sector.

Public expenditure will continue to fall as a proportion of GDP, as it has, the coal strike apart, since 1981-82. Expenditure is planned to stay broadly flat in real terms at about this year's level, excluding the costs of the coal strike. To achieve even these new figures, future public expenditure surveys will have to be at least as tough as their predecessors; and there can be no let-up in the tight control of individual spending programmes within the cash limits set for the coming year.

On the other side of the public accounts, tax receipts, too, are now expected to be higher over the next three years, partly for related reasons, but not by as much. The scope I have for tax cuts this year is therefore only half the amount I said might be available in my statement to the House in November. In other words, the net effect after indexation of the measures I shall shortly announce will be to contribute some three quarters of a billion pounds to the £7 billion borrowing requirement I have set for 1985-86.

THE STRATEGY FOR JOBS

In determining the nature of those measures, within the overall framework of the medium-term financial strategy, my overriding objective has been to improve the prospect for jobs. It is important to be clear what this means. Jobs are created by firms that are competitive, efficient, profitable and well managed. This in turn requires a work force with the right skills, one that is adaptable, reliable, motivated and prepared to work at wages that employers can afford to pay.

The extent to which Government—let alone a single Budget—can bring this about is clearly limited. We cannot instantly inculcate the spirit of enterprise by Act of Parliament, or abolish latter-day Luddism overnight simply by adding a few more pages to the statute book.

We cannot even prevent trade unions from pricing their members out of a job. Last year, despite a further encouraging growth in productivity, wage costs per unit of manufacturing output rose by some 4 per cent. In the United States, Germany and Japan, unit wage costs actually fell. This is bad for our competitiveness and bad for jobs. Too much of the benefit of economic growth is currently being enjoyed in higher living standards for those in work, too little in the form of better job prospects for those out of work. In a free society, the remedy lies in the hands of those responsible for collective bargaining throughout the economy.

However, limited though the role of Government is, it remains an important one: to prepare the ground in which enterprise can best flourish; to remove obstacles to the effective working of markets in general and the labour market in particular; to correct the deficiencies in our education and training that make it hard for industry—and individuals—to adapt to change; to construct a pattern of taxation that does least damage to incentives, and in particular does least to deter people from taking jobs at wages that businesses can afford.

We have made progress on all these fronts. Inevitably, it takes time for the effects to come through. That is not surprising — attitudes and behaviour acquired over decades cannot be changed overnight — and there is much still to be done; but there is no short cut. If it were possible to create jobs simply by boosting Government borrowing and Government spending, there would be no unemployment in the world today, for nothing is easier for a Government than to borrow and spend. Impatience is a bad counsellor.

In setting financial policy for the year ahead I have had one object in mind: the continuing reduction of inflation. Equally, in deciding my individual Budget proposals within that overall framework, I have sought throughout to make those changes that will do most to promote enterprise and employment.

Our attack on the evil of unemployment is clear, coherent and strong. My Budget today represents a further step along the road we have been taking since 1979. It will help us to ensure that more new jobs are created and that they will be new jobs that last.

EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING MEASURES

I begin with some measures directly related to employment and training.

One of the most long-standing problems in this country is our failure to prepare our school-leavers adequately for work. Since it was first launched in 1983, the youth training scheme has proved to be a very successful bridge between school and work. I has also helped to make young people's pay expectations more realistic. But too many trainees are still reluctant to accept rates of pay which reflect their inexperience, and too many employers still fail to recognise that training is an investment in their own commercial interest. This is in marked contrast to our major competitors overseas.

The Government have therefore decided to promote a substantial expansion of the youth training scheme. Provided employers contribute a major share of the cost, the Government are prepared to provide further funds to launch this new initiative, over and above the existing £800 million a year of public expenditure on the YTS. The expanded scheme would offer places lasting two years for 16-year-old and one year for 17-year-old school-leavers, leading to a recognised qualification.

The main aim of all this is a better qualified work force. It would also be a major step towards our objective of ensuring that every youngster under the age of 18 will either be in full-time education, or in a job, or receiving training, with unemployment no longer an option. But first we have to get the expanded scheme in place. It will require the active co-operation of employers, trade unions and school-leavers, which I am confident will be forthcoming.

The existing YTS provides foundation training and preparation for work. The expanded scheme will also involve occupational training for both the employed and the unemployed, geared to the needs of business and industry. In the long run, we would expect employers to meet the full cost, as those in other countries do, but I recognise that such a major change in attitudes may take time. I am therefore prepared to set aside a fixed sum in public funds to launch this new initiative and get it moving in the right direction.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment will be arranging consultations through the Manpower Services Commission about the quality of the training, the share of the cost to be borne by employers, and the level of trainee allowances. We aim to complete these consultations by the end of June so that a second year will be available for as many as possible of the 16-year-olds leaving school this year. Provided the outcome is satisfactory, I have undertaken to increase the Department of Employment's programme by £125 million in 1986-87 and £300 million in 1987-88. This expenditure will be partly offset by savings in social security payments and the ending of the young workers scheme, which will close for applications at the end of March 1986.

I am also providing the MSC with an additional £20 million in 1986-87 to finance a programme of appropriate in-service teacher training courses.

It has become increasingly evident that our output of graduates in high technology disciplines is not keeping pace with the expanding needs of industry. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science will therefore be announcing later today a special programme, costing around £40 million over the next three years, to provide additional places in engineering and technology at selected higher education institutions. In this case the cost will be met from within existing public expenditure programmes.

While school-leavers are catered for by the youth training scheme, there remains the problem of the long-term unemployed genuinely seeking work. Under the community programme, local authorities and voluntary bodies provide temporary work for the long-term unemployed on projects of community benefit. This scheme, which at present provides 130,000 places has proved its worth, with a significant proportion of those who leave it going on to other jobs.

I have therefore agreed to make funds available to provide an additional 100,000 community programme places by June 1986. These places will be for 18 to 24-year-olds who have been unemployed for six months or more, and other adults who have been unemployed for over a year. To accommodate this, the Department of Employment's programme will be further increased by £140 million in 1985-86 and £460 million in 1986-87.

To an even greater extent than with the youth training scheme, the net public expenditure cost will be substantially less than the gross cost because of savings on social security benefits. The net addition to public expenditure as a result of all the proposals I have just announced will be £75 million in 1985-86, £300 million in 1986-87, and £400 million in 1987-88.

We also need to do more to remove legislative impediments to the effective working of the labour market. However well intentioned, these can only lead to fewer jobs. Accordingly, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment will be extending to all employers the provisions on unfair dismissal which currently apply to small firms. The qualifying period for unfair dismissal claims will thus become two years for all new employees. This is a reasonable period of time and should lessen the reluctance of some employers to take on new people.

In addition, my right hon. Friend will be issuing a consultative document about the future of the wages councils later this week. Wages councils destroy jobs by making it illegal for employers to offer work at wages they can afford and the unemployed are prepared to accept. This applies in particular to small employers and to youngsters looking for their first job.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): The right hon. Gentleman should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. Lawson: The document will cover a number of proposals for radical change, including complete abolition.

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Employment and for Education and Science will be issuing press notices later today giving further details of these measures.

Mr. Evans: Bring back sweatshops.

TAX REFORM

Mr. Lawson: I now turn to taxation.

This Budget carries forward the theme of tax reform I set out last year; reform designed to make life a little simpler for the taxpayer; and above all reform designed to improve our economic performance over the longer term, on which the jobs of the future will depend.

In my Budget last year I announced a radical reform of the corporation tax system. This had been preceded by the Green Paper on corporation tax issued by my predecessor in 1982.

I am satisfied that the right way to proceed with major tax reform is to issue a Green Paper first, as a basis for full and informed discussion, followed by legislation when the results of that discussion have been fully digested.

I therefore propose to issue a Green Paper later this year on the reform of personal income tax.

The computerisation of PAYE makes this the right time to review the system of personal taxation. Most of the work will be complete by the end of 1987 and the full range of facilities will be available by 1989. The Green Paper will therefore discuss a range of options opened up by computerisation, from non-cumulation to closer integration between the tax and benefit systems, and including in particular a reform of the present system of personal allowances.

It is the Government's firm policy to reduce the burden of income tax, but we need to make sure that the reliefs we can afford are concentrated where they will do most good.

The present structure of personal income tax is far from satisfactory. Too many young people start paying tax at too low a level, and too many families find themselves in the poverty and unemployment traps. The system discriminates against the family in which the wife stays at home to look after the children. It denies to the partners in a marriage the independence and privacy in their tax affairs which they have a right to expect.

[Mr. Lawson]

There is therefore a strong case for changing to a new system of personal allowances more suited to today's economic and social needs. Under this, everyone, man or woman, married or single, would have the same standard allowance; but if either a wife or a husband were unable to make full use of their allowance, the unused portion could be transferred, if they so wished, to their partner.

This reform would produce a more logical and straightforward system. Far more people could be taken out of the poverty and unemployment traps, and indeed taken out of tax altogether, for a given sum of overall tax relief than is possible under the present system. It would end the present discrimination against the family where the wife feels it right to stay at home, which increasingly nowadays means discrimination against the family with young children.

Husbands and wives would each be taxed separately on their own income irrespective of the income of the other. The aggregation for tax purposes of a wife's earned income and investment income with her husband's would end, thus removing what has become an increasing source of resentment among women.

The Green Paper will set out full details of the proposals I have just outlined, as a basis for public discussion. After an appropriate period for consultation, it would be possible to legislate in 1987 and have a system on these lines in place by the end of the decade.

There is also a case for changing the tax treatment of pension funds, as part of a thorough-going reform of the tax treatment of personal savings generally. Any fundamental reform of this kind would, in the same way, need to be preceded by the publication of a Green Paper.

The House will, I am sure, be interested to learn that I have no such Green Paper in mind.

Nor, indeed, despite the unparalleled pre-Budget agitation, do any of the detailed proposals in my Budget affect the tax-deductibility of pension fund contributions, the tax-free nature of pension fund income and capital gains, or the anomalous but much-loved tax-free lump sum.

Meanwhile, I have a number of other important proposals for tax reform to announce today, which will both simplify the system and encourage enterprise.

First, on Capital gains tax, last year I was unable to do anything about the acknowledged defects of this tax, notably its combination of unfairness and complexity, and undertook to come back to it this year. This I now do.

I have decided that the right way to reform capital gains tax is to build on the important change made by my predecessor three years ago when he introduced the 1982 indexation relief. That relief, valuable though it is, and increasingly valuable as it will become, suffers from three serious limitations.

First, indexation does not cover the first 12 months of the ownership of an asset. This provision was introduced to discourage the short-term conversion of income into capital, but it has made the tax very much more complicated for the taxpayer. I am now in a position to remedy this defect. Hon. Members will recall that I announced last month measures to put an end to the practice known as bond washing, the principal device for converting income into less heavily taxed capital gains. Having done that, I now propose to abolish the 12-month rule. So far as most disposals are concerned, this will take effect from 6 April. In the case of certain fixed interest securities, however, the rule will need to remain in being until the anti-bond-washing provisions take effect on 28 February 1986.

Second, the indexation does not at present extend to losses. I propose to remove this restriction.

Thirdly, the present indexation provision unfairly discriminates against those who acquired their assets prior to 1982. For them, the allowance is based not on the 1982 value of the asset but on its original cost. I now propose to remedy that injustice. The indexation allowance will henceforth be based on March 1982 values. Capital gains made prior to 1982 will still not be indexed, of course, but at least all purely inflationary gains made since that date will now be free of tax, irrespective of when the asset was acquired.

That three-pronged reform of capital gains tax will produce a fairer tax, make life simpler for the taxpayer, help the efficient working of the capital markets, relieve the burden on family businesses and encourage risk-taking and enterprise. Combined with the statutory indexation of the exempt amount, which will rise in 1985-86 to £5,900, these changes will remove some 15,000 taxpayers from liability altogether. Increasingly, the tax will be levied on real and not inflationary gains. With these reforms, I believe that the tax is now on a broadly acceptable and sustainable basis. The combined cost of the threefold reform I have announced is £155 million in a full year; but none of it falls in 1985-86.

I turn next to the stamp duties. Following widespread consultation, I have decided that the time has come to simplify and modernise these ancient duties. I propose in this Budget to sweep away 15 separate duties, including the contract note duty and the 1 per cent. duty on gifts. Altogether, the changes I am proposing should reduce by over 40 per cent. the number of documents which require to be stamped.

My final proposal for reform concerns development land tax. This is a particularly complex tax, which was introduced in response to the problem of soaring land values at a time of high inflation. Its chief practical effect is to discourage the bringing forward of land for development. This disincentive effect will grow as the gap widens between the 60 per cent. rate of development land tax and a corporation tax rate which is on the way down to 35 per cent.

I have therefore decided to abolish development land tax altogether, with immediate effect. At the same time, I propose to cancel all deferred charges under the tax. The net cost will be some £20 million in 1985-86 and £50 million in a full year. That compares, incidentally, with a collection cost of some £5 million a year. Development gains will, of course, continue to be subject to income tax, corporation tax and capital gains tax, in the same way as any other income or capital gains.

The abolition of development land tax will, I am sure, be especially welcomed by the building and construction industry. It will also remove no fewer than 200 pages of highly complex legislation from the statute book. This follows the abolition of the national insurance surcharge and the investment income surcharge in last year's Budget —three unwanted taxes swept away in two years.

BUSINESS TAXATION

I now turn to other aspects of business taxation. It cannot be repeated too often that it is businesses and not Governments that create jobs. The Government's responsibility is to foster the conditions which will encourage businesses to grow and to create more jobs. The measures I have to announce are designed with that end in view.

First, on corporation tax, the reforms I announced last year set out a new and improved framework of business taxation for the remainder of this Parliament and beyond, so this year I have only limited changes to make. A full list is, of course, contained in the Red Book.

As I promised last year, I have reviewed the scientific research allowance. Given the particular importance of expenditure on research and development if British industry is to hold its own in a competitive world, I have decided, exceptionally, not to reduce that allowance in line with the changes in the other capital allowances. A few minor changes apart, the scientific research allowance will remain at 100 per cent.

I have also decided to modify the new capital allowance system as it applies to short-life assets. While the new structure of capital allowances enables most plant and machinery to be written off over a period that more than fairly reflects its useful life, I accept that there is a problem with those assets which enjoy only a short life, in particular high technology assets.

Accordingly, from next year, a business will be able to exclude from its general pool of capital expenditure any asset which it believes will have only a short life, so that, if the asset is subsequently scrapped after, say, four years, it will be fully written off for tax over that period. I believe that this change will be widely welcomed. The benefit to business could rise to about £300 million in the early 1990s.

I now turn to a number of other detailed measures affecting business.

The number of employee share schemes has increased from 30 when we first took office in 1979 to some 850 today. The whole-hearted commitment of employees to the success of the companies in which they work is vital to our country's economic future. To maintain and build on this progress, I propose to reduce the retention period for profit-sharing schemes from seven years to five.

I propose to take action to deal with tax avoidance by partnerships, following the consultative document issued last year.

In my last Budget, I removed a competitive disadvantage to British manufacturers by levying VAT on imports. I have decided to modify the new regime in two respects.

First, I propose to relieve from VAT certain goods which are imported into this country solely for repair, or for processing which does not change their identity, and are then re-exported to their owners overseas. Secondly, goods which are temporarily exported from the United Kingdom and then reimported after repair or processing abroad, will bear VAT only on the value of the repair or processing. These reliefs will take effect on 1 June and have a once-for-all cost in 1985-86 of £30 million.

I propose to introduce secondary legislation to remove the constraint imposed by the Banking Act, which at present prevents companies from financing themselves by a series of issues of short-term securities. That should provide a useful alternative to bank borrowing.

I have no major new proposals this year on the taxation of North sea oil. I have reviewed the economics of incremental investment in existing fields, but I have not been persuaded that there is a case for introducing new fiscal reliefs at this stage. My only proposal for change, apart for some minor technical measures, is to remove immediate petroleum revenue tax relief for onshore exploration and appraisal expenditure. Onshore activities are sufficiently low-cost not to need that special incentive.

In last year's Budget statement, I mentioned the Government's concern at the spread of unitary taxation within the United States, and the threat that this posed to the US subsidiaries of British companies. Since then, I am glad to note that several American states have abolished unitary taxation; but in others, notably California, no change has yet been made. We shall continue to press for action to be taken this year, and fully support the campaign being waged by the CBI and others on this issue.

Finally, I turn to a group of measures of particular importance to smaller businesses and the self-employed, a sector of the economy where an increasing proportion of the jobs of the future is likely to be found.

I have already announced a substantial reform of the capital gains tax. In addition, I propose to implement many of the proposals contained in last year's consultative document on capital gains tax retirement relief, notably to reduce the age for full relief to 60 and to extend relief to those who are obliged by ill health to retire before that age. This relief is particularly important to the proprietors of small businesses concerned at the capital gains tax they might have to pay when they come to sell their business on retirement.

Although the business expansion scheme has been in existence only two years, it has already made an impressive contribution to the promotion and growth of new businesses. Last year, almost 20,000 people took advantage of the tax reliefs offered by the business expansion scheme to invest some £100 million in more than 500 companies. Over half of this went to provide equity capital for new businesses.

I have two changes to propose. The scheme was designed to encourage investment by individuals in new and expanding businesses in risk areas. Accordingly, I propose to include within the scheme companies formed to carry out research and development. By the same token I propose to exclude from the scheme certain ventures which primarily involve property development. Building and construction will, of course, continue to be a qualifying trade.

Last year I undertook to review the scope of VAT relief for bad debts, a matter of considerable concern to small businesses. In the light of legislation now proceeding in another place on the reform of the insolvency law, I propose to widen the scope of the existing relief. The new rules will take effect as soon as the provisions of the Insolvency Bill are implemented, and will cost some £25 million in a full year.

I propose to increase the VAT threshold to £19,500 from midnight tonight.

Over the past five years, the ranks of the self-employed have risen by well over half a million, or some 30 per cent., and the growth in self-employment has been a particularly marked feature of the encouraging growth in overall employment that has occured since the spring of 1983.

However, the self-employed suffer from one long-standing grievance so far as tax is concerned. While the national insurance contribution paid by an employee cannot be set against tax, the national insurance contribution paid by the employer on the employee's behalf can. Yet none of the national insurance contribution paid by the self-employed can be set against tax at all.

Today I propose to remedy this grievance. As from 6 April, tax relief will be allowed for half the graduated class 4 national insurance contribution paid by the self-employed. In addition, I have agreed with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services that, as from the beginning of October, the flat rate class 2 national insurance contribution payable by the self-employed will be reduced from £4·75 to £3·50 a week. The benefit of these reliefs to the self-employed will be £55 million in 1985-86 and £155 million in a full year.

All this adds up to a substantial package of measures to help small business and the self-employed, which I am sure the whole House will welcome.

PERSONAL TAXATION: TAXES ON SPENDING

I turn now to the taxation of personal income and spending. My Budget last year shifted some of the burden of personal taxation from earnings to spending. Today I propose to make a further move in this direction. Accordingly, I propose to increase the revenue from the excise duties by rather more than is required simply to keep pace with inflation—a less painful task now that inflation is relatively low.

I propose to increase the duty on cigarettes and hand-rolling tobacco by the equivalent, including VAT, of 6p on a packet of 20 cigarettes. This will take effect from midnight on Thursday. I do not, however, propose any increase at all in the duties on cigars and pipe tobacco.

I propose increases which, including VAT, will put between 1p and 2p a pint on most beer, depending on its strength, 1p a pint on cider, 6p on a bottle of table wine and about 10p a bottle on sparkling or fortified wine. In recognition of the current difficulties of the Scotch whisky industry, however, I propose to increase the duty on spirits by only 10p a bottle, well below the amount needed to keep pace with inflation. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] All these changes take effect from midnight tonight.

I propose to increase the duty on petrol and derv by amounts which, including VAT, will raise the price at the pumps by approximately 4p and 3½p a gallon respectively. This does no more than keep pace with inflation. These increases will take effect from 6 o'clock this evening. As last year, I do not propose any change in the duty on heavy fuel oil.

I propose this year, however, to raise more revenue from the vehicle excise duty. For cars and light vans the duty will go up by £10 to £100. On the advice of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, the pattern of duty on lorries will be changed to correspond more closely to the amount of wear and tear that they cause to the roads. While there will be substantial increases in duty for some of the heaviest rigid lorries, for most lorries the rates will remain unchanged.

These changes in the excise duty will, all told, raise an extra £820 million in 1985-86, some £235 million more than is required to keep pace with inflation. The overall impact effect on the retail price index of these changes will be 0·5 per cent. This has already been taken into account in the forecast that I have given the House of 5 per cent. inflation by the end of the year.

I now turn to VAT. I have followed with interest the speculation that has built up over recent months about my alleged intentions for VAT. Most of it—such as the so-called proposal to levy VAT on books—has concerned matters which have not even been under consideration. But to have revealed this prematurely would not have stilled speculation; it would merely have concentrated it on those matters that were under consideration — a practice that no Chancellor, rightly, has sought to encourage.

I can now inform the House that, apart from one change I shall be proposing today, I do not intend to make any further extensions of the VAT base during the lifetime of this Parliament. This is, of course, a field in which European Community law has to be reckoned with and where we are bound by our treaty obligations, but as the House will be aware, where we are currently under challenge, we are vigorously fighting our case.

The one extension I propose to make concerns newspapers and magazines. At present, while all other advertising is taxed, newspapers and magazine advertising is not. There is no justification for this anomaly. It is one thing to maintain that newspapers and magazines should not be liable to VAT: quite another to argue that those who advertise in them should enjoy a similar immunity. Accordingly, I propose that, from 1 May, newspaper and magazine advertising should be subject to VAT. This will raise £30 million in 1985-86 and £50 million in a full year.

I also propose to change the VAT treatment of credit cards and similar payment cards—a part of the financial sector which has enjoyed exceptional growth over the past few years. I propose that, from 1 May, transactions between the companies providing the cards and outlets which accept them should be classified as exempt. This means that the companies will not be able to recover VAT in respect of such transactions. This will raise £15 million in 1985-86 and £20 million in a full year. It should not directly affect the charges made to card holders.

I also have a modest VAT concession to make. I have decided to extend the existing VAT relief for medical or scientific equipment bought with donated funds for use in hospitals and the like to cover computer equipment for certain medical uses. Customs and Excise will be announcing the precise details of the relief, which will take effect from 1 May.

Following extensive consultations, I propose to include in this year's Finance Bill legislation to implement most of the recommendations of the first two volumes of the Keith report on the enforcement powers of the revenue departments, including measures to deal with the problem of the late payment of VAT. This is expected to bring in extra revenue of about £50 million in 1985-86. By 1988-89, there will have been a cumulative once-for-all revenue gain of about £600 million. Proposals on the Inland Revenue aspects of the Keith report will follow in next year's Finance Bill.

The VAT changes I have just proposed will bring in £90 million in 1985-86, rising eventually to £215 million in a full year. They will have no impact on the RPI. The additional revenue raised from the excise duties and VAT taken together will help me to lighten the burden of income tax.

PERSONAL TAXATION: INCOME TAX

Before turning to income tax, I should briefly mention capital transfer tax. Since 1979, the burden of this tax has been very significantly reduced, and I propose to maintain that position this year by raising the threshold and rate bands set last year in line with statutory indexation. In addition, I propose to widen the scope of the existing exemption for amenity land surrounding a house of outstanding heritage quality. I am sure that this will be welcomed by all those concerned with the preservation of our national heritage.

I now turn to income tax. On 6 April, the banks will move over to the composite rate system for the payment of tax on bank interest. I now need to legislate to put the corresponding composite rate payments by building societies on a similar footing, starting next year. This will not produce any additional revenue. As an administrative saving, I also propose to legislate this year to bring new loans above the mortgage interest relief ceiling into the MIRAS system by April 1987. The ceiling itself will remain at £30,000 for 1985-86.

I need to set the 1986-87 car benefit scales for those whose employers provide them with the use of a car. As last year, I propose to increase both the car and fuel scales by 10 per cent. with effect from April 1986. This will still leave the scale levels well short of the true value of the benefit.

To give further help to charities, I propose to increase from £5,000 to £10,000 the limit to which relief at the higher rates of tax is allowed for covenants.

I now turn to my main income tax proposals. I propose to make no change this year in the rates of income tax. Once again, I believe that it is right to concentrate most of the limited resources at my disposal on raising the starting point for tax. Increases in the basic tax thresholds benefit all taxpayers, but they give proportionately more help to those on low incomes. This year, a Budget for jobs and for enterprise has to give high priority to raising the tax thresholds.

The statutory indexation formula means that I should increase all the principal income tax allowances and bands by 4·6 per cent., which is the increase in the RPI over the year to last December, and then rounded up. For the higher rate thresholds and bands I propose this year to do just that. The first higher rate of 40 per cent. will be reached at a taxable income of £16,200 and the top rate of 60 per cent. will apply to taxable income above £40,200.

For the basic thresholds I can do more. Statutory indexation would imply an increase in the single person's allowance of £100. I propose to increase it by precisely twice as much — £200 — from £2,005 to £2,205. Statutory indexation would imply an increase in the married man's allowance of £150. Again, I propose to raise it by precisely twice as much—£300—from £3,155 to £3,455.

I propose to increase the age allowances this year by the same cash amount as the corresponding basic allowances. Thus the single age allowance will rise by £200 from £2,490 to £2,690 and the married age allowance will go up by £300 from £3,955 to £4,255.

These increases mean that most single people will enjoy an income tax cut of at least £1·15 a week and most married couples an income tax cut of at least £1·73 a week. Some 800,000 people on low incomes — 100,000 of them widows—who would have paid tax if thresholds had not been increased, will pay no tax at all in 1985-86. That is almost twice as many as would have been taken out of tax had the allowances merely been indexed.

The income tax changes I have announced today will take effect under PAYE on the first pay day after 17 May. Their cost is considerable: £1·6 billion in 1985-86, of which roughly half represents the cost of indexation.

The increase in the basic allowances of almost 10 per cent., or some 5 per cent. in real terms, means that for 1985-86 they will be more than 20 per cent. higher in real terms than they were in 1978-79, Labour's last year.

NATIONAL INSURANCE CONTRIBUTIONS

I have one last proposal to make. I have already set out the broad lines of the Government's strategy to improve the prospects for jobs. I have described a number of measures to improve training, remove legislative barriers to employment, and stimulate enterprise; and I have also raised tax thresholds substantially for the second year running; but I want to do more to improve job prospects for young people and the unskilled, among whom the problem of unemployment is most severe.

I have concluded that an effective response to this problem must include direct action in two related areas — to cut the costs of employing the young and unskilled, and to sharpen their own incentive to work at wages which employers can afford to pay.

I am therefore proposing, in collaboration with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, a radical reform of the structure of national insurance contributions. The essential features of the contributory principle will be preserved. The changes will affect both employers' and employees' contributions.

Given the limited resources at my disposal, I cannot afford this year to make a further substantial reduction in the overall burden of employment costs, following the abolition of the national insurance surcharge in last year's Budget. I therefore propose to abolish the upper earnings limit for the employer's national insurance contribution, which for 1985-86 has been set at £265 a week.

Under existing arrangements, an employer pays in national insurance the same cash sum, which for the coming year would be roughly £28 a week, for all employees above the upper earnings limit, regardless of whether the employee is paid £15,000 a year or £50,000 a year. Under the new and arguably fairer scheme I am now proposing, the employer's liability will be the same flat 10·45 per cent. of earnings as at present applies below the upper earnings limit.

The £800 million raised by this change in a full year enables me to make a substantial reduction in the cost of employing people at the lower end of the earnings scale. There, instead of the uniform 10·45 per cent., I propose to introduce a system of graduated rates.

As now, there will be no national insurance payable for those earning below the lower earnings limit, which for 1985-86 has been set at £35·50 a week, broadly in line with the single person's pension, but for employees earning between this and £55 a week, the employer will in future have to pay only 5 per cent. instead of 10·45 per cent.; for employees earning between £55 a week and £90 a week the new rate for employers will be 7 per cent.; and for those earning between £90 and £130 a week, the employer will pay 9 per cent. The full employers' rate of 10·45 per cent. will apply only for those earning over £130 a week.

These changes represent substantial reductions in the cost of employing the lower paid. They will significantly improve the flexibility of the labour market and the prospects for jobs. I recognise that employers cannot be expected to welcome the increased cost of employing higher paid workers, but for business and industry as a whole the increase in the cost of the higher paid will be fully offset—indeed it will be more than offset—by the reduced cost of employing lower paid workers.

Moreover, I propose to introduce a similar system of graduated national insurance contribution rates for the employees themselves at the lower end of the earnings scale. At present, those earning more than the lower earnings limit pay a flat rate of 9 per cent. on total earnings up to the upper earnings limit, and nothing on any amount they may earn above that limit.

This system makes national insurance contributions a particularly heavy burden for the low paid. I propose that, in future, those earning between £35·50 and £55 a week pay at the rate of 5 per cent. and those earning between £55 and £90 a week 7 per cent. Only those who earn above £90 a week will be liable to the full 9 per cent. on their earnings. However, I do not propose to abolish the upper earnings limit for employees' contributions. It is an integral part of the contributory system on which their benefit entitlement is based. Moreover, if it were abolished, those on the higher rates of income tax would face unacceptably high combined marginal rates, taking into account liability to both tax and national insurance contributions.

The changes I have proposed represent a substantial reduction in the burden of national insurance contributions on lower paid employees. In addition, as I have already indicated, I propose a corresponding reduction in the contributions paid by the self-employed. The flate rate class 2 contributions, as I have already said, will be reduced from £4·75 to £3·50 a week.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services will include legislation to give effect to this restructuring of national insurance contributions in the Social Security Bill now before Parliament, and I expect the new rates to take effect from the beginning of October. I should make it clear that these changes are not intended to affect benefit rights, and new rules will be introduced to protect those rights. Nor will the changes affect arrangements for the contracted-out rebate.

The overall cost of these changes will be £450 million in a full year, made up of £80 million less in employers' contributions, £270 million less in employees' contributions, and £100 million less in contributions from the self-employed. In 1985-86 the total cost will be £160 million.

The effect on job prospects will, over time, be substantial. The radical restructuring I have announced will encourage employers to take on the young and unskilled and give them, in turn, an incentive to seek work at wages that employers can afford. The cost of employing some 8½ million people on earnings of less than £130 a week will be reduced by almost £900 million in a full year. It will cost an employer £3 a week less to employ a young person or unskilled worker at just below £90 a week, and the take-home pay of some 3½ million people with earnings up to this level will be further increased, on top of the significant real increases in income tax thresholds I have already announced. Thus, a single youngster on just under £90 a week will pay about £1·80 a week less in national insurance on top of the reduction in his income tax bill of £1·15 a week—an overall increase in take-home pay of almost £3 a week.

The reduction in the total burden on the low paid—income tax plus employers' and employees' national insurance contributions combined — is even more dramatic. For someone on £80 a week it is cut by up to 30 per cent., and at £50 a week it is cut in half.

These are changes of a major order. They amount to a direct and powerful attack on disincentives to employment. They tackle the problem of unemployment where it is most acute. They complete my Budget for jobs.

CONCLUSION

In this Budget, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have reaffirmed the Government's commitment to the defeat of inflation through the maintenance of sound money. I have made further radical proposals for taxation and national insurance, and abolished outright a third tax. In collaboration with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Employment, for Education and for Social Services, I have proposed a coherent and wide-ranging set of measures to promote new jobs. I commend this Budget to the House.

PROVISIONAL COLLECTION OF TAXES

Motion made, and Question,

5.7 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): The custom is for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be congratulated on his Budget. A Chancellor who is able to cut down on his previous year's delivery time to a new "low" of one hour 12 minutes this year deserves to be congratulated.

There are certain aspects of the Budget which can immediately be commended. First, the Chancellor has relented about the changes in capital allowances, especially on scientific equipment and short-life investment goods. It is also appropriate for the Chancellor to receive support for making life easier for the self-employed who have to retire early through ill health. Most of all, we commend the Chancellor for the changes that he has made to national insurance contributions by both employers and employees. The cheers that were heard when he announced these changes were rather louder from the Opposition than they were from the Conservative Benches. Indeed, there was what could be called a deafening silence on the Conservative Benches, probably because the Chancellor's proposals were all contained in the Labour party manifesto for the 1983 general election.

It is a shame that the Chancellor has taken so long to make these changes, despite the appeals to do so that were made well before the last general election; appeals which have been repeated by me and by my right hon. Friends since then. Who knows how many jobs might have been saved if successive Chancellors had taken the opportunity to reduce the national insurance contributions, especially since this Government raised them by 50 per cent. after they took office in 1979.

There is much that is deserving of detailed attention and comment in this Budget, and I have no doubt that many of my right hon. and hon. Friends will want to do that. It is not the custom of the House that, in the speech immediately following the Chancellor, I should go into what could be called the nitty-gritty.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Tebbit): Just as well for the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Kinnock: That was the nitty-gritty speaking. There is no one nittier and grittier than the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

The Chancellor deserves the courtesies that go with clearly having spent considerable time and energy on making his Budget and compiling his speech. The right hon. Gentleman has clearly put a lot of work into the Budget. The problem is that it is highly unlikely that a lot of work will come out of the Budget.

The Chancellor's advertisers, and, indeed, the Chancellor himself today, have repeatedly used the phrase "a Budget for jobs." Indeed, we have heard something even stronger. We heard the Chancellor referring to the scourge of unemployment and the evil of unemployment. Let us hope that that is a harbinger for much bigger actions in future to deal effectively with unemployment.

We have heard all about Budgets for jobs before. We heard it last year. In one of the dying phrases of his speech last year the Chancellor talked about the Budget for jobs, and in the succeeding year unemployment in Britain increased by 143,000. That has been the case in each of the other six Budgets for jobs that have come from the Chancellor and his precedessor. All that we have seen after each of those Budgets for jobs has been a remorseless increase in unemployment from 1·25 million to the now registered 3·25 million, but actual 4 million unemployed in Britain.

On that basis, sadly, the Budget will fail Britain again. Unemployment in Britain is higher now than ever before, and it has stayed higher for longer than ever before. It is more worrying to more people, both the employed and the unemployed, than it has ever been before. It is more financially and socially expensive and wasteful than it has ever been before. Action to fight unemployment is more necessary than it ever has been before.

I know that Conservative Members are not too keen on listening to the unemployed—at least, not to all of them—but perhaps those who are keen on listening to the unemployed, on trying to relate to them and on campaigning on their behalf, can prevail upon their colleagues to ensure that we get that action which is more necessary than ever before. Unfortunately, little that the Chancellor said this afternoon properly recognises or responds to the unemployment which is higher, has lasted longer and is more worrying than ever before.

We have heard the propositions that relate to the youth training scheme, to the community programme and to an expansion—although we did not hear exactly how much—of in-service teacher training. Let me say this about the YTS proposals, as far as we could distinguish them. The right hon. Gentleman talked about unemployment not being an option. That sounds like an encouraging phrase, but from the lips of the Government it is an ominous phrase, especially since we heard of the net costs of the scheme. Therefore, we are forced to conclude that there is a strong likelihood that the Government will withdraw benefit entitlement from young unemployed people who do not find themselves suited by training schemes or who cannot get work or education, and who therefore want to use unemployment benefit for the purpose for which it was originally paid at the beginning of the century—to look for work.

Are the Government proposing—I shall gladly give way to have my question answered — to withdraw entitlement to benefit from unemployed young people? If they are, it will be a repeat of a tragic part of our history.

[Mr. Kinnock]

My father went to a training camp for training in the 1930s. The penalty for not doing so was withdrawal of his dole. It may be that, 50 years later, the youngsters of our generation are being offered exactly the same—absence of options, reduction of freedom—as a consequence of not wanting to undertake the form of forced training which the Government will be operating. Are we to have a conscriptive scheme? Are we to have a coercive scheme? Or are young people to retain their entitlement to benefit if they want to look for jobs, as well as getting any advantages that go with the expansion of the youth training scheme? The whole country and every youngster in it will want to know the answer to that question.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): Had I any new proposals to make on that front, they would have been contained in my speech.

Mr. Kinnock: We are now looking for an undertaking from the Government, and we shall press this continually, that, having not made or proposed any such changes today —if that is what the Chancellor means—no changes will forbid the payment of benefit to unemployed youngsters. That would be an elementary injustice and the young people of Britain would not tolerate it. They want jobs, education and training. They do not want to take those under coercion, and the Chancellor and other Ministers had better get hold of that.

We have heard about the Government's policy on wages councils. That is about the most squalid of all the Government's policies on the labour market. We are being told that the real inhibition to the development of our economy is the £1·19 an hour that is offered by the hairdressing wages council, or the £1·70 an hour that is guaranteed by the catering wages council. If they were enforced there might be something more to be said, but last year inspectors made 10,000 notifications that employers had broken the regulations of the wages councils, and two prosecutions arose out of them. If the right hon. Gentleman is concerned about personal freedom, good labour markets and decent employer-employee relations he should be getting those inspectors to enforce the law as it has stood since 1919 and as it has been upheld by successive Tory and Labour Governments.

What the country really needed today from the Budget was expansion, opportunity, justice, enterprise, and, most of all, jobs. This stagnant Chancellor has, in the face of all those requirements, simply given us a stalemate Budget which gives with one hand and takes away with the other, and which even threatens to jeopardise freedoms which have been narrowed over recent years.

The Chancellor has today again turned his back on millions of our fellow citizens who are unemployed and millions who are poor. He has turned his back and waddled away from them, and he will not be forgiven for doing that. He has only just started to wake up to the fact that the assistance necessary to sponsor growth in this economy is a direct obligation of Government.

Nobody claims that recovery can come only from Governments. Nobody claims that Governments must bear the full responsibility. But modern Governments can and must create the conditions in which what the Chancellor called the evil or scourge of unemployment can be fought effectively and vanquished by the Government and those prepared to assist them.

The fact is that there is no need for the Chancellor to insist on maintaining the course, as he put it. There are real and realistic alternatives. Those real and realistic alternatives have been put to him by the CBI, the road hauliers, the construction industry, the TUC, the National Economic Development Council and by a great chunk of the Conservative party in the House and throughout the country. They were put to him long before others by the Opposition.

The very least that the Chancellor could have done today was to announce that he was prepared to provide an additional £3,500 million for investment and repair in housing, roads, sewerage systems, gas and electricity supply industries, training and research and development. He could have done that. He was prepared to find £2·5 billion to fight the miners. Why is he not prepared to do it to fight unemployment? That would show a real sense of priority on the part of the Government, and the jobs generated in those spheres as they have been listed by us and by others would be real jobs, not make-work schemes, not cosmetic covers for the unemployment figures. They would all be true contributions to the efficiency, safety and fairness of our society and our economy.

The cost of not undertaking that major task of repair and development will only get higher as time goes on. The bills will only be bigger if that action is neglected now. The Prime Minister is fond of telling us that we must not maintain borrowing because we do not want to leave a debt to our children. It is very strange that the right hon. Lady is prepared to leave them a legacy of decay and danger because the Government will not undertake the proper expenditure now. Somehow she does not care that, by not spending, she and her Government are not only creating problems now but are creating despair for our children, about whom I know she cares. That is what the Government are doing by showing their willingness to borrow to maintain unemployment instead of borrowing to undertake new investment and provide new employment.

When employers, industrialists, analysts, councillors, the Opposition parties and the Conservative party in substantial and increasing measure tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he is wrong, what makes him think that he knows best? It cannot be his record, can it?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is the parent of the medium-term financial strategy, the great design that was supposed to set and to keep "financial discipline"—as the right hon. Gentleman likes to put it — in the economy. Since they introduced that strategy in the 1980 Budget, the Government have destroyed 1·25 million more jobs than even they planned to destroy. In that process they have spent 10 per cent. more money than they intended to spend. They have printed 20 per cent. more money than they planned to print. They have borrowed £20,000 million more than under that medium-term financial strategy they planned to borrow.

The Chancellor's brainchild of a strategy was intended to bring "a significant reduction," as the document put it, in interest rates. Instead, real interest rates have been at record levels for record periods of time and, in periods of that time, have been 50 per cent. higher than they were under the previous Labour Government.

The right hon. Gentleman is the first Chancellor to have presided throughout his whole term of office over a manufactured trade deficit. He has presided over a bigger fall in the value of the pound than any other Chancellor in British history. He is the man who thinks that we have a recovery when we have 4 million unemployed. He is the man who thinks that in this technological revolution Britain can depend on jobs which, as he has previously put it,

"are not so much low tech as no tech".

He is the man who told the House last July that the expenditure on the miners' dispute—£2·5 billion—was a "worthwhile investment for Britain". This is the man who will not recognise that the ruinous cost of maintaining unemployment in Britain is the greatest single factor blocking even his desire, his plans, for durable growth, stability and confidence in our country. He has got himself into the position where even his own plans for tax reform and tax cuts are sabotaged by his own policies of higher unemployment.

This is the man who told us on Sunday, in his interview with Mr. Harris in The Observer, that is necessary because it is "exactly the same with a country"

"financial discipline"

as it is for

"any housewife".

Would any housewife leave holes in the roof for want of some borrowing in order to undertake repairs? Would any housewife deliberately keep her grown-up children at home out of work rather than help them to get a job in the future? Would any housewife give money to a rich uncle rather than give anything that she had to spare to poor parents? Housewives would not do that, but that is exactly what the Government do.

All those distorted priorities, all that neglect of unemployment, all those wasted resources, all the meanness towards the poor and the old, are features of this Government. That is their "financial discipline", and it would not be the financial discipline of any ordinary housewife in the land. The result of those policies is that there are more poor people living in deeper poverty in our country now than for decades past, and the Chancellor has done nothing truly effective to help them today.

The higher tax thresholds and the pension and benefit increases which can be anticipated this year will not even keep those who depend upon those incomes at the levels at which they are now, because the Government's policy of increasing water, gas and electricity charges rents, rates, transport fares and prescription charges and the petrol rises will eradicate in short order any benefit that comes from those increases. Indeed, today, a week after we heard of the £2 prescription, we have the £2 gallon of petrol, and everybody knows exactly what the knock-on effect of that will be.

This country needed a Budget for jobs and for justice. Britain needed a Budget for investment and for modernisation, a Budget which would help people to help themselves. That is the Budget which the Opposition would offer now and which people throughout this country want, because they recognise that it is a vital obligation of the Government to sponsor recovery.

The Chancellor has responded to the deeply felt needs of the country by more of the policies that have already brought idleness and injustice on a massive scale. This Budget will not give scope for improvement, and it will not arrest or reverse the decline or decay in our economy and our society. It is not a Budget for healing divisions, for householders, for business, for giving security to the old, or for giving real opportunity and support to the young. Indeed, it is not even a Budget which could reasonably be expected, if there were any serious competition from within the Government, to save the career of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The right hon. Gentleman has told us that he has battened down the hatches and is staying on course. He is not on course. He is travelling in circles and sinking all the time. In this coming year we want the people of conscience and courage who exist on the other side of the House to join us to stop the right hon. Gentleman dragging our country down with him.

Mr. David Knox (Staffordshire, Moorlands): I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on his presentation. I have heard more exciting Budget speeches, but I certainly have not heard a briefer one. I regard both those remarks as complimentary because, in common with many people, particularly outside the House, I am getting a bit tired of excitement from Chancellors of the Exchequer. All such excitement does is to cause confusion and extra work and undermine the activities of people who are trying to run business and commerce in this country.

I commend my right hon. Friend on his brevity, too. In the past, I have listened to some very long and boring Budget speeches, and I prefer the shorter version.

I must confess that there were rather more items in the Budget which I found myself able to welcome than I had anticipated. I welcome very stongly the substantial increases in the thresholds for income tax, particularly for those at the bottom end. That is a welcome element of social justice.

I welcome also the changes in the employer's national insurance contribution. It will be fairer than the existing system; and fairness, or an appearance of fairness, is most important. The excise duty increases this year are tolerable, and, as one who enjoys a glass of whisky, I find the increased duty on a bottle of whisky almost reasonable. I am pleased, too, that the VAT threshold has been increased, though my right hon. Friend might have increased it by somewhat more than he has.

I am sure that all hon. Members join me in welcoming the fact that there is to be no change in the tax treatment of pension funds. It is unfortunate, however, that the Chancellor did not make this apparent some time ago. Much concern was caused to people by speculation about what might happen to pension funds. Among them were many who were looking forward to retirement and who were wondering what they would receive and whether it would be as much as they had anticipated.

Firms were also concerned because they anticipated that they might have to introduce pension fund changes which would result in increased costs to them. Thus, although I welcome the fact that there is to be no change, it is unfortunate that that was not made clear earlier.

I welcome the fact that there is to be no VAT on books, newspapers, journals, children's shoes and children's clothes—all items about which we heard much in recent weeks. I have no great objection to VAT being levied on newspaper advertising, because that would merely bring it into line with other forms of advertising.

I welcome the promised Green Paper on the reform of income tax. I hope that it will lead to a measure of integration between income tax and benefits. That has been needed for a long time, and I hope that we shall start more positively on that road as a result of the publication of the Green Paper.

I come to some of the wider issues of economic policy which arise from the Budget. The principal economic problem facing Britain today is unemployment, and on its effects on unemployment the Budget will ultimately be judged, and rightly so. The Chancellor claims that it is a Budget for jobs. I hope that I shall be proved wrong, but I fear that it falls short of what is required to make a real impact on unemployment. I say that, first, because the Chancellor did not give details of any plans to try to stabilise the international monetary situation, and, secondly, because he has done nothing to increase substantially the level of domestic demand.

In the first 25 years after the war we had relative stability in exchange rates under the terms of the Bretton Woods agreement. There was, therefore, a stable international economic order under which countries, co-operating with one another, could rebuild, develop and expand their economies. That provided Britain with the conditions which made it possible to operate the economy more efficiently and effectively than at any time in our history.

In the early 1970s, through no fault of ours, Bretton Woods broke down. Unfortunately, it is not possible to recreate it. However, the most important action that the Government should be taking today is to work with our friends, particularly in the European Community, to create a greater measure of economic stability in the world, for there is no chance of permanent economic recovery so long as the present economic chaos remains.

The fact that the pound is worth about half what it was worth against the American dollar four years ago and that its value has declined by about a third in the last 18 months, with all the disruption to our domestic economy that that has caused, is evidence of the urgent need for action to reduce fluctuations in exchange rates. Continual changes in the value of sterling are more damaging to our economy than high or low exchange rates, damaging though the latter can be.

Immediate unilateral action which Britain could take, which would have beneficial results, is to join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. That would provide us with a degree of stability for 60 per cent. of our trade. It would be a step forward which would make it easier for the countries of the European Community to speak with one voice in international economic affairs and to take initiatives towards the reintroduction of greater international economic stability, particularly in terms of initiatives with the United States and Japan.

We shall of course, be told that the time is not right for Britain to join the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS and that membership would restrict our freedom of manoeuvre. The absurdity of that argument is shown only too clearly when one asks, "What freedon of manoeuvre?"; because there is none and there has been none for some time.

Even though nothing has been said about that today, I hope that there will be an early announcement that Britain is to join the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS and that then, with our friends in the Community, we shall use the consequent international economic muscle to try to bring about a greater measure of economic stability in the world. That would benefit the economies of every nation. That is important for Britain because, without it, our domestic economy will inevitably remain weak and unemployment will remain at an unacceptable level.

An improvement in the world economy, though an essential prerequisite to strengthening the British economy, will not cure our economic problems or of itself bring back full employment. It will require a substantial increase in the level of demand in the British domestic economy to take up the slack and bring people back into employment.

It is nonsense to suggest that insufficiency of demand is not one of the main causes of unemployment. Usually that is argued on the basis of anecdotal evidence of some prosperous people and rising consumer sales. If demand were increased and the unemployed brought back into employment, more people would become prosperous, the already prosperous would become more prosperous and consumer spending would be even higher, quite simply because there would be more to share around.

Demand will not rise automatically. Only the Government can make it rise other than marginally. It can be done by reducing taxation while not decreasing public expenditure or by increasing public expenditure while not increasing taxation, or by a mixture of the two. In other words, the Government can increase demand by increasing the public sector borrowing requirement. There is plenty of slack in the economy today in terms of unused or under-utilised capital and labour to enable that to happen without any inflationary danger.

Only adherence to the now discredited theories of monetarism and to the medium-term financial strategy has prevented the Chancellor from increasing the PSBR today. He should have cut taxes by more than he proposes or, preferably, in present circumstances, announced a substantial programme of public investment in the infrastructure. That is desperately needed and it would have been of great benefit to the hard-hit construction industry and those who work in it.

The effects of the tax cuts that the Chancellor announced are peanuts compared with the measures that should have been taken to enable us to return once again to full employment. It is no good thinking that tax incentives for businesses, schemes to encourage the establishment of new small businesses or other measures to improve the supply side—however admirable these may be in themselves and however useful they may be in the long term—will have any effect on the overall employment level in the absence of an increase in demand. Those measures will only attract jobs to particular areas, types of production or types of firm at the expense of jobs elsewhere. Jobs exist only when there is a demand for what is produced. Without that demand, there are no jobs. Without increased total effective demand in the economy as a whole, there cannot be significantly more jobs in the economy as a whole, and unemployment will remain at its present unacceptably high level.

The same is true of tax incentives to individuals. There is no evidence that the tax incentives introduced in the 1979 Budget have had any effect on unemployment, although they might have had a beneficial effect if they had been accommpanied by an increase in total effective demand. The changes announced by my right hon. Friend concerning the community programme and training are, of course, welcome, but they do not involve the creation of real jobs. The numbers involved will be small and there will be a marginal improvement in the unemployed statistics, but not much more than that.

If we really want to bring the vast army of the unemployed back to work, we must aim to increase the rate of economic growth. The Chancellor's projected rate of growth for the coming year is just over 3 per cent. which, if achieved, will have no impact on unemployment, which will continue at about its present level. A real Budget for jobs would have aimed at a growth rate of 6 or 7 per cent. which, given the degree of slack in the economy, would have been sustainable for many years. That would have involved a substantial increase in the public sector borrowing requirement which would have been manageable because of our present volume of savings. I regret the fact that that has not been done. I am afraid that the Chancellor's Budget judgment leaves much to be desired.

5.42 pm

Mr. Gregor MacKenzie (Glasgow, Rutherglen): Over the years, you and I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have heard a number of Budget speeches. This one had the merit of being short in length, but it was also rather short on ideas. This Budget had been much heralded as a Budget for jobs. Like the hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) I worry about that aspect. If this was a Budget for jobs, goodness knows what it would have been like if it had been a Budget for something else. It strikes me that the Chancellor has not got to the core of the issue that worries every one of us—unemployment.

Sometimes Chancellors forget that government is about people. Sometimes they forget that Budgets are about people and that, these days, people are more concerned about their jobs and the jobs of their children than about any other aspect of life. They are concerned that their young people should have jobs. For all this talk about YTS and so on, people want their families to have real jobs which are created by industry with the assistance of the Government. There is no point in giving a young person some sort of training for a couple of years only to throw that young person onto the scrap heap at the end of the period. Unemployment should loom much larger in the Chancellor's mind than it did in his speech today.

The Chancellor seems to forget totally the social evils brought about by unemployment. Frequently we listen to the Prime Minister moralising about the values of family life. Nothing disrupts family life more than unemployment. The Prime Minister often moralises about all sorts of other social evils, but I believe that disillusionment, especially among young people, about unemployment is leading to hooliganism, vandalism, glue sniffing, drug taking and what we have seen during the last few weeks —which I think is now called "Millwallism". They are the work of unemployed young people. The hon. Member for Moorlands, as a Scot, knows as well as I do:

"For Satan finds some mischief still
For idle hands to do."

Chancellors sometimes forget that that is a social problem. Above all, the skills and talents of hundreds of young people are being wasted. Those skills and talents could be used to create wealth.

A number of us are worried about unemployment. Any Government who do not make reducing unemployment their first priority are failing in their duty to this generation and future generations. That is not just my view. Only the other day, a poll conducted in Scotland investigated people's priorities. The poll showed that two out of three people said that they would much rather the Chancellor used the nation's resources to create jobs than to cut various taxes.

Tax cuts may be welcome to some, but the Chancellor deludes himself if he believes that people dash off to invest in industry the few pounds' benefit they receive from tax cuts. All too often, instead of being invested in industry by the individual saver and investor, that money is spent on holidays abroad or on a BMW instead of a British-made car.

I shall cite the number of unemployed people in my constituency, and I hope hon. Members will forgive me for making a parochial point. Tax cuts would be of no interest to the 7,332 people unemployed in my constituency. About 2,946 of them have been unemployed for more than six months, another 2,154 for more than a year and 1,360 for more than two years. About 400,000 people are unemployed in Scotland and nearly 4 million are unemployed in the United Kingdom as a whole.

Recently, the Prime Minister told me in answer to a question that £1·497 billion was spent on unemployment benefit. That figure does not include the people who are taken off employment benefit after a year or those on supplementary benefit. That is a dreadful waste of the country's money.

We talk about the benefits from North sea oil. The Prime Minister has told me that our revenue from North sea oil is about £8·8 billion and that 17 per cent. of that money is spent on unemployment benefit alone instead of to create jobs. We are paying people to kick their heels. I believe that during the next few months we should give more thought to that aspect.

The hon. Member for Moorlands stressed, as did the TUC and dozens of other organisations, that to improve the economy we must first improve the infrastructure. The Government have a serious obligation to improve our road system, our rail system and all other forms of public works. That would be of tremendous advantage in helping to reduce unemployment. I am a bit simple about such matters, but it strikes me as exceedingly odd that, at a time when in Scotland we need houses and houses are crying out for modernisation and repairs, hundreds of people in the construction industry should be on the unemployment list. That is beyond my comprehension and, I am sure, beyond the comprehension of everyone.

Ministers constantly tell us, and I accept it, that if we do not do more for industry and if it does not become more competitive, we shall fall behind in the international race. Recently, I read that we were one of the most inventive countries in the world. More inventions are patented here than anywhere else in Europe. Sadly, because of a lack of resources and because the Government are not prepared to provide assistance new inventions are developed and manufactured abroad.

The Government's whole approach to industry worries every one of us. A clue to that is that the Government do not think hard enough about industrial problems. A few years ago I heard a Conservative Member—I dare not mention him by name as he is a young man for whom I have considerable regard, and it would not do his prospects in the Tory party any good—say that he wished that Treasury Ministers knew more about industry than they did about money. I wonder whether he has changed his mind, because I heard last week that New York hotels were paying tourists 98 cents for a pound. That does not strike me as a blessing bestowed by Treasury Ministers. If they knew what they were doing, they would ensure that our revenue from the North sea—instead of 17 per cent. of it being spent on unemployment benefits and so frittered away — would be spent on research, development, training and investment in the modernisation of our older industries, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) has just said.

I should like the Government to spend more money on an effective regional aid programme. I cannot accept what the Prime Minister said at Question Time, when she claimed that we were not two nations. If the Prime Minister and her Ministers really visited the towns they would discover that there is a north-south divide. That is the sort of situation that the Labour party certainly wishes to end. The measures that I have outlined are the only way to create the jobs, and so the wealth, which the country sadly needs.

Finally, for the past six years we have been told that we must be patient. Some of us are beginning to lose our patience. It is all very well for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that he now has inflation at only 4 or 5 per cent., but the cost of that is high unemployment. I do not believe that things are getting much better, and will never believe that they will get better until the Government have a change of heart and a change of policy. Nor will the millions who are unemployed in this country.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): I have a great deal in common with the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. MacKenzie). First, we have both heard Budget speeches from many Chancellors of the Exchequer. Today's Budget certainly had the virtue of being short and simple. I understand what the right hon. Gentleman said about unemployment, as, I am sure, does the Chancellor of the Exchequer. However, it is not easy to say how much money is spent on unemployment benefit and how much of it could be transferred to benefits in employment. I do not understand and never have understood that equation. Even successive Chancellors have been unable to carry out that equation. An attempt was made by a Government to inject money into the economy and to create jobs, but it failed. I wish that an easy solution could be found for what the right hon. Gentleman correctly described as one of the greatest social evils of our time.

The right hon. Gentleman talked about two nations. We all know from personal experience of people who have come from the north to the south for jobs, and of their incredible frustration when they find that they cannot be housed or bring their families with them. I join the right hon. Gentleman and the House in a desire, not only to make the north and south one, but to create as many jobs in the north as are available in the south where, incidentally, employers are waiting to take up people to fill vacancies.

The Budget must be considered as a whole, in terms of what it will do in future and in terms of what it does as a platform on which we can build. In the long term, it lays the foundations for the growth and creation of new jobs. It does not prop up old industries, which we have been inclined to do rather than to create new industries in line with modern demand. That is a legacy which it will be extremely difficult to overcome.

Unemployment is one of the terrible hurdles that we must overcome, and if we are patient, I am sure that we shall do so. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the creation of 400,000 jobs will not solve the unemployment problem. It will be a long time before the transition of our industries to modern technology will overcome that enormous problem.

A main point of the Budget is to create the right atmosphere for a property-owning democracy, for houses and for share-owners. I know that the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) agrees with share owning and share participation by workers in industry. It is important to emphasise what the Chancellor said about maintaining control of public expenditure and, more important, control of inflation, because our entire policy is based on that. The rate of inflation was 18 or 20 per cent. some years ago. It is now about 5 per cent., and the Chancellor must take the credit for that.

With regard to income tax, the Chancellor has placed the emphasis in the right place—that is, on the lower paid and on taking people out of the tax bracket altogether. He has also placed emphasis on small businesses and the help that he can give them. I shall not go into detail, because the Chancellor spelt it out well himself. However, he did not quite bring home the fact that small businesses are hampered not only by the tax system and the number of forms and complications with which they are faced. A one-man business must fill out heaven knows how many forms to complete his tax return. In many cases the forms have no value whatsoever—half of them are duplicated and the other half are consigned to the dustbin. They do not give a small business man the opportunity that he requires. Small business men are being given incentives. We depend on them, because a small business develops into a large business. That is how our whole economy has developed over the years.

I should like to refer to taxation. In the Budget the Chancellor has given us what I have always wanted to see — a move from direct to indirect taxation. Direct taxation is an uneconomic form of tax because it takes a long time to collect and is a laborious process, whereas indirect taxation is far simpler. I welcome the reduction in the threshold, which is very important, and I also pay tribute to my right hon. Friend for being able to add to our reserves.

My right hon. Friend touched on the problem of school leavers. We all know the tragedy. We hope that the scheme that he put forward will enable them to have at least two years' training, but the training that they receive must be in line with technological advances which this country and the whole world see. It is no good putting people into something which is not designed or oriented for the future. It is towards achieving that objective that the Government must put their entire resources and brains.

I was interested in what my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) said about pension scares. We heard about all the scares on television, such as taxes on pensions and books. I do not mind the tax on advertisements, which is reasonable. All of us on both sides of the House have suffered from such scares. I believe that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor went a little further than he should have done when he said that there would be no retrospective legislation. He could not deny those scares and say what he would do in the Budget. I understand that that would be unconstitutional. Nevertheless, we still have such scares, and I am glad that these ones have now been removed.

We want to see the reform and restructuring of industry. We want new industries to be created and small businesses to be encouraged. Above all, we want the tax system to be simplified and reformed to make it easier to collect and beneficial to all concerned. Let us look forward in this platform Budget to seeing this country recover and businesses grow, accompanied by an increase in our standard of living. Let us hope that there will also be a reduction in unemployment, which is the tragedy of the nation.

Mr. Cyril Smith (Rochdale): If I count proper Budgets as opposed to mini-Budgets, I think that this is the 13th budget that I have heard presented in the House. The title that has been given to it is the worst use of the English language that I have heard during all the Budgets that I have listened to. To describe it as a "Budget for jobs" is the greatest joke that I have heard for many a long year. If one examines this "Budget for jobs", what is the Chancellor's solution to the unemployment problem? He said that he was dealing with job creation and, in effect, that he would make it easier for employers to sack people. He said that people would have to work for two years instead of one year before they were entitled to protection from unfair dismissal. Therefore, the first measure that he has introduced to protect jobs makes it easier to sack people.

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman proposed the abolition of the wages councils. I speak as one of those who are revered by the Government—I have a small business, and I employ 38 people. I must tell the Government, as an employer, that I do not want the wages councils to be abolished, because they protect my business from unfair competition. They ensure that my competitors are required by law to pay the same minimum wage as I do. However, if the wages councils are abolished, the cowboy employers will be able to employ people at ridiculously low wages for about six months, pinch other people's customers and trade, and then disappear. Other people's businesses will decline because they do not have the custom. Therefore, anyone who imagines that wages councils are the enemies of employers, especially small businesses, lives in cloud-cuckoo-land. The abolition of the wages councils will not lead to more jobs. Ultimately, it may lead to fewer jobs because it could mean good businesses going to the wall as a consequence of short-term cowboy activities.

The Chancellor then said that only businesses could create jobs. That is not true if by "businesses" he means private enterprise. Many businesses rely totally on Government finance to purchase goods. There are many examples, such as local authorities purchasing houses and hospital goods. In my part of the country, the water and sewerage systems are desperately in need of renewal. Scores of millions of pounds need to be spent on them. The purchaser is the water authority. If it relies on being financed directly by the water consumer, there is not sufficient capital for the required renewal. The alternative is to inject Government capital so that the Government can purchase capital goods and thereby create jobs.

Therefore, the Chancellor's statement that only businesses can create jobs is not true—if, as I suspect, the right hon. Gentleman means that only private enterprise can create jobs. It is on the section concerning the creation of jobs that I believe the Budget will be judged, in the long term, to have been a failure. Certainly, a £7 million public sector borrowing requirement is too low in the present situation. The Chancellor added that it takes a long time for policies to work and create jobs. He can say that again. The Government have been saying that since 1979. We are now in 1985—I do not know what constitutes a long time in the Government's eyes, but it must be longer than six years.

There are things in the Budget that one welcomes. It would be a funny Budget if there were not things to welcome. I welcome the extension of the youth training scheme to two years for 16-year-olds, but it is a great tragedy that it is not two years for 17-year-olds as well. We should interpret the word "training" literally and not have tarted-up jobs that are just excuses and palliatives for taking people off the dole. Whether a youngster is 16 or 17 when he goes into the scheme, two years are still required to train him. The figure should not be reduced to one year simply because the youngster is 17. The Government's concept of youth training, demonstrated this afternoon on the basis of two years for one age group and one year for another, shows that they see the YTS not as training but as an excuse for taking people off the dole. If that is the basis of the YTS, it will not do the job that it was meant to do.

I make the following remarks with some irony. The Chancellor said that he would spend about £40 million on creating places for training in engineering. That will come good in the north-west of England and areas serviced by Salford university, a university that created engineering places. Three or four years ago the same Government destroyed hundreds of places at that university, which specialised in engineering. If that represents a U-turn in the Government's programme, it is to be welcomed. It is nonsense for a Government who have destroyed thousands of places in engineering training at universities, polytechnics and so on, to sit there and say that they have created more training places.

I am delighted that the Chancellor had enough sense to leave pensions alone. I suspect it was political sense that moved him, never mind what he said about speculation. I believe that speculation was fuelled so that the Chancellor could see what the reaction would be. When he saw the reaction, especially from his own supporters and Back Benchers, he realised that he would have to back-pedal fast.

I welcome the encouragement to small businesses and the self-employed, but more help could have been engineered for investment for small businesses. There are such things as direct grants, but if the Chancellor cannot provide them he could provide help for small firms through interest-free loans for investment in productive machinery, in tools, in tool making and in modern technology. If those are not possible, the Chancellor might persuade the banks, which get a rake-off every time bank rates rise, to provide two rates of interest on bank loans: one for those investing in productive machinery and another for those who simply want to borrow money for purposes that may in their interests be legitimate but which make no overall contribution to the economy or to industry.

[Mr. Cyril Smith]

The Chancellor's announcement that the tax on derv is to be increased by 3½p per gallon is serious. During the last six months, the price of a gallon of derv has been increased by 31p. Small hauliers are becoming extremely worried about the constant increase in the price. In the coming weeks the Government will hear more and more about the serious impact this will have upon small haulage contractors. Far from helping to create jobs, it may well destroy them.

Let it be clear that transport is a basic cost of industry. If transport costs to the producer increase, he can only pass them on to the person buying the goods. I am not criticising the increase in the price of petrol, but I certainly criticise the increase in the price of derv. When pressure mounts on the Government, as it will, from the Road Haulage Association, the Government may be persuaded to think again.

Any reduction in tax, whether direct or indirect taxation, is always welcome, but, as the hon. Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn) said, we are merely shifting from direct taxation to indirect taxation. In this context, indirect taxation is not merely putting a little on VAT. Let us remember the increases that have been approved even in the past few weeks. The Leader of the Opposition outlined them. The cost of gas and electricity is being increased to give more revenue to the Government and for no other purpose. The industries themselves see no reason to raise their charges, but the Government insist that they be raised. Whatever people save in taxation, they will have to pay in extra charges for gas and electricity.

There is also the increase in prescription charges. That is not just an increase from £1·60 to £2; there are also the items which are being removed from the list and which people will have to pay for in full. Then there are the increases in council house rents, in transport charges and in rates. In many cases, the rate increases have been forced on councils not because the local authorities concerned have increased expenditure by more than the rate of inflation but simply because of the Government's rate-capping policy. The average taxpayer and the average ratepayer have to bear all those increases.

When the Chancellor told us that he was reducing taxation, the national insurance surcharge or whatever, it sounded very good. It is good, taken in isolation, but if it is taken as part of the whole package it is not half so rosy. The reductions in taxation must be seen against the increases in charges for necessary services.

This Budget is like every other Budget—a curate's egg. It is good in parts, but taken as a whole it is far worse than it appears at first sight. Certainly it has been misnamed if it is being called a Budget for jobs. Any effect it has on unemployment will be minimal. As the Leader of the Opposition said, it is a stalemate budget. The country needs a new attitude to unemployment. This Budget does not display it.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Unlike the hon. Member for Rochdale, (Mr. Smith), I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend on the felicity of his presentation of the Budget and on his courage and brilliance. The Budget was awaited this year with more than the usual speculation. Most of us received scores of letters from constituents about what it might or might not contain. Perhaps the nation expects too much of the Budget, because, after all, the salvation of the country depends ultimately upon ourselves as individuals. All that the Government can do is to set the scene to allow us to get on with the job. Therefore, anything that the Chancellor can do to set us free from the shackles of state control is to be welcomed.

This nation, which is so superb and united in war, is not always so good in times of peace and is sometimes inclined even to be divided against itself. In recent years we have certainly become a very difficult country to govern. The present Government, under the dynamic leadership of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, are trying to get us all to embrace capitalism more fervently and to allow the market to work more freely, as it does in the United States, where everyone believes in free enterprise and where there is no Socialist party.

We also need more of the nationalism that one finds in some countries on the continent, particularly in France, among all political parties and throughout business. We need to be dragged into the last quarter of the 20th century to compete against the dynamic capitalists of the United States of America, Japan, Germany, France, Taiwan, Korea and so on. We have the brains and trading skills. What we need is the dedication which is so evident in most of our foreign trade rivals. Our business men should be the best men in the country.

I judge the Budget, therefore, against the requirements of that background. In that sense it has been successful. Of course, a great deal more remains to be done. We give such colossal subsidies to so many special interests—farmers, industrialists, students, householders, savers—that it is no wonder that taxation is still so high. Of course, those subsidies cannot be reduced in one year. The reduction must be gradual and there must be the fullest explanation; far more than the Government are sometimes inclined to give us, hence the revolts against the Government by some middle-class supporters. Our working-class supporters are tougher and more loyal. They understand in a fundamental way what the Government are trying to do.

I wanted the Budget to make it easier and cheaper for people to be taken on for work, and some good steps have been taken in that direction. I wanted substantial improvements in the tax lot of the lower paid, who, owing to our idiotic benefit system, are often little better off in work than when receiving state benefits. The Chancellor has gone some way towards doing that. It is probably the most important action that he has taken in the Budget. I should have liked to see stamp duty on house purchase removed to make the redeployment of labour easier. I welcome the reductions in the national insurance contribution from employers and employees. That is most important.

I am sure that my right hon. Friend would have liked to do more, but his room for manoeuvre is strictly limited. He must now guard sterling and be seen to be guarding it. He must keep a tight hold on inflation. He must long, as we all do, for interest rates to come down. That is necessary for industry and commerce, but, alas, the time for that has not yet come. However, there are many good signs. Exports seem to be growing even faster, oil imports will diminish with the ending of the miners' strike, and the contribution of the new and growing service industries is an encouraging sign, although manufacturing recovery is slower than many of us would have wished. My right hon.

Friend has made a most sensible judgment about the size of the borrowing requirement—neither too much nor too little.

Apart from the overall picture of the British economy, which is our main consideration in the Budget, I must also think of the position of my constituency in the west midlands. All hon. Members know that the recession there has been deep. I detect at last some signs of recovery, but it has been slow. The Budget will surely help the west midlands. My constituents are a sturdy lot and seldom complain. The Budget should help industry and employment there, but my constituents know that above all they must help themselves. That means that they must find new technologies, new products, new markets and cheaper ways of making things. The emphasis which for so long in the black country has been on production must now be on marketing and sales.

I listened carefully to the new taxes on those who have company cars. I hope that the tax on the cars used by sales managers and salesmen will not be increased, because they are essential tools of that trade.

We have no frills in the west midlands, and we dislike extravagance. I wish, therefore, that in the Budget we had heard of the demise of more quangos. Has the attempt to curb quangos stopped, or only been postponed?

I welcome the emphasis given in the Budget to training. It is a vital aspect in which this country must catch up with its competitors. I also welcome the further help given to small business and the self-employed. The income tax changes are excellent. They could have been much more had it not been for the cost of the miners' strike; yet, costly as that strike was, it had to be won. We must all now hope for a much better climate of management-union relations in the coal industry and throughout industry.

I believe that there is much more realism on the shop floor about the position in which this country finds itself. In all, I believe that my right hon. Friend has done well in the circumstances in which he found himself. I also believe that we have seen much to look forward to in future Budgets. The country is on the right economic road. The Budget will be well received in all quarters.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): I always enjoy the way in which the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes) wraps himself in the Union Jack, but on this occasion he has even more optimism than I usually associate with him. When I heard the Chancellor say that there is much still to be done, I wondered how long the country could afford the present Chancellor of the Exchequer doing it, because his Budget is no answer to the problems that the United Kingdom faces now or will face in the last quarter of the present century, as the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge said.

The Chancellor said that the defeat of inflation was still one of his objectives. The Budget can hardly be said to be a triumph for employment prospects in the foreseeable future. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) had great difficulty in keeping a broad grin from his face when the Chancellor spoke about wage restraint and said that it would provide more jobs.

Many of the measures spelt out this afternoon by the Chancellor gave every indication that he intends to dampen down the demand for wage and salary increases and the level of wages and salaries generally and, therefore, the level of purchasing power within the economy. I thought that the proposal to chop the wages councils — a regulatory system we developed in this country for good reasons — was obnoxious. The low-paid sector of the economy will have the skids put under it with the disappearance of the wages councils. The recent Auld report on Sunday trading referred to the importance of retaining wages councils in the retail sector to preserve stability and to ensure the guarantees that the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) mentioned, because destroying wages councils will not necessarily help industry. It may destabilise the more responsible employers who look for a measure of stability in the running of their affairs, but the absence of regulation can destroy rather than create jobs.

We tend to have more investment and more interest in training employees in higher paid industries because it becomes more worth while. That raises the issue of the two-year youth training scheme. What will it amount to? It is all very well, as the Chancellor did this afternoon, to talk about schools preparing young people for the world of work. One wonders into what world of work they will be inducted. My experience is that schools have more problems from demoralisation and lack of incentive because the young people know only too well the bleak prospects that face them when they leave school.

If the youth training scheme is to be financed by the employers, it will be a completely different creature from the present one-year training scheme launched by the Government, the employers and the trade unions under the aegis of the MSC. Employers will expect a great deal more value for money if they are responsible for funding a substantial part of the YTS. The Government should recall the difficulties that they had with employers regarding the levy under the industrial training board system if they are thinking of moving towards a self-financing two-year youth training period.

I remind Treasury Ministers that on a previous occasion we considered the question of a compulsory youth training scheme. When the scheme was originally launched, I recollect that in the Select Committee on Employment we discovered that it would be more bother than it was worth and that it would probably cost more to create a compulsory scheme. We discovered that, for the percentage of youngsters who might opt out of the scheme, it was more worth while to have a voluntary system than to penalise young people who did not opt in.

The Government should have a care lest the expanded youth training scheme envisaged today becomes no more than an extension of compulsory schooling.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Will my hon. Friend confirm that, at the same time as the discussions to which he referred were taking place, a proposal was made by the Department of Employment to reduce the allowance with regard to the YTS to £15 a week? The amount that has been announced in the Budget will go nowhere to restore the allowance to what it would have been following its introduction by the Labour Government in April 1978, taking account of inflation or earnings, which would be £40 a week. The youngsters are already penalised by about £15 a week.

Mr. Craigen: My hon. Friend is right. The Government have been consistently mean-minded about the operation of the training allowance. They have more or less coerced the Manpower Services Commission into keeping it unfairly low on the ground that, were the allowance to be increased, it would be at the expense of the numbers of trainees. There is no doubt about the significance of the point made by my hon. Friend.

This matter raises once more the whole issue of training. We always seem to think that if only the apprentices were better trained, the economy of the country would be on a better footing. Why do we not start in the boardroom? It is there that the key decisions are made about the value, scope and quality of training. It is interesting that the Treasury is now coming round to abolishing the young workers scheme. I can remember the Minister of State, Department of Employment, conceding that it was 90 per cent. deadweight, which meant that employers would have been taking those youngsters on anyway. The difference was that they were getting a handout in the process.

The Government are coming round to the question of the long-term unemployed and the expansion of the community programme rather late in the day. I remember the predecessor of the present Secretary of State for Employment refusing to increase the number beyond 130,000. It now seems that there are to be another 100,000. There have been recent changes in eligibility for the scheme which are detrimental to married women. Moreover, I suggest that the scheme should avoid some of the bureaucratic red tape which creeps into such special programmes. I prefer to see worthwhile jobs being carried out by local authorities and other sections of the public sector than to have some artificial jobs created simply because they are the only alternative open to the Government.

I listened with interest to the Chancellor's proposals on reform of personal allowances. In my view, it is proper that men and women should be on an equal footing in these matters. With regard to the references to women in the home, I wonder whether this announcement is a precursor of the demise of child benefit, and whether the Treasury in these changes has in mind squeezing out child benefit in the operation of personal allowances.

Reference has also been made to pension funds. Most right hon. and hon. Members were inundated with letters arising from people's understandable fears about their future prospects. Coming at a time when all hon. Members are receiving letters about VAT on books, children's shoes and clothing, it struck me that this was a new form of Budget referendum by post—that we will judge by the volume of correspondence that we receive whether a project is likely to succeed. That was how the Chancellor eventually realised that he would need to keep off the grass with respect to pension funds.

By and large, this has been a Budget of Green Papers. If Green Papers were mentioned once, they were mentioned several times.

The Chancellor with his £2 gallon of petrol will hit some of the small business men about whom he always maintains he is so concerned and some of the rural areas, apart from motorists in general.

Last year and this year we debated the White Paper on public expenditure. We know that the prospects for aiding the construction industry are bleak. No messages of hope for the construction industry were tapped out by the Chancellor at the Dispatch Box. It must not be forgotten that on occasions more than 50 per cent. of the jobs available in the construction industry depend on public sector contracts, because private firms in the construction industry do not bother to distinguish whether the origin of a contract is public or private. They are interested only in the contract and the work that follows. With regard to the Chancellor's statement about business creating jobs, I remind him that the Treasury has done a great deal as a Luddite in the operation of its fiscal policy to destroy jobs, not least in the construction industry.

When we hear about the overshoot in public expenditure, it should be borne in mind that, with the surge in the dollar, as the Chancellor described it, the Trident programme will be more costly than hitherto envisaged simply because the value of sterling has plummeted.

We constantly hear about the need to contain public expenditure. However, we must ask about the cost of the Falklands programme in relation to public spending programmes generally and the absence of the necessary longer term political initiatives.

I do not think that this Budget will present any great hopes or joys for the prospect of employment or new work. It is another indication that the Chancellor, although he is still on his feet, is on the ropes in the operation of the economy.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): I welcome the Budget, and I congratulate my right hon. Friend, in the hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will pass on my sentiments.

I do not find it a glamorous or even an exciting Budget, but it is in my opinion very businesslike and interesting. The Budget has far deeper effects upon such matters as employment than almost any critic on either side of the House has yet acknowledged.

It will be borne in upon all hon. Members in time what the Budget is really about. It is about enterprise and the creation of business, and it is about the creation of real jobs —the jobs that I have not heard mentioned so far by its critics. No hon. Member has yet spoken about the creation of real jobs.

It is a significant achievement for our economy, the Chancellor said, and the economy has come through a great test. It has weathered the storm of the worst world recession ever recorded in history and a very worrying world economy.

At the same time, there has been a serious drain, like an open sore, because of the vastly expensive miners' strike. However, in the end it was worth it, because it will result in better industrial relations well into the next century. It is the beginning of the end of the British sickness. The attitudes of both management and employees are changing dramatically as a result of the strike. I applaud my right hon. Friend's resistance of the temptation to fall in line with the normal, traditional, highly popular give-away at Budget time. We must face the reality of the cost of the miners' strike.

The Budget is one for enterprise and real jobs. Some of its aspects, which have been grossly maligned by critics, will encourage enterprise and the creation of employment. We must encourage people to invest in business risk, because when that is successful real jobs are created. The new rules for indexation in the capital gains tax provisions will encourage investment. The allowance for the indexation of losses will encourage business risk that people can stomach. The rising of the thresholds on capital transfer tax also encourages business investment. The reduction of the retention period to five years on employee purchase schemes encourages inside investors —it encourages employees to invest in their companies, which creates a much better morale within companies.

The simplification of stamp duty reduces the cost of investment and therefore encourages the flow of funds into equity investments. The capital allowance scheme, with 100 per cent. write-off for high technology and short-term assets, encourages specifically and with fine tuning the direction of investment. High technology is the source of future revenue and jobs.

My right hon. Friend mentioned increased integration with the computerisation of the PAYE and benefit schemes. I applaud that, because it will ensure that benefits are paid not to everyone as a right, but to the needy dependent upon their level of need. We must all grasp that.

As the days and months unfold, people will increasingly realise the domestic effects of the Budget as an incentive to employment. The substantial increase in the expenditure and scope of the youth training scheme and the near-doubling in size of the community programme will increase job training. The raising of income tax thresholds will make inroads into the poverty trap and create a real incentive to be employed.

During the six years that I have been in the House, I have asked for a new system of national insurance contributions to lower the cost of employment and increase the incentives to be employed. Therefore, I warmly welcome the graduated scheme announced by my right hon. Friend, although I had hoped that it would be more eroded in total. However, I understand that this Budget must keep the ship on course in difficult waters, and it is not the time to give anything away.

I heartily applaud the measures to reduce the shackles of employment legislation on the incentive to employ. The extension to larger businesses of the rules that now apply to new and smaller businesses is a welcome trend. What is good for smaller businesses is good for business in general. I hope that my right hon. Friend will follow that trend in many other aspects to break down the shackles of employment and planning legislation, first on new businesses and then on business as a whole.

I have always urged a Budget to encourage real employment; we have been lucky in this Budget and I thank my right hon. Friend for that. However, I was disappointed in two specific areas. I heartily support the exclusion of the property category from the business expansion scheme, as its inclusion was a wild abuse. I support the inclusion of research and development companies.

However, my right hon. Friend has not proposed anything to deal with the problem of pool investments. Until the investments in a pool are actually invested in the companies, the rebate does not come through to the end investor. We should encourage small investors to participate in some of the pool investments. The scheme has not sufficiently encouraged start-ups as opposed to investment in businesses and the expansion of businesses. There must be something to encourage people to risk a start-up. It is too easy simply to pour money into an on-going business and obtain the benefits of the scheme. We want the money to go into new businesses—something that we have lacked for the past 40 years.

Secondly, I had asked that household employment should be allowed as a tax charge. That would reduce the black economy and have two huge advantages — it would increase the tax base and reduce unemployment. It would be a cheap investment for the Government.

I wholly support the tight control of the public sector borrowing requirement and the cash limits. However, when my right hon. Friend comes to control public expenditure and make cuts in certain areas, he might consider whether, rather than looking for across-the-board percentage cuts on Government spending, it would be better to go in for something widely mooted in the United States — the practice of zero budgeting, where every programme must be re-evaluated and rejustified with each Budget. The Budget is actually built up rather than simply cut down.

This practice has had beneficial effects in the United States. It has allowed for expansion in some areas and the complete cutting of programmes in other areas. It allows real cuts in spending with the minimum as opposed to the maximum amount of aggravation that usually comes with percentage cuts. That would be a good practice to follow in cutting public expenditure and ensuring value for money.

It is a low-key Budget, but an interesting Budget with fundamental effects upon both enterprise and the creation of real as opposed to unreal jobs.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): Yet again we have been told that this is a Budget for jobs. It must be the mark 2 version, because during the 12 months since last year's Budget 143,000 more people have been put on the dole. The Budget contained the usual tax increases—I call them annual increments—on beer, wine, spirits, tobacco and, in a different category, vehicle excise duty. Car tax is to cost another £10 a year, yet cars are no longer a luxury. They are invariably used for journeys to work and for other essential travel. There will be a serious effect on road haulage. Most of our freight is carried by road, so the additional tax on road haulage will increase the cost of goods and services and make our firms less competitive in the markets of the world. Besides, it invariably fuels inflation.

Given the huge amounts already collected by the Government in motor taxation, less than a third of which is spent on roads and road maintenance, it is time that the Government learnt the error of their ways. We are often told of the American example and about how millions of jobs have been created in that country, but one fact that is overlooked is that America has always had a low-cost fuel policy. That has undoubtedly been of tremendous benefit to the American economy.

No one likes paying tax, but cuts in income tax are likely to have only a limited effect in creating new jobs, which allegedly is the Chancellor's aspiration, and, of course, there is always the possibility that, in a day or so, even these minimal decreases could be wiped out if the building societies increased their rates of borrowing.

The changes in national insurance contributions are more welcome. It is suggested that they will make it easier for firms to offer low-paid jobs. In 12 months' time we shall be able to judge whether the Chancellor's proposals will have had a more than marginal effect on the level of unemployment.

[Mr. Roy Hughes]

The Budget seems to have been drafted in a vacuum. One might think that Britain had only a marginal unemployment problem. The vast size of the problem seems to evade the Chancellor's attention. The chairman of the Conservative party tells us to stop whingeing because we are enjoying a boom. Ministers live in a world of unreality. According to the official statistics, 3·25 million people are out of work. Many thousands more are on training schemes, and thousands do not bother to register for employment because they know that there will be no vacancies for them. In Wales, over 183,000 people are on the dole. That is 17·3 per cent. of the work force, and the figure has risen by more than 10,000 since February 1984. When will the Government give people a little hope?

In the country as a whole, about 1·3 million young people are out of work. Their future is bleak indeed. Admittedly, the Chancellor has extended the training programme. In a sense we welcome that, but there is already some confusion about these matters. The Leader of the Opposition asked this afternoon whether there would be any effect on benefits if youngsters refused to join such courses. That question must be answered.

This year is the International Year of Youth. How sad it is that there should be such massive unemployment among our young people. Is it any wonder that they turn to glue sniffing and football hooliganism? The social and human costs of unemployment are enormous. In Thatcherite Britain the rich get richer, while 15 million live on or near the poverty line.

The National Health Service is being run down at a time when the demands on it are ever increasing. Waiting lists grow ever longer, especially in south Wales, and people are denied the treatment that they need.

Private education is subsidised, while state schools are starved of funds. We see the deplorable spectacle of schools organising bingo sessions in order to buy essential textbooks. The teachers, who play a key role in our society are locked in a major industrial dispute over the poor level of their salaries.

Investment in higher education is essential for the future economic, social and cultural well-being of our country, yet our universities have suffered a 10 per cent. cut in their funding between 1980-81 and 1984-85. That represents a loss of £460 million of vital resources. During the same period, 30,000 well qualified young people who would normally have been assured of university places have been turned away. That is a waste of ability and talent.

The biggest job is to put our people back to work. The Chancellor should have announced a massive investment programme for the public sector, to improve our industrial efficiency and our environment and to build up our rail and road network. What could be more logical at present than a major housing drive? The materials are largely home-produced. In south Wales our chief housing officers tell us that much of our housing will be fit only for slum clearance by the turn of the century. A large new housing programme, public and private, could take thousands of people out of the dole queue at a stroke.

We all know that there are no easy answers in the attempt to halt Britain's decline, but investment must be a key factor. However, private companies have shifted production and capital overseas to the extent of £50,000 million since 1979. The Government should intervene to stop Britain being undermined in that way. That money should be invested at home.

In the past we have always been told that there is no alternative, yet in recent weeks and months a host of alternative economic packages have been put forward. The Labour party itself has put a major package together. No doubt it will be outlined by the shadow Chancellor in the debate tomorrow afternoon. The CBI has its plan, and so do various journals, such as the Daily Mirror. The former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) has suggested a £5,000 million package to boost the economy and create jobs. The Government should take notice of people such as the former leader of the Conservative party.

There are alternatives, yet all that we have been given is another dose of monetarism. We need a change of policy. In recent weeks there has been much speculation about the future political career of the Chancellor. This may well be his final Budget. The future well-being of Britain now demands a change of policy and a change of Government.

Debate adjourned—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

British Railways Bill (By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

7 pm

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson (New Forest): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill is part of the continuing policy of the British Railways Board to achieve more efficiency and better services for its customers. It comes at a time when the highest level of investment for 25 years has been authorised. About £2·5 billion is to be spent over the next five years. Electrification of the east coast main line and the introduction of the new "sprinter" vehicles to replace the old diesel multiples are examples of that improvement in service.

As my hon. Friend the Minister pointed out yesterday in the House, substantial losses have, of course, resulted from the miners' dispute. It is the board's determination not only to make good those losses, but to win back the lost business. The Bill will go some way towards changing the present structure of the board's network to take account of the need for greater efficiency.

I shall point out those parts of the Bill that hon. Members may wish to study. Part I contains mainly the standard provisions that appear in all similar Bills. I refer, for example, to the general provisions in clause 3 that are relevant to railway construction, and to the application of the Compulsory Purchase Act 1965 in clause 4.

Part II contains the most significant early changes and the power to make works. Several works which are outlined in the Bill will have some material benefit for the travelling public. For example, works Nos. 1 and 2 relate to London. Work No. 1, which is outlined in clauses 6 and 7, involves the reinstatement of the railway at Farringdon, which has lain disused since 1969. Using the tunnel at Snow Hill, it will provide a link between the board's midland main line service out of St. Pancras and the board's passenger network south of the Thames. It will ultimately link stations such as Bedford, Luton, St. Albans, Streatham, Croydon, Catford, Bromley, Sevenoaks and Gillingham with an uninterrupted service.

Work No. 2, to which clause 8 relates, involves building a short railway of some 650 m joining the midland main line outside St. Pancras with the east coast main line at the King's Cross freight terminal junction. That will provide direct access for the movement of empty high-speed rolling-stock and will save a great deal of time, fuel and manpower. As it is directly within the board's King's Cross freight complex, it will certainly improve activities there.

Work No. 3 involves the electrification of the east coast main line. I reassure hon. Members that there has been full consultation with the Tyne and Wear county council, and that the scheme has its full approval.

Clauses 16 to 26 relate to the closure of level crossings. They represent part of a continuing programme to provide for more efficiency. If any hon. Members have points to make about individual level crossing closures, I shall endeavour to deal with them later.

Part III is another standard provision dealing with the purchase of land, and rights over land.

Part IV incorporates the provisions of the British Railways (No. 2) Act 1981.

Part V of the Bill, which contains miscellaneous provisions, introduces several quite significant new proposals. Clause 37 gives British Rail police powers to seek information as to the identity of a vehicle driver involved in offences either at level crossings or within station approaches. That power does not currently exist, and the Bill will bring those officers within the scope of the more general law.

Clause 42 has caused some concern in south Wales, particularly for the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) and for the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman). The board proposes to cease to operate a swing-bridge over the River Neath. I should like to set the record straight. The ability to open the bridge was the result of the Rhondda and Swansea Bay Railway Act 1892, and it represented an attempt to provide access along the length of the river from wharves and jetties down past Briton Ferry. However, the swing-bridge facility has hardly been used in recent times. It was used 14 times in 1947, three times in 1948, only once in 1949, and once in 1956, but only for testing purposes, at the request of the Neath harbour commissioners.

The board believes that maintaining the fiction of a swing-bridge that has suffered serious fires, whose dynamos and pumps have been destroyed, and which has been the subject of extensive vandalism over the past, say, 30 years, presents it with a cost that is no longer justified. Many of the wharves and quays have already disappeared, and a road bridge further up the river has already been built on the A474. However, I assure any in the area who are concerned that it will be possible for small craft to pass up river.

Although the river is hardly navigable above the bridge, the clearance available at the bridge will be 5·2 m at high tide and about 10 m at low tide, which should allow any small pleasure craft easy access further up. I know the area well, and I am aware that there is a large sailing marina in Swansea. Those with larger boats may keep them there anyway.

Part VI deals with general provisions, and then there are the schedules.

This modest Bill is part of a continuing process to tidy up the system and to provide better services for passengers. I hope that it will be given a Second Reading. I commend it to the House.

7.8 pm

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): In contributing briefly to this debate on the Bill, and in considering those items relating to works, I feel that I should begin with a plea to my hon. Friend the Minister to consider the introduction of a Government health warning that "commuting can seriously damage your health", if the recent report from the European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions can be cited in evidence.

British Rail is ever the butt of criticism, whether justified or otherwise, but it is now taken to task—along with other forms of commuting—as the instrument of regular stressful journeys that can lead to hindrance in family relations, leisure activities and job satisfaction. Indeed, travelling to and from work by courtesy of British Rail, which the Bill will facilitate, especially via clause 5, can contribute to everything from sleeplessness and digestive disorders to skin complaints and excessive perspiration—the latter no doubt the consequence of the

"Will she come, won't she come" syndrome, well recognised by would-be travellers hopping up and down on station platforms wondering whether a train will arrive.

It may already be evident from my opening remarks that I view the Bill with a mixture of support and circumspection, especially as I represent a constituency in Hertfordshire which has a great many regular rail commuters. My support comes for the evident improvements that will be made to the services of British Rail if this measure is passed by Parliament. My circumspection comes in consequence of the omissions from part II of additional improvements which would be of value to my constituents in Welwyn Hatfield.

The purpose of the Bill primarily is to empower the board, as it states,

"to construct works and to purchase or use land."

However, no mention is made of the long-awaited redevelopment project at Welwyn Garden City station, nor of the possibility of creating a new station at Welham Green, for which I and many local people have been campaigning. But mention is made in clause 5 of works to be carried out in terms of the railway at King's Cross, which is the terminus for the eastern region line from the north, on which are the four stations in my constituency. The other three stations are Brookmans Park, Welwyn North and Hatfield, the last mentioned having been, with its staff, a recent award winner.

Although the Bill could not be expected to cover all aspects of the inner suburban electric service, given the long title to the measure, it might be appropriate simply to mention that, despite the new rolling stock and revised timetabling, a number of difficulties unfortunately still exist. Nevertheless, it would be equally appropriate when considering the Bill, in particular part II, to mention that local people, whether travelling to King's Cross or to Moorgate, or, indeed, even further afield, have much benefited from a faster and more efficient service, albeit not a cheaper one. Commuter tax relief, which I have long sought, would have been a welcome addition to today's Budget statement by the Chancellor.

On balance, it is my intention to support the Second Reading of the Bill tonight because of the importance of clause 5 and other aspects for hon. Members and their constituents, but I would make one plea. When hon. Members travel the length of Welwyn Hatfield as they come or go to or from their constituencies at high speed by rail, especially if they are enjoying the advantages of the 125 train, and cross the noticeable landmark of Digswell viaduct and get a brief glimpse of mid-Hertfordshire's towns and countryside, perhaps they will spare a thought for our extra needs. Then hopefully on the next occasion they will equally be prepared to support a further British Railways Bill relating to works designed to provide those additional and necessary improvements for my local commuters.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): The House will be grateful to the hon. Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) for the customarily succinct manner in which he has performed the annual ritual of moving the British Railways Bill. My remarks will be exceedingly brief because, as the hon. Member indicated, there is nothing in the Bill which could be regarded as controversial, although the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) managed to strike a suitably parochial note, not only by making a plea on behalf of his constituents, as we would expect from him, but by providing the Welwyn and Hatfield "Bugle", or whatever the weekly organ is known as, with a line or two that will interest his electors whenever that newspaper is printed.

I hope the hon. Member will not feel that I am being unduly combative if I say that the service which his constituents enjoy, both to King's Cross and to Moorgate, would be welcomed by millions of people throughout the length and breadth of the country. Although there have inevitably been teething troubles on that route, I hope that the hon. Member will agree that now that it has settled down it is far superior to probably seven eighths of British Rail's commuter network. I hope that both the hon. Member and his constituents feel that British Rail has made a very good investment in improving communications in that part of the country.

I welcome in particular the clause which deals with the Snow Hill link. I, like the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield, shall sound a somewhat parochial note by saying that although I welcome the clause, I believe, since I represent a midlands constituency, that it is the wrong Snow Hill with which it deals. Unfortunately, the grandeur of the Great Western Railway at the former Snow Hill station has not yet been restored. Although provision was made for such works in the last British Railways Bill, I understand that there has been a hold-up.

Those of us who view the centre of Birmingham with a somewhat jaundiced eye believe that the bomb site appearance of the former Snow Hill station ought to be dealt with sooner rather than later and that the work for which parliamentary permission was given this time last year ought to be commenced. I hope that the Minister will be able to give an assurance that the delay will not be due to the fact that inevitably these decisions will now have to be taken by the Department of Transport because of the regrettable demise, if the Government have their way, of the West Midlands county council.

On the clause that mentions the Snow Hill link with London, one of the regrettable legacies that our railway system has inherited is the unbridled competition that took place 100 or 150 years ago between the railway companies. In modern transport terms, that competition has resulted in journeys all too often commencing and terminating in the wrong place. The Snow Hill link will create through services between the southern and London midlands regions via Blackfriars and Farringdon. Once the link is opened, the hon. Gentleman's constituents will be able to travel in the same train as far as Sevenoaks, Chatham or East Croydon, or even further than that. I hope that when the scheme comes to fruition he will be led to praise at least some aspects of British Rail's management.

Clause 33 gives a time extension to the Windsor link, as it is known, in Manchester. It deals with the Castlefield curve. The House has welcomed this clause in the past. Therefore, it appears to be about time that British Rail stopped talking about the need to connect two former competitors—the old Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway and the London and North Western Railway—and got on with the job.

On behalf of the Opposition, I give a qualified welcome to the Bill. We hope that the works contained therein will be completed before this time next year. Much though we enjoy listening to the hon. Member for New Forest, we should hate him to have to repeat himself.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): It may be helpful if at this point I intervene to give a brief indication of the Government's view on the Bill. With the knowledge that you yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, represent a railway town and have a very special interest in it, I am sure that you will be following the debate with keen interest.

My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) has shown his usual lucid mastery of the purposes of the British Railways Bill. The House should be grateful to him for the way in which he went through it. My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) put the case for the improvement of station facilities in his constituency with great diligence on behalf of his constituents. These matters would, I believe, best be raised by him direct with British Rail. I am sure that if he writes to the chairman his letter will receive careful attention.

The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) claimed that because of the way that the railways started, many journeys do not begin or end where people would like. That is another illustration of the constancy of change in the market for transport. When the Transport Bill returns to the Floor of the House, I shall look for the hon. Gentleman's obvious support.

Mr. Snape: I know that the hon. Gentleman does not intend to introduce a controversial note, and before he does so he should reflect that the Opposition are interested in ensuring that there is transport where people want to go. We fear that the deregulation Bill will be a debussing Bill and destroy the system altogether.

Mr. Mitchell: I shall not pursue the hon. Gentleman on that matter on this occasion. I am sure there will be happy opportunities for hunting him in future.

The Government have considered the Bill and have no objection in principle to the powers sought by the board. A few minor points have been raised with the Bill's promoters in correspondence, but I have no reason to doubt that these will be satisfactorily cleared up. A petition has been deposited by London Regional Transport, but I understand that BR and LRT expect to resolve this matter before the Bill reaches Committee. Therefore, I recommend to the House that the Bill be given a Second Reading to allow it to proceed in the usual way to Committee where its provisions can be considered in detail.

7.21 pm

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. With the leave of the House, the hon. Member may speak again.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: May I elaborate on a point made by the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) about clause 33? He is right to say that when work No. 2 was authorised in 1980 it was regarded as subordinate to the main work in the Act, the Castlefield curve, to which he referred. For various reasons with which we are now familiar that curve has never been built and the proposal has now been abandoned. However, the board still sees a good case for retaining the powers for work No. 2, as that will enable the junction between the Liverpool and Bolton lines at Salford junction to be simplified as part of a scheme for track rationalisation in connection with the construction of the Windsor link, as it is known, which is still planned to go ahead. I hope that that reassures the hon. Gentleman.

The comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) will, I have no doubt, be noted by the board.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed.

Cambridge City Council Bill
(By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

7.22 pm

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill is promoted by the Cambridge city council, Cambridge being the finest city in Britain, having the best university in the world and being not ill-represented in the House. It has a Labour council, but the Bill has the full support of all parties.

The Bill's purpose is primarily to preserve by re-enactment in contemporary form certain existing local Act powers which were inherited under the Local Government Act 1972. I should be happy to answer any questions that hon. Members may pose.

Let me specifically refer to clause 6, which declares, for those who know Cambridge, Jesus Green to be a common and deems it to have been registered under the Commons Registration Act 1965. That has caused some concern in my constituency, but it is intended that the original common rights will be specified in an agreed amendment to be submitted in Committee.

I commend the Bill most warmly to the House.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I intervene only briefly because one of the effects of the depradations of the previous Boundary Commission was to include part of the city of Cambridge, two wards to be precise — Trumpington and Queen Edith — in my constituency. That gave me two advantages—first, of representing an agreeable part of the city, and, secondly, of having the good fortune to be a neighbour of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James). Not only is he the most distinguished historian in the House, but he is a most noted academic. My hon. Friend, a fellow of All Souls, is a remarkable constituency Member. Nobody pleads the cause of Cambridge better than he does.

Therefore, I am delighted to say that this modest measure will be of advantage to my constituents who live on the fringe and who enjoy the benefits of what my hon. Friend has rightly described as the most beautiful and successful university city in Britain, if not the world. It is non-controversial and I sincerely hope that it will reach the statute book.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I endorse many of the comments made by my hon. Friends the Members for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) and for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant). It may be convenient for me to intervene briefly to give the Government's view of the Bill.

The Government have considered the Bill and have no objection to the powers sought by the council. Neither my Department nor that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport have any observations on the Bill. Therefore, I recommend to the House that the Bill be given a Second Reading and allowed to proceed in the usual way to Committee, where its provisions can be considered in detail.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed.

C-Poultry Company Limited Bill
(By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

7.26 pm

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

7.27 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): The Bill falls mainly within the purview of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. He has no objection in principle to the powers being sought by the promoters of the Bill. He has raised a few minor points on the Bill which are under discussion with the promoters. I recommend to the House that the Bill be given a Second Reading so that its provisions can be considered in detail in Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills.

Harrogate Stray Bill
(By Order)

Order for Second reading read.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The stray is an invaluable and unique asset to Harrogate. It is a central feature of the town's character, just as Hyde park is a feature of London's. The stray has been jealously guarded down the years and the Bill is to preserve its protection. It wraps around the centre of the town like a vast village green of some 200 acres, and the subsequent development of Harrogate owes much to the great Act of 1770—the Forest of Knaresborough Act—which set out to preserve the open walks which had become an essential feature of the spa. It said:

"persons resorting to the said waters have always had the benefit of taking the air upon the open parts of the Forest".

The forest disappeared, leaving wide open spaces, but today it is enhanced by trees that have been planted over the years and the remarkable number of crocuses which provide a carpet of colour at this time of year. During the second world war, the stray took on a different use when it was dug up to grow potatoes and vegetables.

In 1792, Dr. Gamett praised both the chalbeate and sulphur waters, "the latter highly esteemed" and the "lively bracing air", not forgetting the "sociability of the company" and "the many pleasing and delightful scenes of the district".

The growth of the spa was a consequence of private and public enterprise in harness. Similarly today, Harrogate is once again profiting from its role in the growing leisure and conference business and the wealth that we derive from it.

Local doctors, Bain and Edgecombe, argued at the turn of the century that the bracing climate alone was an effective treatment for two conditions:

"the physical and mental depression resulting from town life and sedentary occupation".

and, secondly,

"that state of brain fag which is the result of prolonged and assiduous mental work without a break".

You will understand, Mr. Deputy Speaker, how much I value my weekends and recesses in my constituency. The importance of the stray for recreation cannot be over-emphasised.

The Bill is promoted by the Harrogate borough council. The Local Government Act 1972 provided that with certain exceptions local legislation promoted by local authorities prior to reorganisation should cease. By subsequent order, the cessation date for such legislation in non-metropolitan areas is 1986.

The Act of 1770 directed that the stray be set out as stinted pasture for the benefit and use of the freeholders and copyholders of Harrogate. The Act also directed that the land should thenceforward for ever remain open and unenclosed. By the Harrogate Corporation Act 1893 the powers of control and management of the stray were vested in the corporation of Harrogate, the freehold of the land remaining vested in the Duchy of Lancaster, having been part of the forest of Knaresborough of which His Majesty King George III was seized.

The borough council has management powers over the stray and there are nowadays no individual rights of common over the stray. Section 10 of the Harrogate Corporation Act 1893, from which clause 5 of the Bill is principally imported, provides:

"The corporation shall (except as in this Act otherwise provided) at all times keep the Stray uninclosed and unbuilt on as an open space for the recreation and enjoyment of the public."

Throughout its history, the stray has been widely used by the residents of Harrogate, both individually and in organised groups and teams, for many forms of recreational activity. Those activities include walking, running, picnicking, riding, soccer, rugby, grass-track cycle racing, golf, athletics and polo. Additionally, the stray is a focal point for school activities, events organised by various local and national charities, rallies, exhibitions, festivals, the town bonfire, fairs and circuses. The use of the stray for organised group games and events is subject to the permission of the council.

Being situated in the centre of Harrogate, the stray, particularly during the summer months, is used extensively by, for example, those working in offices nearby who seek a breath of fresh air during their lunch hour. It is vital to preserve its status as open parkland for the free enjoyment of the many residents and visitors to Harrogate.

Most of the Bill is a re-enactment of existing powers, but showing deference to recent common land precedents in local legislation. The management of the stray is maintained in the borough council, which has a duty to maintain the stray and the wells upon it, subject to certain powers to inclose. The powers are contained in clauses 4 and 6 of the Bill.

The new powers are the following: first, to inclose for helicopter landings; secondly, to build new public conveniences — which, incidentally, have already been constructed — and changing rooms on the stray in specified plots. Thirdly, in accordance with approved departmental policy, opportunity has been taken by the promotion of the Bill expressly to repeal relevant provisions which are considered to be redundant.

The borough carried out consultations with the Stray Defence Association and other organisations and individuals. General support for the Bill has now been universally given and full support has come from the Ramblers Association.

A number of constituents have raised important points with me and I am fully satisfied that all representations have been considered. In particular, it was originally proposed to repeal the legislation making provision for water from the wells to be supplied without charge for the public drinking fountain situated outside the royal pump room. The fountain was originally provided in view of the earlier obligation for a free supply of water to be made available from the well inside the royal pump room. I am happy to say that this Bill now incorporates this obligation and perpetuates the only surviving link with Harrogate's great past as a spa.

Local concern was expressed under the following headings: in relation to the stray, over road inprovements and the landing of helicopters; in relation to repeals of sections of earlier Acts, including sections under which low-cost or fine water is supplied to certain landowners in the borough, to alleged interference with piling rights, especially through the repeal of a provision restricting boating on Lumley reservoir, and to the repeal of a provision under which a particular landowner has the right to construct a road over part of the stray.

In relation to repeals, the borough council complied with Standing Orders of the House in giving notice of the intended repeal to those in whom the benefit of protective provisions was vested.

Five petitions were deposited against the Bill, by the Harrogate Society, by a company and by a number of individuals. Negotiations or correspondence have taken place with each of the petitioners through parliamentary agents and a measure of agreement now exists between the parties. Draft undertakings sent to the petitioners have been endorsed by the borough council in return for the withdrawal of the petitions and it has undertaken to amend the Bill so as, first, to provide that land taken elsewhere in the borough as a substitute for any part of the stray used for road or path making improvements shall be no more than 100 m away from the stray border as delineated in the stray plan; secondly, to limit the number of temporary enclosures for the purpose of aircraft landings to 12 in any given year; thirdly, to save from repeal paragraphs 2 and 10 of section 11 of the Harrogate Waterworks Act 1897, relating to water supplies from Scargill reservoir and other matters section 23 of the Harrogate Corporation Act 1893, relating to land in Granby park area, and section 25 of the Ripon Corporation Act, relating to sporting rights.

The promoters have agreed to introduce a new Bill to regulate Bogs field, and I wish to put this on the record. Bogs field was not included in the present Bill, because the council considered that, although historically it may have been part of the stray, it was different from the stray in topography, use and land ownership — the borough council owns the freehold. However, the borough council now accepts that statutory restrictions on its use and management should be enacted.

The House can derive the satisfaction that I feel that this vital part of the heritage and environment of Harrogate will, with the passage of this Bill, be preserved. I am indeed conscious of the desire of the members and officers of the Harrogate borough council to perform their functions in the full spirit of this necessary preservation.

7.35 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): This Bill is generally acceptable to us. My Department and that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport have a few minor reservations, which we are discussing with the promoters. There are a number of petitioners against the Bill and they will have a chance to present their objections to the Select Committee, which will be in a much better position than we are tonight to examine the provisions involved and will have the added benefit of expert evidence.

I hope that the House will give the Bill a Second Reading and send it to Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills.

Plymouth Marine Events Base Bill
(By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

7.36 pm

Miss Janet Fookes (Plymouth, Drake): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second Time.

Plymouth is justly famous for its long association with ships and the sea, with daring voyages of exploration and in naval terms as well, and it currently houses a major naval base, but it has also become famous over the years for recreation sailing and international competitions.

The present Bill seeks to have a marine events centre. It is soundly based and is a co-operative venture between Plymouth city council and a private firm, Dean and Dyball. We are urgently in need of this centre to provide all the facilities that are required for international yachting races and for lesser but none the less important activities. I believe that, once established, it will revitalise the area of Coxside in which it is situated and give great opportunities for employment, as well as being an additional recreational facility for the city of Plymouth.

I believe that the Bill is soundly based, and I warmly commend it to the House.

7.37 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport's Department has raised a few minor points which are under discussion with the promoters, but I hope that the House will give the Bill a Second Reading and send it to Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second Time and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills.

Scarborough Borough Council Bill
(By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

7.38 pm

Sir Michael Shaw (Scarborough): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This Bill has been promoted by the Scarborough borough council. The House will recollect that the Local Government Act 1972 provided that, with certain exceptions, local legislation promoted by local authorities prior to reorganisation should cease. By subsequent order, the cessation date for such legislation in non-metropolitan areas is 1986. The purpose of the Bill is to continue the authority and power which the corporation has always had to continue it into the future.

The Bill relates entirely to cliff railways or lifts at Scarborough and Whitby. The Whitby lift is at present operated under statutory provision under the Whitby Order 1914. The Scarborough railways are at present operated under section 24 of the Scarborough Corporation Act 1925. The Bill continues legal powers for the lift and the railways. It does this by express enactment. The Bill does not authorise the construction of new lifts or railways.

These lifts and railways are important both to Scarborough and to Whitby since much of their trade is based on tourism and both towns have steep cliffs leading down to the beach. These lifts are, of course, of great assistance to visitors to the two towns. In addition, the Scarborough railway forms a vital link between the town, the conference hotels and the spa, which has recently been refurbished at a cost of well over £5 million.

No petitions have been deposited against the Bill and I hope that it will be approved by the House.

7.39 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): We have no objection to the Bill. I hope that the House will give it a Second Reading and permit it to go into Committee as quickly as possible.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time and committed.

Streatham Park Cemetery Bill
(By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

7.40 pm

Mrs. Angela Rumbold (Mitcham and Morden): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The purpose of the Bill is to authorise the promoters, the Great Southern Cemetery and Crematorium Company Ltd., to make surplus cemetery land available for development purposes appropriate to the local community. The promoting company was incorporated in 1907 and its business consists of maintaining cemeteries and operating crematoria.

Among the cemeteries belonging to the company is the Streatham Park cemetery, which is in my constituency, where it also has a crematorium. Owing to the increasing use of cremation for the disposal of human remains, there is more land available to the promoters at this cemetery than will be required by them for burials.

The Bill is required since the lands for which power to develop is sought had technically been set aside for the burial of human remains and therefore come within the scope of the Disused Burial Grounds Act 1884. Parliamentary sanction must therefore be obtained to remove the application of that Act to the lands. In addition, parliamentary sanction is required to remove the effects of consecration in respect of part of the lands which have been consecrated, though never used, for the burial of human remains.

If the Bill is enacted and if the company decides to develop or sell the lands, it will still be necessary for the company to obtain planning permission from the local authority, the London borough of Merton, in the usual way.

It is not proposed to release any part of the development profits or proceeds of sale to the shareholders but to plough such funds back into the company. The company adopts a rolling capital improvement programme at Streatham Park cemetery and has already spent over £100,000 on major improvements, such as lawn clearance schemes, with considerable benefit to its appearance, and is scheduled to spend a further £96,000 on similar projects over the next two years.

Under clause 3—"Power to sell or develop scheduled lands"—the promoting company is given power to sell or develop the scheduled lands. By clause 4 — "Discharge of trusts" — the scheduled lands are to be freed from the effects of Disused Burial Grounds Act and, so far as the consecrated land is concerned, from the effects of consecration. Clause 5 — "Power to use scheduled lands for other purposes" — enables the scheduled lands to be used for any purposes as if they had never formed part of a cemetery. Clause 6—"Removal of human remains"—contains a code for the removal of human remains and has been included as a precaution because, to the knowledge of the promoters, the scheduled lands have never been used for burials.

Although no formal objections have been lodged by any outside sources to the Bill, considerable concern exists among the residents of Mitcham about some aspects of the measure, arising from an experience in 1971. Therefore, when the Bill is in Committee, I hope that hon. Members will be asked to look carefully, on behalf of my constituents, at clause 4 and at the second schedule, which refer basically to unconsecrated land.

I particularly ask for those provisions to be examined carefully because the disposal of human remains is a sensitive matter. Many of the relatives of my constituents have been buried there. My constituents are concerned because if the lands go for development, the possibility might arise that all the remains had not been removed within the context of the Bill. I hope, therefore, that in Committee the promoters will be questioned closely about that and asked to provide undertakings to assure my constituents that no part of the land which will be used for development purposes might still contain remains or that remains might emerge during the course of development.

The House will appreciate that that would, were it to happen, cause immense distress to my constituents, remembering that, as I said, few matters are so sensitive as the disposal of human remains. I make that important reservation about the Bill on behalf of my constituents.

The schedule to the Bill contains a description of the lands affected by the Bill, and a plan showing the lands has been deposited in the offices of the Clerk of the Parliaments and in the Private Bill Office of this House.

The passing of the Bill is the only means by which the promoters may make use of the lands which are surplus to their requirements as regards the burial of human remains for the benefit of the local community.

I reiterate that, if the Bill is to be for the benefit of the local community, the residents must be assured that there will be no impediment from their point of view to the disposal of human remains. With those reservations, I commend the measure.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): The Government hope that the Bill is acceptable now to the House, will be given a Second Reading and may be allowed to proceed in the usual way to Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills.

Sewers and Surface Drainage (Wales)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

7.46 pm

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): I am grateful for this opportunity to outline the problems associated with the non-adoption of sewers and surface drainage infrastructure in Wales.

I first became aware of the problems of unadopted sewers in 1983. Until then, like most people, I thought of sewers only rarely, and then only in the vaguest terms as rather unsavoury topics. I have found, however, that sewers are just like the underpayment of DHSS benefits, the non-repair of rented property, breaches of the sale of goods legislation and many other problems about which people think that they have rights and are protected against financial loss when, in fact, they are not.

The problems associated with unadopted and unadoptable sewers stem from 1981, when the now defunct National Water Council published a design and construction guide entitled, "Sewers for Adoption." The standards and requirements in that guide have now become the standards and requirements for sewers to be adopted by regional water authorities under sections 17 and 18 of the Public Health Act 1936.

However, those standards do not coincide with those laid down by the 1965 building regulations, which are administered by local authorities and which form the legal requirements for the construction of sewers. The two standards do not coincide because, while the building regulations meet health and safety standards, they do not incorporate the wider view relating to the standards of construction of the network as a whole.

The regional water authorities are obliged by law to take wider considerations into account when sewers are to be adopted and maintained at public expense. In other words, the water authority criteria are higher. While the building regulations are statutory, compliance with water authority standards is not.

Too often, the developer selects the cheapest and most convenient construction route—through private gardens, for example. Unfortunately, the potential house buyer—a totally innocent party—suffers because the sewers will never be adopted by the regional water authority. They are, in effect, unadoptable because they do not meet the "Sewers for Adoption" criteria. They will remain private sewers, for which the house buyer and future buyers will be legally and financially responsible for maintenance and repair.

An example of that is now occurring at Gowerton, in my constituency, where a developer has recently been granted outline planning permission on what was an application for 112 houses, although there will now be fewer than that number. So far, the developer has not offered to enter into a voluntary agreement under section 18 of the Public Health Act 1936. It has been pointed out to the developer that, if he carries out his plans to lay the sewers of the estate on private land rather than alongside the access road, as requested by the Welsh water authority and the local authority, the sewers will not meet the "Sewers for Adoption" criteria. No matter what compromise is reached regarding diameter of pipe laying at the detailed planning stage, those sewers on that private estate will never be adopted. The developer rightly points out that he is meeting all his legal requirements, but it remains a fact that future home buyers on that estate will have to pay for the short-sighted objective of the developer. In that way we are storing up problems for the future.

The Welsh water authority estimates that in Wales 16,000 homes with sewers will not be eligible for adoption. In Lliw valley, which serves part of my constituency, approximately 2,800 houses have unadopted sewers. Householders are particularly angry when they encounter this problem, because they believe, not unreasonably, that throughout the stages of house buying they are protected from it.

The house buyer notes from the estate agent's literature whether the house in which he is interested has a "public" or "private" drainage system. If he has what is described in this literature as a "private" drainage system, that relates to a cesspit or septic tank, and the price of the property often reflects the fact that the householder is responsible for the maintenance of the private system. However, if the estate agent's literature says "mains drainage," the house buyer is normally satisfied that no further questions need to be asked. Yet he may be taking on a shared responsibility for a system where far more expense can be incurred than in maintaining cesspit drainage, where the most that is usually required is replacing a pipe from the back of the house to the bottom of the garden.

The house of one of my constituents, for example, is showing all the ugly signs of subsidence. Investigations are not yet complete, but it appears from the preliminary report than an unadopted and uncharted sewer pipe from a private housing estate of 30 houses comes across the field and under his house. The pipe is broken at that point and sewage is leaking into the clay on which the house foundations lie. I cannot yet state the legal and financial implications for my constituent and the others on the estate, but that sewer will have to be re-routed at the expense of the householders on that estate.

If the system is defective at that point, it is not likely to be in good repair elsewhere. The householder will not be eligible for legal aid, even if he can seek redress from his solicitor or surveyor, or the local authority or water authority, none of which apparently was able to state the position.

What are the implications for the building society which has an interest in the value of the property and in the householder's ability to meet repayments? What are the implications for the insurance company, if the householder is covered? That is the legal and financial morass that the present position poses for consumers.

If the house buyer employs a surveyor and valuer to inspect his property before purchase, unless the property is showing signs of flooding or affecting foundations, there is no way in which a surveyor can assess or comment on the state of the sewer. The same applies to a building society surveyor. Even on new developments, sewers are normally in place and covered before house construction. It would therefore be impractical and unreasonable to expect to extend the scope of such reports to cover the adequacy of a sewerage system, but that again means that the buyer is not protected when he thinks he is and has paid fees to ensure that he is protected.

Similarly, when a home buyer pays a substantial fee for conveyancing on his property, he expects that any aspect of his purchase which could result in his incurring an unexpected expense of thousands of pounds or could affect the subsequent value of his investment would be pointed out to him by his solicitor. I understand, however, that it is not possible for a solicitor to provide this information and protection. A local authority can inform a solicitor whether the sewer is adopted and whether a section 18 agreement will take effect, but it cannot say, without the regional water authority undertaking a survey, whether an unadopted sewer system will be adopted under section 17. The standard form for solicitors' searches which is sent to local authorities does not ask whether the regional water authority has refused an application to adopt.

Some of my constituents are new residents on an estate in Clydach where 300 houses are served by an unadopted sewerage system. Those new residents could not have been informed by their solicitors, or the local authority —neither of which knew about this—that the residents on the estate were applying for the sewers to be adopted. The residents will jointly have to pay, first, for a detailed camera survey of the sewers and then for any repairs, reconstruction or re-routeing necessary to comply with water authority standards for adoption.

Some of those houses are 30 years old; others are new. How should the costs of adoption be apportioned — equally, on age of property or on length of residence? The whole matter is potentially a legal minefield, yet it could not be covered by solicitors' searches which the householder thinks cover him for such disastrous contingencies. We are talking of hundreds of thousands of pounds.

Presumably, it was awareness of that that led the Secretary of State for Wales to overrule the Welsh water authority, Dwyfor district council and a public inquiry inspector, and to order the Welsh water authority to adopt the private sewers on the Maes Gerddi estate at Porthmadog. To repair those sewers will cost the Welsh water authority an estimated £200,000. I am delighted that the residents of the estate, who are responsible for the sewers, will not have to meet those costs, but I shall expect exactly the same consideration to be given to my constituents as, I am sure, will all Members on both sides of the House. If it is right for Wales, my English colleagues will want equal treatment.

We must return to the root of the problem — the discrepancies between the building regulations and the 1981 "Sewers for Adoption" criteria, and the implications of that for sections 17 and 18 agreements. To give people the protection to which they are entitled, first, the voluntary status of section 18 must end, and, secondly, sewers must be constructed to adoptable standards, which means the regional water authority standards.

New legislation should provide that a person constructing a sewer should build it so as to comply with the building regulations and with any higher standards necessary to comply with the adoption standards of the regional water authority, and make provision, pending adoption, by way of a deposit or bond.

Such a measure, which would close the gap between building regulations and regional water authority adoption criteria, has virtually the unanimous support of regional water authorities and local authorities. The Principality Building Society and other building societies, the Building Societies Association and the Law Society are firmly behind that suggestion.

The Association of District Councils, whose members, as planning authorities, are placed in a most invidious position, has been pressing for that change since 1982, as has the Building Societies' Association. At that time, the Secretary of State for the Environment deflected those representations by saying that pressure would be brought to bear on developers to construct sewers to adoptable standards. Informal pressure and voluntary section 18 agreements have not worked. As my constituents know, developers continue to opt for the cheapest method of construction. I hope that the Minister realises that I shall not be fobbed off with that sort of reassurance tonight. Voluntary agreements have not worked. Meanwhile, we are continuing to store up tremendous and expensive problems for the future.

I am aware that such a simple step will not resolve all the problems at a stroke. First, there will be instances of new sewers being connected to existing systems not complying with the adoption criteria. In 1936, with the introduction of the Public Health Act, a blanket adoption was given to existing public sewers. A similar solution was applied in Scotland under the 1968 Act when it was applied in 1973. However, a much more recent precedent for releasing home owners from the unknown financial implications of inadequate construction is the Housing Defects Act 1984. I see no sound or just reason why unadopted sewers should not be regarded in the same way as houses in that Act, especially as the Government should have been able to predict the problems inherent in the water councils' higher adoption standards not coinciding with the building regulations.

Secondly, a developer may feel that the regional water authority conditions are unacceptably stringent, or that a bond or deposit requirement is unnecessarily high for a particular development. It would therefore be both sensible and practical to incorporate a right of appeal into the mandatory requirement. That would help the construction industry, which is labour-intensive. As the right of appeal is already a provision of section 17, the decline in those appeals should allow for a new provision, without an increase in administration costs or building costs associated with delay.

Similarly, as water authorities are already consulted about planning applications, regardless of whether a section 18 agreement is being considered by a developer, I cannot see that mandatory section 18 agreements with the right of appeal would increase the administrative costs of regional water authorities. The procedure would be far more cost effective for the public. Indeed, the whole thrust of this call for legislation is in the public interest.

I am sure that this issue will not stimulate the same interest as the economic statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer earlier today, but for those people in homes with unadopted sewers, the need for change is just as important. When my constituents and other people buy houses and incur considerable expense in surveys and solicitors' fees, they think that they are protected from disaster. They are not, if they or their neighbour has unadopted and unadoptable sewers. Therefore, I urge the Minister, on behalf of the people of Wales, to take up this issue and to persuade his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales to introduce legislation to ensure that home buyers are given that protection which, as consumers, they have a right to expect and to which they are entitled.

8.8 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): I must first congratulate the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) on his lucid and well-informed speech about the difficulties which can arise when foul and surface water sewers are not adopted. It is fortunate that the number of unadopted sewers which cause serious problems are few, but, nevertheless, when problems arise they are often difficult and expensive to put right and in the interim they can cause untold problems and worries for the residents who are affected. Therefore, I welcome the opportunity that this debate offers to explore some of the reasons why these problems have arisen, what remedy is currently available and to assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government are aware of the problems faced by some householders and are already considering what action needs to be taken. I should perhaps add that, although the hon. Gentleman has highlighted problems in Wales and particular cases in his own constituency, such problems are common to both England and Wales.

I shall look at the commonest causes of non-adoption. Under section 20 of the Public Health Act 1936, as amended by the Water Act 1973, all sewers in public ownership at 1 April 1974 were deemed to be vested in the relevant water authority. Thus, there passed into the public ownership of the Welsh water authority over 12,000 km of sewers.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is well aware that even today, some 10 years after the setting up of the water authorities, one of the biggest causes of complaint by them is the inadequate plans and records of their sewers. The local authorities, which originally owned the sewers before the setting up of the water authorities, are the same authorities, or their successors, who today still act as agents of the water authority in the building, maintenance and management of the local sewer network. Thus, of the 2,700 or so properties identified by the hon. Gentleman in his constituency as being served by unadopted sewers, some may, in fact, be public sewers, but, because of inadequate documentation at the time, the water authority did not accept responsibility for them. I am told that many of them are indeed the property of Swansea city council.

I should add that the Welsh water authority has been very generous in its treatment of non-adopted sewers in this category, and in a letter to all its sewerage agency councils in 1980-81 it offered a final amnesty and to accept sewers into its ownership which were public sewers in 1974 but had been left off the sewer maps. I am sorry to say that the response from the district councils was very disappointing.

The second cause of non-adoption is that the water authorities will not accept the transfer of sewers into their ownership until the development to which they relate has been completed. This seems to me to be a very sensible approach by the water authorities, and has many precedents in other fields. Clearly, the water authority needs to be absolutely sure of what it is taking on and to have the opportunity of examining and testing the complete system before adoption. This can lead to problems for householders when a builder takes several years to complete a development. In the interim, problems arising related to the sewer are the responsibility of the developer, who may or may not be quick to remedy the situation or who may or may not be the same as the original developer who started the work. In all of that, the consumers who are paying their charge to the water authority for sewerage services find it difficult to understand why the water authority, or its agents the district council, will not act to help them.

The third cause of non-adoption and the one which ultimately seems to cause most resentment is the sewer built by a developer which is put forward for adoption by the water authority under section 17 of the Public Health Act 1936 and is then found to be defective and not up to the standard required by the water auhority for adoption. The cause can be bad design; for example, the sewer is laid at the wrong depth below the road surface, or at the wrong gradient for it to be properly self-cleansing. Another problem often encountered is poor workmanship and materials. Even if the sewer conforms with building regulations, it may not conform with the standards required by the water authorities for adoption, which reflect wider considerations. I have to say that although I accept some of the points made by the hon. Gentleman on the difference in standard between building regulations and water authority adoption standards, many of the cases which have come to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales show some failure, often on the part of the local authority, in inspecting and enforcing building regulations.

So much for the causes of non-adoption. Now let us look at the remedy. The drain and/or branch sewer serving an individual property is the responsibility of the individual house owner. However, the main sewer is normally in the ownership of the developer until adopted by the water authority. If problems do arise with that sewer, the first remedy for the individual is to seek action by or redress from the developer, and that quite often leads to a satisfactory outcome. Even after completion of a development, if the sewer remains undadopted, the remedy for the householder is still with the developer or his successor in title ultimately through the courts.

A common feature of cases that come to the attention of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for the Environment is where a developer has gone into liquidation and the residents themselves ask the water authority or its agents, the district council, to adopt a sewer. If the water authority refuses, there is a right of appeal to the Secretary of State under section 17(3) of the Public Health Act 1936.

That section of the Act lays down certain specific points to which my right hon. Friends should address themselves, as well as the facts of the individual case. I must stress that each case is different, usually presenting a combination of problems, causes and special factors, all of which have to be taken into account in reaching a decision on whether the sewers should or should not be adopted by the water authority. To assist my right hon. Friends in coming to a decision, they nearly always offer the parties the opportunity to state their case before an inspector, appointed for the purpose, at a private hearing or a public local inquiry. I am pleased to say that there have been quite a number of instances where, because of the circumstances of the individual case, my right hon. Friends have been able to find in favour of the residents and to have the sewers adopted.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Maes Gerddi estate decision. A judicial review before the High Court on that section 17 case decision is pending, to which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is a party. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will understand that, for that reason,

[Mr. Wyn Roberts]

I would not wish at this stage to get into a debate about the detailed application of section 17. He will realise that I must also be careful about how far I can discuss any individual cases that might ultimately find their way to my right hon. Friends for a decision on appeal under section 17(3) of the Public Health Act 1936.

As the hon. Gentleman said, there is a way open to developers which readily overcomes the problems about which we are talking today. That has been available since the Public Health Act 1936. Section 18 provides for a developer to enter into an agreement with the water authority that the sewers will be adopted upon completion, subject to their being built to the standards set down in that agreement. This provides a safeguard for both parties, in that the developer will be able to discharge his responsibility for ownership and maintenance of the sewer upon completion, and the water authority is assured that the sewer is built to a standard that will ensure its adoption. The residents also have the benefit of knowing that any problems that arise will be dealt with by the water authority.

The hon. Gentleman has been seeking assurances that the Government will take action to stop these problems arising in future. He has made several interesting suggestions, which I certainly promise to examine and consider with my right hon. Friends.

In case the hon. Gentleman is not aware of the situation, I should inform him that a working party composed of officials from Government Departments and the water authorities is currently examining the existing legislation relating to sewerage and sewage treatment and disposal, to see what changes are required to bring the legislation up to date and to remedy deficiencies. This follows on from the view of the Law Commissioners that the existing sewerage legislation is in need of consolidation. One of the areas of difficulty identified by the working party is the adoption of sewers. I shall certainly pass on the hon. Gentleman's ideas to that working party for its consideration.

The hon. Gentleman has pressed the case for a change in the law which requires developers to enter into a section 18 agreement with the water authority. This is certainly one option being examined by the legislative review group. The suggestion has the attraction from the residents' point of view that their sewers would be adopted. However, at that point one has to stop and examine exactly what is implied by such an agreement.

Certain obvious questions arise. First, how far does adoption go? Is it just the main sewer, the main sewer and branch sewers, or all sewers and drains to the curtilage of a property? There are a number of other possibilities as well. Secondly, the adoption standards are often more stringent than the building regulations, as the hon. Gentleman noted, because of the longer-term needs of water authorities, and thus they are more expensive to implement. This has an obvious consequence for any purchaser. Thirdly, with the sort of agreement envisaged by the hon. Gentleman, how far should the water authorities go in planning for possible extension of development to the site? The cost of such provision to the initial developer could be very high. All that I can do this evening is pose the questions. I shall certainly not try to answer them.

The present system of voluntary section 18 agreements works well and enables the developer to agree the extent of adoption and ensure the best balance of cost and service to the purchaser of property on the site being developed. Thus, though there are initial obvious attractions to the hon. Gentleman's proposition, all aspects must be carefully considered. The views that he expressed are helpful in this consideration. I assure him that they will be given further attention.

This debate has been most constructive. I hope that the elucidation and assurances that I have been able to give to the hon. Member have helped to assure him that the Government are very much alive to the problems faced, thankfully, by a very small minority of the population. Nevertheless, they are important. I am also glad to confirm to him that the Government are actively examining what action needs to be taken both to stop these problems occurring in future and to deal with existing problems.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-two minutes past Eight o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iran and Iraq (Prisoners of War)

1. Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will, in conjunction with other European Economic Community Ministers, make a protest to the Governments of Iran and Iraq concerning the torture of prisoners of war as highlighted by the United Nations report issued last month.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Richard Luce): We share the view expressed in the United Nations report that the situation concerning the treatment of prisoners of war in Iran and Iraq gives cause for serious concern. When the United Nations has completed its examination of that report we shall consider what supplementary action might be appropriate, either unilaterally or in conjunction with our partners in the Ten.

Mr. Brown: I thank the Minister for that reply. In view of the flare-up in the Gulf and the horrendous casualties on both sides, why do neither the British Government nor the international community make any great effort to bring an end to this dreadful war? Why has the Minister not sought a meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations, and why has he not imposed a ban on the sale of arms to both Iraq and Iran?

Mr. Luce: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we view the recent developments in the Iran-Iraq war as extremely serious. The hon. Gentleman may realise that on 15 March the President of the Security Council issued a statement appealing for an end of the hostilities and for a resumption of the agreement of last June that there should be no attacks on the civilian populations of either side. We strongly support and endorse that. Within the European Community, we have made strong representations to both the Iranian and Iraqi Governments in support of that statement. We shall go on working with our friends in the Community and elsewhere to make special efforts towards peace.

Mr. Marlow: In view of the reports by the International Commission of Jurists of the torturing of prisoners in Fara'a, including cigarette burning, beatings and hoodings, by the Israelis, will my hon. Friend take up this issue?

Mr. Luce: I take note of my hon. Friend's comment, but the question is about prisoners of war in the conflict between Iraq and Iran. The United Nations report is still being studied and examined. When conclusions have been reached, we shall do all that we can to see that they are implemented.

President Mubarak

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's meetings with President Mubarak of Egypt.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. Friend's discussions with President Mubarak reflected the excellent state of Anglo-Egyptian relations. They had a full discussion of Arab-Israel peace efforts; the Prime Minister expressed support for the President's efforts, and those of King Hussein, to make progress towards a negotiated settlement. The Prime Minister and the President also expressed serious concern about the situation in Lebanon and in the Sudan.

Mr. Mikardo: I thank the Minister for that reply. This question may be a little unfair, but does he think that there is a realistic expectation of negotiations between Israel and the joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation within the reasonably near future?

Mr. Luce: All I can say is that where there are signs of any constructive efforts to move in that direction, it is our job and obligation as a Government to do all that we can to encourage them. We have noticed what happened in the agreement between King Hussein and Mr. Arafat on 11 February. We have observed with interest the remarks of Prime Minister Peres of Israel, in which he has some favourable comments to make on some of the developments taking place and some of the speeches that are being made from the Arab side. We shall do our utmost to encourage that process.

Mr. Walters: Should the moderate Arab leaders such as President Mubarak and King Hussein fail to persuade the Americans of the need to launch a major peace initiative, will my hon. Friend consider the possibility of a joint Euro-Arab approach to President Reagan to persuade him of the need for an initiative while circumstances remain favourable, like the particularly good arrangements made between King Hussein and Mr. Arafat, and before it is too late?

Mr. Luce: I have carefully noted my hon. Friend's suggestion, which he also made in last Thursday's Adjournment debate. I think that he will know as well as I do the extent of the contact between ourselves and the President of the United States. There have been two meetings between my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the President in the past three months, including talks on the subject of the middle east, and there has also been extensive contact between distinguished Arab leaders, including President Mubarak and King Fahd. The Foreign Minister of Jordan is also in Washington this week. Thus, there is extensive contact. We are also very pleased to support the fact that President Reagan has announced that he is prepared to launch renewed efforts to get peace negotiations going. This week it has been announced that Mr. Murphy will be sent as a special envoy to the middle east to try to get things moving.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: How does the Minister respond to Mr. Mubarak's suggestion that unless there is action on Israel there will be an outbreak of action and extremism by the individual Islamic groups? What does the hon. Gentleman intend to do about that? Does he intend to refer that conversation to the American President and to ask for action on that?

Mr. Luce: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is talking about Israel's actions in the Lebanon, or about the occupied territories. If he is talking about the occupied territories, I must repeat that the British Government take a very strong view in condemning the existence of settlements in the occupied territories. Indeed, we are deeply concerned by the evidence of the economic conditions of those who live in the occupied territories. We have now stepped up the amount of bilateral aid that we are prepared to give to Palestinians living in the occupied territories. We believe that the conditions there and the existence of the settlements are not conducive to peace.

Mr. Hayes: Among the many important issues that my hon. Friend raised with President Mubarak, did he mention the question of the kidnapping of certain people in Beirut? If so, can he tell us what progress is being made on the possible release of the British national involved, as some information can then be given to his family?

Mr. Luce: Of course we discussed the question of the Lebanon. My hon. Friend will know that on the serious matter of the kidnapping of two British subjects, Mr. Nash and Mr. Levick—about which there is great concern—the Islamic Jihad has claimed responsibility. The British ambassador and the British Government are pursuing the issue most vigorously through all possible channels in order to identify where they are and to seek their release. We are also approaching other Governments whom we think may be able to help. We take the kidnappings very seriously. As my hon. Friend knows, the British ambassador has made it plain that we do not feel that British subjects living in west Beirut—numbering about 70—would be wise to stay there in present conditions.

Mr. Anderson: Does the Minister accept that it would have been a serious blow to the peace initiative if President Mubarak had returned home just with a mild rebuke from Washington, and that the Prime Minister's positive response is, therefore, most welome? Is there any serious prospect of us engaging our EEC partners and possibly building on the Venice declaration in respect of the middle east, as that would certainly be welcome to several Arab countries?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his earlier remarks. I reaffirm that we are strongly committed to the two principles of the Venice declaration, because we do not believe that there can be any peace unless the principle of the right of Israel to exist within secure boundaries and the principle of the right of self-determination of the Palestinians are recognised. We are in very close touch with our European partners in the Community. We regard the point made by the hon. Gentleman as a matter of importance, because we think that collectively we can bring some influence to bear.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Does my hon. Friend agree that President Mubarak represents a significant factor in further progress towards peace in the middle east? Will he confirm that during the recent talks the Government encouraged President Mubarak to continue with his endeavours?

Mr. Luce: We listened with great interest to the practical ideas that President Mubarak put forward, which I believe are designed to mesh in with the proposals that King Hussein and Mr. Arafat launched on 11 February. We have already made it plain that we will do everything that we can to encourage that process. We note that President Mubarak and King Hussein are working very closely together, and, indeed, met this week.

Geneva Arms Talks

4. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government made to the United States Government prior to the resumption of the Geneva arms talks.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): Both before and since the beginning of the Geneva talks on 12 March we have maintained close contact with the United States. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I had discussions with President Reagan and Secretary of State Shultz in December and February. Those talks covered all aspects of the issues which will be the subject of the Geneva negotiations.

Mr. Ross: Given Mr. Richard Perle's criticisms of the Foreign Secretary's speech, reported in the newspapers today, will the Foreign Secretary tell us exactly where we now stand on the star wars issue? Did he make any representations about the extra 21 multi-warheaded MX missiles? Is it not time that we called for a freeze by both sides to give the talks a chance to succeed?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: A freeze would not be a useful contribution to the prospect of conclusions on balanced arms control, because it would immobolise the imbalance that currently exists, not least in intermediate range nuclear weapons.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said yesterday,

"The policy"

—on star wars—

"was, and remains, in the four points set out at Camp David and reaffirmed when I was in Washington. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary was speaking in pursuance of that policy."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 779.]

The 21 MX missiles are part of the programme of modernisation to which the United States is committed. That is one aspect of the search being undertaken at Geneva for an effective agreement on arms control, including a reduction in nuclear weapons on all sides.

Sir Peter Blaker: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that in his speech last week he supported the American research on the strategic defence initiative, as the Prime Minister has done? Is that not the right course for our Government to take, given that the Soviet Union itself is widely known to be conducting research?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend. That is one of the points that I have made clear not only in that speech but on many other occasions, including discussions with representatives of the Soviet Union and her allies. The Soviet Union has for many years been engaged in research in that field, and has moved further towards deployment within the limits of the 1972 treaty. It is essential for the West to match that research and the way in which it is being carried out.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will my right hon. and learned Friend repeat and emphasise his misgivings about the strategic defence initiative passing the research stage? Does he agree that if the SDI does not work it will be a gigantic waste of money, and that if it works it will simply encourage the development of the alternative nuclear weapons delivery systems to which Britain and Europe are particularly vulnerable?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I quite understand that point. That is why we have emphasised—it was one of the points agreed at Camp David—that research should certainly proceed. As members of the American Administration have made clear, we cannot know what the research programme that the President and Secretary of State Weinberger have directed will uncover.

It is also clear—another of the Camp David points—that the deployment of SDI-related weapons would be a matter for negotiation in the context of existing treaty obligations.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Does the Secretary of State accept that there is considerable applause on this side of the House—and some from his own side—for his lukewarm attitude to the strategic defence initiative? Will he go a step further and make it clear to President Reagan and to the Americans that star wars is a lot of nonsense and that the enormous amount of money that will be spent on this research would be far better spent in other fields?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I invite the hon. Gentleman to address that serious question on the right basis. Research into defence technology in space has been undertaken by the Soviet Union for many years, and the Soviet Union projects into space more than twice as many objects of that kind as the rest of the world together. It is therefore important for such research to be sustained. It is equally important to stress that the outcome of that research is by no means concluded and that, as the Camp David points made clear, the deployment of SDI-related technology must be a matter for negotiations.

Mr. Ian Lloyd: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the defence of the free world for at least four decades has depended on, now depends on and will in the future depend on the capacity of the free world to maintain and create a superior defence technology? Will he assure us that nothing will be done to prejudice that capacity?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The defence of the world from the prospect of war in the past 40 years has depended on the effectiveness of the nuclear deterrent. It is equally clear, as was set out in one of the four points at Camp David, that the aim of the United States and the West is not to achieve superiority but to maintain balance, which is crucially important, taking into account Soviet development.

Mr. Nellist: Is the Foreign Secretary aware that, parallel to the resumption of the so-called disarmament talks in Geneva, there was a two-day United Nations conference which tried to raise $1·5 billion to save 30 million people in Africa from the effects of starvation? As the major world powers spend £1 million a minute on weapons and armaments, does the Foreign Secretary agree that that problem could have been solved not in two days but in one if the real issue—total disarmament—had been taken up at Geneva?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the importance of the world doing everything that it can to address itself to the problem of starvation, and worse, in Africa. That is a programme in which we have taken a leading part. If he wants to compare that with the other major issue to which he referred, he should take account of the fact that the Soviet Union spends probably twice as large a percentage of its gross national product on arms as, and that her record of giving aid to such countries compares lamentably with that of, the free world.

Mr. Nicholls: Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that probably the main reason why the Russians came back to the disarmament talks is that they were convinced that the West was prepared to defend itself? Was not the West's lead in star wars technology such that the Russians had no alternative but to come back to the negotiating table?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sure that one of the factors which has persuaded the Soviet Union of the need to resume the arms control talks, which she had left, has been the continued and effective unity of the North Atlantic Alliance, as demonstrated and sustained by the continued deployment programme of intermediate range weapons in Europe.

Mr. Norman Atkinson: When the Foreign Secretary refers to the imbalance between nuclear weapons possessed by NATO and those possessed by the Soviet Union, and goes on to say that that was the initial discussion at Geneva, is that on the assumption that the true numbers are put on the table for negotiation? If so, why does the Foreign Secretary refuse to confirm to Members of Parliament the exact numbers of nuclear weapons possessed by Britain?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman will find that the extent to which the Government and the country have laid open the nature and scale of our weapons, as set out in successive White Papers, compares very favourably with any other country.

Mr. Baldry: Although the negotiations at Geneva are important, disarmament talks are also taking place at Stockholm, and there are talks on the control of chemical weapons. What initiatives are the Government taking on the control of chemical weapons, which are just as frightening as nuclear weapons to mainland Europe?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding us of the importance of achieving a worldwide ban on chemical weapons, such as we seek. Probably the hardest issue is verification. He will know that that is a subject on which the United Kingdom has taken a leading part. We tabled several proposals directed at that problem—in 1983 and 1984—and on 12 March 1985, my hon. Friend the Minister of State presented further proposals to that end in Geneva. My hon. Friend is right to underline the importance of this matter.

Mr. Healey: May I congratulate the Foreign Secretary on the penetrating and comprehensive critique of the star wars programme that he made the other day, and on provoking an alarming outburst of hysteria from the editor of The Times? As President Reagan said that he was ready to consider a ban or moratorium on tests of anti-satellite weapons, whereas the Foreign Secretary said that the future is now, will he now make the negotiation of such a ban the main objective of British policy, and will he seek to extend it to a ban or moratorium on all tests of space systems which are capable of verification by national means?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the importance of verification, which is a crucial part of any effective disarmament agreement. He is right also to remind the House that in my speech I was commending the statement by the President of the United States in his United Nations address about his willingness to work for agreement in ASAT technology. I respond, as always, with gratitude to the congratulations extended by the right hon. Gentleman, but I remind him that he should read the speech as a whole and understand beyond doubt that the speech was based firmly and squarely upon the existing policy as set out by my right hon. Friend to the President at Camp David.

Middle East

5. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what responses have been monitored by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office from Palestinian spokesmen about clarification of their attitude on the Hussein initiative; and whether they accepted United Nations Security Council resolution 242, modified by 338, since the Prime Minister's statement of 26 February, Official Report, c. 173-74.

Mr. Luce: We have noted a number of statements by Palestinian spokesmen representing different shades of opinion. King Hussein's initiative does not refer explicitly to United Nations Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, but spokesmen have drawn attention to the fact that it is based on the principle of "Comprehensive peace as established in United Nations and Security Council resolutions".

Mr. Cox: Is the Minister aware that in February the central committee of the PLO completely rejected resolution 242 and that it is seeking to destroy the whole of the Hussein initiative? In the light of such action, how can the state of Israel believe statements about groups respecting its security and right to exist as a country? That is what this issue is about, and that is why there is such great concern in Israel about the kinds of statements that the PLO has been making.

Mr. Luce: I think that it would be to Israel's benefit, as Prime Minister Peres said in some of his comments, to take seriously what King Hussein and Mr. Arafat have said in their joint statement. As I have said in my main answer, the statement refers to United Nations Security Council resolutions. Those resolutions talk about the exchange of territory for peace. I believe that that could form a basis for discussion between the Arab world, the Palestinians and the Israelis. All that we can hope to do is to look for the constructive points that have been made, pick them out and try to help their development. It is for the parties involved to do this, but we must encourage those positive points.

Mr. Latham: Since King Hussein, President Mubarak and Prime Minister Peres have simultaneously during the past few weeks either lanuched initiatives or responded favourably to them and have made similar statements in Washington, is it not time that they all met to do something about those initiatives?

Mr. Luce: We very much hope that there will now be progress towards some agreement about the basis for discussion. We hope that there can be direct discussion between the Palestinians and King Hussein on the one hand and Israel on the other. We have noted that President Mubarak has some practical ideas in this direction.

Geneva Arms Talks

6. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what role the United Kingdom has played in the disarmament talks which commenced in Geneva on 12 March.

Mr. Luce: The United Kingdom is not a party to the bilateral talks between the United States and Soviet Union which began on 12 March. We have, however, played a full part in consultations within NATO on the subject of nuclear and space weapons. We remain in contact at the highest level with the United States and Soviet Union.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I welcome that reply and especially the expressions of solidarity with NATO. Will my hon. Friend comment on those areas where we are perhaps directly involved and can take a positive lead?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that question. As he heard a little earlier, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary stressed that only last week, on behalf of the British Government, I tabled a fresh set of proposals designed to improve the system of verification in a comprehensive agreement on chemical weapons. The House should be aware that Britain abandoned its chemical weapons over a quarter of a century ago, that the United States has not produced additional chemical weapons since 1969 and that the Soviet Union has acquired more than 300,000 tonnes of nerve agents. This is a serious situation, which makes it all the more urgent that we should progress towards a comprehensive agreement.

Mr. Cartwright: Has the Minister noted the appeal made earlier this week by the Federal German Foreign Minister, Mr. Genscher, that there should be a direct European voice in the Geneva discussions? Do the Government support that approach? If so, what steps will they take to try to secure that direct European involvement?

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and other Ministers proposed that there should be greater co-operation, possibly through the Western European Union, on security matters within Europe. There is already a great deal of consultation within the NATO Alliance, which includes the European contributors to the Alliance. The range of consultation is extensive.

Human Rights (Afghanistan)

8. Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the United Nations report drawn up by Mr. Felix Ermacora on the subject of human rights in Afghanistan.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We entirely endorse the report's conclusion that gross violations of human rights are occurring in Afghanistan. We continue to urge Soviet leaders to end the immense human suffering inflicted on the Afghan people—which is detailed in the report—by withdrawing their forces.

Mr. Moynihan: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is the Government's duty to make strong representations over alleged human rights violations in Afghanistan, especially in view of the Ermacora report, which states that there are an estimated 50,000 prisoners being held in Afghanistan, alleged torture in gaols, a deliberate policy of bombing villages and summary execution of captured guerrillas?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The Afghan people have been denied the fundamental human right of self-determination. There is massive suffering in Afghanistan as a result of continuing Soviet occupation, including loss of life and the destruction of villages and crops. The tactics adopted last year were even more brutal than before. They included high-level indiscriminate bombing and the depopulation of some areas. The world must never forget that it is the presence of more than 100,000 Soviet troops that is maintaining a regime that is unacceptable to the Afghan people. We do not miss any opportunity of drawing that to the attention of Soviet leaders.

Mr. Skinner: What kind of hypocrisy do we have to listen to from the Government over Russia and Afghanistan? In 1980, the Government, led, of course, by the Prime Minister, were demanding that British athletes should not go anywhere near——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about human rights in Afghanistan.

Mr. Skinner: My supplementary question is on that subject, Mr. Speaker. The Government were demanding that British athletes should not go anywhere near Moscow because of the invasion of Afghanistan. Within 12 months the great and grand boycott had been called off by the Iron Lady. Over the past two years both the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary, as well as almost every other Minister, have trotted across to Moscow whenever there has been a chance to do so. How can they adopt these double standards?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman's lack of comprehension of this subject surpasses that which we have come to expect even from him. The Government are acting and speaking on behalf of the House and the nation in seeking to promote better relations between East and West, between the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union and its allies. In the course of doing that we should not allow the world to forget the continuing Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in a war that has continued for longer than did the war between the Soviet Union and Germany. The invasion still persists and I raised this subject with Mr. Gorbachev at Christmas. It has been raised with the Soviet Union on other occasions. It is regrettable that there has been no change so far in the Soviet position.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: As the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary seem to be finding the new Soviet leadership somewhat affable, could it not again be put to them that East-West relations could be transformed if they would end what one might call their Vietnam in Afghanistan?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend is underlining the very point that I have made. It is important not to allow our approach to policy towards the Soviet Union to fall out of balance. We want to achieve, and we are seeking to achieve, improved relations with the Soviet Union and its allies. We must not allow that to lead us to overlook continuing important issues of the sort that my hon. Friend has raised. We have taken every opportunity to draw this to the attention of the Soviet Union and we shall continue to do so.

Mr. Anderson: Does the report give the answer to those in the United States and elsewhere who claim that the United Nations is selective in its human rights considerations?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I think that there are always bound to be views about the selectivity of almost any organisation. On this point, the hon. Gentleman is right to remind the House that the voting in the General Assembly of the United Nations last year was 119 in favour of a motion condemning the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan with only 20 against, a record majority. It is quite right that that should have been recorded and that we should remind the House of that fact.

Geneva Arms Talks

10. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will recommend the inclusion of the British independent nuclear deterrent in the Geneva arms reduction talks.

Mr. Luce: We have made it clear that, as far as the United Kingdom's independent deterrent is concerned, it would be wrong as things stand for us to seek to trade reductions with a super power. But we have made it clear that if Soviet and United States strategic arsenals were to be very substantially reduced, and if no significant changes had occurred in Soviet defensive capabilities, the United Kingdom would want to review her position and to consider how best she could contribute to arms control in the light of the reduced threat. That remains our position.

Mr. Meadowcroft: While I note the Minister's earlier comment that Britain was not a party to the talks at Geneva, may I ask whether he believes that it would assist those talks if Britain were to be a party to them? If that is the case, surely a pre-condition to participation in those talks is the willingness to include our own independent nuclear deterrent in the talks on disarmament.

Mr. Luce: No. To go back to the hon. Gentleman's first point, I think that the essential pre-condition for any progress in the very serious arms race that has been taking place in the last few years is that the two main super powers, who possess the vast bulk of the strategic arsenal of the world, should get together and see whether they can make progress. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the British Government support the June communiqué issued by Mr. Shultz and Mr. Gromyko. We give every support to that. We are in close consultation with the United States. With regard to the British deterrent, the position is as stated in my answer to the question.

Mr. Leigh: Will my hon. Friend accept that, given that this country on occasions can maintain only one Polaris submarine at sea, a reduction in our nuclear capability would mean, in effect, a cancellation? Will he also accept that there is a difference between accepting that and helping the disarmament negotiations by allowing our nuclear weapons to be taken into account in the total number of Western forces?

Mr. Luce: Indeed. We have to consider what is the minimum requirement to provide an effective deterrent in our independent strategic deterrent force. That is a factor that we have to keep in mind all the time. We have to remind ourselves that our forces are literally only 3 per cent. of, for example, the strategic forces of the United States and/or separately of the Soviet Union, and that it must be for them to see whether they can make progress, as we hope they will. Thereafter, of course, we can consider our position.

Mr. Healey: Following the question of the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh), is the Minister aware that Mr. Gromyko himself said that the Soviet Government were seeking not a reduction in British nuclear forces but only that they should be counted in the balance of offensive forces on the Western side in the Geneva talks? Since Her Majesty's Government in the 1983 White Paper on defence said that the Russians must take account of the British nuclear forces, what possible objection is there to allowing the Russians to take account of those forces in the arms talks?

Mr. Luce: At this stage what is important is that the two super powers, which are the main possessors of all strategic weapons, should get together and try to see whether they can make progress. As I have said, our position is quite clear. If they make substantial progress, we can reconsider our position.

VE Day (40th Anniversary)

11. Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to make any invitation to the Soviet Union to attend ceremonies in the United Kingdom to commemorate the 40th anniversary of VE Day conditional on the Government of the Soviet Union revealing details of the fate of Raoul Wallenberg.

Mr. Woodall asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will seek to make an invitation to the Soviet Government to participate in the VE Day 40th anniversary celebrations in the United Kingdom conditional on the release from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics of Soviet war veterans and others.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We hope that the 40th anniversary of the end of the war will be seen in all countries as an occasion for a rededication to the causes of freedom, human rights and the dignity of man for which victory was won. We do not believe that it would be either appropriate or effective to set preconditions to foreign representation at our national commemoration. However, we have on several occasions pressed the Soviet Government to provide further details on the important question of the fate of Raoul Wallenberg.

Mr. Sumberg: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is somewhat ironic that in 1985 we are commemorating the 40th anniversary of peace and freedom, yet that heroic man Raoul Wallenberg is probably enduring his 40th anniversary of imprisonment? Is this not an ideal opportunity to get the Soviet Union at long last to tell us and the world the truth?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with my hon. Friend that the 40 years of peace that we shall be commemorating have many blemishes upon them, a particularly important one being the fate of Raoul Wallenberg. As my hon. Friend knows, the Soviet claim is that he died in prison in the Soviet Union in 1947. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue to make inquiries about the matter until we achieve a satisfactory answer.

Mr. Winnick: In view of the immense contribution made by the Soviet Union to the defeat of Hitler's Germany, would it not be ludicrous to make any condition about the Soviet Union participating in the 40th anniversary? That having been said, is the Foreign Secretary aware that many of us find it very difficult to understand why the Soviet authorities continue to deny information about Mr. Wallenberg? Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the Soviet authorities should make clear when Mr. Wallenberg died and in what circumstances — and particularly why he was kept in custody at all, bearing in mind the very brave role that he played in trying to save lives near the end of the war?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is not often that I have the opportunity of agreeing with the hon. Gentleman, but I am glad to be able to do so and to acknowledge the point made in the first part of his question. I am sure that the whole House will support any representations that we continue to make on this important matter.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Budget Rebate

71. Mr. Lamble asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to secure from the European Economic Community the United Kingdom abatement of £625 million in respect of 1984.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The timing of our abatement remains as laid down in the Fountainebleau conclusions, which provided for it to be made available in 1985.

Mr. Lamble: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman, in spite of his answer, still prepared to guarantee that the abatement will, despite other factors, be given in 1985? If not, why have the Government agreed to supplementary loans this year totalling £350 million?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Community is committed by the Fountainebleau agreement to the introduction of new own resources not later than 1 January next year. There is no dispute in the Council that the Fountainebleau agreement must be implemented, and that in accordance with it we must receive the £590 million abatement of our 1984 budgetary contribution in the course of 1985. At this moment in the Council we are continuing to press for the establishment of the instruments that will assure that.

Mr. Marlow: If my right hon. and learned Friend were in the happy situation that he was owed £625 million by somebody, would he lend that person more money until he had his money back?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If I were in the relationship of a partnership with the Community, in which we are working together, and in which I know, as I have told the House, that there is no dispute in the Council or the Community that the Fountainebleau agreement must be implemented on time, I should approach the matter on the basis of that fact.

Policy and Reforms

72. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reforms are currently under discussion within the European Economic Community.

73. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further proposals he intends to place before his European Community partners for the development of Community policies.

76. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the current priorities of the European Economic Community.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Community's first priority is to reach decisions in the enlargement negotiations and on implementation of the Fontainebleau conclusions. A number of proposals for longer-term institutional change have been put forward in the Ad Hoc Committee on Institutions, which will report to the March European Council.

Mr. Maxton: In view of the 7 per cent. increase in the agriculture budget, in a Community budget in which agriculture now represents 74 per cent. of the total, and in view of the unwillingness of any of the EC countries to accept any cuts in agricultural prices, will the Foreign Secretary tell us what has happened about the reform of the common agricultural policy—or does he agree with his Conservative colleague, Mr. David Curry, a Member of the European Parliament, that we should forget about the reform of the CAP because it is impossible?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That would be a curious and discouraging conclusion to reach, and I would certainly not reach it. One of the major purposes of the Fontainebleau agreement was to establish a framework which would secure a gradual reduction in the percentage of resources being devoted to the CAP. Since that time the process of reform has been moving steadily forward. The 1985 proposals put forward by the Commission show a determination to control costs. The wine reform regime agreed in Dublin has now been implemented. The agricultural structures agreement has been achieved at a level that is much lower than was originally expected. In all those ways the process of reform is taking place and will continue.

Mr. Knox: Will my right hon. and learned Friend impress on his colleagues at the Treasury that one of the main stumbling blocks to the development of the Community as an economic force is Britain's failure to join the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I would not take the same view as my hon. Friend on that, not simply out of natural love and affection for my former colleagues at the Treasury, but because if the United Kingdom were to join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system it would be important for us to do so in a fashion that would contribute to the increased stability of that organisation, and not the reverse.

Mr. Rogers: In the continual reassessment of priorities within the European Community, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman bear in mind that in recent years the European Commission has said that tackling unemployment is to be its top priority? Will he press for alterations in the distribution of moneys within the budget, especially as about 5 per cent. of it goes to regional spending, 5 per cent. to social funding, but over 74 per cent. to agriculture? Will he do something about that?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman underlines the importance of the agreement, which has been reached and is being implemented along the lines that I have just described, for the reduction in the share of agriculture spending as part of the Community budget. It is also important that the Community is able to support technological and other programmes that contribute to the advancement of employment. The Community and its member states must also apply themselves to the process of deregulating their economies to liberate opportunities for job creation and to take steps to establish a single internal market in the Community, because that would make a powerful contribution to the creation of jobs throughout Europe.

Mr. Dykes: Did my right hon. and learned Friend mean when answering my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) that the pound was too shaky for us to join the EMS? If the other members, on all the evidence, are reasonably keen for us to join, why can we not do so?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: A number of factors, with which my hon. Friend is familiar, must be taken into account. The objective of Government policy remains to join when the time is appropriate. It is important for us to be sure that the manner and timing of a decision to join the exchange rate mechanism is such as to contribute to the stability of the mechanism, and not the reverse.

Dr. Owen: The right hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that a month ago we could have joined the EMS at a trade weighted index of 69·8, which has now risen to 74·5. Is he aware therefore, that we have lost a historic opportunity to enter and stabilise the currency at a competitive rate?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman on the precision of that diagnosis. Other factors, apart from the relative parity at any one time, must be taken into account.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Is it not far more urgent to reform the food aid programme, bearing in mind that figures published in the Official Report yesterday showed that the combined amount of food sent to Ethiopia and Sudan in the last 15 months was less than the amount that the Common Market sends to the Soviet Union and its allies every week? Is that not a shameful insult to the starving people of Ethiopia, bearing in mind that we have heard nothing but grand plans of what the Common Market could do but obviously is not doing?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If the food programme were expanded to absorb all the food surpluses available throughout the Community, that would involve disposing of that food at a much lower price, if not at a zero price, and the cost of so doing would exceed substantially that of which my hon. Friend already complains. [Interruption.] The reality is that the food disposal programme produces some revenue from the disposal of some food. If my hon. Friend is complaining about the scale of that cost already, there must be some balance between the food that is disposed of on the market and the food that is disposed of by way of the substantial programme already sustained for Ethiopia.

Mr. Deakins: Why is the Foreign Secretary ready to agree to an extension of majority voting in the Council of Ministers? Would such an extension apply to interpretation by the council of the financial guideline for agriculture?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There could be more majority voting within the Council of Ministers on the basis of articles of existing treaties. We believe that it would be appropriate to consider more frequent use of the existing powers for majority voting, while maintaining absolutely the right of member states to insist on the Luxembourg compromise being observed in respect of national interests. The price proposals made by the Commission on the agriculture guideline have been put forward within that guideline. Any change in those proposals would require unanimity within the Council.

Sir Peter Blaker: What progress is being made with the liberalisation of trade in invisibles? Will my right hon. and learned Friend assure us that the Government continue to regard that as a high priority?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with my right hon. Friend that one of the aspects of the internal market where we want to make early progress towards liberalisation is in respect of services, especially those that would earn us invisible exports. We have been trying to do that with insurance for some time. We intend to ensure that that is one part of the programme that the Community adopts for early comprehensive progress on the internal market.

Mr. Foulkes: Why is the Foreign Secretary right and Tory MEP David Curry, who is actively working within the Community, wrong when he said that we should stop pretending that we can reform the CAP or even the Budget? Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that his appointment of former MEP Adam Ferguson as the Minister of State's special adviser, at a salary in excess of £21,000, to liaise between the Foreign Office and the European Parliament is meant to try to stop honest men like Mr. Curry blurting out embarrassing truths?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have the utmost respect for Mr. Curry. I have heard his view in a single sentence uttered in the House this afternoon on two occasions. It is such a conclusively futile conclusion that I cannot believe that it represents the entirety of wisdom uttered by Mr. David Curry. It is of the utmost importance to continue reforming both the common agricultural policy and the budget.

Regarding the other part of the hon. Gentleman's question, the appointment of Mr. Adam Ferguson is a sensible and essential change to make to improve and extend contact with MEPs and the Community on other issues. Regarding the nature of his appointment, it is worth noticing that in 1984, the last year for which figures are available, the Government had only 18 special and personal advisers of this sort, whereas in 1978 and 1979 the Labour Government had 25 and 22 such advisers respectively. The Labour party would be better placed to make such criticisms if it ensured that its MEPs made a more constructive contribution to the European Parliament.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: May I beg leave to——

Mr. Speaker: No, not at this moment.

Mr. Taylor: Surely, Mr. Speaker, I am entitled to——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We often hear things in the Chamber that we do not like.

Harmonisation

74. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals for harmonisation between member states are currently under discussion within the European Economic Community.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Commission's proposals for harmonisation cover a wide and varied field. A full list of all Commission proposals outstanding on 1 October last year appears in Council document number 19748/84, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Pike: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the European Community would do a lot better if it stopped dreaming up ideas for a European stamp and for a European passport, and instead, made a determined attempt to remove the high unemployment level of more than 12 per cent., which is the scourge of the EC? Should that not be the EC's prime objective on harmonisation at present?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It would help the hon. Gentleman's appraisal of the subject if he were reminded that there is no proposal for a European stamp or a European passport, but for the introduction of a common form passport, including the British passport, in 1987. It would help him further if he would understand that one of the most important ways of reducing unemployment in the Community would be the establishment of an internal market on the basis of standard measurements, standard units, and the reduction of national differences. If he is truly in earnest about unemployment, he would do better if he supported the programmes for harmonisation in the Community.

Mr. Harris: Will my right hon. and learned Friend continue to keep his feet firmly on the ground, in particular over harmonisation? Will he pursue measures that will mean something to the people of this country by breaking down trade barriers and resist some of the more grandiose schemes put forward by some of our partners with regard to institutions?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend has raised two separate points, one related to institutional changes, which is a separate issue. He is right to remind the House that harmonisation of the wrong things or in the wrong way can involve heavy compliance costs which stand in the way of job creation and economic activity. Provided that one is addressing oneself to the right kind of harmonisation, in particular for new products and new markets, where we need the unity of the European market to compete with the rest of the world, harmonisation can do a great deal of good.

European Parliament (Communications)

78. Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to improve communication with the United Kingdom members of the European Parliament.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have recently written to all British Members of the European Parliament in an effort to improve the flow of ideas and information between them and the Government. We are also continuously seeking ways of improving existing briefing arrangements.

Mr. Bidwell: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the leader of Labour Euro MPs said that the Tories from this country in the EEC were split four ways? Is it any wonder, as the famous Mr. Curry has said, that the party at Westminster and Euro MPs are the same as "gravy train merchants, carpet baggers"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must not quote. He should paraphrase.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am afraid that the wisdom of the hon. Gentleman's observations rather trailed away at the end of his trail. I cannot make any sensible observations.

Mr. Yeo: In communicating with MEPs, has my right hon. and learned Friend had time to consider the abolition of passport and customs controls within the Community, because such a step would bring alive the advantages of membership far more clearly than any other institutional reform?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding the House of the importance of achieving considerable simplification of frontier controls of passports, goods and services. That is one of the subjects being studied by the Committee on People's Europe, whose recommendations we shall be considering shortly.

Voting Procedures

79. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had this year with the French and German Foreign Ministers regarding the improvement of decision making within the European Economic Community.

80. Mr. Hugh Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if changes in voting procedures within European Economic Community bodies are to be considered at the forthcoming summit in Brussels; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have discussed possible improvements in Community decision-taking bilaterally with other Community Foreign Ministers on several occasions. The issue has also been discussed at length in the Ad Hoc Committee on Institutions — the Dooge committee—whose report will be discussed at the June European Council.

Sir Anthony Meyer: As my right hon. and learned Friend has just said, the completion of the internal market is a prime British objective. Is it not a matter of some anxiety, to say the least, that the French and German Governments appear to have taken considerable steps in that direction by improving their common decision-making? If such a thing continues, shall we not find ourselves shut out from the decisions that are of prime concern to us in this country?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend, unusually, has failed precisely to follow the point of what has taken place. The decisions taken recently by the French and German Governments and extended to the Benelux Governments relate to the relaxation of frontier controls at land frontiers. They have not been making any proposals for changes at seaports or airports, which is a different issue. He will find that our arrangements for entry at sea and airports are as free as they can be and compare well with those operated by others in the Community for similar places.

Mr. Brown: Does the Foreign Secretary think that moving towards a greater use of majority voting procedures will enhance harmonisation within the EC? Can he offer an opinion as to whether the accession of Spain and Portugal would be desirable in that context?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sure that the accession of Spain and Portugal will make an important contribution to the stabilisation of democratic communities throughout Europe, including those two countries. I am equally sure that the accession of those two countries will require the Community to use its existing decision-making procedure more expeditiously and effectively if it is to continue to work properly. It is for that reason that we believe that an increased use of majority voting, in accordance with existing articles, would be of advantage, provided we maintain our respect for the Luxembourg compromise.

Mr. Alexander: My right hon. and learned Friend has referred to improved arrangements here, but the whole point is that in the rest of the EC the arrangements at land frontiers are still as bad as they ever were. Surely, then, the decision-making is at fault.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Again, I think that my hon. Friend does not quite understand the distinction I was making. The arrangements arrived at between France and Germany have very recently been agreed for extension to the three Benelux countries. They are intended to produce improved frontier controls within those five countries. They do not yet extend to the other Community countries. They are concerned with land frontiers, as distinct from sea frontiers and airports, with which we are concerned.

Mr. Healey: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the lugubrious ritual through which the Community at present avoids taking all necessary decisions has left it without any budget for the current year, yet with an expensive agricultural policy whose only obvious beneficiary is the Soviet Union?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman is always capable of summing up the most complicated questions with a laconic and imperfect wit. The fact is that the Community's decision-taking processes are in need of improvement, are being improved and are addressing themselves to questions of importance to the people of this country and of Europe as a whole.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it appropriate at this stage to make the point that I hoped to make——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As long as it is not a continuation of Question Time. If it is a point of order that I can answer I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. Taylor: Is it appropriate at this stage to raise as a point of order my intention to raise on the Adjournment the wholly unsatisfactory nature of the answer given to question No. 73, which included an unjustified personal attack on my MEP simply because of the views which he expressed and which he is entitled to express as a member of an elected assembly?

Mr. Speaker: It is perfectly in order to do that.

Mr. Healey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that at the end of questions a month ago I expressed a view, widespread on both sides of the House, about the inadequate time available for Foreign Office questions. Can you tell us, Mr. Speaker, whether you have had any communication from the Leader of the House about improving matters?

Mr. Speaker: I have had no such communication, but I understand that discussions are going on and that a decision may be taken shortly after the Easter recess.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), Mr. Speaker, can you give guidance? Has the procedure changed? If an hon. Member is dissatisfied with the reply to a question, is it right that the notice that he wishes to give to the effect that he will seek to raise the matter on the Adjournment should not be given at the time but at the end of questions?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is right. I should have allowed the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) to raise his point of order at the time. I confess that I thought he was on a rather different tack.

Mr. Meadowcroft: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether you noticed that no fewer than six Labour Members were not in their place to ask questions that they had tabled——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid that is definitely not a matter for me. I do not think that we want to start that sort of game.

Mr. Meadowcroft: May I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that you are very zealous to protect the interests of Members of Parliament who want to ask questions at Question Time? Many hon. Members come to ask supplementaries to questions that have been tabled. Would you consider whether it is possible to exact some retribution on those Members of Parliament who are not here to ask their questions?

Mr. Speaker: Order. No. I think the retribution is that other hon. Members manage to ask their questions, as a result of some other hon. Members not being present.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker, could you institute a regime to ensure that every day you have a list of those Members who attend the House? For instance, today you could draw up a list that shows that the Liberals never manage to have more than three members in the House——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that I could do that. It would put an intolerable load upon me.

Mr. Skinner: And then, perhaps, you could draw up a list of all hon. Members who voted. You would be able to ascertain that the leader of the Social Democratic Party did so on only 34 per cent.——

Mr. Speaker: Order. These interesting statistics, are nothing to do with me.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

[Relevant documents: European Community Document No. 10277/84, Annual Economic Report 1984-85 and the Unnumbered document Annual Economic Report 1984-85 (final version as adopted by the Council).]

3.35 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): In his new year's day message to the City and the world, the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised Britain a Budget for jobs—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] Now, only the most gullible of his supporters would believe that the Chancellor had kept that promise. When next year the Chancellor or his successor introduces the Budget for 1986, unemployment will be no less than it is today. Indeed, the probability is that it will continue to rise throughout the next 12 months. Yet, had he chosen to do so, the Chancellor could have begun to put Britain back to work—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] Might I suggest to my hon. Friends that, while they naturally resent the usual absence of the Chancellor, it is probably better that we proceed without calls for him, because if we call he might come.

When next year the Chancellor or his successor introduces the Budget, unemployment will certainly be no less than it is today—perhaps a great deal more. I also repeat that the absent Chancellor, had he chosen to do so, could have introduced a Budget which began to put Britain back to work. The nation's tragedy and the Chancellor's disgrace is that once more he and the Government have chosen the high unemployment option.

At another phase of the Chancellor's pre-Budget cycle, he decided to excite hopes of tax cuts. Today, nobody believes that the hopes which he encouraged have been realised. Indeed, the total annual tax burden will rise by a further £4 billion between now and the next Budget. Table 5.4 on page 39 of the financial statement makes it clear that, between the 1979 general election and the end of the present financial year, the total increase in our annual tax burden will be about £26 billion. That is the increase imposed on Great Britain by a party and Government who won two general elections on the promise of tax cuts.

What most families may have received yesterday in the form of tax reductions will not compensate for the extra charges, payments and indirect taxation which they must pay. Many of those charges were not announced in the Budget. They were announced to prepare the Budget's ground and to enable the Chancellor to put as good a face as possible on yesterday's dreary event. However, prescription charges, water rates and bus fares are still to be paid, and they are the basis on which the Chancellor was able to make his other proposals.

In addition, one direct result of the Government's folly will cost many families virtually as much as the income tax reduction provides. A married couple with one child will enjoy an income tax reduction of £7·50 a month. However, even if the building societies make no further increase in their lending rate, which I fear is a most optimistic assumption, the cost of an average mortgage has gone up since Christmas by £7·25 a month. Even if there is no further increase on Thursday, Friday or next week, the one fact of the mortgage increase, which was the direct result of the Chancellor's mishandling of the sterling crisis and the increased interest rates that followed, will virtually wipe out the average reduction in income tax.

No wonder that the Chancellor's supporters were so glum yesterday afternoon. As the speech went on, they edged nearer and nearer to the edges of their seats, waiting for the rabbit that they assumed that the Chancellor would produce from his hat. At the end of his speech, in the words of Dorothy Parker, they looked like men who had bought tickets for a quite different play.

The Chancellor's unpopularity is not confined to his party. He is, according to the evidence and the polls, the most unpopular holder of his great ofice in modern history. It would be both mistaken and uncharitable to jump to the obvious conclusion and blame that unpopularity on his personality and character. As I was defending the Chancellor for an uncharacteristic moment, I shall repeat what I said now that he has come into the Chamber. We were discussing the unpopularity from which he uniquely suffers. In a mood of typical charity, I repeat that it would not be right to jump to the obvious conclusion and attribute his unpopularity to his personality and character.

Equally, it would be wrong to assume that the right hon. Gentleman's unpopularity is a result of the incompetence with which he has performed his duties, although the combination of bluster and indecision with which he faced the sterling crisis in January did not make him a national hero. The Chancellor's status and standing——

Mr. Christopher Hawkins (High Peak): Is this economics?

Mr. Hattersley: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to say something, or is he just going to shout?

The Chancellor's status and standing is largely a result of a single characteristic. He represents, indeed he personifies, the callousness of Conservatism. He is essentially the man who does not care, as was demonstrated yesterday in his attitude towards the wages councils. The wages councils were created by the Prime Minister's greatest of all heroes, Sir Winston Churchill. They were created to protect the weak and the vulnerable. The then Mr. Winston Churchill said when the Bill was introduced:

[Mr. Hattersley]

"It was formerly supposed that the workings of the laws of supply and demand would naturally regulate or eliminate that evil"— that is, the evil of living on less than a decent wage—

"But when you have no organisation, no parity of bargaining, the good employer is undercut by the bad, and the bad employer is undercut by the worst."—[Official Report, 28 April 1909; Vol. 4, c. 388.]

It is to that situation that the Chancellor proposes to return us. The weak-minded reliance on the free market will cause much anguish and deprivation to the men and women who now receive a modicum of protection, provided by the wages councils.

As to the workers who are covered by the wages councils provisions, far from causing unemployment, they have, over the past five yars, been its principal victims. In the last decade, the average earnings of wages councils employees have fallen from 73 per cent. to 65 per cent. of the average national wage, and the notion that we might find some economic salvation in depressing their wages still further is simply grotesque.

Indeed, even if the formula worked, we would only be replacing one sort of grinding poverty with another, and that is not the sort of society in which I, or my hon. Friends, wish to live. Yet the abolition of the wages councils and the abolition of employment protection are part of the price that the nation pays——

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Tom King): Abolition?

Mr. Hattersley: If the two-year rule is introduced, it will be abolition in everything other than name. If the right hon. Gentleman does not understand that, he does not understand the workings of the legislation over which he is supposed to preside. That rule, that new change and the abolition of the workers' councils—or rather the wages councils—[AN HON. MEMBER: "Workers' councils?"] The hon. Gentleman is quite right—we shall create some of them, not abolish them.

The price for abolition is the price that the nation has to pay for the half-thought-out, superficially clever but fundamentally flawed economic prescription on which the Government now operate. That prescription is called the medium term financial strategy. It has collapsed under the weight of its own contradictions.

Indeed, yesterday afternoon the Chancellor of the Exchequer performed the last rites over the corpse when he warned the House and, for all I know, the country and perhaps the foreign exchanges about "benign neglect" of the exchange rate. Until 11 February, benign neglect was official Government policy, but then it was called the free float of sterling. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer shakes his head, perhaps I should remind him of something that he said in the House on 12 July:

"We have demonstrated by action that there is not an exchange rate target".—[Official Report, 12 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 1399.]

My word, was not the Chancellor of the Exchequer proved right in February? Has he not learned the lesson since? Why does he not have the good sense to avoid the volatility that is now doing so much damage by openly admitting that there is now an exchange rate policy, and admitting, therefore, that the medium-term financial strategy has collapsed?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): There is no exchange rate target. That remains the position. If the right hon. Gentleman contests that, does he say that he thinks there should be an exchange rate target? If so, what is his preferred target?

Mr. Hattersley: I told the right hon. Gentleman at the time of the February crisis—using almost exactly the same words as the Prime Minister, but I make no apology for that—that, thanks to the Government's mismanagement, the sterling rate had settled lower than it should have done. It was necessary for the right hon. Gentleman to make up for his misdeeds by taking some positive action about a proper rate. But I do not believe that the possession of a target is the same as the announcement of one. The right hon. Gentleman knows that perfectly well. He will not announce a target, but he should have in his mind—and I suspect that he does—a target that he is now prepared to defend. Until 11 February he was not prepared to do that, and consequently we had all the difficulties that characterised that difficult and dangerous month.

The medium-term financial strategy now exists only as a series of targets which are constantly revised but very rarely achieved. Yesterday, the failures of the Government's forecasting were institutionalised by the announcement that the contingency reserve is to be increased by £2 billion this year and next year. Indeed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is now preparing for his forecasting errors a year before he actually makes a forecast. Yet he continues with his manic pursuit of the elusive targets. It is, I suppose, for that reason that he failed to provide the remedy that the country so desperately needs to the unemployment crisis. That remedy is a substantial investment in public capital. That is the most certain and beneficial way of creating new jobs.

I am delighted to see that the Prime Minister has become a belated convert to that cause. Yesterday, during Prime Minister's Question Time, she told my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike):

"Public investment was purposely higher in the north so as to help with the unemployment problem."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 781.]

If that is why the Prime Minister pushed public investment to the north, and, if she was right—as I believe she was—in saying that that is how public investment works, why is she not applying the same policy to the whole country, and why has she cut the level of public capital expenditure by more than 20 per cent. over the past three years?

We believe that the Prime Minister was right about the way in which public investment works, and that is why we regret, and resisted, the £3·3 billion reduction now scheduled for between last year and 1987-88.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): If public investment is so effective, why is the area that has received the most public investment—the north-east—suffering from the highest level of unemployment?

Mr. Hattersley: The first answer is that, for structural reasons, as the Prime Minister pointed out yesterday, that area has the greatest problems. The hon. Gentleman should address that question not to me but to the Prime Minister, who argued yesterday that more investment in the north-east produced more jobs. He should also ask the right hon. Lady why, if that policy works in the north-east, it should not be applied all over the United Kingdom.

I know what answer the Chancellor would give. He would say that that cannot be done, because of the potential effects on public borrowing. We accept, of course, that we need prudent control of public borrowing. We also need a better definition of public borrowing than the public sector borrowing requirement, according to which investment in British Telecom was classified as a liability on the day before privatisation and as an asset on the day afterwards. But even if the inflated and bogus definition of the public sector borrowing requirement, which includes capital in a way unknown in any other OECD country, is taken as our guide, the level of public borrowing in this country is lower than the OECD average. Yet, although the figure for public borrowing is lower than in many of our successful competitors, the Chancellor insists that it must be cut again this year from 3·25 per cent. of national income to 2 per cent.

If the public sector borrowing requirement had simply been left at the same figure, and augmented by the use of what the Chancellor calls fiscal adjustment, he could have financed a £5 billion job package. Resources should have been divided initially between a job creation programme and public investment. As the construction industry geared up and training programmes produced the necessary manpower, the emphasis should have been switched to new roads, sewers, hospitals and schools and to the building and renovation of houses.

All the work that would have been done under that programme is desperately needed and could be justified on its own merits. Reporting to the Government three months ago, the National Economic Development Council made that clear. It said:

"delays in maintenance so sharply increase necessary expenditure in subsequent periods that no rational discounting process can justify them".

If we do not invest now in restoring our decaying roads and houses, we will have to spend far more in the future on replacing derelict roads and houses.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Can the right hon. Gentleman explain, if he really believes what he is saying, why it was that, when he was last a member of the Government, unemployment doubled? Why, for example, if he believes in the capital investment programme, did the Government of whom he was a member cut the hospital building programme altogether? The right hon. Gentleman says one thing when in government and another when in opposition.

Mr. Hattersley: It is not just me who believes what I am saying. The Confederation of British Industry, the engineering employers, the Trades Union Congress, the construction industry and the road haulage industry believe what I am saying. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) believes what I am saying, as do a substantial number of the hon. Gentleman's party. The comparison between what happened when we were in office and what happens now is clear. The comparison is based on the certainty that, during the past five and a half years, unemployment has risen by more than 2 million. For the hon. Gentleman to suggest that we were somehow deficient in these matters when unemployment was 2 million lower than it is today is to stand the facts on their head.

If the Government did not prefer the high unemployment option, they could have a PSBR cost of £2·5 billion, which would create 100,000 genuine jobs and restore the crumbling fabric of the country. If we spent the same amount—the other half of the £5 billion package—on direct job creation schemes, we should reduce unemployment by a further 200,000 this year. After two years, that programme would reduce unemployment by 1 million.

Could we be told by the Chief Secretary over what period the Chancellor expects his measures to have an effect and how great an effect that will be? At the moment, we have what the Chancellor claims to be a Budget for jobs, without knowing when it will work, what its effects will be or what estimates have been made of the unemployment reductions that he anticipates. Can we be told at least the reductions in unemployment that the direct job creation measures are expected to create and when they will move into success?

Of course, the Chancellor will go on to insist that his attack on unemployment is also concerned with the use of wages to stimulate jobs. In that respect, I repeat the general welcome for the principle of the changes in national insurance contributions which my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) offered the House yesterday, although I wish that the Chancellor had summoned up enough courage to extend the employee's contribution to the top of the income scale and to use the extra revenue for greater relief at the bottom. The Chancellor will know that the man or woman earning £55 a week—the key figure in the formula—will still, after that formula is applied, pay a higher rate of national insurance contribution than he or she did under Labour in 1979. The Chancellor will also know—I put it no higher—that there is a great danger of a wage or national insurance trap applying at about £55 a week.

Perhaps the Chief Secretary will explain how, in the new circumstances, he justifies the national insurance scheme still levying a smaller percentage of earnings from the rich than from the poor. Putting those reservations aside, I welcome the new scheme as far as it goes, although I do not believe for one moment—nor, I think, does the Chancellor—that it will have a significant effect on the number of jobs. Without a general increase in demand, the overwhelming likelihood is that it will simply reshuffle employment from skilled to unskilled jobs.

We were told last year that a similar measure—abolition of the national insurance surcharge—would reduce unemployment but, since then, unemployment has risen by 120,000.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): It would have gone up more.

Mr. Hattersley: Somebody says that it would have gone up more. Would somebody like to have a guess how many? Was it not the Secretary of State for Employment who cried that it would have gone up more? Nobody wants to put a figure on it. Is there any advance on 120,000? I think not.

The second item that we were told last year would increase jobs was tax cuts. They also clearly failed. I hope that the Chief Secretary will say exactly how the tax cuts are supposed to work to promote employment. Are they supposed to hold down wage costs by acting as a substitute for negotiated increases? If they are, they will not widen the gap between wages and social security payments.

The two supply side arguments which the Chancellor has advanced to justify his wages policy as a means of creating new jobs work against each other. In any event, the idea that a significant number of men and women choose unemployment because they can do almost as well on social security is an insult not only to the unemployed but to the intelligence of anyone who examines that proposition.

The unemployment crisis comes not from an imaginary reluctance to look for work but from a real inability to find it. Two weeks ago the director of the CBI told me that his members all over the country were reporting vacancies which they could not fill. I promised him that, putting aside specialist employment—where the problem is not paying but trading—I would fill every Birmingham vacancy about which the CBI notified me. I have to report that the CBI has not yet taken up my offer. Notwithstanding that, I extend that offer to every Conservative Member of Parliament who believes that unemployment is the result of the unemployed's reluctance to work. The people are there looking for jobs; the Government's duty is to find the jobs for them

Look at the simple figures. On the Government's own figures, today unemployment stands in excess of 3,300,000 and there are fewer than half a million unfilled vacancies. Even if six people refuse to take a job, a seventh is still waiting for employment. Yet, yesterday, the Chancellor had a message for the men and women who were looking for jobs. It appears in column 792 of Hansard under "Employment and training measures". His message was:

"Impatience is a bad counsellor."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 792.]

I must say to the Chancellor, on behalf of my unemployed constituents, that it is a great deal easier to be patient in No. 11 Downing street than to be patient in the dole queues.

How long does the Chancellor expect the patience to last? One hundred thousand people have been unemployed for five years or more. Have they been patient enough? Have they waited long enough? Does the Chancellor urge patience on them? Putting it more simply and directly, can we be told when the unemployment measures will work? For five years, every ministerial broadcast on the subject and every prime ministerial pronunciation has told the House and the country that, sooner or later, the unemployment prospect will improve and jobs will be found. When will that happen—this year, next year, sometime, or never under a Conservative Administration?

The Chancellor told the House yesterday, and, I understand, repeated it to journalists verbatim, that his room for manoeuvre in the Budget was limited by the effects of the coal dispute on Government expenditure. That is a selective version of the Chancellor's public spending problem. Fourteen months ago, to make the Chancellor's strategy seem plausible, the 1984 public expenditure White Paper was based on a series of wholly unjustifiable assumptions, which I told the Chief Secretary during that debate were unjustifiable — assumptions about public sector pay, about local authority spending and about unemployment. Because of those errors—in part, intentional errors—the contingency reserve was spent before the cost of the major contingency was calculated.

What is more, the Government clearly badly underestimated the cost of the miners' strike. Yesterday the Chancellor replied to a letter I sent him a fortnight ago asking him a series of questions. He declined to answer most of the questions—for instance, he did not say whether the cost of the Trident programme, which was wholly carried out in the United States, has been included in the Government's estimate to pad out the figure. The right hon. Gentleman did, however, answer a question about the cost of the miners' strike, saying:

"What I actually said on 31 July was that the cost of resisting the strike was a worthwhile investment."

The Chancellor seeks to re-write both Hansard and history. That is what he meant to say. [Interruption.] Even now he is crying that it is clear in Hansard. On 31 July 1984, the Chancellor said:

"even in narrow financial terms, it represents a worthwhile investment".—[Official Report, 31 July 1984; Vol. 65, c. 306-7.]

Mr. Lawson: Is this resisting the strike?

Mr. Hattersley: No. The truth is that the Government woefully miscalculated the cost of the miners' strike. I give the Chancellor credit for this: if the Government had not under-estimated to such a degree, the right hon. Gentleman would probably have had the sense not to prolong the strike for as long as Government intervention prolonged it.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South) rose——

Mr. Hattersley: Wait until I get to the end of the subject.

Another question arises from the Government's attitude to these matters and the way in which the Chancellor now whines about the costs that his policy have made necessary. I asked him this second question during the last public expenditure debate. It is a question that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition asked the Chancellor yesterday. I repeat it today, and I believe my party will repeat it for the rest of this Parliament—if the Government could afford £3 billion to fight the miners, why cannot the Government afford £3 billion to fight unemployment?

Mr. Yeo: Does the right hon. Gentleman not recognise, as every hon. Member and everyone in the country recognise, that the only real miscalculation in respect of the miners' strike was made by Mr. Arthur Scargill? Does the right hon. Gentleman not recognise that everyone knows that the financial, social and employment consequences and costs of giving in to that strike would have been much more massive than any cost that the Government have paid?

Mr. Hattersley: The hon. Gentleman is welcome to his opinion. My only criticism is that the hon. Gentleman did not explain the point to the Chancellor, before the Chancellor made a quite different point. The Chancellor said:

"even in narrow financial terms".

Clearly, that does not stand a moment's examination.

I repeat: if the Government could afford £3 billion to fight the miners, they should be able to afford £3 billion to deal with the greatest scourge of our generation—the curse of continual unemployment. What is more, the Government should be able to afford something in this Budget to help the worse off—the lowest paid. Precious little has been done for them. The lowest paid will pay the largest percentage of their income in increased charges and indirect taxes and their real incomes will suffer most from deteriorating public services. We believe, and have urged this point on the Chancellor, that the right hon. Gentleman should have helped families most in need of help—

Mr. Lawson: That is exactly what we did.

Mr. Hattersley: —by programmes specifically designed to help the three groups on whom the financial pressure is the greatest—the pensioners, families with young children and the long-term unemployed.

The House may have escaped hearing the Chancellor's cry that that is exactly what he has done. I hope that the Chief Secretary will tell me exactly what the Chancellor has done in the Budget to help pensioners and families with young children, particularly unemployed families with young children. I hope that the Chief Secretary will not only tell me what has been done to help the long-term unemployed but remind the House of the difference between unemployment benefit levels after 12 months and unemployment benefit levels after 12 months and a day. The Chancellor should have provided a pension increase of £5 a week for the single pensioner and of £8 for a married couple, a child benefit increase of £3, which is by far the easiest, best and most direct way of helping to alleviate poverty and an extension of supplementary benefit for the long-term unemployed. That would have cost, in addition to the statutory upratings, which I assume the Chancellor has already provided for, £2·825 billion in a full year.

I have no doubt about where that money for the poverty programme should have come from. Before yesterday's Budget, the Government—twice elected on promises of tax cuts—had increased the annual tax bill by £21·5 billion. They have now increased it to over £26 billion.

Against this background of general increase, one group has enjoyed tax reductions. This group comprises the 5 per cent. of highest income recipients. In principle, we all believe in tax cuts but cutting taxes, especially for one group, is not a discreet choice. The price that we have had to pay for cutting the taxes of the well off is increased charges for welfare benefits, reduced public expenditure and limits on the PSBR which prevent a decent job package and a regional aid programme appearing in the Budget. I hope that the Chief Secretary will explain the justification for a policy which over five years has helped the rich at the expense of the poor. I think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is just the man to explain why that has been done.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): If the right hon. Gentleman were the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would he restore the 98 per cent. rate of income tax which was a feature of the previous Labour Government?

Mr. Hattersley: I was coming to that. I have a major objection to the 98 per cent. marginal rate of tax because hardly anyone paid income tax at that rate except pop stars with huge investment incomes and rotten accountants. I want to see an added tax contribution from the wealthiest members of society, but 98 per cent. on the marginal pound is not the answer. The answer lies in a higher rate of average taxation by removing some of the tax privileges which the wealthy in our society presently enjoy. There is something deeply demeaning——

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham) rose——

Mr. Hattersley: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment.

There is something deeply demeaning in Conservative Members and newspapers, who have not raised a word about the deprivation of unemployment and the problems of poverty, producing or using headlines about the dozen or two dozen who might have to pay high rates of taxation on the last pound of their gigantic unearned income. My objection to the 98 per cent. rate is that it does not operate in a way that will produce the revenue that I want to see. There will not be a 98 per cent. rate in those circumstances, but £3 billion should be contributed by those who have been the only beneficiaries of Government policy.

Mr. Hogg rose——

Mr. Hattersley: No, I shall not give way for the moment. I shall be more than happy later to give way to the hon. Gentleman, of all people.

The other scare about high rates of taxation comes from the notion that by taxing unearned income we shall be taking the savings of individuals with little money, little independence and a low standard of living. When the unearned income surcharge was abolished last year, the starting point was £7,000. At that time it was thought to be produced by about £70,000 in the bank. I am not suggesting that £70,000 in the bank is a fortune, but in my constituency I doubt whether there are a dozen people with that sum in the bank. However, there are thousands who need decent child benefit, who cannot afford to pay for their children's school meals and who, above all else, want a job which will give them something like a decent standard of living.

Mr. Butterfill: Would the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: No. I gave way to the hon. Gentleman a short time ago, and no one can regard that as a rewarding experience. I give way instead to the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg).

Mr. Hogg: The right hon. Gentleman has told the House how he proposes to finance what he is pleased to call his poverty relief programme, to the tune of £2·5 billion. Apparently it is to be achieved by withdrawing tax privileges. It will be helpful if he tells the House exactly what tax privileges he has in mind. Do the privileges include mortgage interest relief and contributions to pensions? Does he suppose that the withdrawals that he is contemplating will raise the money, or will he hit the average taxpayer?

Mr. Hattersley: I knew before the debate started that we would have a scare about mortgage interest relief. The hon. Gentleman has given me the opportunity to say, as I was able to say to the distinguished economics editor of The Times, that I do not have the slightest intention of attacking the concept of home ownership. One of my complaints about the Government is that they have made home ownership so difficult, especially for those seeking new mortgages. As for tax privileges, I believe that 14 of them are listed in the latest publication of the Institute of Fiscal Studies. These are tax privileges that are available to the very rich with expensive accountants and they are a scandal when set against the payments that they receive. No one wants to see—[HON. MEMBERS: "Name them".] I am not sure whether Conservative Members are crying "Name them," or saying that they claim them. I have no doubt that some Conservative Members claim the tax privileges that I have in mind.

[Mr. Hattersley]

The idea that the highest 5 per cent. of income earners should be the principal beneficiaries of tax cuts which the Conservative party proposes, when every other group in the population is paying more and getting less, is not a vision of society which I believe civilised and decent men and women outside the House are prepared to accept.

The Government's callous disregard for families in the middle of the income scale as well as at the bottom have marked them out from every one of their Conservative predecessors. That callous disregard for the poor, including those with low incomes is the hallmark of the Budget. Indeed, it is the hallmark of the Government over the past five years. I believe that their callous disregard for these considerations will result in their defeat at the hands of an electorate which rejects tax cuts at the expense of public services and rejects unemployment at the expense of policies which the Government have abandoned merely to protect the privileged. The British people have a great deal more concern for the poor in general, including the unemployed, than the Government realise. As a result, they will rise up and sweep the Government out of office.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Rees): The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has opened the debate with a characteristic and almost endearing combination of irrelevance and bombast. [Interruption.] The Leader of the Opposition may well laugh. We listened with care to his speech yesterday. It is a difficult speech for a Leader of the Opposition to make. Alas, the parts that had obviously been prepared for him did not fit the measures that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had announced, and so he had to extemporise. Unfortunately his extemporising did not tie in with the more formal parts of his speech. We shall come to that in a moment. I shall deal also with the points of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, if any serious points were made by him, in the course of my speech.

First, I shall take up two of the general observations that were made by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. He has told us that he will not make an attack on home ownership. I am sure that that will be reassuring for the country, which will remember his uncharacteristically diffident admission at the close of the first debate which he conducted on behalf of the Opposition on the sale of council houses, that when the Labour party was returned to power it would take back into public ownership council houses which had been sold. We are glad that life has moved on——

Mr. Hattersley: I remember distinctly the intervention to which the Chief Secretary has referred. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's allegation is untrue and I hope that he will withdraw it now rather than seek to do so later in the day.

Mr. Rees: If the right hon. Gentleman is so stung by what I have said, I will check the record. I shall check Hansard and if I am proved to be wrong I shall be delighted to withdraw—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House wants to hear what the Chief Secretary has to say.

Mr. Rees: Mr. Speaker, what is important, and this is the point that I am making, is that—[HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] I am not exactly certain what I am supposed to withdraw. If the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook assures the House that at no time was it in his contemplation that the Labour party would take back into public ownership council houses, I am very happy to accept that assurance. All I am saying is that the right hon. Gentleman obviously has developed his thinking on this question. [Interruption.] I have said that I am very happy to accept reassurance from the right hon. Gentleman. I have made my position absolutely clear. If the right hon. Gentleman—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not see why the Chief Secretary should be subjected to such barracking. He is seeking to explain his position.

Mr. Rees: I am very happy to rest on what I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, and I think that Opposition Members should study that before they show such indignation.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is the Minister withdrawing what he said when he says that he is resting on what he said a minute ago, or is he reaffirming what he said? We must know, if the disorder on the Opposition Benches is to cease.

Mr. Speaker: That is the problem. Because of the noise, it was impossible to hear exactly what the Chief Secretary was saying.

Mr. Rees: I have said very clearly that if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to reassure the House that at no time did he assert that the Labour party would take back into public ownership council houses that had been sold to their tenants, then I am very happy to accept the right hon. Gentleman's reassurance. I said that a moment ago. I am merely accepting the reassurance of the right hon. Gentleman. Does he wish to give me another one?

Mr. Hattersley: Let me make it clear to the Chief Secretary that he is not accepting my reassurance—that is not the issue. The issue is what he said that I had said. What he said that I had said was that we would take back into public ownership the houses which had been sold to their tenants. It is not a matter of my reassurance; it is not a matter of any degree of speculation; it is a matter of false allegation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman now has two choices. The first is to withdraw it with what grace is left to him now. The second is to wait until Hansard is published and then withdraw it more shamefully.

Mr. Rees: Mr. Speaker, I think that we are getting a little far from the debate on my right hon. Friend's Budget statement. I am not certain what I am asked to withdraw, quite honestly.

Let me move on to the next point. The right hon. Gentleman also asserted that in principle we all believe in tax cuts. The right hon. Gentleman—[HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."]—in case the House did not hear, asserted that in principle we all believe in tax cuts. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rees: If I may go back to the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman, he said that in principle we all believe in tax cuts, yet that comes after——

Mr. Sheerman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If you compare the attitude of the Minister whenever Rossminster was uttered in Committee or in the House with what he has said to my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook, I think that you will know, Mr. Speaker, that some kind of an apology or withdrawal is now in order.

Mr. Speaker: I am not responsible in any way for what is said in debate.

Mr. Hattersley: Since I am now not so much enraged as embarrassed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman's performance, I shall explain not only the reference to him but his error. In the wind-up of the debate to which he referred, the Opposition were asked whether we would abolish the legislation and withdraw the right to buy, and we said, of course, that we would. That is not the allegation which the right hon. Gentleman made. The right hon. and learned Gentleman made the allegation that we would return to public ownership houses which had been sold to individuals. That he must withdraw, and he must withdraw it now.

Mr. Rees: On the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman — [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to know against this barrage what I am expected to withdraw. I am very happy to withdraw on the reassurance of the right hon. Gentleman that it is not part of the policies of the right hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends to take back council houses into public ownership. If I may say so, this is not relevant to the debate on which we are embarked.

The other point that the right hon. Gentleman made was that—[Interruption.]—in principle we all believe in tax cuts.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon) rose——

Mr. Rees: I am sorry, I will not give way, not even to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to let the Chief Secretary continue. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] Order. I distinctly heard the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that he would withdraw. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."]

Mr. John Morris rose——

Mr. Rees: No, I am not giving way to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. [Interruption.]

Mr. John Morris: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You said a moment ago that you distinctly heard the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that he wanted to withdraw. A moment or so earlier, he had said not those words, but that he was not sure what he was supposed to withdraw. In those circumstances, might it not be more convenient to check exactly what the right hon. Gentleman did say?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is the problem. When there is so much noise, it is very difficult for anybody to hear. Perhaps I should have said that I thought I heard what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said. Let us now continue in an orderly manner, otherwise the debate will be very unruly.

Mr. John Morris rose——

Mr. Rees: No, I will definitely not give way. [Interruption.] Although it might not have been possible——

Mr. Sheerman rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to raise a point of order or a point of argument?

Mr. Sheerman: It is a most important point. Mr. Speaker, either you did hear the Minister say that he withdrew or you did not hear. It must be clarified, or the Minister is hiding behind the skirts of the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I said a moment ago that because of the noise it is very difficult to hear what is being said, but I thought that I heard those words uttered. In the interests of the House, will the Chief Secretary say again what he said a moment ago?

Mr. Rees: Mr. Speaker, I thought that I had made my position absolutely clear on this. I said that on the reassurance of the right hon. Gentleman I was very happy to withdraw. [Interruption.] Mr. Speaker, I hope that we may continue to debate my right hon. Friend's Budget statement, and not the Labour party's housing policy. I would, however, be happy to debate with the right hon. Gentleman—although he did not spend a great deal of time on the subject—the Labour party's tax policies.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): On a pont of order, Mr. Speaker. In all the hubbub, may we have it confirmed one way or the other—because I could not hear what the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said — whether it was the Labour party's policy to withdraw from council tenants the right to purchase? I could not hear the answer.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman will know that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) read something from Hansard. If the hon. Gentleman will wait until tomorrow morning he will be able to read it.

Mr. John Morris rose——

Mr. Rees: I want to debate, if I can, some of the other points made by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. [Interruption.] I do not think that I can say more than I did say—[Interruption.] I should like to come in due course to the Labour party's tax policies.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am not quite sure of the rules of procedure of the House but, as I understand them, it is improper for one hon. Member to call another hon. Member — or dishonourable Member—a liar. [Interruption.] I gather that that is correct. That being so, is it not incumbent on anyone speaking in this House not deliberately to lie or to distort the views or the statements of another hon. Member? Any hon. Member who does so opens himself to being called a liar.

Mr. Speaker: That is a pedantic argument. The whole House has heard the exchange between the two Front Benches on the matter. I think that it would be profitless to pursue it further. Will the Chief Secretary continue?

Mr. John Morris: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) has made a very important point and, with respect, it is not a pedantic matter. When there is a challenge to the Official Report, surely every hon. Member has a right to expect that matter to be put right. If there is a mistake in the Division Lobby, one can come to the House to have the matter corrected. If there is any other mistake, which touches on the honour of an hon. Member, he can have the matter put right on the Floor of the House. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, in seeking to give his reassurance, has not been withdrawing the allegation that he specifically made — that my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said in terms that we would take back houses that had been sold to individual council house tenants. That is the matter on which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has been asked to withdraw——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Every right hon. and hon. Member must take responsibility for his own speech. I cannot answer a point of order such as that.

Mr. Rees: If I may perhaps deal with the subject of the debate—[Interruption.] If I may——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Where is the right hon. and learned Gentleman's integrity?

Mr. Rees: I shall not accept lessons in integrity from the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is not the record clear? Is it not laid out in the Official Report, which is there on the Opposition Dispatch Box? Is it not clear that the Chief Secretary knows precisely what the House demands of him? We are asking him to withdraw a statement that he made and that he knows is completely untrue. If he is a man of integrity, why does he not make a withdrawal, which will take only seconds, and allow the debate to continue? I assure him that we intend to keep on pressing him until we get it. The debate rests in his hands.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say again that it is not a matter for me; it is a matter for debate.

Mr. Rees: It may be that right hon. and hon. Members on the Labour Benches did not hear accurately what I said. I suggest that they wait and read in Hansard tomorrow —[HON. MEMBERS: "No".] If they wait until tomorrow they will find that I have entirely accepted the reassurance offered by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. [Interruption.] I do not know why hon. Members are getting so exercised about the matter. I could not possibly be expected to say more.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone) rose——

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friends are worried about the diversion of time in what should be an important debate. [Interruption.] I have already——

Mr. McKay: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to be helpful. Is it within your power or jurisdiction to ask now for a transcript from Hansard so that we and the right hon. and learned Gentleman may be sure what was said? If it is shown that he said what we believe he said, it is up to him to apologise. Is it within your jurisdiction to ask for that?

Mr. Speaker: Even if it were within my jurisdiction, the hon. Gentleman will understand that it would be drawing me into the debate, and that is not my function.

Mr. Rees: I am very happy to say — [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw".] I hope that the House will at least allow me to say what I want to say. I made it very clear about 10 minutes ago that, on the reassurance of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, I withdrew my remarks. [Interruption.] Further than that, I do not see what I can honourably be required to do. [Interruption.] If there is any doubt about it, I suggest that right hon. and hon. Members would do well to check the matter in Hansard. I hope that I have now made it absolutely clear that I said —[Interruption.]—that on the reassurance of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook I was very happy to withdraw my remarks. I said that 10 minutes ago. Labour Members must be very short of issues to debate, if I may say so, if they choose to ignore what I said and to engineer a slightly frivolous encounter.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Come on, withdraw.

Mr. Rees: I have now said three times, if not four, that I withdraw. I cannot reasonably be expected to say more. Other right hon. and hon. Gentlemen are being deprived of the chance to contribute to what I believe is an important debate. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: I think I should say to the House that a large number of right hon. and hon. Members are seeking to take part in the debate. It will be impossible for me to call them if the Chief Secretary is unable to continue his speech.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Without wanting to get too deeply involved in what has occurred, but just for future reference, will you explain why, on one recent occasion when I was asked to withdraw a statement when I called the SDP leader a pompous sod and I gratuitously withdrew half of it, I was told by you that I had to withdraw the lot or nothing at all, and that if I did not I would have to go out of the door and take an early bath? Why is that ruling not being applied to the Chief Secretary?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows the answer. He used two words that are unparliamentary. The Chief Secretary has not used any words that are unparliamentary.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) called the SDP leader a pompous sod, that was a matter of opinion——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us not pursue past history.

Mr. Boyes: My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover had a personal opinion about an individual, but what the Chief Secretary said is a matter of fact. What he said is wrong, and that is the difference. If the words had been used by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) I do not doubt that by now he would have been on his bike down the road. The words were said by a senior Minister. He should be asked to withdraw unreservedly, to apologise, and then resign.

Mr. Speaker: So that we may now make progress, let me assure the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes)—I am sure that he knows this as well as anyone—that to me, it matters not whether it is a senior Minister or a Back Bencher; the same rules apply to everyone. However, the situation as explained by the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington is entirely different. This is a matter of debate. No unparliamentary words have been used. I distinctly heard—I am sure that the whole House heard—the Chief Secretary say on several occasions that he withdrew the remark—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I heard him say it. I do not know what else the right hon. and learned Gentleman can do.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Might it be for the convenience of the House if I quoted what the Labour party said in its manifesto on this issue, which will bear out——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member catches the eye of the Chair later, he will be able to do that.

Mr. Sheerman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I came to the debate because I thought it important to hear the Chief Secretary's speech. Only one person in this Chamber is obstructing that process, and that is the Chief Secretary who will not conform to what you, Mr. Speaker, said—namely, that he should withdraw the remark that he made. If he does that, the proceedings will continue, but my hon. Friends and I cannot allow them to continue unless he withdraws the remark.

Hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that that was not a threat. I did not ask the Chief Secretary to withdraw anything. That is not my role in this instance. I said that I heard him say that he had withdrawn, and that is a matter of the record.

Mr. Rees: Perhaps I may now revert to the main theme of the debate—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."]—and to the Government's economic strategy, which was clearly outlined in the days of Opposition before 1979, which was restated after the election of that year and in all subsequent years and which has been consistently followed.

In brief, the Government's overriding objective is to establish a healthy, flexible and dynamic economy from which real sustainable jobs will come and which alone can finance our public expenditure commitments, whether in health, social security or education. We must get to the roots of the unemployment problem rather than treat only the symptoms of our condition.

Mr. Sheerman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I cannot allow this to continue—[HON. MEMBERS: "Sit down."] — without asking you whether the Chief Secretary will assure the House that he will examine the Official Report and make a statement after having done so. If he gives that assurance, he may be assured that most of my hon. Friends will discontinue our points of order—[Interruption.] May we be assured that a statement will be made about what was said, once the Official Report has been examined?

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall continue to deal with the Government's economic policies — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Our overriding objective is to establish a healthy, flexible and dynamic economy from which real sustainable jobs will come and which alone can finance our public expenditure commitments, whether in health, social security or education. We must get to the roots of the unemployment problem rather than treat only the symptoms of our condition. Real sustainable jobs are generated by a dynamic, flexible economy. An economy debilitated for two decades or more could not be expected to generate jobs on the scale required or the resources for all the good things that hon. Members on both sides of the House want for the country.

It is no accident that countries that have performed best and have produced the highest standards of living for their people are those in which the economy has not been overburdened, overtaxed and overstretched. The twin themes of our strategy were set out in 1980 and I hope the House will forgive me if I restate them.

The first is the continued reduction of inflation. That in turn involves unrelenting concern with public expenditure and borrowing. The second is to ensure that the economy in all its aspects, but particularly the labour market, is working as smoothly and effectively as possible. Hence our concern with supply side measures, some of which may seem small but which, in the aggregate, are important, and I shall deal with both.

My right hon. Friend announced yesterday that the public sector borrowing requirement for 1985-86 should be £7 billion. That is the same figure as we announced last year and the same percentage of the gross domestic product, 2 per cent. Siren voices will whisper that we could support a higher figure and that other countries do. Events in past months demonstrate that the markets still view warily, even though we may feel that such wariness is unjustified, this country's economic performance. Thus, I hope that, on reflection, the House and the country will see some virtue, as we do, in consistency.

Some might regard that consistency as being of a somewhat austere kind, but we see some virtue in a lower figure than might be advocated by some. They will feel, in particular, that while oil revenues are at their peak, there is a case for reducing public sector borrowing. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook argued for a public sector borrowing requirement of something over £10 billion; if I have that wrong, he will correct me.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins)—we are pleased to see him back in our debates — who is perhaps the most distinguished economic spokesman for the SDP and Liberal parties, will, I hope, support us in that, as his claim to fame as Chancellor of the Exchequer was that he produced a balanced Budget in 1969, and we remember that with admiration.

To the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, I quote what his right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) said in November 1976:

> "We must, therefore, aim at a steady and continuous reduction in the size of our PSBR". — [Official Report, 30 November 1976; Vol. 921, c. 716-7.]

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, if he is anxious about that, might wish to look at the Official Report for that date. I hope that he will be courteous enough to check the quotation.

Underlying the amount of our borrowing requirement lies the question of public expenditure. We have recently debated the public expenditure White Paper. I said then, and I repeat, that the containment of public expenditure is, and will, I suspect, always remain a continuing, arduous and thankless task.

Even when inflation falls faster than expected, which it did between 1981 and 1983, and even when the gross domestic product grows faster than expected, the problems remain. In an elective democracy, the pressures for more expenditure are there the whole time. The pressures to improve the National Health Service, to add to the social security programme and to extend local government services, to name but some of the areas of sensitivity, will always be likely, if unchecked, to outrun the resources that we can make available.

In the debate on the public expenditure White Paper, and in my evidence to the Select Committee on the

[Mr. Peter Rees]

Treasury and Civil Service, I emphasised that circumstances had altered since the material for the White Paper had been brought together before Christmas. I emphasised then that public expenditure, borrowing and revenues would have to be considered again at Budget time. I instanced—and was much pressed on—the cost of the coal strike. Even now, the costs for 1984-85 are difficult to quantify with absolute precision, but they are likely to be, as my right hon. Friend stated yesterday, about £2·5 billion, and there will be some further cost in 1985-86.

Beyond that, the turbulence of the last few months, which no deftness of touch could have stilled, developments in the exchange markets and in interest rates, which will temporarily feed through into the retail price index, have affected our calculations. All in all, for the current year there is likely to be an overrun of the borrowing requirement of £3·25 billion, and a public expenditure overrun of nearly £3·5 billion. To bring public expenditure back on to the path set out in January's White Paper would involve, therefore, an extremely large real decline, if one compares the balance for 1985-86 with the likely outturn of 1984-85. I must again emphasise that the pressures that I have outlined will continue.

Despite those uncertainties, and so that our position should be seen in its true perspective, I can tell the House that we have succeeded in holding expenditure to central Government cash limits. The pressures on programmes which are not subject to cash limits remain intense. We have been much pressed by commentators, not least by the Treasury Select Committee, that our figures should eschew optimism and be firmly realistic. On that basis, and recognising the events of this year and the continuing pressures that I have outlined, we decided to add £2 billion to the reserve, and so the planning total for each of the three years covered by the White Paper. In short, we decided to build up the reserve to ensure that it is adequate to cope with unexpected developments.

The decision represents no change in the Government's policies of public expenditure. Planned expenditure has been falling as a proportion of GDP since 1981-82. The fall is planned to continue. Spending will be held constant in real terms while the economy continues to grow. However, I must emphasise that that pattern will still require consistent restraint.

Our decision certainly does not offer a soft option on public expenditure. Cash limits must hold as they have held hitherto. In the public expenditure survey for future years there can be no relaxation of our approach to this crucial aspect of our economic policies. I hope that the good sense and realism of the decision to add to the reserve will commend itself to all thinking Members of the House and the public.

Indeed, I recall with pleasure and admiration the words of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook to the Ruskin Fellowship on 15 May 1984. He said:

"The assertion that a massive increase in effective demand would be a certain and automatic remedy"

to unemployment

"is no longer convincing . . . There can be no dash for growth."

He will recall and, if need be, repeat those wise words. Now, the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends assert that they want a dash for growth, and that my right hon. Friend's Budget is not a Budget for jobs. First, there is no evidence of a lack of demand.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): Will my right hon. and learned Friend explain the terminology "reserve" that he and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have been using? Previously, it has normally been known as the contingency reserve, and I am not sure whether he is referring to that. Secondly, he referred to £2 billion in each of the three years. I understand that the interest charges which are not included in the planning total, contrary to the advice of the Select Committee, are expected to be higher. Will he tell us how much higher they will be?

Mr. Rees: My right hon. Friend follows these matters closely and knows that the reserve covers both contingencies and overruns in the estimation of demand-led programmes. Therefore, it is more accurately described as a reserve. He is right that an additional figure will be included for debt interest, which will be £500 million.

Mr. Higgins: Each year.

Mr. Rees: I return to the point made by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, today and by the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) yesterday. There is no evidence of a lack of demand. Retail sales have increased by 5 per cent. in the three months to February 1985 compared with a year ago, business investment increased by 12 per cent. in 1984, manufacturing investment by 13 per cent. in 1984, and investment in the construction and service industries by 12 per cent. That does not bear out the right hon. Gentleman's point that there is a shortage of demand.

We must analyse the problem of unemployment more coolly and with less rhetoric. The population of working age increased in the 12 months to September 1984 by 450,000. In the same period, 390,000 extra jobs were created. Opposition Members may say that that is not fast enough, but it is a travesty of the truth to say that the economy is not responding to our measures. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is, therefore, right to approve the adjustments to the national insurance contributions and the abolition of the national insurance surcharge last year. However, by implication, he will surely admit that some of our measures will create the right climate for increased jobs.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Since the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday described the Budget as a Budget for jobs, and as I anticipate that the Chief Secretary will confirm that the Treasury calculated that these measures would lead to an increase in jobs, will he now tell the House the estimated number of jobs that these measures will produce?

Mr. Rees: No, Sir. We do not take a mechanistic view of the economy, as the hon. Gentleman appears to do.

Mr. Straw: One hundred thousand? One million?

Mr. Rees: No, we are calculating, as the Treasury press release made clear yesterday, that 150,000 extra jobs will be created over two years, as a result of the addition to the youth training scheme and the increase in the community programme, and 200,000 by the spring of 1988. That is a provisional calculation. I hope that on the more general measures I shall demonstrate that we hope that there will be a climate which will create jobs. We cannot make a precise calculation.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): The figures that the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave are a cosmetic fiddling of the dole figures. They represent the people who will be taken off the 3·25 million unemployed list and transferred to schemes. It does not answer my hon. Friend's question about how many jobs the Chief Secretary expects the measures to create. If the answer is 200,000, as has been floated in the press, what will the Chief Secretary tell the remaining 4 million people who will not get jobs from the Budget?

Mr. Rees: The hon. Gentleman cannot have listened closely to my answer, which was that the general fiscal and insurance contribution measures make it impossible to calculate the figure. After all, they are creating a different climate, and opportunities and incentives. We cannot give a figure with scientific accuracy. I gave the estimation of the increase in jobs—that is, the number of people who would be taken off the unemployment figures through YTS and the community programme measures. I hope that that will satisfy the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) rose——

Mr. Rees: I shall not give way, but shall press on.

I now turn to the tax and other measures in my right hon. Friend's Budget. We inherited a tax system which reflected all the Socialist prejudices of the previous Government. Today the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said that we all believed in tax cuts. However, within the past fortnight he told us that he proposed to reintroduce the penal tax rates that prevailed in 1979. I remind the House that income tax rates were rising to 98 and 83 per cent. Since he suggested that he would abolish the upper earnings limit for the employees' contribution right up the scale, I hope that he will confirm that he is contemplating a top rate of income tax of about 91 or 92 per cent. It may be that I misunderstand his calculations, but that seems to follow from what he said.

Mr. Hattersley: I had determined not to interrupt the right hon. and learned Gentleman but to leave him alone in his glory. While some of my hon. Friends may forgive him for misquoting me from a debate five years ago, it is a little more difficult to forgive him for misquoting me from today's debate. He is describing policies which half an hour ago I said categorically were not mine nor my party's.

Mr. Rees: I am sorry if I misunderstood his policy. Because his speech was so devoid of any sign of his policies, I had to glean them from his shadow budget.

Mr. Hattersley: He reads the Daily Mail.

Mr. Rees: If the right hon. Gentleman is now retracting what he said and is saying that the Daily Mail misreported him, I accept that. He also held a press conference. Is he now saying that he will not abolish the upper earnings limit for the employees' contribution? [Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman would. Presumably it would have to be superimposed on the top rate of income tax that he has in his sights. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he would reimpose all the tax burdens that we have painfully dismantled since 1979. There may now be a slightly different edge to his policies, but it is difficult for the House to weigh contributions from Opposition right hon. and hon. Members because they have not been free with their policy thoughts. They should perhaps take the House into their confidence.

All that the Opposition propose is in the name of redistribution. I describe it as a rage to destroy, because any redistribution that they contemplate seems to be in favour of the state. In a different sense, redistribution has taken place under this Government but more positively. Dare I touch on this sensitive subject again? It has been by the sale of council houses at a discount, by employee buy-outs — the National Freight Corporation offers a good example — by more generous share incentive schemes, and by public participation in privatisation measures. Those redistribution measures are critical and important to ensure the proper diffusion of wealth in our society. I contrast them with the prejudiced contributions of the Opposition.

It apparently has not occurred to the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook—at least he did not mention it in his speech—and his right hon. and hon. Friends that one conspicuous reason for the poor performance of the United Kingdom economy in the decades before 1979 was that the tax system accurately reflected their prejudices. It was designed to discourage incentive, risk-taking, and the accumulation of savings, it drained companies of resources and it diminished the availability of capital for productive enterprise. In short, it was calculated to reproduce here the rigidities and failures of the east European economies.

We are trying to fashion a tax system in harmony with the needs of the 20th century, the needs of a more effective economy and the needs of a more mobile and enterprising society. It involves a process of tax reform and tax reduction. The speed at which we can move must depend in part on the ingenuity which we can show, but also on the resources which we can command—which in turn will depend on the containment of public expenditure.

Last year, building on the achievements of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, we initiated far-reaching reforms of corporate taxation, which will bring pre-tax and post-tax profits closer into line and which are designed to encourage profitable investment. Inevitably there are areas that need to be reviewed. That is why businesses are to be given the option of depooling short-life assets so that they can receive a balancing allowance if disposed of at less than written down value. That is why the scientific research allowance has been retained at 100 per cent.

Personal taxation is at the same time more intricate and, in view of the numbers of taxpayers involved, more costly to reform and more difficult to administer. My right hon. Friend has said that our intention is to publish a Green Paper covering a number of possible ways of reforming personal taxation which we should like to consider following the time when the Revenue has computerised the administration of PAYE. I should emphasise the massive scale of this computerisation exercise which is the largest in Europe and possibly in the world. It will affect somewhat more than 20 million taxpayers directly or indirectly. We believe that it would be folly to contemplate fundamental tax reforms before that great administrative measure is properly in place and working smoothly, but we must plan against that date.

One option in those reforms that we particularly favour — the fully transferable allowance — would end the discrimination between one-earner and two-earner married couples. The new structure would give a relatively higher allowance to married men supporting families. It would give married women equality and the possibility of complete privacy and independence in their tax affairs. It would overall be a more rational and comprehensible system, better adjusted to the personal aspirations and economic needs of our time. In case any hon. Gentleman should suggest that we should go for a system of fully separate personal taxation, rather than transferable allowances, I will confess, without embarrassment, to a Tory prejudice. We believe that the tax system should recognise the special status of marriage.

As I have said, the need for consultation and detailed planning means that a new system cannot be in place until 1990, although we intend to legislate in 1987.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): One of the disappointing aspects of this part of the package is the delay. As we have already had a Green Paper on the options available for the taxation of married women, why can we not now have a White Paper, which would clearly set out the Government's conclusions, rather than a Green Paper, which implies that the decisions set out in the press release are not final, and that the whole matter is still in the melting pot?

Mr. Rees: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but the Green Paper will set out our views. We shall not leave the public or the House in doubt about them. As I said, as these administrative problems must be faced first and therefore legislation is some time ahead, it is right that we should consult fairly widely to take the mind of the country on this important reform of personal taxation which will follow the reform of corporate taxation initiated last year.

In the meantime—I hope that this will command the support of the whole House — we have decided to concentrate resources on increasing the threshold of income tax. The resources are not inconsiderable—£1·5 billion in 1985-86 and £1,870 million in a full year. If the House wishes to know the figure, the cost above mere indexation is £730 million for 1985-86 and £910 million for a full year.

That is a real increase in the basic personal allowances for the fourth successive year. Thresholds will now be over 20 per cent. higher in real terms compared with 1978-79. Part of our long-term programme is to raise the starting point for income tax progressively and to reduce the burden of direct taxation.

It is a measure completely compatible with our economic strategy. It will take some 800,000 taxpayers out of tax. It will help the unemployment trap. It will improve real take-home pay. It should encourage working people to accept lower pay increases. It should, in short, improve incentives for the individual and the competitive position of business, apart from the supply side consequences which will not be negligible. It will give the greatest proportionate benefit to the lower paid.

I hope that the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald), who I think is to reply, will have the grace to acknowledge the advantages of that measure, to which the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook did not refer at any length.

In parallel with our proposals on the income tax thresholds are the reforms we shall bring forward to the structure of employee and employer National Insurance contributions. This radical restructuring will encourage employers to take on young people and unskilled workers and give them an incentive to take jobs at wages that employers can afford. Almost 1 million families with children will benefit, including 300,000 with family earnings under £90 a week. That is not a negligible achievement.

Since the employment statistics show that self-employment provides an increasing source of new jobs, it is right that we should turn our attention to that sector of the market. Sub-contracting, for example, not only in the public sector, but by the larger public companies, will, we believe, depend on an increasing class of self-employed. It is right therefore that the structure of our tax and national insurance system should recognise and foster this trend. The reduction of class 2 contributions and the introduction of tax relief on half class 4 contributions, which recognise a long felt grievance of the self-employed, will encourage the contribution that self-employment is making and has progressively to make to the economy.

Again in regard to reform I commend to the House the abolition of yet another tax, development land tax. We recall the circumstances which led to its introduction which, I hope, will not be reproduced at any rate under this Administration. The reasons for repeal will, I hope, be recognised and approved. Apart from the pleasure of removing over 200 pages of legislation of formidable complexity from the statute book, the repeal will, I hope, release a flow of projects which will do more for housing, or for the infrastructure, than any uncritical application of public moneys.

I revert to the basic themes of the Government's economic policies. The public expenditure measures, and the fiscal measures which are their counterpart, are designed to make for a smoother working and expanding economy from which profits, investment and jobs will flow. Let us not under-estimate what has been achieved already. The unemployment figures remain obstinately high, but employment is increasing.

Let me record that in 1984 company registrations reached a record level of 100,000. Let me record that retail sales were up by 4 per cent. in 1984. Let me record that construction industry output was up by 3 per cent. in 1984. Let me record that exports in manufactures were up by 10·5 per cent. last year. Let me record that the country's current account has been in surplus for five successive years. Let me record that total investment is at an all-time high.

Without an atom of complacency we can point to results achieved so far. It may be objected that this is a cautious Budget. I would not object to that, but there is a time for caution and a time for boldness. It is an imaginative Budget. It is a Budget which is part of a coherent, consistent and successful strategy. It is part of a strategy that we intend to see through. It is part of a strategy that was clearly put to the country and overwhelmingly endorsed both in 1979 and in 1983. It is a Budget that I have no hesitation in commending to the House.

5.12 pm

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): The Budget speech yesterday, in sharp contrast to the performance of the Chief Secretary today, was briskly lucid. I am afraid that I cannot join those who have said that the record brevity of the Chancellor's speech was cause for congratulation. If hon. Members encourage Chancellors to be ever more brief when they make their Budget statement we shall encourage assertion, of which there was a great deal yesterday, rather than argument, which always takes longer, and we shall be allowing Chancellors to skate over matters which embarrass them but ought to concern the House greatly.

For instance, it has already been said to me, from outside the House, that yesterday the Chancellor made no serious reference to the consequences for the general national economy of the £3·25 billion overshoot in the public sector borrowing requirement during the current year. He regretted it but he did not explain all the horrors that presumably, in view of his stance on economic affairs, must follow from it. The people who have complained about the lack of reference to that have reminded me that last year, when various hon. Members on both sides of the House recommended a PSBR of approximately the size that it is turning out to be, they were told that they would be unleashing all kinds of evil things on the economy and that they ought to be ashamed of themselves and should know better. The Chancellor owed the House—I hope the Financial Secretary will repair the omission tonight—some explanation of what the Government consider has happened because of the very large overshoot.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Now that, by accident of the miners' strike, the hon. Gentleman has got the PSBR that he required, can he tell us why we have not got the jobs? Will he not accept that one reason for high interest rates is because we have overshot the PSBR?

Mr. Wainwright: It never astonishes me when the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) completely misses the point. There was no suggestion that any critics in the House of last year's Budget would have spent the extra PSBR on costly oil imports or on anything of that sort. I simply made the point that the House is entitled to know what the Government think are the main economic consequences of such a large overshoot in the PSBR.

Another matter on which we should have had a paragraph from the Chancellor — again I hope the omission will be repaired this evening because I am sure the Financial Secretary can do so—is the possibility of a substantial fall in the dollar, which is a preoccupation of everybody round the world who watches the financial scene. We should have been told what preparations in outline the Chancellor has for dealing with a marked change in the exchange rate, which the majority of commentators think will happen during the current year.

The main omission was any explanation of the single sentence in which the Chancellor said:

"At the same time, I have further increased the estimate for debt interest in each year."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 791.]

It is common ground that one of the great virtues of all the ceremony, fuss and attention that our annual Budget receives is that it is an opportunity for the Government to make a major signal to all the business, financial and economic interests of the nation as to their intentions for the coming year. That is a valuable opportunity which justifies much of the special concentration on the Budget speech.

The speech yesterday contained very little by way of signal. On future interest rates the indications were very definitely confusing. Clearly the whole purpose of the Chancellor's main Budget judgment was to try to ease interest rates down as quickly as possible—an ambition that all of us would applaud. Indeed, if we do not get back to single digit base rates fairly soon, there will be a bleak outlook for investment and other capital expenditure.

Having indicated that a reduction in interest rates was one of his prime aims, the Chancellor then inserted the throw-away sentence that in regard to Government interest he has most exceptionally altered his public expenditure White Paper, on which the ink is scarcely dry, and has increased the estimate for debt interest in each year. Surely the House is owed an explanation of that remarkable change but, of course, it has not had it.

By fairly common consent this is the toughest Budget for, at any rate, four years. What is the nation to receive in response for putting up with this austerity? The Budget, for all its severity and, no doubt, the courage required to introduce such a disappointing Budget to one's own side of the House, will not attack the heart either of the twin evils of rising, prolonged unemployment or deep family poverty. It is by those two tests that we on the alliance Benches at any rate, and I guess most hon. Members, want to judge the Budget.

On unemployment, may I plead with the Government to be a little more refined and, indeed, more accurate in their reports on jobs? At the moment it is clearly Government policy to treat even a part-time job as a full-time job for the purposes of their returns to the House and their statements. It is dishonest, unhelpful and greatly misleading to treat part-time jobs in that way.

I am sure that all hon. Members are familiar with manpower statistics in business and other spheres, in which a part-time job is meticulously recorded as half a job or three quarters of a job. However, in the last year or two, in the Government's language any job which has brought the employee to the notice of national insurance staff is simply recorded as a job, and the unspoken implication is that it is full-time. Any stimulus which the Government's general measures give to employment as a result of this Budget will largely be in respect of part-time jobs.

I regret to say that the interesting and admirably intended restructuring of national insurance will not overwhelmingly benefit those who are genuinely low paid for a full week's work, but will immensely add to the attractions for employers to take on part-timers. Such people are often quite well paid if one takes account of the modest hours that they work. In general, there has in recent years been a marked trend, with Government encouragement, for employers to move over to a part-time work force. That is not a satisfactory answer to the real hard core of the unemployment problem.

As to deep poverty—usually family poverty—the lifting of thresholds, although pleasant and admirable for taxpayers, sidesteps the real problem. A very modest bonus for the generality of taxpayers, especially those earning up to £13,000 a year, is an extraordinarily expensive way of scattering largesse and means that only a few crumbs will reach the really poor.

The alliance parties would have considered two measures as much preferable to the indiscriminate raising of thresholds for every taxpayer, especially in a year such as this. We would have preferred a broad increase in the scope of family income supplement. That is a Conservative measure in origin, although we know that no one loves it very much. Yet for all its crudity and the means testing that it involves, it permits meaningful amounts of cash to go into the hands of households where the money is desperately needed. In cost benefit terms, FIS is the quickest and most direct way of relieving, although not curing, deep family poverty.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Does not the hon. Gentleman accept that it makes the poverty trap that much more acute?

Mr. Wainwright: It makes the poverty trap wider but more shallow. I am not advocating FIS as a great reform to last for all time. I am simply explaining how deep poverty could be relieved at a time of great economic stringency at relatively modest cost. In fact, the two measures that I am advocating would cost the Exchequer less than the proposed increase in thresholds.

The other attack on poverty was rightly mentioned by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who referred to the long-term unemployed whose clothing and household requirements have worn out and who should, at long last, be entitled to the full long-term supplementary benefit rate. The alliance parties along with others have pressed for that for many years.

Those are our two alternatives to the raising of the thresholds, although we look forward to better years under better financial management when the thresholds can be raised very considerably indeed.

Some taxes are not required to go into a Budget. They are never the subject of a Budget resolution, and need never receive the explicit sanction of the House of Commons. I refer to the deliberate increase in taxation which this Government levy through their powers over the nationalised industries. Nothing which has been done by way of raising thresholds or anything else will compensate poor households for the recent average 4·5 per cent. increase in gas prices and the coming 4·3 per cent. increase in electricity prices. Neither industry regards those increases as necessary for its own purposes, but they have been forced upon them by the excessively stringent external financing limits imposed by Government. Also on the horizon is an average 12 per cent. increase in water rates, as well as various other increases in official charges.

At this point I wish to welcome two measures which are not all that modest. The first, which it is estimated will bring benefits of about £300 million a year to British industry, is the Government's welcome change of heart on capital allowances for short life assets in industry and commerce. Last year, alliance Members pleaded with the Government, both in Committee and on Report, pointing out that their reducing balance method of writing down would cripple those who use machinery with a short life cycle. We were thinking of machinery which quickly became obsolete in fast-developing technology or which wore out quickly because of the strenuous tasks it had to perform. I congratulate the Treasury on a most ingenious method—apart from the unfortunate term "depooling"—which puts it well ahead of the accountancy profession and top of the league for fiscal ingenuity.

The other welcome part of the Budget is the long overdue reduction from seven to five years in the length of time that an employee, under an approved scheme, must keep his or her shares intact in order to get full tax relief. Seven years has seemed an age to middle-aged workers, and in many cases made the schemes sound scarcely worth while. Five years is much more realistic, and I am glad that the Government have come round to that view.

The national insurance contribution has for long been conveniently excluded from Budgets because it was a kind of crude poll tax which no Government wanted to advertise. It is, however, a source of enormous annual revenue. I congratulate the Chancellor on bringing it frankly and openly into the Budget statement and on making a start on restructuring. This is only experimental, and involves severe traps at £55 and £90. It will make pay increases of practically negligible value unless they are in the order of £6 or £7 a week or more, but that is unusual in poorly paid occupations. This will place a severe burden on the admirable, dynamic, high technology firms that employ highly paid staffs.

For example, if a boffin is paid £20,000 a year, the employer will have to fork out another £730 a year as the employment cost of keeping that person on the payroll. The employment cost for a man on £20,000 a year will become no less than £2,090 simply by way of national insurance contribution. I realise that the money must be found somewhere, but I doubt whether that part of the experiment will survive for very long.

In the longer term, one must ask why our benefits and pensions have to be paid for by, of all things, a payroll tax. Why are jobs singled out to be the subject of taxation for financing benefits and pensions? There is no longer any logic in the system. It belongs to the era before the two world wars. It needs to be looked at root and branch, and I am glad that the examination has at least been started.

As people are gradually coming to realise, this is the year in which it is likely that our North sea oil value of production will be at its peak. We should be thinking, as many people already are, about how the country will pay for its imports and other necessities when the oil ceases to provide any export value to our balance of payments. I am bound to say, with a heavy heart, that I cannot see any measure in the Budget which will assist our other industries and services to fill the enormous gap that looms ahead, and to make up for the loss of our oil exports and revenues. I hope that I am wrong, but nothing has yet shown that the Government are tackling that matter with either the resolution or the flexibility that is required.

Mr. Francis Pym (Cambridgeshire, South-East): For a number of years, both while I was a Minister and since, like the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright), I had the strongest reservations about the wisdom of the Government artificially raising energy prices and water charges. However, although the hon. Gentleman criticised that policy, he did not make any alternative suggestions as to where the additional income would come from.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on his presentation. His was one of the best-constructed Budget speeches that I have ever heard, and it was remarkably concise. The contrast with the speech of the Leader of the Opposition yesterday, and that by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), the deputy leader of the Labour party, is striking, to say the least.

The proposals that my right hon. Friend announced yesterday have so far attracted predictable reactions both within and outside the House. It is fair to say that on the Conservative Benches the response has been more one of muted welcome than of positive enthusiasm.

Many of my right hon. Friend's measures clearly command broad support, and quite rightly so. The reduction in national insurance contributions at the lower end, the raising of income tax thresholds, the extension of the youth training scheme and of the community programme, the measures to help small businesses and the self-employed, and the prospect of a future convergence of the tax and benefits systems are all to be welcomed warmly. There is nothing in the Budget to which exception can sensibly be taken and much in it that is highly commendable.

However, there is a world of difference between avoiding a bad Budget, which this most certainly is not, and producing a really good one. The proposals need to be judged not only on what they contain but on what they do not contain. The fundamental question is whether this Budget, and the whole economic and industrial approach of the Government, add up to a coherent strategy that will encourage the sustained growth of our economy and the prosperity of all our people in the future.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor took as his theme "a Budget for jobs". Within the context of his viewpoint, that is what it amounts to. However, for those who take a broader view of the role of Government and see a more positive scope for their action, it is not that. It is a Budget that will do a certain amount to remove disincentives to employment, and that is obviously essential, but it does not look like a Budget that has been conceived with the stimulation of employment on a substantial scale as its main objective. If it had been, the first requirement would have been the rewriting of the medium term financial plan and an increase in the PSBR.

I find it extraordinary that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor takes a rigid attitude to the PSBR, protesting that the slightest increase would wreck everything. His assertion that increased borrowing would fuel inflation is not borne out by the facts. He has announced an overshoot of £3 billion, a fact that appears to have no impact on inflation. I find it ironic to speculate that, had the Government chosen to recoup the cost of the miners' strike by passing it on to the consumer, that course of action would have been inflationary. By absorbing the cost into Government spending, the Government have avoided the inflationary effect.

The fact is that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is operating within a straitjacket of his own choosing. I very much admire the agility of his performance, but we should be questioning why he has bound himself up in this way in the first place. This straitjacket makes it impossible for him to produce a real "Budget for jobs". His proposals veer in that direction, but they do not go very far.

In that context, the real question is what the Government's economic policy is, which is not an easy question to answer. The Chancellor has announced, as is customary, the Treasury's forecast of the immediate economic outlook, but he has not amplified that to give us his assessment of the problems that confront our economy over the coming years, or provided us with a strategy to meet them.

My right hon. Friend has given us a modern version of "1066 and All That"—a world of good things and bad things. Inflation is a bad thing. Cutting taxes is a good thing. Public expenditure is a bad thing. Monetary control is a good thing. Unemployment is a bad thing, but it is clearly a better thing than borrowing money. In fact, borrowing money for any purpose is the worst thing of all. In consequence, we have a Budget that picks its way, with my right hon. Friend's great skill, through a landscape dominated by fear of the bogey man of borrowing. Its principal flaw is that responsible financial management, however necessary, does not in itself constitute an economic strategy. To me, the lack of such a strategy is the glaring gap.

As the starting point for a proper strategy, both sides of the House would do well to stop debating what factors have contributed to the present position, and to look with fresh eyes at where we are now and where we should be going. Trying to apportion blame between the so-called years of profligacy, the so-called over-deflationary policies of the Government and the effect of the world recession is ultimately a fruitless exercise. It is the future that matters. We need to look anew at the present and the future and we should take into account three main factors —growth in output, international competitiveness and unemployment.

Thank goodness we now have some growth. No one pretends that it is enough, and it still has not returned us to the level of output of 1979. Everything that we want to achieve for our country is dependent on attaining a high and sustained level of growth. That will be difficult enough anyway, but all the more so against the background of a progressive fall in oil revenue.

The level of growth that we need will not be achieved without an improvement in our competitiveness. We have made gains in productivity, but most other major countries have made bigger strides than we have. We are no more competitive today than we were six years ago, and probably less so. We still have a lot of progress to make.

The third major factor is unemployment. Many of us have spoken about the social and human evils of mass unemployment and especially of mass long-term unemployment as it exists in many communities in Britain today. The economic evil is no less immense, and it was good to hear my right hon. Friend acknowledge this.

A huge proportion of the natural resources of the country are lying to waste, financed by a massive payment that brings no long-term gain to the people, or to the country as a whole. Despite the very welcome rise in the number of people in work, there are no signs that the number of people out of work will fall appreciably, at least for some years to come. To many right hon. and hon. Members it is inconceivable that such an unacceptable situation should not substantially influence the objectives and the strategy of the Government.

The correct economic objective must surely be that which would be pursued by a company that found itself in the same unfortunate circumstances: to seek growth by simultaneously improving performance in existing areas of business, investing in new areas of business, and making the most of all the resources available.

The strategy that flows from such objectives should have three main features. First, the achievement of growth and the prospect of new long-term jobs are dependent not only on continuing to improve our performance on the supply side, but on stimulating the demand side. Secondly, improvements on the supply side are dependent on increased levels of investment—especially in new technology, but in other things too—on a further reduction of inflation and of industrial costs, and on a stable exchange rate. Thirdly, the stimulation of demand is dependent on injecting more money into the economy, through increased public sector investment.

The consequences of such a strategy would be the opportunity for a sustained growth in output, an increasing competitiveness in British industry, and the creation of more jobs both immediately and in the long term. I must stress that there is no reason why inflation should rise in consequence—and no reason, in fact, why it should not fall further.

[Mr. Francis Pym]

If such a strategy, or something close to it, lay behind the Government's thinking, I would have hoped and expected that yesterday's Budget would have included all the following features and not just some of them: an increase in Government investment in the public sector, with a consequent increase in the PSBR; incentives to investment in the private sector; a reduction in the cost of employment for both employer and employee; the creation of a major regional aid and development programme, and a programme to make possible far greater mobility of labour—a point mentioned by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary; further assistance towards the creation and success of new businesses; and the announcement of a more considered attitude towards the exchange rate.

When one compares these measures with those announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the differences are more substantial than the similarities. For that reason, my fear is that this Budget will not achieve the objectives that my right hon. Friend has set for it. I hope that I may prove to be wrong, but that is what I think. None of my right hon. Friend's changes go in the wrong direction, but few of them go very far in the right direction.

It seems to me that the time has come to question some of the assumptions that have governed economic policy for the past six years, and to question why British industry is less competitive internationally, despite attempts to make it more competitive. It is time to question why, although the conditions for growth have supposedly been created, the output of manufacturing industry is lower than it was six years ago; and why an increase in company profits has accompanied a decline in investment in manufacturing industry. It is time to question why the control of inflation has not led to much growth, to greater competitiveness or to reduced unemployment.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer assured us yesterday that his Budget was directed towards the continued control of inflation and the reduction of unemployment. Significantly, he added:

"Nor is there any conflict between these two objectives."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 787.]

But experience to date has been the opposite. The continued control of inflation has been accompanied by an inexorable rise in unemployment. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor that the two objectives need not conflict, but since — on present policies — they have conflicted, how can one have confidence that they will not continue to do so?

I do not think that it is unreasonable to ask whether we are any nearer to an answer to our main economic problems than we were six years ago. My answer would be, not much, with the exception of inflation. In that case, surely it is time to look for changes in policy. There seems to be little advantage in reshuffling a pack that has so far, at any rate, failed to produce any aces.

Mr. John Townend: My right hon. Friend has put forward an alternative policy of increased expenditure on the infrastructure. But are not many of his suggestions those that were carried out by Mr. Mitterrand after being elected to power in France? They resulted in a higher rate of inflation, increased unemployment and in an ultimate volte-face.

Mr. Pym: No, indeed not. If my hon. Friend reads tomorrow the speech that I have made, he will find that that is certainly not the case. I have argued quite carefully, and I hope reasonably briefly, that it is right to consider an alternative approach on the evidence of the results so far of our present economic policy.

We all share the objectives that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer outlined yesterday. What we need is a strategy that will deliver them. My real criticism of the Budget and of economic policy in general is not that it is wrong, but that it is inadequate for the problems that we face and the task in hand.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): The Chief Secretary's speech was marred, although it need not have been if he had had the decency—I do not want to go over what was said before—to apologise properly to the House. Hon. Members might then have listened to him with more rapt attention, but I am not too sure whether his speech would have told us much more.

The right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) damned the Budget with faint praise at the beginning of his speech, and then put forward an alternative Budget that would have given the people of this country far more hope. I agree with him that it is time that the Government asked themselves, if their economic strategy is not working after six years, what confidence anyone can have that it will work at all. Yesterday, the Chancellor of the Exchequer forgot to mention that he has presided over the greatest ever fall in the pound and over a great increase in unemployment. According to the Government's figures, unemployment stands at about 3·3 million——

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): After the Government have Tebbitised the figures.

Mr. Hoyle: In the real world—where it matters—we know that unemployment stands at over 4 million, and is still rising. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) that the Government have massaged the figures to make them appear to be as low as possible. Nevertheless unemployment is still rising. There has been a lack of investment in British industry and there has been no rise in productivity. But at the same time billions of pounds have gone overseas quite freely. That money should have been invested in British industry. Instead it has been invested in our competitors. Thus, all the time we have been strengthening the economies of Japan and other nations. Their products now compete highly successfully with British products not only in the other nations of the world but in this country. As a result there is even more unemployment.

There has also been a dramatic rise in interest rates. Therefore, I cannot see any hope of the economy recovering in the next 12 months if the Government's strategy remains one of a little tinkering here and a little tightening of bolts there. Indeed, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has said, not only is there no recovery, but the infrastructure of the nation is still decaying. Not only is there not enough investment in manufacturing industry, there are appalling standards in other vital sectors of the economy, especially education at all levels. Standards in higher education are falling. We are losing the seed corn.

We have a tatty and tarnished Health Service that is also in decline. It is apparent to the rest of the world, and it is dawning on hon. Members on the Government Benches, that our nation will continue to decline while the Government pursue their current economic strategy.

The Chancellor's speech yesterday suggests that no lessons have been learned. I was always taught not to look into the crystal ball when I could read the book. The Chancellor prefers to look into the crystal ball because what he sees in the book is too horrible to contemplate. He is not prepared to hold up his hands and say that the Government have been wrong, even though, apart from the reduction in inflation, nothing has improved.

For the first time, under this Government we face a deficit on our manufacturing trade. If we are not a manufacturing nation we are nothing, yet nothing is being done. We were told that the Government's measures would make us more competitive, leaner and keener. However, they have not done so. As the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East said, productivity is no higher now than it was six years ago. Indeed, it is lower.

Nevertheless, a terrible cost has been paid in the regions of this country for the Government's activities. While listening to the Chancellor's speech yesterday I was wondering what effect the Budget will have on areas such as my own constituency and other areas in the north-west, the north-east and Yorkshire, and on ports such as Grimsby. The answer is that it will have no effect at all on such areas. Indeed, rather than getting better, the situation in such areas will get worse.

All that the Chancellor said yesterday was that if wage levels were depressed even further, we would in some way become more competitive. He has not learnt a simple economic lesson. Perhaps there should be a primary course for the Prime Minister and the Chancellor in Keynesian economics. The Chancellor is simply depressing purchasing power, when we need a boost to the economy to raise purchasing power.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The Prime Minister recently went to the United States to lecture President Reagan and to tell him that he could have our failures instead of his success. Perhaps it would have been better if President Reagan—the only Keynesian economist who does not yet have grey hair—could come here to lecture the Prime Minister about the economy.

Mr. Hoyle: I have my doubts about President Reagan's hair. However, he has learned better than our Prime Minister how to use the economy, and he has learned how to use a deficit budget. We hear time and time again from the Government Front Bench that we have much to learn from the American economy about the revival of small businesses. We should also learn that the American economy has been revived by pumping purchasing power into it, not by depressing wages. If depressing wages was the answer, Calcutta would be the Mecca for us all, and so would Bangladesh.

The tragedy of the Government's policies is that they will create a low-technology, low-wage, low-economy society when what we need is a high-technology, high-wage, high-productivity society that looks forward rather than looking back to the 1920s and the 1930s.

People in the regions are feeling the effects of the Government's policies. One of the things that the Government have succeeded in doing is pushing the frontiers of the depressed north even further south. That area now encompasses the west midlands, an area that was once the manufacturing barometer of the nation. In the past, when we were closer to full employment, people looked to the west midlands to see, for example, what was happening to the motor industry. One has to look very carefully now to find any motor industry there at all. The place is a shambles. It is a desert.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield) indicated dissent.

Mr. Hoyle: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but the Conservatives will suffer in the west midlands at the next election unless Government Members pay more attention to the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East, and less to the Chancellor. The Government offer nothing to the west midlands car worker, the unemployed steel worker in my area, the unemployed textile worker in north-east Lancashire or the unemployed coal miner.

There is no sign of a revival, and the Government have done nothing not only for what used to be the basic industries but for the scientific industries of the future. There is now to be a tax on companies for employing people who have the expertise and scientific knowledge that might pull them companies out of the mire. Such people are needed in management if we are to have any chance of success.

The situation is tragic. However, as we frequently hear, the Government have one asset that no other Government have had before. They have the windfall of North sea oil. Unfortunately, the day of North sea oil may now be over. It will last for a little longer—thank goodness for that—but the reserves will become more difficult and more costly to extract.

North sea oil has provided the Government with £12 billion that they would not otherwise have had. However, the tragedy is that, instead of using those resources to build the new science-based industries of the future, the Government are paying out £17 billion in unemployment pay and social benefits. That is the economics of madness, yet there is no evidence of any new thinking at all on the Government Front Bench.

At long last the Government are crying about the plight of the unemployed, but they are making no attempt to solve the problem. They would have done better to invest some of the £12 billion windfall in the industries of the future.

We should also be plugging the gaps that permit money from the pension funds and the insurance companies, for instance, to flow overseas. We should be directing that money back into the long-term future of this country, especially by investing it in the new industries.

I welcome the absence of one measure from the Budget. The Chancellor did not introduce a tax on occupational pensions. Perhaps that was because of the strong representations from my own union, the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs. I had a very heavy postbag on the matter and I am sure that many other hon. Members did too. On the other hand, the reason may be simply that the Government have upset so many of those who misguidedly supported them at the general election that they decided not to take that horse to the last fence.

[Mr. Hoyle]

The Budget lacks flair and imagination. All we need is a little more common sense and for purchasing power to be put back into the economy. We should invest in infrastructure — modernise ports, build houses, build new schools and get rid of the antiquated institutions in which our children are still educated, build hospitals and equip them properly and employ some of the nurses and doctors who are out of work to look after the needy. That must make far more sense, and it is how to create real jobs. Everyone put back to work would pay income tax and spend money on consumer goods such as textiles, motor vehicles and washing machines, thus putting others back to work. There is no sign of that. Indeed, there is no sign that the Chancellor understands the mechanism.

One thing will now exercise the minds of many Conservative Members—they are now only two years away from the general election.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): Three.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: They have counted it down to the day.

Mr. Hoyle: Conservative Members will be pressing for a change which brings jobs to their constituencies and some security for those that are left. There was much speculation before the Budget and it was said that unless the Chancellor got it right, this would be his last Budget. My reaction, and that of many others in the City, trade unions and business, is that this is a non-Budget. It has already been forgotten, as has what it will do for the people. It has no imagination, flair or vision. Moreover, it will bring no hope to the regions or those I represent.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Once the initial reactions to the Budget have passed, it is difficult to avoid assessing its implications for one's constituency.

I thank my right hon. Friend for declining to extend the scope of VAT to books, for the largest employer in my constituency—I have no shame in disclosing this naked self-interest — is a leading firm of publishers and the headquarters of a large educational publishing company is also in my constituency. My colleagues in the Treasury were aware of my strong representations on behalf of those companies, which were deeply worried that VAT could seriously damage their business.

I am heartily glad that my right hon. Friend effectively squirted a puff of DDT at the lobbyists who, I suspect, were responsible for our having enormously heavy mail bags during the past four months. His declaration that there are to be no further changes in VAT in this Parliament are welcome inasmuch as they ought to guarantee a rather lower level of constituency mail for the rest of the parliament.

I welcome my right hon. Friend's commitment that there will be no change in the fiscal treatment of pensions without prior consultation. I am firmly one of those who believe in legislative change after as wide consultation as possible. That is more desirable than Budget diktat, which can produce change rapidly. For that reason, I welcome my right hon. Friend's intention to produce a Green Paper on the reform of personal taxation. I am strongly attracted to the notion of a personal allowance for both a husband and a wife. Such a long overdue reform will end an unfair discrimination against married women who choose to stay at home and look after their children rather than to seek employment.

I am also attracted by the possibility of bringing the tax system and the benefits system more closely together. Computerisation in the Department of Health and Social Security and the Inland Revenue should be recognised as an opportuniy for a greater coincidence of those systems, and therefore greater efficiency.

Like many others, I shall judge the Budget by its success in creating jobs and shortening dole queues. Notwithstanding what Opposition Members have said, I welcome the incentive to business to take on young people. I have listened to the outrage which appears to come from the Opposition. The word "sweatshop" is bandied about. There is an obscenity in the argument which supports an artificially high wage for a young person at the expense of another young person who remains on the dole. I welcome Treasury Ministers' courage in being prepared to acknowledge that and to give great hope to young people who are currently without a job.

I welcome unreservedly the fact that the Budget puts more into the pockets of the lower paid through tax cuts and national insurance cuts. There might indeed be groans in the boardrooms of the City about the extra cost of employing skilled people who can command high salaries, but it is not unreasonable to expect companies that employ people at the top of the tree to make a sacrifice for those who are at the bottom of the heap.

Like many other right hon. and hon. Members, I represent a constituency which has pockets of high unemployment. I am fortunate in coming from the west of Scotland and having a constituency in which the overall level of unemployment is less than 10 per cent., but that figure masks areas of considerably higher unemployment. It is hard not to be moved by the plight of youngsters who come to my surgery telling of their miserable experiences when applying for jobs. They apply again and again and suffer constant rejection or, worse, would-be employers decline to acknowledge their applications. I often feel guilt at their helplessness and the worries that are feelingly articulated by their parents. I am therefore extremely glad that the youth training scheme is to be extended to all youngsters without a job or the prospect of higher education on leaving school.

Nothing can be more wrong or demeaning than a school leaver finding himself sliding on to the dole and a life of institutionalised idleness. The extension of YTS to two years will present a great challenge to the Manpower Services Commission to be even more successful in seeking out employers prepared to take on people in training vacancies.

In areas such as mine, the MSC should endeavour to identify more local vacancies so that young people do not find that their fairly modest remuneration is whittled away by higher transport costs. A recent study in Strathkelvin showed a rather unfortunate shortage of training vacancies. I hope that the MSC will recognise the challenge implicit in an extension of the training period and do its best to find additional vacancies.

I am pleased also that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has recognised the plight of the long-term unemployed and has been prepared to act. The Opposition have only shed crocodile tears. By boosting the community programme, my right hon. Friend has shown the long-term unemployed that they are not the forgotten ones.

I have had a chance to visit many useful community programmes to see their operations. I have been intrigued by the fact that I, a Government Back Bencher—I am almost an island of blue in an ocean of red and, like my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, represent a west of Scotland constituency — received invitations to visit projects in the west of Scotland. Having recorded my appreciation and admiration for a particular project, a few months ago I received a letter from the project's organisers asking me to send a warm letter of support to the area's manpower board requesting funding for a second year.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): Did you do so?

Mr. Hirst: I did. I also sent a letter to a major project in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I am sure that he will be grateful to me for doing so.

In welcoming the changes, I cannot let the matter pass without articulating the concerns that have been so forcefully expressed by many people in the construction industry in the west of Scotland. A number of my constituents have positions of responsibility in the construction industry that present them with enormous difficulties in keeping together a core of skilled people to preserve their business and to take advantage of the upturn in construction activity. As one who has come from the business world, I recognise the difficulties of coping with vagaries of demand in business and the challenges thereby presented to management. I can only speculate on the extent to which the Chancellor could fund additional capital projects without damaging his medium term financial strategy. I dare say that the House could engage in such a discussion for the rest of the day. I recognise that there is a delicate balance between the borrowing requirement, interest rates and the imperative of low inflation, which is essential in encouraging investment and job creation.

Mr. Craigen: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way to one who is part of that portion of red. Why have the Government singled out housing and construction for such cuts in investment, given the employment potential that the hon. Gentleman rightly sees in housing and construction?

Mr. Hirst: The hon. Gentleman cannot overlook the fact that low interest rates are the most compelling stimulant to the creation of private housing. Demand for private housing is enormous and as yet, unrequited in the west of Scotland. Private housing would be provided when stable economic conditions bring about low interest rates.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: When?

Mr. Hirst: The hon. Gentleman knows jolly well that interest rates are at their present level because of the budget deficit in America and the misery exported to the rest of the world by the artificially high borrowing requirement in America.

Whatever our views on the extent to which there should be a public sector borrowing requirement, we are united in our acceptance of the importance of low interest rates and the benefits they bring, spreading throughout industry to every borrower and home buyer.

I remind the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle), who talked of dismal levels of investment, that investment is running at an all-time record rate, but the trouble is that purblind commitments to ideology prevent him from seeing that much of the investment comes from the private sector. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman would prefer that investment to come only from the public sector. If we had the type of pools winner spending that is constantly advocated by the Opposition, the pound would be worth 90 cents, interest rates would be even higher and inflation would increase again. If the Labour party ever has a chance to form a Government, it would end, as has happened before, in tears, with the doctors from the IMF coming to give us the kiss of life.

Mr. Hoyle: The hon. Gentleman talks about interest rates being higher. Present interest rates are only high compared to previous rates under his Government. In fact, interest rates in real terms are overall about 30 per cent. below the rates in relative terms than when we were in government, and there was real spending power.

Mr. Hirst: The hon. Gentleman must make a proper and valid comparison. He cannot escape the basic truth that, if his party were in government and spending at the levels it says, interest rates would be much higher than they are. If the Budget package which the Leader of the Opposition was seeking yesterday were implemented, there would have been no cut this afternoon in lending rates—far from it.

The Chancellor has set aside an additional £2 billion each year for the next three years to boost his contingency reserve. I hope that that money will be spent to create jobs and not, as it was last year, to defend liberty from the abuse of industrial power for political ends.

Having made that point, I stake a claim for Scotland's hard-pressed domestic ratepayers who, next year, will suffer a rates increase perhaps more than twice the value of the tax relief given in the Budget through increased personal allowances. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will forgive me if I import into the discussion a little of the concern expressed so strongly by my constituents. I know that he is aware of this worry.

As a professional accountant, I welcome many of the worthwhile — albeit undramatic — changes in the tax regime. In deference to so many of my colleagues who wish to participate in the debate, I may, as a member of the Standing Committee on the Bill, discuss the changes more fully later. [Interruption.] I assure the Opposition that I am expressing a desire to serve on the Standing Committee.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): May we have an assurance that, if the hon. Gentleman sits on the Standing Committee on the Finance Bill, he will play a more active part than most of his Tory colleagues have done during consideration of that Bill in previous years?

Mr. Hirst: The hon. Gentleman will know, because he sat opposite me during much of the discussion in Standing Committee last year, that when I and most of my colleagues opened our mouths we spoke quality rather than quantity, unlike the Opposition. I have no doubt that "guid gear comes in sma' bulk", which means that something that is worth while comes in small bulk.

The balance in the Budget proposals is about right in their emphasis on maintenance of stable economic conditions and job creation. I represent a constituency in which the haves and the have nots are well represented. The Budget will give me the opportunity to look both straight in the eye and tell them that there is hope for all of them.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced the Budget as a package for jobs, but I would not describe it in those terms. If anything, it is a charter for lower paid jobs. That is about the only thing that can be said for it in terms of employment. My constituents will not see the Budget doing anything to help prospects in Burnley. I am concerned by further signs that the Government will abolish wages councils. This poses a threat to those who work in low-paid industries, and it must be of serious concern.

Many working people receive low pay and in the past that has done nothing to save their jobs. Yesterday the Prime Minister stood by her statement that low pay is better than no pay. There may be a little truth in that statement, but it is not an acceptable position for those who are having to work for low pay. Many employees of the Government who are engaged in public service, many hospital and local government employees and many in industry are working for unacceptably low wages. However, they still face redundancies and the threat of job losses is ever-present. Low pay does nothing to stop that. Anyone who works should receive a wage that enables him to live properly. He should not have to depend on benefits such as the family income supplement and unified housing benefit. That is wrong and we should be changing society to ensure that those in work no longer need to claim those benefits.

About two months ago, one of my constituents told me that he was working in a factory after having been unemployed for two years. He told me that his pay on the top line was £50 a week and that that was the wage which all the workers were receiving, apart from the foreman, who was receiving the extravagant wage of £54 a week. Would Conservative Members like to try to live and support a family on that sort of wage?

I do not accept the claim of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Budget will create jobs. The job losses that will result from the Government's actions will far outweigh any job gains that stem from the Budget. It was significant that the Chief Secretary was unable, when he sought to respond to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist), to say how many new jobs will be created. He was able to describe the effects of the increased funding of the youth training scheme and the community programme, but he could not say how many new and real jobs would be created.

Local government is suffering capital cuts, and this will result in many people becoming unemployed. The Government's overall package, which is not confined to the Budget, will produce an unacceptable increase in unemployment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer talks about low wages. I believe that, if he were to be paid on the basis of productivity for his Budget, he would take a cut. That might be a good thing.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer referred yesterday to the many rumours that had been circulating about the Budget. Perhaps he welcomes the rumours, even if he does not create them. They enable him to say after the Budget statement, "Well, it was not as bad as you expected." He hopes that the newspapers will give publicity to the things which he has not done but which the rumours suggested he would. Such publicity draws attention away from the measures that he has proposed and the measures which he should have taken but has not. Our attention tends to be drawn from the significant issues by the false rumours that circulate.

I welcome the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not include proposals in his Budget adversely to affect pension funds, to tax lump sum payments or to tax pension fund investments. I served as a worker-director of a large pension fund before I was elected to this place. I served also as a trustee of a county council pension fund. I am concerned about the considerable investment of the pension funds in overseas countries and believe that more of their investment should be within the United Kingdom. It is nonsense to say that the funds have a prime duty to protect those to whom they will pay a pension when they retire, when they are jeopardising the jobs of those whom they are trying to protect by investing so heavily in overseas countries.

Mr. Hoyle: Does my hon. Friend agree that protection of the pension funds lies in the appointment of more worker-directors such as himself? Does he agree that they should constitute at least 50 per cent. of the board?

Mr. Pike: I have always supported the concept of worker-directors of pension funds. They are a most useful addition to the pension fund boards. Unfortunately, most worker-directors and other participants from the work force do not have any real powers and serve only in an advisory capacity. Their powers should be increased.

It was rumoured that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would tax gas and electricity, newspapers and books. He did not do so, but he has proposed—I predicted two or three weeks ago that this would happen—to levy VAT on newspaper advertising. I accept that the present absence of VAT on newspaper advertising is an anomaly, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal to remedy it will have serious consequences, especially for the local and provincial press. Advertising budgets are tightly controlled, and the Chancellor's proposal, if implemented, will mean that there will be less money available to the local press, and this could well jeopardise jobs. I do not always agree with what appears in the local press—very often I disagree with the opinions that are expressed and printed in local newspapers—but it will be a bad day for the country if further local and regional newspapers cease to exist.

Mr. Hirst: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the levying of VAT on television advertising but not on newspaper advertising is an anomaly and that it is desirable that it is overcome?

Mr. Pike: I can only assume that the hon. Gentleman has not been listening to my remarks. I recognise that there is an anomaly, but that does not necessarily mean that it should be removed. I believe that the Chancellor's proposals will place many local and regional newspapers in jeopardy. Advertising revenue is vital to their survival and if it is cut they will be placed in severe difficulties.

I am pleased that the Chancellor proposes to increase the single man's allowance and the married man's allowance. This will be of great benefit to the lower paid. It will be more valuable than any reduction in tax rates. However, the increased allowances will be of no benefit to those who are paying no tax, and there are many in that position.

The Chancellor's proposals will benefit a married man by just under £2 a week and a single man by just over £1 a week. However, the increases in the price of petrol, beer and cigarettes will mean that the Government will take more, especially from working people, than they are giving. They are giving with one hand and taking back more with the other. My constituents will say that the increased taxation of beer and cigarettes will bear heavily on working men and their pleasures. This will be evident to them when they note the Chancellor's treatment of cigars and whisky, which is more favourable.

The Conservative Government were elected in 1979 and we should take account of their 1979 Budget, in which they reduced income tax at the ordinary rate by 3p but introduced a 23p reduction for those on the top band of income tax. That is indefensible and has given a massive benefit to highly paid people. Few people in my constituency benefited from the 23p reduction at the top of the scale. It would have been better to give more tax concessions in favour of the people at the lower end of the scale.

We have a responsibility to ensure that people have a decent standard of living. I have already said that people should receive a proper living wage. The same applies to pensioners. As a minimum, the link to wages should be restored. This would have resulted in the pensioners receiving more.

There are many anomalies in what the Government have done, but they are doing not one single thing that will solve the problems facing the country. One should consider not only the Budget, which does nothing to improve the number of jobs in the country, but other aspects—housing is in decline, hospitals are in need and there are long hospital waiting lists.

The record of the Government is a disaster. Until the Government and the Chancellor change direction, we will continue in a downward spiral. The Government should make a positive change in direction and start on a determined effort to create jobs. Only when the Government move in a completely different direction from that which they have been following for the past six years will we really begin to solve the problems facing the country and to deal with the difficulties that are facing so many of our constituents.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): I hope that the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) will excuse me if I do not follow the line of thought that he was developing.

I think that this is an excellent Budget, not least because it has one quality which in my view deserves more attention and perhaps more praise from the Opposition Benches—the quality of social solidarity. Most of the so-called give-aways in the Budget are at the bottom end of the scale. They are not in the form of sterile handouts, but are carefully calculated to stimulate employment and to motivate people to look for work. While I think this is an excellent Budget, I also believe that it is a limited one, for a number of reasons that I wish to outline.

First, I believe that there will be another budget in a few months' time which will be a benefits budget. So great is the proportion of public expenditure currently accounted for by the Department of Health and Social Security—if we continue at this demand-led rate, it will be approaching half the total public expenditure — that, when the reviews which are currently being undertaken by the Secretary of State for Social Services come to fruition, it will amount to a benefits budget on its own. In contemplating that mini-budget which is to come, I hope that the Government will give it the same thrust that my right hon. Friend has chosen for his Budget. By that, I mean the concentration of effort and money where it is most needed, and dynamic thinking: not in terms of handouts but of helping the poorest in society in ways that make us more able to help each other in the future.

Secondly, the Budget is a rather limited one in the sense of what it omits. It is true that in our society benefits are now given from the cradle to the grave literally, starting with child benefit and ending with death grant. I am concerned not so much by the fact of those benefits, but because in this country to a much greater extent than other countries people start thinking about the grave so soon after the cradle.

That brings me to the delicate territory of pensions. The Chancellor implied that there is a case for considering pensions, but he also said that there would be no Green Paper on pensions. Thus the case for considering pensions will not be articulated at this stage in the form of a Green Paper. One does not have to be a great politician to understand the reason for that. I suggest that we keep this ball in the air. We should not lose sight of overall economic objectives. We are talking about £7 billion of tax forgone. From some figures that I saw today, I understand that the total has increased by £2 billion in the last two years alone. In a way, that is a splendid thing, and we all know the case for pensions — God knows we have received enough letters spelling it out. But let us not lose sight of the extent of the pensions business in the country, and the distorting effects that it can have on investment and possibly on jobs. Recently I was looking at some very nice paintings which had been bought by the British Rail pension fund and it crossed my mind that there are not many British jobs in French impressionists, so let us bear that aspect in mind.

Mr. D. Nellist: Does not the hon. Gentleman recognise that when Arthur Scargill and others in the National Union of Mineworkers argued the point about pension funds investment in British industry, Arthur Scargill was removed from the board of trustees because that decision was held not to be within his competence. How can the hon. Gentleman make the point that he has just made?

Mr. Walden: The difference between me and the hon. Member for Coventry South-East (Mr. Nellist) is that he is talking about compulsion and I am talking about freedom. The hon. Gentleman implies that the Government should take control of how pension funds are invested——

Mr. Nellist: No.

Mr. Walden: I will rephrase that—to direct that investment. The fact that those pension funds are given tax relief and are so large I suspect tends to have an inhibiting effect on the spirit of enterprise in the country and hence on jobs. In a sense, therefore, the hon. Gentleman and I are talking indirectly about the same thing from different angles.

[Mr. Walden]

I deal next with another limitation of the Budget.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My hon. Friend is exploring the possibility of subjecting pensions to tax, but is not the problem that the greatest sum, £4,000 million, arises because the contributions are exempt? There will be great hostility to bringing those into tax. What would be more acceptable, subjecting the funds themselves to tax, would being in only about £650 million.

Mr. Walden: My hon. Friend and I may have looked at different figures, and I am perfectly prepared to accept that his figures are right. The last figures I saw show that the tax relief on pension funds is more like £2·5 billion. I shall look at that again in the light of my hon. Friend's comments.

The second limitation in the Budget to which I wish to point concerns mortgage interest relief—another matter not too popular among many of my hon. Friends, but I think that we should keep these questions in mind. In my view, the extent of current mortgage interest relief is another distorting element in the British economy. I would link it—because it is linked organically—to the question of pensions. I will give one small, colourful example. I was recently told that the fashion among hitherto rather prim civil servants is not to get married unless they actually have to because together they benefit to the extent of £60,000 tax-free on a house. That is a minor but colourful example of the distorting effect that the extent of mortgage interest relief can have. Here we are talking of £3 billion and, as in the case of pension relief, this is not static but rising.

The third avenue that the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems implicity to have closed is VAT. I shall not launch into a long discussion of VAT. I shall say only that I hope that, difficult though it is, he will pursue his strategy of going from direct to indirect taxation wherever possible.

In his decisions on pensions, mortgage tax relief and VAT, the Chancellor of the Exchequer appears to have cut off three important and—in terms of tax relief—very expensive areas. I do not think that we are in any position to do that. We should put constantly before the British public the facts about the benefits that they are receiving and what it means with regard to the Government's limited ability to bring down direct taxation. It would be a pity if the three areas that I have mentioned were to be lost from sight. We have all had many letters about them, and I think that the honest course is to go on putting those issues before the public, because there should be more discussion about them.

I should like to refer to an indirectly related subject —the state of relations between the Government and the TUC. In his speech the Chancellor of the Exchequer rightly talked a great deal about the youth training scheme and other forms of training. It is obvious that there is little scope for fruitful discussion at present between the Government and the TUC on such questions as how far employment can be inhibited by excessive wage rises. But if the Government can increase their contacts with post-Chernenko Russia, surely we can increase our contacts with the post-Scargill TUC.

Mr. Nellist: He is still there.

Mr. Walden: The hon. Gentleman says that Mr. Scargill is still there. I believe that he is politically dead; I certainly hope he is. One way to ensure the political death of the former miners' leader—as I prefer to think of him—is to go along the path that I have suggested, and to deal with the TUC on common ground. That common ground is training and what we can do together for our young people. I was glad that, in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, he mentioned the need to consult the TUC about expanding the YTS. I hope that he will follow it up energetically.

We have a reforming rather than a radical Budget, and I well understand the constraints on the Chancellor of the Exchequer that made it so. It has been unfairly said of him that he backed away from the problems. It would be fairer to say that the problems backed away from him.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): In one sense the Budget fulfilled one of my expectations. I did not expect any real relief for the more than 4 million unemployed and the further millions who have low standards of living. My expectations were fulfilled, because the Budget provided no real relief for those millions of people in our society.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had the gall yesterday to describe his Budget as a Budget for jobs. It can more accurately be described as a low-wage Budget. It does nothing for the more than 4 million unemployed. The few jobs that may be created by some of his measures will be essentially low-wage jobs.

Last night, on the BBC television news, in an analysis of the Budget, an employer who had been listening to the live radio broadcast of the Budget was asked whether he thought that it would increase jobs. He said that he might consider taking on another young worker at the expense of an older worker, because it would become cheaper to employ young people. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's measures will not reduce the number of unemployed; they will simply shift the burden of unemployment increasingly up the age scale.

I believe that most of the changes in the employer's national insurance contributions will result not in businesses taking on new workers but in extra profits for those businesses. Chancellor of the Exchequer's measures are highly cosmetic. We have heard about the reduction in unemployment that is supposed to follow from stepping up the YTS and the community programme. A figure of a third of a million has been mentioned in regard to the two schemes. This afternoon, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury talked about 150,000 jobs being created by the expansion of the YTS. It is supposed to be a training scheme. Its failure is that at the end of the training there are no jobs for the vast majority of the youngsters concerned. We have heard of £1 billion being spent on those schemes, but when the net cost and the benefit of the so-called savings are taken into account, the cost is £75 million. That is less than the Government have been spending in one week on trying to break the National Union of Mineworkers.

It is all very well for the Prime Minister to shout about a task force to deal with football hooliganism. We do not hear her talking of a task force to deal with youth unemployment. There are 237,000 youngsters of 16 or 17 who are not on youth training schemes. At present they are claiming supplementary benefit. Yesterday the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that unemployment will no longer be an option.

That is a dangerous confirmation of what I have suggested, in the past few months, lies behind the thoughts of the Prime Minister and her Cabinet. They want to remove those youngsters from supplementary benefit and to introduce economic and industrial conscription. There is no guarantee that the youngsters will get jobs at the end of their training. The expansion in the scheme is taking place in order to fiddle the dole figures and to try to maintain that unemployment has been reduced by a third of a million.

There has been no mention of the allowances paid under the training scheme. When shall we hear from the Government that they intend to increase the allowances? The youth opportunities programme was introduced six years ago. If the allowances had been increased in line with inflation or earnings, the youngsters on YTS would be getting £40 a week today. Instead, the allowance has been frozen for years at £25 and it is now only £26. That is why there is a need for measures such as my own private Member's Bill to provide a genuine and decent training to youngsters and a minimum trade union rate for them of £55 a week.

Youngsters recognise that nothing that the Tory Government have done up to the present, or even in yesterday's Budget, alters the material fact that there is no future for the majority of young people leaving school. In 1983 in Coventry during the general election slogans were sprayed on the subway walls saying, "Vote Tory, retire at 16". That is what young people think of the Government's policies.

There are now rumours about the abolition of the wages councils, which protect the lowest paid 10 per cent. of the working population in shops, in hotels and in slightly more obscure occupations such as coffin manufacture and ostrich feather manufacture. Such people are on £40, £50 and £60 a week and need protection. If the Tory Government carry out their threat to abolish the wages councils, the trade union movement will have to organise a massive recruitment drive among those workers to offer them the hope of some protection.

In the past 24 hours, the Budget has been seen, and it will be seen in retrospect, as a Budget to drive down wages. It is offered by the Treasury Bench as a Budget that will create jobs. Where is the proof? At least a dozen times I have asked Ministers in the Department of Employment to justify the assertion that if the wages of young people are cut more jobs are created. Since the Tories came to office young people's wages have fallen by 8 per cent. for boys and 12 per cent. for girls. In the same period youth unemployment has tripled. Therefore, how can it be said that cutting wages creates more jobs? The only solution that the Tory Government are offering to cure unemployment is to have two workers doing the work of one and sharing the wage between them. The Government are trying to massage and fiddle the dole figures in some magical way to achieve that result.

Mr. John Townend: Will the hon. Gentleman give his opinion on the decision of the Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunications and Plumbing Union? It realised that apprentices had fallen in numbers because of the high starting wage. Therefore it agreed to a substantial reduction in the starting wage. As a result, the number of apprentices in the union has increased, whereas in other unions it has declined.

Mr. Nellist: The answer is simple, and I have made the point to the EETPU in the past two years. The price of that agreement has been to reduce the wages and allowances paid to apprentices in the industry. It would have been far better for that union to follow the policy of the sheet metal workers and the Transport and General Workers' Union. They argued with the management at Massey Ferguson in Coventry that there should be a trade union rate of pay for those on youth training schemes. As a result, the youngsters in that firm are getting £74 a week, with a guarantee of a job at the end of the scheme. It is the task of the trade union movement to protect and enhance the conditions of workers and not to cut the wages of apprentices.

This, therefore, is a low-wage Budget. When we consider the Chancellor's proposals in that light, and particularly the extension of unfair dismissal clauses to firms with more than 20 employees, we see the danger in the context of the general anti-trade union feelings of the Government, because some employers will use the change to attack trade union rights. In doing that, they will attack those who take on the job of shop steward in the first two years of their employment. I can foresee employers replacing youngsters aged 20 and 21 with cheaper, ex-YTS 17, 18, and 19-year-olds, sacking the 20 and 21-year-olds before they have achieved two years' employment.

We have already seen that happen, particularly with older women workers and youngsters who have left, or are still on, YOP schemes. Nothing has altered the scandalous position by which part-time workers who work 12 to 16 hours a week must complete a five-year probation period before getting the most elementary unfair dismissal protection. That is another aspect of this low-wage Budget.

Great play has been made with the so-called give-away aspects of tax changes. Despite the Chancellor's attempts to cloak himself with a generous reputation, the increased allowances will mean, for most workers, £1·50 or £1·80 a week extra. But that has already been taken away by the previous announcement of price rises in gas, electricity, water and prescription charges and by the rises announced yesterday in the price of cigarettes, beer and petrol.

Nobody is fooled by the separate announcements that have become the hallmark of the Government. There was a time when all such announcements were made at one time, in the Budget. They included dental and prescription charges. Now, the Government separate increases of that sort by a couple of weeks, hoping to take the sting out of what they are doing.

When those increases are contrasted with the changes at the other end of the tax spectrum, such as in capital gains tax and the abolition of development land tax, it is clear that they have been warmly welcomed—I don't think—by the people in the dole queues. There was no dancing in the streets of council estates in Coventry last night over the widening of relief from capital transfer tax on land surrounding homes of architectural heritage, despite the fact that much of the worst housing in Britain could qualify for that on age alone. None of those changes will be welcomed by the majority of the population.

I wish to concentrate on what was not done in the budget. The Chancellor told lobby journalists that he was boxed in. We know why the right hon. Gentleman found himself in that position. He was boxed in by the £6 billion that the Tories caused to be spent in the last year on the "worthwhile investment"—the Chancellor's phrase—of trying to destroy the National Union of Mineworkers.

We had the ludicrous announcement yesterday—as we had last Friday, when we debated the west midlands — that, somehow, we were in the fifth year of successful and sustained growth. We have had a plethora of statistics to justify that statement, showing a few percentage points increase in this or that index. But the Chancellor never tells us the base to which the statistics are supposed to relate.

The engine of any economy is manufacturing investment. That is still 25 per cent. lower than when the present Prime Minister walked through the door of 10, Downing street in 1979. Manufacturing production is still less than it was during the three-day week of a previous Tory Government in the early 1970s.

The Chancellor tries to depict trade unionists as Luddites. The Tories have presided over the biggest example of Luddism this century. They have destroyed one in five factories in Britain. It is all very well for the Tories to talk about creating small businesses. The easiest way to do that today is to start with a large business; it will soon turn into a small one under their policies. They have tripled unemployment. Britain has become a second-rate country with third-rate living standards. The Chancellor completely ignores the real position of capitalism in Britain.

In The Times, with pictures, appeared these words which appropriately described what the Chancellor did not mention when he presented his Budget yesterday:

"After the war Great Britain was the third largest steel producer. Now we are 10th.

In 1900 Great Britain made 60 per cent. of the world's shipping. Today we make 3 per cent.

Britain once exported motor bikes to over 100 countries. Now we import almost every machine we buy.

After the war almost every car on the road was British. Now over half are foreign.

Britain pioneered the world machine tool industry. Now our share is 3·1 per cent.

Britain discovered the wireless. We now import 96 per cent. of all personal and portable radios.

Britain made the first practical computer. Now we have 5 per cent. of the information technology market.

We once made all the textile machinery in the world. We now make 8 per cent."

That is an incredible advertisement of the present state of affairs. Since the Spanish empire collapsed 300 years ago, no economy in history has declined faster than Britain's in the last 30 years.

Mr. Hirst: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the appalling unwillingness of the trade union movement to change working practices has been responsible for the total decline in Britain's economic performance?

Mr. Nellist: I could not for a moment accept that. It has been due to the appalling inability of those who have had the real stewardship of British industry, the employers, for refusing to invest in industry and who, instead, have allowed £50 billion to leave the country in the last five years.

Trade unions do not have control of those investment decisions. Indeed, even Parliament does not have control over them. We have never been presented with a Dunlop (Closure) Bill, a Courtaulds (Reduction of Workers) Bill or a GEC (Subsidy for Short-time Working) Bill. Decisions of that type are made in boardrooms by the directors and major shareholders of British industry. They are responsible for our lack of competitiveness and for all the money that has flowed abroad in the last five years.

The British economy will, once again, be heading for recession in the coming year or two, but it will be far worse than it was in 1974, 1976, 1979 or 1981. Already, Britain is seen abroad as a nation comparable to a Third-world offshore tax haven. In The Economist on Saturday appeared an advertisement relating to a report which could be purchased for £60, and another for $120, headed, "United Kingdom as a tax haven". It claimed:

"With low effective tax rates, reinforced by a wide range of government assistance to business by region and sector, the United Kingdom is a tax haven for those who know their way around."

That is what the Government have turned our economy into.

It can more accurately be described as a rentier economy, an economy that depends on the ownership of shares, materials and investment abroad, rather than investment in our manufacturing industry. That spells future further massive attacks on the living standards of working people in Britain. That is the real reason why the Ridley report was written in the mid-1970s and enacted by the Conservatives to attack the NUM, hoping to demoralise the union and strip away the power of trade unions to defend their members.

What has the Budget done for Coventry? Ten years ago, two thirds of the people working in that city were employed in manufacturing, mainly for 15 companies which produced cars, engines, machine tools and telecommunications equipment. About 60,000 jobs have gone from those industries in the last 10 years. I told the House a couple of weeks ago that in one ward in the centre of the city—Coventry, South-East, which I represent—the unemployment rate was 32 per cent. It has now risen to 36·9 per cent.

When young workers, men over 60 and women workers who are not allowed to register for supplementary benefit are added to the total, the real rate of unemployment in that city centre area is over 50 per cent. For those workers, the cosmetic approach of the Budget means nothing.

The Chancellor says, "Hang about. The Government have no responsibility or ability to create jobs. Only the economic climate can create employment." That is not true in Coventry, nor, I suspect, is it true of other parts of the country. Many of Coventry's job losses have been due to Government decisions, particularly the closure in recent years of major parts of British Leyland.

Now, almost two in five—50,000 out of 135,000—workers there depend on central or local government spending for their livelihood. The largest is the city council, with 10,500 full-time and 7,000 part-time workers. yet Coventry city council has lost £80 million in the last five years as a result of Tory cuts, for example, in housing subsidies. Money spent by that means could have created jobs for building workers and provided better homes for people in the city.

When one adds to that the number of jobs lost through cuts in the NHS, DHSS, Inland Revenue, which once employed 9,000 people, and other public services, such as the university; in nationalised industries such as the gas, electricity and coal boards; in nationalised companies such as Rolls-Royce; in part nationally owned companies such as British Telecom; and in all the other companies which rely on Government contracts in, say, defence, such as Alvis, GEC, Dunlop and Courtaulds, and other firms which supply those companies, we find that 40 per cent. of the jobs in Coventry are dependent on decisions made by the Government. Thus, the reduction in the number of workers in that city has been caused by decisions taken by the Conservatives in the last six years.

The Chancellor spoke of five years of successful economic recovery. Several of his leading supporters in boardrooms are talking of a new golden age in British capitalism. If prospects are so good, why has £50,000 million left the United Kingdom and gone abroad during the past five years to low-wage anti-trade union economies, such as South Africa, Brazil, Korea and Argentina? Where is the so-called patriotism of those directors that they would rather invest abroad than in British companies and jobs?

The little increases that we have seen in the British economy have been largely due to North sea oil. Without that crutch, there would be an even more calamitous drop in capitalism compared with our overseas rivals. Last year, for the first time since the days of Queen Elizabeth I, we imported more factory-made goods than we exported. At one time, we were known as the workshop of the world, but now we are more accurately described as the warehouse of the world. We have lost those world markets because of a lack of investment, especially during the past 25 years, and now we are also losing domestic markets.

We have seen the rise of the Chancellor and the Prime Minister — the representatives of finance capital as opposed to industrial capital. The Tory Cabinet has the ludicrous idea that manufacturing industry does not matter, that it can be replaced by service and financial industries. Some Tory Back-Bench Members have even talked about a rise in tourism as providing jobs, as if unemployed ship workers, car workers and steel workers can get jobs as beefeaters at the Tower of London. That is a stupid idea.

The service sector is entirely dependent on manufacturing for its products. Bankers depend on computers, hairdressers on scissors, hotels on furnishings and journalists—not many are present now—on typewriters. The production of real wealth is based on the production of manufacturing wealth. Yet that is the sector that the Government seek to ignore.

More than 30 per cent. of industry is now idle, and nothing that the Chancellor said will get that unused capacity moving. The Library estimates — I have challenged Treasury Ministers on this figure — that £200,000 million of investment would be needed in manufacturing industry merely to catch up with Germany, Japan and America. That is 40 times the present annual rate. Even on an exponential of that figure, under present policies it would take until the year 2025 before British industry was as competitive as those countries. There is no prospect of this Government or the capitalist system following that path. The Government and its supporters have given up re-tooling industry at that rate. They have convinced themselves that the only road to economic salvation lies in a further massive decline in the living standards of the British working class. That is why we have had a cheap wages Budget.

The Budget will not work. The next economic downturn will expose British capitalism still further, and squeeze foreign and domestic markets, with a consequent rise in unemployment. Nothing in the Budget will fundamentally alter the long-term decline of the British economy.

For that, we need an early general election and a new Socialist Labour Government. We need public ownership, and workers' control and management of industry and finance across the commanding heights of the economy. We need a proper Socialist economic plan, which will not provide profits for a few thousand friends of the Chancellor and the Government, but fulfil the needs of millions of people. It must be based on a shorter working week with a maximum of 35 hours, early retirement and other measures to share work. It must end low pay and set a national minimum wage of at least £100 a week, with pensions to match. It must provide a massive boost to public expenditure to build thousands of schools and hospitals, and the millions of homes that are needed.

At present, 400,000 building workers are unemployed, yet millions and millions of bricks are stockpiled. Money is sloshing around in the financial system and people are living in 6 million damp houses. The Government cannot, and do not want to, match the needs of working people with the skills that can fulfil their needs. For that we need a Labour Government with Socialist policies. For those reasons I call on the House to reject the Budget, to demand the resignation of the Chancellor and to tell him to take the rest of the Government with him.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): The House can judge the validity of the speech of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) by the fact that he took a number and doubled it. He quoted the cost of the miners' strike as £6 billion, but page 40 of the Red Book sets it at £2·5 billion. It is also clear that he supports the policy of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) of attacking pension funds. He agrees that pension funds should be forced to bring their funds back from investment abroad, where they have been invested in the best interests of pensioners, and to invest them in projects which Labour Members think are socially and politically advisable. We all know what would happen to pensions if that were done.

At the beginning of the debate I was a little surprised at the disruption. However, I now have a copy of the Labour Party's general election manifesto. I understand the sensitivity of Labour Members about their council house policy. The manifesto states that the Labour party would

> "End enforced council house sales, empower public landlords to repurchase homes sold under the Tories on first resale and provide that future voluntary agreed sales will be at market value."

That policy was clearly unpopular with the electorate at the general election, and I understand why there was such uproar when that policy was quoted today.

To make a fair and unbiased judgment of the Budget, it is necessary to understand the constraints that severely restricted the Chancellor's ability to produce an exciting, innovative and tax-reducing Budget. Those constraints were the strength of the dollar and the weakness of oil prices, which had a considerable effect on currency markets; the cost of the miners' strike, which admittedly went on longer than expected; and the continued failure of the Chancellor's colleagues in some of the major spending Departments, especially the Department of

[Mr. John Townend]

Health and Social Security, to keep control of public spending. The board and lodging allowance, for example, cost £62 million in 1979, has escalated out of control, and this year will cost £570 million.

I drew the attention of the House to many of these matters during the public expenditure debate, and I shall not repeat the arguments now. However, I shall comment on one aspect of public expenditure, which was dealt with in the Budget and the Red Book—that is, the increase in the contingency reserve of £2 billion for each of the next three years.

I accept that by doing that the Chancellor is being realistic and has accepted the recommendations of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. However, the Government have yet again abandoned their public expenditure policy. We all know that we were elected to reduce public expenditure and that that policy was abandoned some time ago. Then the Government substituted the objective of keeping public expenditure broadly level in real terms. It is clear that once again the Treasury has had to submit to pressure and realism, and the planning total in real terms will be £1·2 billion more in 1986-87 than it was in 1983-84. In that year public spending will take no less than 40·5 per cent. of the gross domestic product. That compares with 39·5 per cent. when the Government came to power. In seven years, far from cutting expenditure, expenditure has risen in real terms as a percentage of GDP. I therefore find it strange that there is so much criticism of the so-called cutting of expenditure. It is an unsatisfactory record for a party committed to cutting spending.

I know that my right hon. Friends will maintain that there is only an increase in the contingency reserve and that it will not necessarily be spent. If one studies the Government's record in relation to the contingency reserve one sees that it is extremely likely that once a sum is in the planning total it will be gobbled up by the avaricious spending Departments.

As one who accepted and accepts the constraints facing my right hon. Friend in the Budget, it was clear that there would not be many resources available for dramatic tax reductions. As with most hon. Members, especially as the representative of a constituency in the north of England which has considerable unemployment, my first criterion was for the Budget to create jobs. To achieve that, it was essential for my right hon. Friend to reassure the markets that the Government had not weakened in their commitment to continue the battle against inflation. If that could be done, conditions would then be created for early reductions in interest rates which are at an unacceptably high level and do more than anything to prevent an expansion in the economy, an increase in investment and the creation of jobs.

By taking a tough line, by bringing the PSBR back to the planned level of £7 billion, by keeping monetary targets tight and by putting an extra £2 billion into the contingency reserve, the Budget has increased the confidence of the market. We have already seen interest rates come down by half a point today.

I say to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), who is no longer in the Chamber, that it is all very well to advocate increasing public borrowing year on year, but it all has to be paid back. If one studies the way that interest charges are escalating in the national accounts one sees that by 1987-88 interest will cost as much as defence and far more than education.

One of the problems that has been in the forefront of the minds of many Conservative Members and many people outside the House, is the employment trap whereby workers in low-paid jobs are often little better off than they would be if they stopped work and went on social security. In some extreme cases they are even worse off being in work. It is surely ridiculous that unemployed people cannot afford to take available jobs. It is clearly wrong that a man working should be little or no better off than if he is not working. That problem could be reduced by raising tax thresholds—[Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman does not think that there is a problem he should go back to the people in his constituency.

The problem can be solved only by dealing with benefits and restricting increases. Even if my right hon. Friend had used all the available resources this year to raise thresholds he would have made only a minor impact on the problem. However, my right hon. Friend did far more than expected by his imaginative proposals for restructuring national insurance contributions, on which I congratulate him most heartily. A married man earning £80 a week is now £3·33 a week better off. That is an excellent start, but we now look to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to close the employment trap further when he reviews benefits.

Mr. Nellist: The hon. Gentleman talks about cutting benefits to create a wider gap between those who rely on supplementary benefit and those who go to work. Will he tell the House how many salaries he draws?

Mr. Townend: Such personal attacks do the House no good. If the hon. Gentleman is so interested he can look in the Register of Members' Interests. It has always been accepted in the House that it is not in the best interests of Parliament or the people for Members of Parliament to be full-time politicians with no other interests. People with other interests—many Opposition Members have other interests—bring their business experience to the House. I am not ashamed of being the third generation to run a family business giving jobs to more than 100 people.

The restructuring of employers' national insurance contributions will encourage them to take on unskilled workers at the bottom end of the labour market, and it will partially reduce the advantage that part-time workers have enjoyed in the past. It will create new low-paid jobs. It surprises me that Opposition Members seem to think that it is better for people to be unemployed than to be in low-paid jobs. That is an insult to the unemployed. One of the problems is that many of the people who regrettably are on the unemployment list are unskilled. There are vacancies for skilled people in many areas. The demand is for the creation of unskilled jobs which, by their nature, tend to be low-paid.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): If we need so many skills in this country, how does the hon. Gentleman justify the Government's closure of 29 skillcentres?

Mr. Townend: Many of them were not being used to the full, and that is why they were closed. The Government have put billions of pounds into the youth training scheme.

The restructuring of national insurance contributions will benefit those employers who employ unskilled and lower paid workers. That is of great benefit to the north where pay levels are lower compared with the south and the City. The people in the north are not on £30,000, £40,000, £50,000 and £60,000 a year as they are in the City. I strongly support the other measures in the Budget designed to encourage employment—in particular, the additional 100,000 places on the community programme. I support the expansion of the YTS. In those places where there are vacancies on the YTS, I see no reason why social security benefits should not be withdrawn from school leavers who refuse to take part in such schemes.

The removal of social security benefits will remove the option of idleness. No one should encourage youngsters to turn down a training opportunity so that they may lie in bed all day or roam around the streets. That does those young people a disservice. I do not know whether Opposition Members are aware of the facts of life. If a youngster leaves school and goes onto social security benefit and remains there for 18 months or more he becomes unemployable. We do a great disservice to those youngsters. I have four children. If my children could not obtain a job, I should prefer them to be on a YTS scheme. I should welcome the Government removing their social security benefit to encourage them to go on the scheme.

Mr. Wareing: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the DHSS which at present withdraws benefit from school leavers who go on to take academic courses at colleges of further education? That is what happens now.

Mr. Townend: Yes. The right way to deal with that is with educational grants. On the hon. Member's argument everyone who is on an advanced course or at university should be on social security for the whole time. That is nonsense.

I was disappointed that my right hon. Friend announced that a consultative document was to be issued on wages councils, especially after what he had said:

"Wages councils destroy jobs by making it illegal for employers to offer work at wages they can afford and the unemployed are prepared to accept."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 794.]

If that is so—and I agree with the Chancellor—surely we should get rid of the councils straight away and not procrastinate with a consultative document. If my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Employment believe in a free market and in people having the right to price themselves back into work, the councils should be abolished. It would be no good tinkering with them, as some hon. Members have suggested, so that they excluded young people under the age of 18. If young people have the right to price themselves back into work, so have older people. The Opposition have put forward a good case for abolishing wages councils. I think it was the Leader of the Opposition who said that 40 per cent. of workers covered by wages council regulations were getting below their entitlement. If the system is not working, it might as well be abolished.

I welcome the help that is to be given yet again to small businesses. I hope that small businesses and the self-employed realise that year after year, in Budget after Budget, this Government are bringing forward more and more measures to encourage that vital part of our economy that will produce, and is producing, a considerable proportion of the new jobs that we need. I welcome particularly the VAT relief on bad debts. That will be particularly helpful for small businesses. I welcome, too, the fact that owners of small businesses will be able to retire at 60 and get the capital gains tax benefit. That will encourage the promotion of younger managers. I welcome the reduction of class 2 national insurance contributions and the tax relief on class 4 profit related contributions which has been a running sore with the self-employed for a long time.

My right hon. Friend was constrained, but he has continued his policy of tax reform by abolishing the development land tax. I am surprised that the Opposition should object to that, because the abolition of that tax should do more than anything to stimulate development and to create new jobs in the construction industry.

When we have regard to the constraints that were facing him, we realise that the Chancellor has produced an imaginative Budget which has reassured the markets and provided a basis for lower interest rates. I am disappointed that the banks did not bring their rates down by one point today. The Budget will encourage the employment of more people and will significantly reduce the employment trap. At the end of the day it must be made clear again and again that it is not the Government who produce jobs, but industry, management and workers who combine to produce the right goods that customers both here and abroad want at the right price and the right time.

People talk about lack of demand. They have only got to go on to the high streets and the main roads and they will see the number of cars from abroad, the amount of white goods pouring in from Japan and other Asian countries and the increase in imports from the EC. That shows that the demand is there. Given the right atmosphere, which the Government are continually trying to create, if British industry seizes the opportunities and if there is co-operation between management and men we can win back those markets and create the jobs that are so necessary.

On reflection in a couple of years' time the Budget will be seen in a similar vein to the 1981 Budget which gave a firm economic base for recovery. This Budget will also give a base for a third Conservative general election victory.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I never cease to wonder at the effrontery of hon. Members like the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) who coyly refuses to tell us how much he is earning from the two jobs that he is so proud of, whether it is up to £100,000 or whatever. He does not tell us how much he earns but it must be very close to £100,000.

Mr. John Townend: I can assure the hon. Member that it is nowhere near that figure.

Mr. Bennett: Until the hon. Member is prepared to tell us, we can only conclude either that he does not want to tell the tax man what he is earning or that he has a guilty conscience about it.

Mr. Nellist: He would need £100,000 in the bank to belong to Lloyds.

Mr. Bennett: If the hon. Gentleman is so keen to lecture people on low pay, he has a duty to tell us how much he earns. He also has a duty to examine the problems in his own constituency. I suggest that the depressed state of much of Bridlington is a result of low pay, because many people in the catering industry suffer from extremely low pay. There will be a fair number in his constituency who are breaking the existing wages regulations. He should also be aware that many people cannot afford to go to holiday resorts like Bridlington because of the implications of low pay. If he is concerned about board and lodging allowances, the best thing that can be done about that is to provide people with homes of their own so that they do not have to claim board and lodging allowances. The hon. Gentleman should think carefully about the implications of his speech for his constituents. Low pay is no good for the majority of people in the country and certainly no good for his constituency.

Yesterday the Chancellor was almost strutting before us, like a rooster, proudly proclaiming his anti-inflation and pro-jobs Budget. Today his Budget seems less attractive and more like a feather duster, perhaps moving a little dust from here to there. When the majority of my constituents have had a chance to examine the Budget, they will think that it has as little relevance as feathers floating in the wind. They will not be impressed by the Chancellor's proposals to fight inflation. The £2 gallon of petrol will not go down well with them. The Chancellor claims that his tax changes will put only 0·5 per cent. on the retail price index but that will be an excuse for other people to add a little here and a little there. It will soon mount up to substantial increases.

The people will be faced not just with the increases in the price of petrol and in other duties. Added to those are all the other increases that the Government have imposed during the past fortnight. The latest was the increase in prescription charges. Then there is the extra amount that people will have to pay for mortgages. I think that since Christmas the average mortgage has increased by about £7 per month, and there is the prospect of a further increase this week. There is also Government pressure on local authorities to put up rates. They have also twisted the arm of water authorities to put up water rates. They have put pressure on the gas and electricity boards to increase their charges even though the boards do not want to do so.

When my constituents add up all these increases they do not believe that the Budget is anti-inflationary. They fear that it is very much a move in the opposite direction. They are also looking with alarm at the proposal to increase the television licence fee, which will hit most of them, particularly those on low incomes.

The Budget offers nothing at all to the increasing number of my constituents who face long-term unemployment. They will find the extra costs that I have just listed increasingly hard to bear. I had hoped that the Chancellor would have done something positive for the long-term unemployed. The first thing he could have done was to allow those who are stuck on short-term supplementary benefit to go on to the long-term rate. It is crazy that someone who has been on supplementary benefit for over 12 months should still be on the short-term rate that is designed to tide people over from one week to the next and which makes no allowance for the need to replace major household items.

There should have been a far greater effort to help people generally who are on benefit. I do not think the Government have any idea of what it is like to live on benefits. I should like to give some examples from my advice bureau. A pensioner couple described to me last Friday night how they have got into a routine of walking almost a mile and a half down from Brinnington, one of the estates in my constituency, into Stockport town centre, where they walk round the shops, not to buy anything but so that they can keep warm during the morning. When they have spent some time in the warm shops they walk back home. They do that so that they do not have to light the fire until the afternoon. They are trying to avoid heavy heating bills.

Another gentleman from Haughton Green came to my advice centre at the weekend. He talked about having an income of £41·75 and about the problems of paying for heating during the coldest spells of the winter. Because he is in a badly maintained council house with high heating costs he found that almost half his weekly expenditure for two weeks went on heating. He had to make a choice between whether to keep himself warm or to have sufficient to eat. Most of his household items involved small amounts of money, yet this constituent gave me a long list of things he could not afford on long-term unemployment benefit.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I do not wish to decry anything that the hon. Gentleman has said, but I came across a case at my advice bureau recently of a married gentleman with two children and a mortgage who on supplementary benefit was entitled to £181 a week. That was the sum that I got him.

Mr. Bennett: I certainly accept that some people get substantial sums, especially if they have been enticed into taking out an expensive mortgage, perhaps by the Government's enthusiasm. I suspect that a large slice of the sum that the hon. Lady mentioned will be for mortgage interest. However, the hon. Lady does not live in the real world if she thinks that the majority of people on benefit are entitled to such sums. Perhaps the hon. Lady would care to tell someone with an income of £41·75 how he can accumulate sufficient money to buy a washing machine or a fridge—

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Give him a nice warming lecture.

Mr. Bennett: That person can just about buy his food but cannot afford margarine or butter. Anyone looking down the list of items that he presented to me will appreciate the considerable difficulty he faces. Similarly, anyone living in the real world will know the acute hardship that is caused for someone living on benefit. For example, such people are often forced to place a piece of wood or a board underneath the settee once the springs go because they cannot afford to have it repaired.

Many of my constituents are suffering on benefit, yet the Chancellor did not offer them any prospect of help. Presumably, in this year's social security uprating, such people will get just enough to keep up with inflation—if they are lucky—rather than enough to ensure that they can enjoy some of the luxuries and benefits that the vast majority of people in work enjoy.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins: It does no good to argue that on the one hand some people on benefit get £180 a week, which is probably too much, and on the other that some get only £41 a week. The real problem with the social security system is that some people get that far too little, while some get far too much. That is why the entire system needs to be reviewed. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that heating is a serious problem. In my own constituency, there are houses that cost around £20 a week to heat. Would not it be sensible to have a winter rate and a summer rate for old age pensioners and those on social security—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman's intervention is turning into a speech.

Mr. Bennett: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's argument. For many of my constituents, and I am sure many of the hon. Gentleman's, greater help could be provided if they were given money to spend on insulation, thereby making their properties much cheaper to heat.

The Chancellor's great claim was that he would increase job opportunities by introducing the new national insurance contribution system. However, I doubt whether he has looked at the practicalities of such a system, because it adds to the poverty trap by imposing a wages trap. It will be extremely difficult for those of my constituents who work in jobs such as shirt making to decide the point at which they should stop producing another item so that they do not cross the threshold and end up worse off. If that is difficult for the individual, it will be a bureaucratic nightmare for the employer. The civil servants who advised the Chancellor to dream up this scheme clearly do not appreciate the problems of people on low pay, particularly those who work in the clothing industry, who are employed on piece rates. It will be exceedingly difficult for such a worker to ensure that he or she does not cross a series of thresholds.

Difficulties will also be created when people on low pay are offered small amounts of overtime. They may well have to say, "We would like the money, but if we do half an hour's extra work we could end up worse off as a result." The Government must look at this carefully. They should consider allowing people to average their income over several weeks. That would help such workers avoid the possibility of going over the threshold one week and falling below it the next. That element suggests that this is much more a Budget for low pay rather than a Budget for jobs.

My constituency also needs a reversal of the Government's decision to close Denton skillcentre. That is absolutely criminal, especially as many of my constituents want the opportunity to obtain additional skills. Not only are the Government closing the skillcentre, they are also making the rehabilitation centre unviable. They have now told me that they are trying to find a new site for it, with all the disruption that that will mean. That is extremely unfortunate.

The Government can create many jobs in my constituency by quickly building the M63 from Brinnington to Denton. That would create many jobs in the construction industry and enhance the opportunities for Tameside to attract industry to the area. Similarly, many jobs could be created and the prosperity of the area enhanced if the Government put up the money for the rail link to Manchester airport.

Many of my constituents would dearly love decent council housing, and it is criminal that Stockport and Tameside do not have the resources to build new houses in significant numbers because of the Government's policy. Here again, that would create jobs and relieve much of the hardship caused to the individuals.

The same is true of housing repairs. Houses in the Brinnington, Betley road and Somers road estates are crying out for council renovation. Similar problems are to be found in Tameside. It is totally criminal that the Government refuse to allow unemployed building workers to improve such property.

There is also a desperate need for home improvement grants, yet the Government's policy means that no money is available and as a result many people are kept out of work. Many other jobs could be created if the local authorities had enough money to spend on road surfacing.

One of the nursery schools in my constituency is the Popular street nursery school. It is attached to the Popular school, and I was wondering whether the Chairman of Ways and Means would be in the chair, as that was the school he attended. He must have kicked a football around the playground, but there is now a nursery unit with special provision for handicapped children. In spite of persistent efforts to get the Tameside and Glossop area health authority to provide the necessary physiotherapy, we are continually told that because of economic and Government manpower restraints, it is unable to employ sufficient physiotherapists for that nursery.

These are all examples of the way in which the Government could improve the welfare of my constituents while at the same time providing jobs. We have heard about the review of the income tax system. I welcome that. However, what will happen to rates and local income tax? Do the Government intend moving towards a local income tax system? If not, what do they intend to do about rates? The review of rateable values has been deferred again and again. The excuse was that the Government would come forward with a solution to the rating problem. If they do not do so, the argument is that there should be a revaluation and that it should be determined on market value rather than rented value. I hope that the Government will say whether their reform of the taxation system will go towards the local income tax option.

We are grateful that VAT has not been imposed on newspapers, but we are worried about the implications of VAT on advertising for local papers, and in particular about the VAT that will go on advertising by many local organisations holding jumble sales and other such things telling people about their activities. The imposition of VAT will have a disturbing effect on organisations that are already struggling to make ends meet.

The Chancellor claimed that his Budget is anti-inflation and pro-jobs. However, it may turn out to be pro-inflation and anti-jobs. The only claim that can be made for it in the long term is that it is pro-low pay. My constituents are fed up with the Chancellor and would like him to go quickly. More important, they want a change of Government as well.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) outlined the Labour party's spending policy when opening the debate. He clearly had in mind a considerable sum. He began by calling for expenditure on public investment of £3·5 billion. He then said that he wanted to promote a massive policy of poverty relief. Here, he was talking about an extension in child benefits and a substantial increase in the old-age pension. He put a value on that of £2·75 billion. As the House will appreciate, these figures are but part of the Labour party's spending programme.

[Mr. Douglas Hogg]

There is never a debate in which the Labour party does not call for a reduction in user charges, an increase in subsidies or a massive expenditure on some programme or another.

The sums that the Labour party's policy contemplates being spent are great. I hope that, when she winds up, the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) will tell us how the Labour party's policy will be financed. I intervened in the speech of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and asked him to be specific about this. He did not clear up the point, or even try to. He said that he believed that the spending programme could be met by taking away the tax privileges that had been conferred since 1979. He equivocated about that as well, because he said that he did not want to go back to the penal tax rates for which he was responsible when he was in office.

How real and sensible is the Labour party's approach? The amount of money that it is contemplating spending cannot be met from such sources of income. The Labour party could increase the PSBR by £3 billion or so. I would contemplate that, as I am not too dogmatic on that issue, but that would be only a small part of the whole. Even if one were to take the total value of tax concessions made since 1979 to the higher rate taxpayers, in the first year of full operation that would produce only £3,000 million. If one did away with tax relief for higher rate taxpayers on mortgage interest, that would produce only £150 million.

The significance of this is that if the Labour party wants to spend such sums, only part of which have been disclosed to us tonight, it has substantially to increase the burden of direct taxation on the ordinary taxpayers. That is the conclusion that the House must see and the country must learn.

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): I may be able to help my hon. Friend with this sum by reminding him of another policy recently announced by the Labour party. That is the policy of controlling the depletion of North sea oil, so a Labour Government would lose revenue there as well. I agree with my hon. Friend that that, too, would have to go on direct taxation.

Mr. Hogg: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. He makes an extremely valuable point, which adds further weight to what we are saying. In the Labour party's policy, although it is not fully disclosed, is the determination to impose on the ordinary taxpayer a heavier burden than that which is contemplated by this Government.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Not so.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman may say, "Not so," but the Labour party cannot count. Those of us who have looked at this problem and sought to balance expenditure against borrowing and revenue see that there is a massive shortfall, and that the Labour party must increase direct taxation. The Labour party will have to attack either pension contributions or the mortgage interest relief if it is to raise anything like the amounts that it wants to raise.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does this not all depend on what one spends the money on? If one spends it on senseless things such as armaments and unnecessary things such as Trident, more money will have to be raised for secondary programmes. It also depends on what investment is put into the country. If one allows £30 billion to flow out of the country, that is £30 billion less invested in the country, which could generate more income and in turn more revenue.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman is not facing up to the problem. It is possible to redeploy expenditure between programmes, and one can make a policy decision between one policy and another and one programme and another. However, such savings are small in the context of the expenditure being called for. There is some force in what the hon. Gentleman says about investment, but the lag time is so much that finance has to be put up front, and that means either heavier taxation of the kind that I have suggested, or a borrowing policy that is wildly in excess of what the country can afford.

Like my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, I feel that he was operating within constraints. Broadly speaking, those constraints are inevitable. I do not see how he could substantially increase the PSBR. It could be marginally higher than the £7 billion that he has in mind, but at the most we are talking about an increase of £3 billion. At the same time, it was essential that he should reassure international markets that the Government's prime object was to defeat inflation. Therefore, he was constrained by factors that he had to take into account. However, within those constraints he has achieved effective targeting of the resources that it is within his ability to dispose of. That is a considerable achievement.

When my right hon. Friend the Chancellor comes to review the success of his policy in two or three years, I think that he will conclude that one of his most important measures has been the expansion of the youth training scheme. The Government are entitled to considerable credit for what has been done. To give 16-year-olds a two-year training scheme is an important policy. However, although it is right that employers should carry the major part of the increased cost, it is also right that the Treasury should recognise that the public interest is being served by this policy. That being so, we should not be too niggardly with the Government contributions towards the increased costs. If the Treasury is too frugal at this stage, the scheme may not live up to our expectations.

When one has a two-year scheme, one is giving employers and employees the opportunity to develop a training scheme that has the advantage of providing training in up-to-date technologies, the kind of technologies that will survive through the 21st century, when those going into the scheme will be at their most productive.

It is important that the Government should seek to encourage employers to provide training in precisely those areas that are likely to have a viable long-term future. Some fiscal encouragement should perhaps be given to promote that end, such as giving zero-rated VAT status to machinery or computers that are installed primarily in order to provide training within the YTS.

Before turning briefly to taxation, I shall make three specific points. The first concerns stamp duty. It is a great pity that we did not take the opportunity to abolish the stamp duty on property transfers. That would have been an encouragement to the construction industry that would be worth giving. Secondly, I recognise that we have raised the bands for capital transfer tax by the statutory amount, but I hope that the Government do not suppose that they have done all that their supporters want them to do during the lifetime of this Parliament. They have not.

Thirdly, my hon. Friend the Minister will appreciate that in the 1984 Budget marked changes were made to capital allowances. That was all right for the corporate traders, because they benefited from the reduced corporation tax, but it was not so all right for the non-corporate traders. I think particularly of farmers, as there are many non-corporate farmers. They were badly hit by the reduction in the value of the capital allowance introduced in the 1984 Budget. The Government must see what can be done to provide more parity in the matter of capital allowances between non-corporate traders and corporate traders in agriculture. I have made some suggestions in writing about capital allowances, and I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister would look at them.

I have two points to make about taxation. First, I warmly welcome the decision of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to mount a full inquiry into taxation, and particularly the personal tax relief system. I am glad that it will be preceded by a Green Paper. Indeed, all tax changes of magnitude should be preceded by one. It is not right to introduce them in a Budget without prior consultation. I particularly welcome the proposal that husbands and wives should have separate tax allowances, capable of being transferred to the other partner if the allowance is not fully used up. That is a valuable step forward. Thus, I heartily welcome my right hon. Friend's decision to examine tax allowances and the income tax system generally.

My second point concerns national insurance contributions. I said earlier that I thought that, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor came to consider his period in office, he would perhaps value most highly the expansion of the youth training scheme. But the other thing that he will feel very satisfied about concerns the changes that he has made to the national insurance contribution system. There have been two changes: the reduction in the cost of employing persons at the bottom end of the pay scale, and, perhaps just as importantly, the reduction in the total deductions from pay that are now made for workers at the lower end of the wage scale.

Two very important consequences flow from that. First, I am certain that the changes and reductions will encourage employers to take on more staff than they would otherwise do. Secondly, if we reduce the net cost of being in work at the bottom of the pay scale, it will do something positive to alleviate the poverty trap.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, when introducing these measures, that he regretted that he did not have more resources to devote to the reduction in the national insurance contributions borne by employers and employees. I echo that. I very much hope that in the 1986 Budget he will place even more emphasis on national insurance contributions, and that he will do more to reduce the cost of national insurance contributions to employers and to the lower paid employees.

This was a modest Budget, but it can be fully supported, and I very much hope that the House will do so.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The reaction of Conservative Members has been very interesting. Most of them have stayed away in embarrassment, but those who have spoken have said very little about the Budget.

We had a sort of economic diatribe from the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), who displayed an economic eccentricity that is almost certainly inherited. His sole recourse was not to defend the Budget but to attack the Labour party and thoroughly to misrepresent it. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) made it quite clear that the money for our proposals would be raised by increasing the PSBR, so that it remains a constant proportion of gross domestic product. Indeed, Gavin Davies has made it plain that the PSBR could be doubled to about £16 billion without causing any inflationary monetisation.

Thus, we would increase the PSBR and we would take back the tax concessions given to the wealthy—that small proportion who have benefited so disproportionately under this Government. That is all. That would raise the money for our programme, which has been carefully announced and costed. Yet the hon. Member for Grantham tars that programme with all sorts of false smears and accusations.

That is one way of defending the Budget. The other way of defending the Budget involves the obscene spectacle of the well-heeled, like the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), demanding cuts in low pay sustained by cuts in benefits, so that low pay and benefits can pursue each other down pari passu. That is their only answer to the economic difficulties that their Government have created. To demand sacrifices of others when they have loyally supported policies which have destroyed jobs and generated such poverty is obscene in today's politics.

That is my reaction to the defence put up by Conservative Members. But my reaction to the Budget was, sadly, to feel rather sorry for the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I know that it is difficult to feel sorry for someone who is so cocksure of his own abilities but he has had to put up with a succession of editorials, and comments in the newspapers and from his own Back Benchers, praising the Budget with faint damns. He has also had to put up with the very unfair situation that he was sprung into by the Prime Minister.

Until January, the Chancellor was running a more accommodating policy than he was prepared to admit. It was the sort of accommodating policy that he wanted to pretend had fallen off the back of a lorry, but he was really expanding the money supply without it showing in the M3 figures by gobbling up commercial bills, which was of some benefit to industry. He was letting the exchange rate fall slowly and was not trying to deter that process. He was tiptoeing away from monetarism, and was trying to smuggle in improvement past mummy like a naughty boy who has brought in some sweets.

Suddenly the whole situation degenerated and collapsed on him in January, because the Prime Minister intervened to stop the pound falling. She interprets the exchange rate as some sort of phallic symbol. Any threat to the exchange rate is a threat to the national virility. The Prime Minister therefore intervened in a way that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not been doing. Her signals to the markets so complicated the situation that we had the fiasco of January when everything was thrown into confusion. The Tory party in a crisis, particularly under this Government, reverts to orthodoxy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was put back on a short lead, and has been on it ever since, as the Budget demonstates.

It was rather sad, because the career of the great tax reformer and the great economic reformer, that had begun with such a bang, ended with a whimper at the whim of the bankers. He is now back to piggy-banking economics and budgets. This is a Budget of know nothing and do nothing, particularly for the poor and for those in the poverty trap. Since 1979, the number of those in the poverty trap has increased threefold to a present total of a quarter of a million families. The Budget will take 5,000 of those families out of the poverty trap—and that is all. It does nothing for the old or for the unemployed. Whatever the poor and the less well-off will gain through tax cuts will be taken back through increased prescription charges, increased excise duties and increased charges for water, electricity and gas. Any measly sum that they may be given with one hand is immediately taken back with the other.

Above all, nothing is done for the social and economic problems that beset our country, and, to my mind, perhaps the paramount accusation is that nothing is done for Grimsby and its people.

Yesterday we saw the pathetic spectacle of a Chancellor chained to the Prime Minister's outdated orthodoxies, miserably peddling his pathetic wares and trying to pass the blame for the Budget on to Arthur Scargill, as if it were Arthur's Budget rather than Nigel's.

The mountains—that is not a physical description of the Chancellor though he may accept it if he wishes—have laboured and have produced a ridiculous mouse. This is not a Budget — it is a bludge-it, a fudge-it, a perpetual financial fidget. It is only a confirmation of the strategy of preceding years—that of moving furniture on the deck of the Titanic and pretending that one is doing something to prevent the ship from sinking. And most of the furniture has been taken from the steerage passengers to improve the conditions of the first-class passengers.

No other Government since the war have enjoyed, like this Government, the great opportunity of North sea oil. That was an opportunity to expand and to put aside the balance of payments constraints that have shackled every other attempted expansion. The Government have thrown away that huge overdraft facility. They have done what a small-minded man would do. This is not a Budget for the small man—it is a Budget for the small-minded. The Government have simply moved the furniture, and they have moved it between the rich and the poor.

The effect of this Budget and this Government's preceding Budgets has been to cheese-pare the benefits to which people would have been entitled had the rules existing under the Labour Government been maintained. About £1 billion that should have gone to beneficiaries under those rules has been held back, while at the same time £3 billion a year has been given to a very small percentage of the population—primarily to those earning over £20,000 a year and, most of all, to the top 5 per cent. of the population. In this and the preceding Budgets, £3,000 million a year has been handed out to such people. That is an obscenity.

It is especially obscene to hand out benefits to those paying capital gains tax and capital transfer tax and then to talk about abolishing the wages councils that protect the earnings of the less well paid. The Government have a responsibility not to indulge in such grabbing, but they believe that the rich are not working hard enough because they do not get enough money, while the poor are not working hard enough because they have too much money. That is the simple belief that motivates the Government. Such economics is obscene at a time when the Government have a responsibility to expand the economy and to improve the welfare of all—not to take from the poor to give to the rich.

The Government have used the effect of North sea oil on the balance of payments to finance imports and destroy jobs, and they have used the tax revenues to support the unemployment generated by that process. They have used North sea oil to destroy industry. Profits are now rising. Of course they are — any firm that could survive the squeeze from 1979 to 1981 must now be doing well—but we have lost an enormous amount of capacity in the process.

Industry is not emerging fitter, leaner and healthier. Despite all the cries from the Government Benches about rising investment, manufacturing investment, which is crucial to survival and jobs, has been running in the past five years at only 75 per cent. of the previous five years. Investment is falling, unit labour costs are rising, and the gains in productivity of which the Government boast are illusory. On the Government's reasoning, one could improve the batting average of a cricket team by shooting the last three batsmen. And even that benefit has petered out over the past year. We have shown less improvement than our competitors.

What formula is that for industrial and manufacturing success? What has the agony of the past five or six years been about? All that unemployment, all that discipline, all those constraints on industry and all those high interest rates have achieved only the preface to an even bigger failure in years to come.

The Government have concentrated on juggling. They have juggled between the public and the private sectors. They have taken wasteful resources from the private sector — the people whom their policies have taken out of work—and put them in the public sector by giving them unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit. Meanwhile, the Government have taken productive assets from the public sector and flogged them to their friends in the private sector. It has been a bankrupt's progress—an attempt to keep going.

The result of those policies has been economic disaster. In the five years to 1984, we lost 1·7 million jobs in manufacturing industry. That is 22 per cent. of manufacturing jobs. The rate of loss was greater than in any other advanced industrial country. Other countries are still prospering by dint of doing what we have destroyed our capacity to do. Japan makes hi-fi equipment, West Germany makes cars and Italy makes white goods.

Where will the jobs come from if we do not rebuild manufacturing industry? It is all very well to talk about new jobs in the new industries, but that development requires a climate of buoyancy, growth and the expectation of profit. Profit demands the expectation that things will improve. Under the present Government, there is no possibility that things will get better. The Government mean to carry on with discipline. Discipline is the enemy of investment because it is the enemy of the kind of profit and expansion that we need if there is to be investment.

These policies will never pay. The only new development that we are seeing takes the form of a few Japanese cast-offs. The outdated technology of Japan is being sent here for small-scale production units to supply the British market. Such are the developments for which the Prime Minister goes grovelling round the world. She is pathetically, gibberingly grateful for droppings from the table of Japan.

What should the Chancellor have done? He should have stimulated economic development by spending on the infrastructure. Infrastructure is a fashionable word. Five years ago, we would not have known what the infrastructure was. Well, perhaps I might have known what my own infrastructure was. But the word is now so fashionable that even the daring revolutionaries of the CBI have got up off their knees to demand spending on the infrastructure.

This country is characterised by a creaking and disintegrating infrastructure. It is like the out-of-date theatre in which Laurence Olivier played in "The Entertainer": "Don't clap too loud — this is an old theatre." The stage is now set for the Widow Twankey and her team. The audience in the stalls is very well-heeled, but there are murmurings from the poor and badly-dressed people in the gods, the foundations are creaking and groaning, and there is a rising smell from the sewers.

The Government must spend money on the infrastructure in order to stimulate economic expansion. In the building trade, 400,000 people are out of work. By borrowing, and putting those people back to work, we would stimulate the economy. The Government will not do that because they do not like the public sector. It would have to be done by government, and government is their enemy. To this Government, the public sector is either a milch cow—they take the money from electricity and gas—or, if it is profitable, it is something to be flogged off. The public sector must be used to stimulate investment in the infrastructure and so to stimulate the economy.

The second thing that the Chancellor should have done is to compensate people for poverty. The victims of Thatcherism demand compensation, and they should get it. I would have increased child benefit to £16 or £17 a week, and I would have taxed it. That would have been fair. To increase the benefit massively and to tax it would have been the most effective way of alleviating poverty directly. That measure would have gone to the core of the problem. As has been said, those who have been out of work for one year or more should, as a matter of social justice, get the long-term rate of supplementary benefit. It would cost only £500 million in a full year and make a difference of £12 a week for a couple. It is their due. It is social justice that they receive that rate from a Government who have created long-term unemployment, which is now three times its level of the 1930s. Indeed, even short-term unemployment is higher now than it was in the 1930s.

The Government should have stimulated jobs not by fiddling with the national insurance contribution, as they have, but by giving new jobs a national insurance holiday and by raising the limit, which comes in far too abruptly at £35·50, to £50. I should like the national insurance contribution to be transmuted into a simple social security tax. It is a form of income tax, after all. There is no reason why it should come in at £35·50. If the Government want to help the low paid, especially part-time workers, they should put national insurance contributions on income tax and make them what they effectively are — a social security tax. That worked well in New Zealand.

I would subsidise new jobs. It would cost about £4,000 a year to subsidise a new job. The cost of keeping people unemployed in benefits paid and tax revenue lost is £6,000 a year. It is economic sense to subsidise firms that create new jobs.

The Chancellor should have paid attention to getting interest rates down. We are told that that has been the object of Government policy for six years. After six years of travail, difficulty and record interest rates, interest rates are at their highest real level since 1922. That is some achievement. All that to get interest rates to their highest real level since 1922. They are a drag on the whole economy. Indeed, the economy is being crucified by them. With interest rates, the free market will not work. It gives the banks too much power. Every time that there is a threat to the pound — there have been four in the past few years—the banks come in a Gadarene rush to push up interest rates, usually led by Barclays. To give the banks so much power over interest rates is to put the ivory poachers in charge of an African game park. The free market lets them push up interest rates, and they benefit by doing so. The Chancellor should take control of interest rates and, if necessary, expand the money supply to hold interest rates down and to get the pound down still more.

Although the pound is now undervalued against the dollar, it is overvalued against the deutschmark. Everyone chooses to forget that in 1976 we promised the International Monetary Fund that we would maintain the competitive position of British manufactures at home and abroad. Since then, the pound has been allowed to increase in real terms, because of our higher rate of inflation, by 40 per cent. against the deutschmark. That is why we have a deficit of £5 billion with West Germany in manufactured trade. That is why they are destroying jobs in the west midlands. It is crucial to get interest rates down and to remove that disparity.

The key to the Budget's failure is its failure to deal with the public sector borrowing requirement. We need deficit financing on the scale that the American Government have gone in for to stimulate the economy. I am going further than the Opposition Front Bench. I must point that out to the hon. Member for Grantham or he will wilfully misinterpret everything that Labour Members say. If purchasing power is deficient, and there is therefore a deficiency of demand, the only way in which to compensate is to increase demand and spend money. Demand is deficient because we have 4 million people out of work. It is no use telling us that there is a demand there for Japanese cars.

Bearing in mind the stage in the economic cycle and allowing for expenditure on unemployment, we are not in deficit but in surplus — to the tune of 2 per cent. of gross national product, according to OECD figures. Not many other countries are in surplus, and those that are are usually doing almost as badly as us. However, we are doing worse than most because our surplus is bigger. The United States, Japan and Italy are in substantial deficit. do not give me this nonsense about Keynesian expansion. The United States is doing what we should be doing — running a deficit and stimulating the economy by it.

The Chancellor talks to us of recovery from the depths of the depression that he and the Government have created. However, there will not and cannot be a recovery, nor can we describe the glimmering as genuine recovery, until unemployment begins to come down and until we have made some way in replacing the capacity that has been destroyed, especially in the disastrous years of overvaluation. The Government told us how good for us was the over-valued pound during 1979 and 1981. We can talk of recovery only when social justice can be restored because unemployment has fallen. All that happens until then is "gather ye rosebuds while ye may, make money while you can" and stash it away overseas in the productive capacity of our competitors. The Budget is a tragic waste of opportunity. This is the last strong year of the oil peak.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Budget is irrelevant to the country's problems? Does he agree that the Government are relying on the Fowler report and a mass of Green Papers? Will not the Government rely on the Young report and therefore does my hon. Friend——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Interventions should be brief.

Mr. Mitchell: It is utterly irrelevant because the Government's only solution now, on the basis of the Fowler reviews, is to start cutting benefits. That is their answer to the difficulties that they have created.

Like the Government, the Budget is a tragic national waste. It is a waste of opportunity as, for the first time, we are self-sufficient in oil and do not have a balance of payments problem that comes from that. The Government have even thrown away the balance of payments benefit of oil because we now have so little room for necessary expansion, because they have wasted oil revenues. The Government and the Budget have wasted human resources by throwing people on the scrap heap. Many of them are strong of back or young. They want to get into the habit of working and to contribute to industries that they have watched being destroyed. We also have the waste of high interest rates, which are a crippling burden on the economy, the waste of under-capacity and of £17 billion every year spent just to finance unemployment. That is a conservative estimate based on the House of Lords Committee's estimate of the cost of unemployment. That is the biggest folly of all—wasting £17 billion every year on keeping people out of work rather than investment in capacity and growth.

The verdict is that the Chancellor fiddles while Britain sinks. Interestingly, I heard at a Christmas service, at which I read the lesson, a text from the book of Isaiah which was read by my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman). The text stated:

"You have enlarged the Kingdom and increased their joy".

The Government's real responsibility is to enlarge the kingdom to build up the economic strength of the country and to provide the framework within which industries can grow. The enterprise economy about which the Government talk needs the framework of Government management so that the economy can grow. That enterprise climate cannot develop as a result of discipline and depression. The Government have a responsibility to provide the framework of economic management in which the climate of enterprise and expansion can grow to enlarge the kingdom and increase their joy. The Chancellor has weakened the kingdom and increased their misery.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that the time for debate is limited. Brief contributions will mean that fewer hon. Members will be disappointed.

8.20 pm

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): I apologise to my ministerial colleagues and to the House in general for the fact that I was not present for the opening speeches because of Select Committee duties. Although I am tempted to follow the path of some of the prejudices of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), I shall resist the temptation, in view of your request for brevity, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and his colleagues on what they have done. The abolition of development land tax is extremely welcome. I am pleased that my right hon. Friend has not done anything on the pension fund front because, while the state pension system is under review, it is only right and proper that we should do nothing to discourage people from opting out of that state pension system and taking up private pensions. I am also pleased that my right hon. Friend has not imposed VAT on books.

A number of changes on the small business front will be welcomed, including VAT threshold and relief for bad debts. I am sure that my right hon. Friend knows that the small business community is never satisfied. It is always seeking further assistance, but there is no doubt that these changes will be most welcome.

In keeping careful control on public expenditure, my right hon. Friend has sought to do what he can to assist people, especially the low paid and the unemployed. I know, because I represent a constituency which has one of the highest unemployment levels and endures low average pay levels, that the Budget is especially welcome. It has considerably helped the low paid by lifting their tax thresholds disproportionately in comparison with the thresholds of those on high pay. The changes in national insurance contributions will make a real difference to employers' abilities to consider employing low-paid people and to the take-home pay of the low paid.

I am pleased that my right hon. Friend is examining seriously the future of a contentious issue — wages councils. In an area such as mine there is no doubt that there is work to be done but, whatever the Opposition may like to pretend, the fact is that work often does not generate a great deal of profit—whether it is distributed as profit to the employer or distributed as wages and salaries to the employed. If work does not generate a great deal of return, high wages cannot be paid.

In the west country, people who are willing to employ and people who are willing to be employed are unable to enter into such arrangements because of the law on wages councils. No one—least of all myself—is in favour of a low wage economy. We cannot escape the fact that, because certain types of work have only a low return, wages are low. I am keen to ensure that careful consideration is given to wages councils — not necessarily with a view to their total abolition, but to ensure that they do not fetter opportunities to find work in low pay areas, such as the west country.

The enlargement of YTS and the community programme is especially welcome. Throughout the country, and especially in the west, there is evidence that new jobs are being created. There are more jobs now, but they are often taken by people in their 30s and 40s, including, perhaps, women whose children are old enough for their mothers to go out to work. Employers prefer such people to the youngsters leaving school or existing youth training schemes.

It is only right and proper that we should examine why that is happening and take every measure we can to increase the attractiveness as potential employees of young people leaving school or training schemes. I welcome the steps that the Treasury is taking to provide two years of training for 16-year-olds and one year for 17-year-olds. The community programme could not have been increased more than it has been. If my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had sought even to double it, it would have been impossible to find sufficient projects because of the controls that would have been necessary.

The Opposition must always examine local trade union attitudes to community schemes. Too often, such schemes are inhibited by the unions' attitude to pay rates. The Opposition should examine their conscience when they speak out so loudly and gladly about their concern to put the long-term unemployed on community schemes.

I urge my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to pay careful attention to the review of board and lodging allowances by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. It is all very well for the Opposition —I note that the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) is back in his seat — to speak with sincerity but dogmatically about levels of board and lodging and about creating more housing.

I have said in the House that the position in the west country is similar to that in many other places. There is virtually 30 per cent. unemployment in Newquay in my constituency. A substantial proportion of those unemployed people have nothing to do with Newquay. They were not born in Newquay and have only in recent times come to the town. I have been told unofficially that more than 2,000 young people have come to Newquay merely to claim the board and lodging allowance, with no prospect of obtaining work. They are doing so because the system encourages that action.

I know that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary —I commend him for this— is determined to match work with potential employees, but we must consider how the system is working. We must ensure that people cannot enjoy uninhibited mobility to move from one area of unemployment to another to claim higher benefits when it is evident that there are not employment opportunities in the new area or, if there are, that there is already a pool of unemployed labour to take them up.

Mr. Butterfill: In my constituency, 7,000 people are on board and lodging who have come to the area only recently. It is estimated that nearly 4,000 of them come from greater Merseyside.

Mr. Neale: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. Surely it is possible for a simple system to be devised to meet what I suspect is the case of the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish. If someone genuinely wants to move from one place of work to another and genuinely has interviews to attend, it will be possible for information and evidence to that effect to be produced. However, in my constituency, and in that of my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), people are arriving at this time of year from places such as Glasgow. They are choosing to move into towns with seasonal employment such as Newquay. They expect to find work, but if they do not they are entitled to claim benefit. This is one of the nonsensical consequences of uninhibited mobility.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett rose——

Mr. Neale: I would rather not give way. The hon. Gentleman did not give way to my hon. Friends and I am conscious that others wish to contribute to the debate.

The enterprise allowance scheme is a marvellous way of encouraging the long-term unemployed to find work. It is commendable that we encourage people to start up their own businesses under the scheme, especially in areas which involve subcontracting. We give them every encouragement by way of the allowance but it must be nonsense for us to place in front of them almost hopeless hurdles before they can overcome the 714 certificate procedure. I know that changes have been made recently and that if a new contractor can obtain a guarantee from the bank that he will be able to meet his tax liability, a 714 certificate will be issued, but I urge the Financial Secretary to give the procedure the most careful consideration.

I understand the historical reasons why the procedure was introduced but it should not be beyond the wit of any of us to devise an arrangement to enable someone who starts a new business, especially under the enterprise allowance scheme, to establish through his accountants, probably with a letter of confirmation, that it is a bona fide new business. This should enable him immediately to gain clearance and a 714 certificate without the paraphernalia of a bank guarantee or anything else.

It has been suggested in correspondence that I have had with my hon. Friend and his Department that it is not an inhibition to provide that arrangements can be made through those with whom he contracts—for example, a constituent firm — that they deal with the tax implications. The procedure is an inhibition on those who are starting a new business under the enterprise allowance scheme, and I urge him to remove it as soon as possible.

I am becoming increasingly concerned by reports that are reaching me from constituents and from accountants practising in Cornwall about the attitude towards small businesses and the self-employed by Inland Revenue staff. It appears on examination that we cannot necessarily criticise the staff for their actions. I suspect that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that the money-collecting processes of the Treasury should be tightened. I presume that he takes the view that one should run an efficient Department and that tax due to it through the Treasury should be paid. Perhaps that approach deserves some commendation, but it is imposing a degree of examination and analysis of the affairs of some of the self-employed in my constituency which is incredibly disruptive and which goes beyond what is fair and justified in some instances.

It is necessary only to deal with those who are in the process of starting a new business or venture to understand the pressures that are upon them during the first two years or so to get their business established. If they are to live in fear of such detailed analysis and investigation and to know that they must prove their innocence in tax affairs, we are not encouraging them to start their own businesses. I ask my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary carefully to consider the various incidents which I have related to him in the past. I suspect that others have provided similar examples.

[Mr. Neale]

Within the constraints that the monetary position has placed upon my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I feel that he has introduced a good Budget. He has attempted to apply the available resources in the right directions. He has tidied up a number of areas which needed tidying up. I feel that, within the constraints that have been placed upon him, the Budget will offer greater hope to low wage areas and areas with economies that have a low level of activity such as Cornwall. The Budget will help them to improve their positions.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It might help the House to know that the speeches from the two Front Benches in reply to the debate are expected to begin at 9 o'clock. This means that the time available for Back Bench contributions is very limited.

8.37 pm

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): For the Chancellor of the Exchequer to present his Budget suggesting that it was a package for jobs was pushing credibility to the extreme. The way in which Conservative Members have tried to justify that statement has been eccentric if not bizarre. No hon. Member, certainly not on the Opposition Benches, could have been left in any doubt about the eccentricity in the suggestion that the Budget will serve to shorten dole queues. It is aimed and targeted more at the man in the City than at those queueing at the jobcentres and labour exchanges. It will do little except provide for fiddling at the margins. Some of the proposed changes will increase the number of unemployed instead of boosting job opportunities.

During the debate that took place last week on unemployment I said to the Secretary of State for Employment that the alliance budget was worth considering. He gave the impression that he was intent on taking on board some of the issues that I raised in the debate and I hoped that he would pass them on to the Chancellor. The policies that alliance Members have advocated consistently would provide the Chancellor with the opportunity to set a new political and economic course and to start the difficult task of reuniting the nation. The policies that we advance offer that new approach. They would allow the Government to start turning the rising tide of unemployment and assist industry to become more competitive. They would provide special help for those in most need such as the long-term adult jobless, the young, the elderly and working families caught in the poverty trap.

The Chancellor ignored, unfortunately, the arguments that I advanced last week in the debate on unemployment. He has ignored also the arguments that have been advanced consistently by Opposition Members and Conservative Members. It has not gone unnoticed by me during the nine months in which I have been a Member of this place that individual Members have pleaded on many occasions for something to be done to alleviate unemployment. At the same time they have offered solutions. Unfortunately, we have a lazy, lethargic Chancellor who chooses not to listen to these pleas. He chooses instead to go along the old trail that has been trodden before. The result is a Budget which is nothing more than a sackcloth package. It has been shorn of the attractive tax reform trimmings that adorned the Chancellor's first Budget last year. His latest effort ensures another lean year for the unemployed.

In 1984, the Chancellor introduced his first Budget and proclaimed that it was a Budget for jobs. However, unemployment increased by 130,000 during the year. This year he has ensured that the jobless figures will undoubtedly go on rising by sticking so fanatically to his financial strategy. One can only guess how many jobs will be lost in the coming year.

The Budget is nothing more than a con trick, just like last year's. The Chancellor has not really given anything away. Last year, public borrowing overshot the Chancellor's target by a massive £3·3 billion. Even allowing for the £2·75 billion cost of the miners' strike, last year's public sector borrowing requirement would have turned out at approximately £8 billion. This year, he means to cut borrowing by a further £1 billion. This extra deflation means that the Government will be taking more money out of the economy than they are putting in. On recent trends, this will cost a further 100,000 jobs, severely limiting the effect of expanding special employment schemes.

The Budget has done nothing for jobs, competitiveness or compassion. The Chancellor could have used the resources by which he put up tax allowances for those in work to rebuild the crumbling fabric of Britain—for new house building, and the improvement of housing, road building and sewerage, and for maintenance generally of the shabby and dilapidated infrastructure in the country. Alternatively, he could have used the money to help those worst hit by the recession, the long-term unemployed and families in the poverty trap.

Opposition Members have repeatedly stressed this afternoon the difficulty that people living in that poverty trap face—not weekly, but daily and hourly. I witness at my advice surgeries many pensioners who struggle not only to see the week through but to survive the day with the escalating costs of heating and food bills. Many of them go very much without the essentials of life.

The Chancellor announced two main job creation packages in the Budget, both of which we on the alliance Benches have long advocated. First, he announced a restructuring of national insurance contributions, something universally welcomed by hon. Members in the last two days. It is hoped that this will provide employment opportunities for the young and unskilled on low earnings. Unfortunately, it will do nothing to get to grips with the problem of the 3·5 million people who sign on. It pays but lip service to the problem.

A Conservative Member spoke today about crocodile tears being shed by the Opposition. I have seen so many crocodile tears shed by Conservative Members that the place is awash with them. They pay but lip service to the problems facing the communities of the country.

The Chancellor's second announcement concerned the expansion of the community programme by an additional 100,000 places, and the extension of the youth training scheme to a two-year programme. We would welcome this, as have many other hon. Members, but, if the YTS is expanded to a two-year programme and employers come forward to offer jobs, we hope that there will be some strict control of the calibre and ability of those firms to maintain that programme, and to make sure that people are given a real opportunity of learning a skill and having two years' worthwhile employment, with a real measure of hope that the training will sustain them in worthwhile employment in the future.

The Chancellor has increased allowances by 5 per cent. more than inflation for the standard rate taxpayer, but he has done little to help the badly off and relieve the poverty and unemployment traps. A more effective way of doing this for the same money would have been to increase the family income supplement and to extend the long-term rate of supplementary benefit to those unemployed for more than one year. It is absurd that those people who have been unemployed for over a year and who need most help are denied it because of the way in which the Government have chosen to manipulate the manner in which benefits are paid.

I find the Chancellor's whole attitude in the last few months grossly irresponsible. There is particularly the way in which he has allowed speculation about the VAT increases and pension rights to be used as a political football. He should have done the honourable thing and clarified the position, particularly on pensions. Perhaps then there would not have been the bitter scenes that were witnessed round the country in which senior police officers took early retirement to avoid the possibility of their benefits being taxed.

Every newspaper in the country has been worried about its future because of the possibility of the imposition of VAT. The manufacturer and the retailer of children's shoes and clothes were crying out for a specific statement from the Chancellor that this was nothing more than speculation, and that he had no intention of imposing VAT. Is it right that the Chancellor should allow a period of some four or five months of such speculation? Of course it is not. It is totally irresponsible. He made no effort to allay those fears, which were so rightly expressed.

What did we hear in the Budget? There was no VAT on newspapers, but there was VAT on advertising. The consequences of that pose a real threat to many of the provincial newspapers in the country, because the VAT will go on the very advertising on which many provincial newspapers survive. Is it right that VAT should have been imposed on death, marriage and engagement announcements, or, indeed, on the selling of individual items offered in the bargain basements that are found in so many newspapers? The very substance that keeps those papers in operation will be threatened yet again.

The alliance would have done more to help the jobless with a programme of investment. I am sure such a programme would have received the support of many of the Chancellor's right hon. and hon. Friends, had they had the backbone to stand up for it.

The Budget is nothing more than a Budget for the city slickers. It is not for those who are sick of the never-ending poverty and unemployment. It offers no hope and no compassion. It is a mealy-mouthed and hard-hearted attempt to pursue the same dogma. I end where I started. It is the Budget of a lazy and incompetent Chancellor who chooses to ignore the stark reality that hits hon. Members in the face every time that they go into their constituencies, if they are truthful. It is about the poverty, the unhappiness and the heartbreak that long-term unemployment brings.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I made a speech in my constituency in Bournemouth last weekend in which I told those present what I hoped would be, and what I hoped would not be, in the Budget. Hon. Members can imagine, therefore, how pleased I was when, on hearing it, I realised that almost everything that I had hoped would not be in it was not in it and that most of what I had hoped would be in it was in it.

I am particularly pleased that we have expanded the youth training scheme. I believe that it makes an enormously valuable contribution to the training of our young people. I am surprised that it has been so much criticised by Opposition Members. I can remember that they produced two or three Green Papers on youth training when they were in power, but succeeded in doing nothing. How they can criticise the Government not only for introducing the scheme but for subsequently substantially extending it I fail to understand.

Similarly, I am delighted that 100,000 more places are provided on the community programme. It has been enthusiastically taken up in Dorset and in the west country as a whole. It has provided useful employment. I know that in my constituency there are sponsors for the community programme who were looking for additional funding, and I am grateful to the Chancellor for making it available.

In particular, those in my constituency who are involved in the tourist industry will appreciate the changes that have been made in taxation thresholds and national insurance. They will undoubtedly encourage greater employment of low-paid people. Many people in the tourist industry in my constituency have told me that they have been advertising vacancies for a long time. I know that they are not very well paid. The problem is that, when one takes into account the benefits people can get, one realises that they are often no better off taking a job. What the Chancellor has done now at least will encourage the filling of those places, and it will encourage people to take up employment which in the end must be to the economic benefit of the country.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) is no longer in his place. He sneered at the tourist industry and thought it incredible that Conservative Members regard it as worth while. I remind Labour Members that tourism provides 1·4 million jobs. The next largest industry, the construction industry, employs fewer than 900,000 people. Tourism is by far the most important industry in employment terms.

Tourism produces about £5 billion a year in foreign revenue for Britain, making it our third largest industry in terms of overseas earnings. Therefore, its importance should not be under-estimated. I should like the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East to know that, apart from providing jobs for waiters, chefs and part-time workers, the tourist industry and, in particular, hotels, create many jobs in the construction industry. They create jobs in the manufacture of cutlery in Sheffield and linen in Lancashire. They employ people to make buses and coaches to carry tourists. Tourism is one of our most important industries. Therefore I am particularly grateful to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for helping it in the way he has.

With the present exchange rate of the pound against the dollar we have a unique opportunity to expand our tourist industry considerably. Therefore, I should have liked to see a little more help given to the work of the British Tourist Authority in promoting Britain overseas and in encouraging overseas visitors to come to Britain — particularly because tourism brings employment to the regions. I am surprised that a midlands Member such as the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East does not appreciate that. I remind him that the chairman of our own Back Bench tourism committee is a midlands Member, and that Birmingham is one of our great and expanding centres for the tourist industry.

I shall not apologise for mentioning one or two things that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not done. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) — unfortunately, he is no longer in his place—referred to an extension of child benefit. I cannot imagine anything that would be less appropriate to our problems. The difficulty with child benefits and other similar universal benefits is that we pay out enormous sums and then collect back an enormous amount in taxation. That policy does not redress the fundamental problems. It does not help people to avoid poverty. There are still many genuinely poor and deprived people. Child benefit is not the route to take. I would rather see increases in family income supplement or special arrangements for supplementary benefit that would get rid of child benefit altogether.

There are special groups to which we are not necessarily addressing ourselves. The Minister will not be surprised if I mention the blind, because he will know that the early-day motion in my name, calling for a blindness allowance, has now been signed by over 250 hon. Members. It is a benefit that is direly needed by the blind, who are one of the special and deprived groups. I propose to table an amendment to the Finance Bill, if I am able to do so, calling for a blindness allowance to be introduced.

There are many measures in the Budget that will be extremely helpful to the nation as a whole and to my constituents in particular, and I congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer on them. I am particularly pleased with his measures to assist the self-employed. The self-employed and the non-corporate sector as a whole represent one of the most neglected components of British business life. Much has been done for the corporate sector but the non-corporate sector has suffered. Excellent schemes such as the business expansion scheme are, by definition, not available to the non-corporate sector. I hope that the Minister will consider whether ways can be devised to introduce something similar to the business expansion scheme that would be of benefit to the non-corporate sector.

I am most grateful to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what he has done for the self-employed about early retirement and for the changes in national insurance contributions, which redress a long-standing grievance in that area.

On balance, it is an excellent Budget which has maintained the Government's policy on course. It has set the scene for the continued expansion of the British economy. It is most encouraging to see overseas observers such as the OECD predicting that once again Britain's economy is likely to grow faster than that of any of our other European competitors. What a refreshing change that is from the years when the Labour Government were in office. I urge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to continue with his present policies, because I am sure that they will lead to our success as a country.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I shall try to be brief because my points are in themselves extremely brief. I do not believe that there is anything to be gained by going back to what happened in previous years and by comparing the performance of one Government with that of another. I am a realist and recognise that economic factors change from time to time. However, I wish that the Government would stop blaming everybody else. Last year it was the Americans, this year it is the miners, and no doubt next year the Americans will be blamed because of their over-valued dollar. That is all counter-productive. I prefer to consider what the Government have done in the Budget.

The Government have done nothing in the Budget for the ordinary man in the street in my constituency. The idea of changing the Employment Protection Acts so that no one is protected in the first two years of employment is not very fair. We all know what will happen, because it has already happened in some small industries. When a young man, after two years of training, is employed at the age of 17 he begins to earn a wage, but when he reaches 19 and his wage becomes realistic, the firm gets rid of him. That happens all the time. One has only to be a practising lawyer to see the result. Under the Government's proposals the young will get the push, and I plead with them to think again.

There is the suggestion that the wages councils may be abolished. I am glad that there is to be a Green Paper on the subject, so that representations can be made. We are likely to see the redevelopment of the sweatshop and of the outworker. We all know the scandals of the outworkers in the lace industry in Nottinghamshire and elsewhere. We know about the scandal of the outworkers in the garment industry. We have begun to see the creation of small businesses in which shirts and other garments are made. Low wages are paid and workers are exploited. It is already beginning to happen among the ethnic minorities.

Hon. Members with legal experience and practical knowledge of industry know that such cases are now coming forward. The Government must not go about matters in that way but must consider the real cause of unemployment, which, simply, is a lack of jobs. Abolishing wages councils will not help in any way. It will simply mean that more people will be exploited, because that is human nature. After all, why did we establish wages councils in the first place?

The fact that 40 per cent. of wages have been found to be below the rates fixed by wages councils is no reason for abolishing the councils. It is like saying that because several million cases of theft occur every year, we should abolish the Theft Act and let everybody go stealing. In reality, certain people will exploit other people. The Government cannot run away from that by abolishing wages councils and allowing the exploitation to continue. Instead, they should do something about those who pay below wages council levels.

I have a constituency interest in the construction industry because glass and bricks are made in my area. I urge the Government to reconsider, before the Bill is enacted, the production levels — I am talking not of monetary but of volume levels — of glass used, for example, in double glazing, and the number of bricks used in housing repairs and so on.

The result of last year's imposition of VAT on double glazing and insulation has been wholly counter-productive. The volume of goods sold in the market place is consistent with it having been pointless, and it has resulted in a considerable number of job losses. It is not too late for the Government to change their mind about that. I have been pleading for a year for VAT to be removed, and today I plead again.

There is a direct relationship between insulation and heat loss. There is no point in the Department of Energy appealing to companies to become thermally efficient while the Treasury is making it too expensive for them and householders to afford it. If the 15 per cent. rate of VAT were removed, we should start to insulate the nation, so reducing our heating bills, making houses more habitable and the quality of life improved.

I have declared my interest—as glass and bricks are made in my constituency—on several occasions. There are now pockets of unemployment in my area nearly as high as 40 per cent. The way to cut that is to get my people back to work. To do that, the Government must learn to invest in people and property.

This is a mean little Budget. It does not seem to take us anywhere down the road to full employment. Any future Budget that takes us down that road will have overwhelming support because we all appreciate that the curse of our time is the curse of unemployment. That curse can be lifted only by positive, rather than negative, actions by a Government who are really in control.

9.3 pm

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): I wish to make it clear at the outset that I do not intend to comment on the speech of the Chief Secretary, in view of his refusal to withdraw his deliberate distortion of remarks made about my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) in relation to our policy on council house sales. The right hon. and learned Gentleman refused to withdraw the statement that he made on that point and, by his behaviour at the outset of his remarks, he destroyed not only his speech but himself.

In last year's Budget we met a swashbuckling, reforming Chancellor. This year he has disappeared and in his place we have Nervous Nigel who, if today's Private Eye cover is to be believed, is more concerned with his own job than with the jobs of others. Indeed, I would not put any bets on his job lasting much longer, following this Budget. One might call it a Budget for the job of Nervous Nigel rather than for the jobs of others.

Again and again the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed his anxiety about jobs, but there is nothing in his Budget that will produce them. He has boxed himself in with his medium term financial strategy. No one did that to him; he insists on doing it to himself. He has further boxed himself in through his mismanagement of the sterling crisis. I am not surprised that his right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) said that the Chancellor's strategy had put him in a strait-jacket. That is another way of expressing what I intended to say.

After six years of Tory Government, the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East said, it was time to question some of the assumptions underlying the Government's economic strategy. Indeed it is. Since the general election in 1983, the position has got worse. According to Government figures, unemployment then was 2·9 million, or 12·4 per cent. of the work force, and inflation was running at 3·7 per cent. On the Chancellor's calculations, by June 1985 inflation will be running at 6 per cent., and unemployment will be at least 3·2 million in the second quarter—that is an average of all the forecasts, as we do not have a Treasury forecast.

After six years, it is time to reconsider the Government's underlying strategy. A less austere fiscal stance would be beneficial to the entire country, and could be consistent with a stable exchange rate. Stability matters most, after the fluctuations from day to day, and even within a day, that we have seen since Christmas. We want a stable exchange rate. That is possible, together with a higher level of real output, if the Government change their underlying stance.

The right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East said that we should have an investment programme. That is the way to produce jobs. I had hoped that my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook would miss the Prime Minister's words at Question Time yesterday, but he used her statement and I wish to refer to the Prime Minister's moment of truth. It is always disappointing when colleagues pinch some points that one wishes to make. It was a moment of truth for the Prime Minister when she found herself naturally forced to admit that public investment was purposely higher in the north to help the unemployment problem. If she would remove her ideological spectacles for a moment, she could see what the country's genuine problems were and how to deal with them.

Yet the Government have set aside the calls for public investment, which they have received from all sides. It is no longer merely a Labour cry, but is echoed even on Tory Benches, by the representatives of industry, the Confederation of British Industry and the established newspapers. On every side the Government faces calls for increasing investment, but they deliberately set them aside.

Instead, the White Paper plans to cut capital spending by a further £3·3 billion. Housing finance is especially badly hit. The Government propose a reduction in capital spending from £3 billion this year to £2·3 billion in 1987-88. The Building Employers Confederation judges that a 5 per cent. drop in capital spending on construction work will cause a loss of more than 600,000 jobs, and a drop in the work load worth about £500 million.

The sheer stupidity of the Government's view was well set out in the Audit Commission's report which was covered by The Guardian of 11 March. It stated:

"There will be a shortage of 500,000 homes and a council house repairs backlog of £15 billion."

Every moment that goes by makes those repairs both more necessary and more expensive. The need for those repairs is reflected in the human misery suffered by people who live in damp, leaky houses. To delay repairs, to allow them to accumulate and to become more expensive, and to refuse to provide the homes that people need is little short of crazy at a time when needs are increasing so rapidly. Investment is necessary for jobs, innovation, competitiveness, expansion, to improve the environment and to ensure that people have decent working conditions. All those reasons justify investment and justify the Government borrowing a little more to ensure that investment.

The Government have made great play of reducing employers' costs. They claim to have done that, first, by removing the national insurance surcharge and now by the changes in national insurance contributions introduced in the Budget, but to allow the infrastructure to continue to deteriorate adds to industry's costs.

Hon. Members will be aware that the CBI made proposals as to how the infrastructure should be improved. Its proposals were modest. It was mainly interested in road improvements. The improvement in the infrastructure that it proposes—the removal of bottlenecks and the building of some new roads, especially in East Anglia—would reduce transport costs by 10 per cent. That would mean an annual saving to industry of £2 billion. That is a way substantially to reduce employers' costs and to increase efficiency and productivity. Why not do that?

The irrationality of the Government's attitude towards infrastructure investment is now beyond belief. I would almost go so far as to say that it is no longer a political point; it is common sense. Work must be done if we are to have efficient industry and create wealth, yet the Government reject that and can give no sensible reason for so doing. The Financial Secretary will perhaps come up with a reason that no one else has managed to come up with so far in the debate that has been taking place not just on the Budget but during the preceding months.

Instead, the Government turned to wage cuts. That is the bottom line in the Budget. It comes out in their attitude towards wages councils and the Chancellor's clear, although not fully expressed, desire for their abolition. It also comes out in the national insurance contribution changes, because if we study those changes carefully we see that they are designed to encourage lower wages. There will be less incentive to allow wage increases at the new bottlenecks which have been introduced into the structure.

The Times today said that Ministers were going around saying privately that 500,000 jobs will be created by the Budget over two years. I am not surprised that Ministers said it privately. If they had said it publicly, evidence would have to be produced and there is no evidence for it. It is a wage-cutting Budget, but the Government have no evidence to show that it will work, but they produce two reasons for it. They point to the American experience and they talk about flexibility in the labour market.

"Flexibility in the labour market" are polite words for poor working conditions, insecurity and disgusting wage levels. The Government conveniently forget that America and many other western countries have minimum wage legislation. It is not half as secret as wages councils minimum wage levels. Minimum wage levels in the United States are widely publicised. One can hardly get on public transport buses in those parts of the United States that have them without knowing the minimum wage level. The 7 million jobs that have been created in America since 1982 have not been created because wages are low or because there is no wages legislation. They have wages legislation.

To bolster the Government's belief in low wages and provide evidence, after the Chancellor's claim about the number of jobs that would be created by a 1 per cent. wage cut, the Treasury produced a working paper. I read it carefully and I found it extremely interesting. The basic argument in the paper is that lower wages increase company income, and, given that increased company income combined with lower wages, companies will immediately decide to employ labour rather than to invest in equipment. That is utterly unrealistic. Let us consider a precision engineering firm with increased company income that wishes to expand. Will it say, "We will forget about the new sophisticated piece of machinery which would enable us to compete with other firms and instead we will hire a couple more engineers with slide rules."? What nonsense. It is an entirely unrealistic paper. Indeed, its authors come to that conclusion, because they say that there is no evidence for the claim that increased company income and lower wages will lead to increased employment.

The Government have no reason for their supposition. It is utterly disgraceful that the Chancellor should try to force down wages in this way. It is not a new solution. It was the kind of thing that used to go on in the 1930s when there was an attempt to push wages down and when people undercut each other in trying to obtain jobs. It is an old solution. It did not work in the 1930s and there is even less reason to suppose that it will work now.

When hon. Members talk about the need to hold wages down, and particularly when they talk about wages councils, they carefully omit to mention the actual wage levels that are set by wages councils. I intend to rectify that. Let us take a 16-year-old. The highest rate for a 16-year-old is £59·20. This information is in a Hansard written reply of 18 March. The lowest rate for a 16-year-old is £29·71. The highest rate for an adult—this is for an unusual type of employment where one could not foresee an enormous expansion—is £97·20 per week, but that is for a non-residential club steward in one of the larger licensed London clubs. With the best will in the world I do not think that reducing wages in that sector would lead to an enormous expansion in jobs.

Mr. John Townend: That is the minimum wage?

Dr. McDonald: I shall give the minimum wage, about which hon. Members on the Government Benches complain continually. The lowest rate set by a wages council for an adult is £47·50 per week. What I find so utterly disgusting is that even the highest rate I have quoted is an amount that many hon. Members on the Government Benches would think nothing of spending on a dinner for two in one of the most expensive London restaurants.

I have listened to the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) complaining about these wage levels. When I look up the Register of Members' interests, I find that he is not satisfied with his parliamentary salary but has at least two other jobs and is also a member of Lloyds, for which in practice, though not in theory, he has to show basic wealth of £50,000. Therefore, the wage levels that I have quoted are in many cases amounts that he would not miss in a week.

Mr. John Townend rose——

Dr. McDonald: I do not think there is any need to give way to the hon. Gentleman. He has had his say on more than one occasion about wages councils and he complains endlessly about the wage levels that are set. I think it disgraceful——

Mr. Townend rose——

Dr. McDonald: —that he does so, given his background. What has the hon. Gentleman got to say for himself?

Mr. Townend: I am obliged to the hon. Lady for giving way eventually. Does she really expect the House to accept that £59 is a reasonable wage for a wages council to set as a minimum wage for a 16-year-old who has just left school, who is probably of very low ability and who is unskilled? Does she honestly think that that school leaver of probably low ability and low motivation should receive that amount? We must remember that that is the minimum wage, and not the wage set for the cleverest or brightest 16-year-old. Does she not agree that someone of low ability and no experience will not get a job if that is to be the minimum wage?

Dr. McDonald: I sometimes feel that the hon. Gentleman thinks that these people should live on 10 quid a week. The job which earns £59·20 is that of a laundry worker. It is hardly pleasant work. I agree that not many qualifications are required, but the work is not pleasant, it lasts for a full week, and 59 quid is not a lot of money. The hon. Gentleman would not even miss that amount each week. It is disgraceful that he should attack such wage levels.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Dr. McDonald: Conservative Members suggest that the abolition of the wages councils will greatly increase jobs——

Mr. Budgen rose——

Dr. McDonald: The estimates based on the Treasury's economic model suggest that the abolition of wages councils would create no more than 8,000 jobs over the next five years. That is the number of jobs lost every month since the Government came into office. It is disgraceful that the Government should even consider this as a way of increasing employment. Many jobs have been lost under their regime, and there are far better ways of increasing employment.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Dr. McDonald: I shall not give way.

The Government fondly believe that it is possible to foster a low-wage, low- tech economy. That is not the future for this country. High skills are available, as are great inventiveness and huge research facilities. That research is put to good use, and the notion that we can fall behind and endeavour to compete with Third-world countries over wage levels is utterly misconceived.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Dr. McDonald: I am not giving way.

Mr. Budgen: Why not?

Dr. McDonald: Because I have several more points to make, and I wish to do so in the time remaining to me.

Instead, the Government are prepared to rely on oil and to destroy manufacturing industry, one fifth of which has already been lost since 1979. If this Government remain in office from 1979 to 1988, they will have obtained £75 billion from oil revenue, and in the same period they will have spent more than half of it on unemployment and social security benefits, merely to keep an army of at least 3 million and possibly 4 million unemployed.

When this Government again go to the country, one of the most serious complaints will be the waste of those oil revenues. The public know that that money has been squandered on unemployment and that it has not been ploughed back into investment. Revenues at this level will continue for only a short time longer, and the way in which the Government have squandered them is quite unforgiveable. The people of this country will not forgive them.

The Government have done nothing about jobs. They have presented this Budget as a Budget for the poor and for families. The Chancellor has wept crocodile tears over the plight of those caught in the poverty trap. I shall not refer to the unemployment trap, because that exists mainly in the minds of Conservative Members. Fewer than 4 per cent. of people face replacement ratios of 90 per cent. of their income in work when unemployed — a tiny proportion. That is why I shall not spend time on the unemployment trap. Instead, I shall spend time on the poverty trap, because the Government have done little to aid those who suffer from it. The Budget has done little to aid the poor altogether. The Chancellor has thrown away a golden opportunity.

Last week a book called "Poor Britain" was published. It was based on the surveys carried out by the authors for London Weekend Television. It showed considerable public support for a serious anti-poverty programme. It even showed that people were prepared to pay not a lot, but a little, more income tax to pay for such programmes. The proposals that we have made for raising child benefit and pensions could be paid for by the funds that the Chancellor has already used and other funds available to us which could be put to a better purpose than those for which the Chancellor has used them.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Spell it out. What do you mean?

Dr. McDonald: The hon. Gentleman is merely yapping away from a sedentary position.

Let us examine the way in which the Chancellor has used the amounts that are available to him in charging income tax and national insurance contributions. Those on levels of income of £60 a week, £90 a week or £200 a week, the average male earnings, will benefit by £1·73 a week as a result of the combined alterations in income tax and national insurance contributions. However, someone on £40,000 a year will receive £7·21 extra a week, a substantial change, but a change that is entirely in line with the changes made in the tax burden so far. The better-off have received far greater benefits through all these changes than those of average and below average income.

To take a typical family of a married couple with two children, with an income of £150 a week, the increases in weekly expenditure as a result of changes in water, rates, vehicle excise duty, cigarettes, beer and wine will wipe out £1·35 of the alleged benefits from the changes in taxation and national insurance contribution. These increases were announced both before the Budget and in the Budget statement itself.

Worse still, by the changes in the national insurance contribution, the Government have created a whole new set of poverty traps. They have done nothing to ease the number of those caught in the poverty trap. Rather, they have increased it. For example, someone earning £89·99 a week pays a national insurance contribution of 7 per cent., which is £6·30. If he earns £90 a week, national insurance contributions go up to 9 per cent., and the cost is increased to £8·10 so that marginal increase in wages produces a new cost of £1·80. That is the kind of poverty trap created by the changes in the national insurance contribution.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: As I understand it, the hon. Lady is decrying the changes that have been made in the national insurance contributions, whereas the Leader of the Opposition welcomed them and said that he had been calling for them for a long time.

Dr. McDonald: The national insurance contributions should be more fairly distributed. One of the ways that the Government might have done this would have been to bring those earning over £265 a week into national insurance contributions net. This has been ill thought out, and as the Chancellor is supposedly so concerned about the poverty trap that he raises personal allowances and alters national insurance contributions, he should have done it with a great deal more thought. He should not have produced several new poverty traps, which is just what he has done.

I now come to those caught in the traditional poverty traps. I refer to the 270,000 families who are estimated to be caught in them. That number represents a threefold increase since 1979. But only 5,000 to 10,000 of those families will be lifted out of the poverty traps by the Budget changes. The Government have done nothing to ease the problem of those poverty traps. Instead, they have made the position considerably worse.

The Government had the opportunity of gaining tremendous public support for the Budget, and should have introduced a programme for the immediate relief of poverty. They should be increasing child benefit by £3 a week, because that is the best way of helping poor families with children. It ensures that they receive an increase in income without being caught in a poverty trap. The Chancellor of the Exchequer should also be increasing pensions in order to benefit many poor pensioners who are still on basic state pensions. Instead, he has thrown that opportunity aside.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South) rose——

Dr. McDonald: I shall not give way; I am about to conclude my speech.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has lost public support. The Budget will not do anything for jobs or for families. It is a dismal, miserable Budget brought in by a Nervous Nigel of a Chancellor who will not be hanging on to his job for long as a result of this disgraceful Budget.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): Those of us who heard the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), and the way in which when he complimented my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on his presentation, will want to compliment him on his presentation too. I was particularly pleased about the way in which he warmly welcomed the changes in the national insurance contributions and the changes in income tax thresholds, the youth training scheme, the community programme and measures for small businesses and the self-employed. I recognise that there were areas of criticism that he shared with other hon. Members, but I shall come to those later.

I particularly compliment my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst). I heard interventions during the debate suggesting that he was not effective in Committee. But those of us who were in Committee last year know how effective he and his Scottish colleagues were. Indeed, they were so effective in persuading my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he recognised the difficulties through which the Scotch whisky industry is passing and ensured that the Budget would help that industry.

Mr. Maxton rose——

Mr. Moore: Among other things, the debate concentrated on one legitimate major concern. Many hon. Members emphasised the problems of employment and unemployment, and discussed whether the Budget or Budgets of a similar nature would contribute to jobs. My hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East, the hon. Members for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright), for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle), for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), and for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham), and my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) sought in their different ways to address themselves to the critical question of unemployment and jobs. It is right and proper that I should deal first with those points.

I do not in any way doubt the sincerity of the comments made by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald). I recognise the sincerity with which hon. Members on both sides of the House have expressed their views about the awful problem of unemployment. But I am concerned that hon. Members may give false hope to those who are suffering and who are out of work if they suggest that there is some simple money answer. I share the views of those who see unemployment as an evil, but with respect, I think that we must understand its causes. In particular, I do not wish to go beyond the Government's remit. We must understand those causes that are Government-induced.

I understand full well that sometimes one does not wish to look to the past but, with respect to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East, I must say that, although in my position of some responsibility I should like to look to the future, I must, in looking for the causes of unemployment, look to the past.

I hope that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) will not mind if I remind him of the days in the late 1950s when he was a student at University College and I was a student at the London School of Economics, and the debates that he, I and others had at that time. [Interruption.] I trust that that modest remark will not create difficulties for the hon. Gentleman.

These important problems are not confined to the past five or six years. I and many others who have come into politics in the past 10 or 15 years remember the debates of the late 1950s. In the middle and late 1950s, unemployment averaged 300,000 a year. We were told that a higher level would create unacceptable social and industrial unrest. I remember the period between 1964 and 1970 when unemployment averaged 450,000 a year; the period between 1970 and 1974 when unemployment averaged 660,000 a year, and the period between 1974 and 1979 when unemployment averaged 1·2 million.

I am quoting statistics, and I do not quote statistics that are not verifiable. I recognise the tragedy of today's average. I am conscious of the appalling level of unemployment today, when the figure is well over 3 million. But in my view the situation has been caused in part by the way in which our country, and Governments of the major two parties, represented here today, reacted to the challenge that faced, after the second world war, an essentially trading nation, one third of the GDP of which was involved in world trade. What was of great importance was the way in which, as a trading nation, we sought to respond to changed conditions, and to the need for new products, better services and better pricing.

In a competitive world, we should have been flexible and competitive. Instead of that, what were we? It was our people as well as our politicians who failed. Our people chose to buy foreign goods. It was not just a question of foreigners choosing not to buy our goods. It behoves us in this debate to concern ourselves with what the Government's role has been in our failure, and with the Government's attempts to correct it. However, we must reconcile ourselves to the fact that macro and micro policies over the generations have compounded our problems.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Then why are all the chickens coming home to roost only now?

Mr. Moore: I have listened to the debate with considerable patience. I hope that I will now be given an equal opportunity to argue my case.

At the macro level, all Governments have reacted to rising historical unemployment by trying again and again to inject more money into the system. They have all had good and sincere reasons, but the consequence has been to breed inflation. In the 1970s, we reached almost the ultimate absurdity. There has been much debate today about the need for increased demand. During the 1970s, nominal demand increased by over 300 per cent., but productivity did not increase by much more than 20 per cent. Those who argue that the Chancellor should increase demand even more should remember that since the beginning of 1981 we have increased real demand by 3·25 per cent. a year. When the Labour party was in office, there was an average annual increase in real terms of 2·75 per cent.—a smaller real increase in demand. I should like to stress to those of my hon. Friends who would like an increase in demand that, in real terms, it is increasing. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said yesterday:

"I repeat today the undertaking I gave the National Economic Development Council last month: The medium-term financial strategy is as firm a guarantee against inadequate money demand as it is against excessive money demand."

At the macro level, we did precisely the reverse of what we should have done and at the micro level we strangled our economy with a panoply of controls on wages and dividends. Moreover, we reacted to prices by putting controls on credit or hire purchase. All those controls were put on for legitimate and sincere reasons, but they made an economy that had already been weakened by inflation less flexible, less able to adapt to the markets and less able to be competitive in the world in which we have to earn our living.

During the past five years, we have reversed those policies. At the macro level, our medium term financial strategy has brought down inflation and created the conditions for sustainable growth. At the micro level, we have disposed of most of the controls and introduced policies concerning competition, deregulation and privatisation. Domestic productivity has improved, as has competitiveness, though not sufficiently. There have been the beginnings of change.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) legitimately asked when the changes will occur. I have not talked, and do not propose to talk, about the problems of the world recession, changing technology and the changing pattern of demography. However there is no question but that the Government have set the proper macro and micro framework. As my right hon. Friend said, the framework has broken inflation and produced productivity. He continued:

"Too much of the benefit of economic growth is currently being enjoyed in higher living standards for those in work, too little in the form of better job prospects for those out of work. In a free society"— happily, that is what we still are—

"the remedy lies in the hands of those responsible for collective bargaining throughout the economy."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 789-92.]

The second major theme of the debate has been the burden of taxation. It was started by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and taken up by my hon. Friends the Members for Cornwall, North (Mr. Neale), for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), for Strathkelvin and Bearsden and for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) and the hon. Members for Thurrock, for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and for Great Grimsby. The facts are clear—the burden of tax is up relative to 1978-79 by £23·8 billion. Why? Because our first job was to repair the ravages of the previous years; to repay international debts, to control borrowing and to reduce inflation. Taxation is at least an honest form of burden on present generations, whereas inflation is a dishonest burden on future ones.

Opposition Members have not asked how and in what way taxes are up, in what way they are down and who pays. Two fifths of the increase is from the North sea. Do the Opposition want us to give profits back to the multinationals who extract oil? Another two fifths has come from an increase in taxes on expenditure. As my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham said, that is part of our philosophic commitment to a switch from taxes on income to taxes on expenditure. Most of the remaining increase comes from increases in local authority rates and employees' national insurance. We get no help from the Opposition on, for example, controlling rates.

The Opposition do not discuss where taxes have decreased. We should compare income tax now with what it was under Labour. Income tax as a precentage of total taxation and national insurance contributions is down from 32·7 per cent. in 1978-79 to 25·6 per cent. in 1985-86—a significant change. This again confirms our belief in the need to shift taxes from those generating wealth at work.

Income tax and insurance contributions as a percentage of the total are down from 39·6 per cent. in 1978-79 to 34·3 per cent. in 1985-86. My hon. Friends the Members for Strathkelvin and Bearsden and for Cornwall, North have welcomed the fact that, in real terms, the threshold will have increased by 20 per cent. since 1978-79 and that 1·25 million of our countrymen and women will have been taken out of tax altogether. I should have thought that that was a significant achievement.

The burden carried by employers, from whom jobs flow, is another aspect of taxation that is fundamental, and the Opposition have shown their sheer brass neck in even questioning this. The employers' percentage of total taxes and national insurance contributions should drop from 14·1 per cent. of the total in 1978-79 to 9·1 per cent. in 1985-86. That is a significant change. In certain areas we are seeing obvious reductions—for example, through the national insurance contribution.

Mr. Hoyle: The hon. Gentleman said that only employers create jobs—that jobs are created only by demand. We have been saying to the Government that they are decreasing demand, and that that is the problem with their strategy. Demand is decreasing so that jobs are not created.

Mr. Moore: Nominal demand has been increased in some radical ways in the past. That did not prevent the extraordinary increase in unemployment that we have seen, ratchet-like, since the 1950s. It has not solved the problem. Demand in real terms has been increasing during the past three years by a greater rate per year than it did under Labour.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Moore: The hon. Member for Thurrock specifically asked me to compare the burden of taxation under Labour and Conservative Governments as it affects working people, especially those at the bottom of the scale. What would the tax burden have been if Labour had still been in office? How has the average employee fared under both Administrations? Ignoring any additions that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook might recently have suggested in attempting to ensure that the Labour party loses the next election, if we had the same pattern and indexed system as when Labour last left office—unchanged, without the action that we have taken on thresholds—£6·25 billion more in taxes would have been paid by millions of our fellow citizens and employers would have paid £3·75 billion in 1985-86 through national insurance. That would have been £10 billion additional taxes.

Mr. Bermingham: I would not disagree with the hon. Gentleman's figures. Will he, however, tell the House which socio-economic group has received the greatest tax deductions? Does he agree that, in value terms, the answer is those at the top end rather than those at the bottom end of the scale?

Mr. Moore: I shall come specifically to the group that has benefited most at the bottom. By definition, if there are absurd, contorted forms of taxation—for example, taxes of 98 per cent.—and if changes are made, some of those at the top are bound to beneift more from a progressive system. Let me answer the questions specifically for those whom the hon. Gentleman thinks are his natural supporters. If Labour had been in power, what would have happened to the ordinary taxpayers—those in work? I shall remind hon. Members of the position when Labour was in office, because one judges the comments of politicians by their actions in government.

I shall give the Opposition the best set of statistics at my disposal. Between 1973-74 and 1978-79 a married couple with two children on half average wages would have seen their real take-home pay increase by 4·3 per cent. A married couple with two children on average wages would have benefited by about 1 per cent. A similar family on one and a half times average earnings would have seen their real take-home pay reduce by 1·1 per cent. The family on twice average earnings would have seen a decrease of 1·5 per cent.

During the period of Conservative Government a married couple with two children on half average earnings have seen their real take-home pay increase by 12 per cent. A similar family on average earnings have seen an increase of 13 per cent. The same size family on twice average earnings have had an increase of 14 per cent. By definition, those at the top of the income scale must have improved their position. Do Opposition Members not care for those at the bottom of the scale, whose position has improved radically under the Conservative Government? Have they lost track of that?

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

Mr. Moore: No, I shall not give way. I have already given way on more occasions than Opposition Front Bench spokesmen and a limited time remains available to me. To the extent that the Opposition are concerned to assist the Government in further reducing tax levels, I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and I will be delighted to have their support whenever Divisions take place on this issue.

Infrastructure spending has been mentioned by many of those who have contributed to the debate, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East, my hon. Friends the Members for Strathkelvin and Bearsden and for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), the hon. Member for Thurrock, the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and the hon. Members for Warrington, North, for Portsmouth, South and for Great Grimsby. [Interruption.] I imagine that those who have participated in the debate, or have sought to do so, wish to have recognition of the fact that they did and wish me to address myself to the issues that they sought to raise. I ask those who were not present to participate in the debate to have a little patience while I respond to the contributions that have been made to it.

I found the comments of the hon. Member for Thurrock on infrastructure spending rather strange. She suggested that the Government are rejecting such spending. I remind the House of the facts, which are always relevant. Fixed investment in the entire economy in 1984, both public and private, is expected to be an all-time record of £55 billion at current prices. It is calculated that public sector capital spending will show an estimated outturn of £22 billion in 1984-85. That is an overall 3 per cent. rise in real terms since 1979-80. Of course these are unpalatable figures for Opposition Members.

We have heard strange comments about expenditure on roads and housing repair and maintenance from Opposition Members. Capital spending on national roads in 1985-86 will increase by 22 per cent. in real terms above the 1978-79 level. Capital expenditure on housing repair and improvement will increase by 37·5 per cent. in real terms above 1978-79 levels.

I recognise that there will be those who have questions and complaints about certain aspects of infrastructure spending. However, my hon. Friends the Members for Bridlington and for Strathkelvin and Bearsden recognise that in such a massive programme there is a balance between the Government's ability to sustain such a programme while maintaining a certain level of interest rates and ensuring that there is no return to the horrifying levels of inflation that we have experienced.

The hon. Member for Colne Valley was kind enough to refer to the changes that we are seeking to make on short-life assets. He was right to remind us that Liberal Members discussed the issue and voted upon it in Committee and in the House last year. He is right to identify this as an important area of budgetary changes for British industry and, therefore, for jobs. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the new arrangements that are aimed at assets whose working life is shorter than the average because of heavy use or rapid obsolescence.

For many years, annual writing-down allowances on most business machinery and plant have been calculated on a pooling basis and the cost of the plant goes into the pool, the proceeds from sales are deducted from it and the writing-down allowance of 25 per cent. is given on the balance.

The proposals on short-life assets will enable taxpayers to elect to have the assets depreciated separately from the main pool—depooling—for a period of up to five years. Taxpayers will have two years from the end of the year in which the asset is acquired to make their election. Thus, the new arrangement will have the twin advantages of enabling assets whose working life is very much shorter than the average to be fully written off while at the same time maintaining the advantages of pooling for the generality of business machinery and plant. I know that this will be much welcomed by British industry at large.

Beyond that, the House may recall that I announced during the Report stage of last year's Finance Bill that we would be providing in this year's Bill for free depreciation for the writing-down allowances for new ships. We have now decided that, as from 1 April, free depreciation should apply also to writing-down allowances for expenditure on second-hand ships on the same basis as earlier announced for new ships. Given the scale and lumpiness of investment in ships, and the strategic importance of the industry to the country, owners should not be deterred by the tax system from taking advantage of the opportunities which there are in the market today for acquiring nearly new second-hand ships at prices well below those for new vessels.

Other points raised by three Opposition Members left me almost speechless. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby raised the question of electricity and gas prices, and tried to suggest that somehow the Chancellor was taking, through price rises in this area, what he had given through tax and national insurance contribution changes. I shall put on record the facts on the prices for the domestic consumer in these areas.

Before 1984, domestic gas and electricity prices were frozen for 15 months and two years respectively. Increases since then have been at or below the prevailing inflation rate. For gas, they were 4·5 per cent. on average from January 1984, and the same from February 1985. For electricity, they were 2 per cent. from April 1984, and are expected to be on average 4·5 per cent. from this April. Domestic energy prices—this is the key point—have therefore fallen in real terms in the last three years.

It would be embarrassing to remind the Opposition that when they were last in office electricity prices went up 2 per cent. every six weeks.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Moore: I think that the facts are always more interesting and more important than some of the pontifications on the subject.

With rising real output, continued low inflation, record levels of investment and welcome increases in productivity, the past year has been one of achievement. However, while we have seen sizeable increases in employment, I recognise that we still face tragically high levels of unemployment.

It has also been a year of turbulence in the financial markets. The coal strike——

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister is not giving way.

Mr. Moore: I would give way to those hon. Members who have the courtesy not only to speak but to spend most of their time in the Chamber throughout the debate.

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will wish to know, Mr. Speaker, because it pertains to your role in the Chair, that not only was I here for most of the debate, but that I spoke for 20 minutes—and I was here last night, as was my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell).

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. Member knows, if the Minister is not giving way, he must resume his seat, and that is exactly what happened.

Mr. Moore: The coal strike exacted a heavy cost in terms of reduced industrial output and higher public sector spending and borrowing. The strong dollar has dominated the international financial scene. This is the background against which the Budget decisions have been taken.

Our first priority remains to keep up the fight against inflation through firm monetary and fiscal policies. After last year's disruption, we are determined to get public borrowing as a proportion of the gross domestic product back on to its downward trend. The Budget is designed to ensure that this is done, and that the monetary and public sector borrowing requirement profiles are realistic and achievable. Within this framework, we have been able to make a modest reduction in the burden of taxation. We have been able to introduce some important measures to boost employment, and we have continued with out programme of tax reform. The extension of YTS and the community programme will help to reduce unemployment and produce a more skilled and adaptable labour force. Reductions in tax and national insurance contributions will improve the incentives for employers to create new jobs and the incentives for workers to fill them.

I believe that the Budget is good for inflation, good for enterprise, and thus good for jobs. I commend it to the House.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

National Vegetable Research Station

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

10 pm

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): This is the second Wednesday night in succession on which a Minister has been good enough to come to the Dispatch Box to answer a debate on the very pressing and serious problems facing agricultural research in Britain. Last week a Labour Member, the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John), raised these issues. I congratulate him on doing so, and on his good fortune in beating me to it in the ballot.

While the Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Mrs. Fenner)—I very much appreciate the fact that she is here this evening—stood her ground unyieldingly in last week's debate, she did acknowledge the importance of agricultural research, the need for new sources of finance to be forthcoming from industry, and the need for an end to the present uncertainties. Therefore, I take what she said as an expression of the same shrewd and sympathetic attitude that she showed when she visited the national vegetable research station last September.

Professor Bleasdale and his staff at Wellesbourne, and I myself, very much appreciated my hon. Friend's willingness to make that visit at our request. We also appreciated the tribute that she rightly paid then, when she said, in an interview with the Warwick Advertiser:

"I am most impressed by the work of the NVRS. The station makes an invaluable contribution to ensuring the continued efficiency and competitiveness of the UK vegetable growers."

My hon. Friend the Minister is well qualified to make that judgment, and I should like to highlight to the House some of the facts that underpin it.

The watercress industry in Britain, worth about £4 million a year, would not now exist but for work done by NVRS scientists. Nor would we have a £19 million onion industry. Work on disease control and physiology of over-wintered onions has resulted in an increase in home production from 26,000 tonnes to 200,000 tonnes a year, with a corresponding reduction in imports. The reduction in storage losses from disease alone is estimated at £5 million a year. Very fittingly, the NVRS received a Queen's award for industry for that work.

Fungal diseases of the oil seed rape crop have been a serious problem which, if unchecked, would have been causing losses estimated at between £20 million and £40 million a year. Control was previously by means of repeated and expensive spray treatments with fungicides. Work at NVRS has developed a seed treatment which is now applied to over 95 per cent. of the seed used in Britain and has virtually eliminated the disease damage. The research cost was only £30,000 because of the expertise and facilities available at Wellesbourne.

A research programme on inter-cropping, using one application of spray and fertiliser for two crops, and so reducing inputs both of chemicals and of energy, is producing encouraging findings. Work on the fertiliser requirements of vegetable crops has led to the development of sophisticated models which allow the optimum amounts to be applied for efficient crop nutrition. The annual benefit of that to the vegetable industry is £7 million. Moreover, there is an environmental as well as an economic benefit to this approach of developing minimum input systems, and so reducing the damage caused by high levels of nitrates and other fertilisers in rivers, lakes, and, ultimately, water supplies.

The NVRS, in conjunction with Oxfam, maintains a gene bank which is indispensable to assisting poorer countries to grow vegetables appropriate to their own conditions, and thereby to feed their peoples. The gene bank is a resource for all countries and reflects the international standing of the NVRS.

From these few examples of the work of the NVRS it is abundantly clear that this research establishment confers valuable benefits. Its work has led to reduced costs for industry. It has contributed towards the achievement of a higher degree of self-sufficiency in food and security of supply for the United Kingdom. It has led to an appreciable benefit to the balance of payments, both in import saving and in increased exports, and these trends could be enhanced.

Vegetable growing is virtually unsubsidised and there are no vegetable mountains, so that increased output does not mean a drain on resources. Vegetable growing is somewhat more labour intensive than other forms of agriculture, so we should encourage it in the interests of rural employment.

As a result of the work of the NVRS, the housewife has vegetables of a type that suit her better, available at more times of the year and at steadier prices. The environmental benefits of NVRS research are also becoming of increasing significance. Moreover, the argument for producing and eating more vegetables in the interests of good health is powerful.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has endorsed the recommendation in the report of the committee on medical aspects of food policy that the nation should eat more vegetables. Investment in vegetable research will lead to a saving of costs in the National Health Service, a point that should surely carry weight as the Government establish their priorities in public expenditure.

The New Scientist of 15 November reported the finding of a large-scale study in Japan showing that eating vegetables every day reduces the risk of cancer, and I have been glad to see that my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, in a campaign to encourage people to adopt a diet less conductive to heart disease, is also urging them to eat more vegetables.

The Minister may perhaps agree that in what I have said I have, in effect, made a case for increased funding for vegetable research, both relative to research on arable crops and absolutely. What the NVRS would ask for—and I only endorse its plea—is level funding and a settled financial environment. What, however, the NVRS actually faces is much worse than that, and the present prospect for the NVRS, of further cuts on top of those already made is black indeed.

In 1984-85, 11 posts were lost at the NVRS. For 1985-86, another 17 posts, including 13 in science grades, have been sacrificed. The NVRS will have lost 28 posts out of 224 in the two years to April 1985. Money that might have been spent on research has been spent on redundancy costs. The NVRS has additionally been asked by the Agriculture and Food Research Council to identify further savings of 18 per cent. for 1986-87.

Not only does the NVRS do work worth millions of pounds for the nation, but does it in a prudent and responsibly cost-conscious manner. Such scope as there was for the elimination of marginal expenditure was more than used up in the first round of cuts. The cuts for 1985-86 will cause the existing research programme to suffer. The further cuts which are envisaged will mean the dissolution of research teams and the complete abandonment of some research projects.

The threat to the NVRS is but an aspect of the wider threat to horticultural research, which is itself but one part of the whole programme of agricultural research, which faces the prospect of cutbacks which will be draconian. The Government have announced their intention to cut expenditure on agricultural and food research and development by £10 million in 1986-87 and by £20 million in 1987-88. As Lord Selborne, chairman of the AFRC has said

" Cuts of this magnitude would probably lead to the closure of at least two institutions and to a further damaging curtailment of programmes throughout the research service."

The new AFRC corporate plan indicates that on top of the 550 jobs lost this year a further 650 jobs—nearly half of them the jobs of scientists—are to go in the next three years. The fall in the AFRC budget between 1982 and 1987 will be between 15 and 20 per cent. It must be borne in mind, too, that the rise in the cost of research, with the sophisticated equipment involved, outruns the general rise in the cost of living.

I appreciate, of course, that it is the Government's hope that the shortfall in Government funding to the AFRC will be made up by an increased contribution from industry. It is not unreasonable that this should happen, given the great benefit that industry has received from AFRC research. There are, however, risks in this approach which must be guarded against. I hope that the means of ensuring a proper contribution from industry will be a levy on the relevant industries, since the priorities of public research ought to be determined more disinterestedly than they are likely to be by industry itself negotiating specific contracts. I am aware, too, that the Government are awaiting the advice of the Priorities Board, and that no particular research establishment should assume the worst for itself until the priorities have been made clear. At the same time the NVRS has grounds for the most serious apprehension. It has been asked to prepare large-scale savings, as I have said. The AFRC corporate plan published in December 1983 identified various research areas as being over or under supported or in balance. Vegetable crop research was one of the areas described as being in balance. But then, in August 1984 Lord Belstead said

"We are over three years decreasing our support for agriculture and horticulture work and increasing that on food."

In the debate on 13 March, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary confirmed that "there are likely to be some changes in relative priorities."

—[Official Report, 13 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 413.]

Priorities in research should be kept under review. In the debate on 22 December 1983 my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science alluded to the danger that the pattern of organisation can unduly dictate scientific priorities. I put it to the Minister that, similarly, priorities should not be determined by a notion that the Government have that they can get away with putting in less money by dint of extracting more from industry. The source of the funding should not distort our best judgment as to research priorities.

Overall retrenchment on the scale envisaged would be catastrophic for agricultural and horticultural research. What makes this prospective damage seem so disproportionate and gratuitous is that the figures which are so large in relation to the budgets of these research establishments are small in relation to other budgets. An AFRC budget of £121·6 million in 1984-85, even before it is cut in real terms, represents only 6·8 per cent. of this year's forecast public expenditure of £1,779·8 million under the common agricultural policy and on national grants and subsidies. the AFRC costs taxpayers less than 1 per cent. of the total value of the product of British agriculture. These ratios seem odd at a time when we need to reduce surpluses—where they exist; I have said, there are no vegetable mountains—and when, in the words of Sir Ralph Riley, secretary to the AFRC and a member of the Government's Priorities Board, we must think in terms of

"new objectives for agricultural research in changed economic conditions . . . We require significantly to increase the competitiveness and efficiency of production rather than its volume; to sustain the effective use of land and practise farming in ways that do not offend the increasing "green" sensitivities; and to ensure that the cost of imported food does not become an insupportable burden on our balance of payments when the contribution from oil diminishes."

New crops, new diseases, new market and economic forces, for example, constraints on price support and enlargement of the EEC, and looming environmental and soil structure problems all enhance the importance of research.

At a conference in December my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that his concept of a modern British agriculture was based on four principles: a more competitive British agriculture; British agriculture and the British food industry supplying a larger share of our domestic market; help for farmers to meet changing demands in diet and pesticide control; and greater emphasis on conservation and enhancement of the environment. Agricultural research is an essential prerequisite of all these policies. The work of the NURS specifically underpins each of them.

The National Farmers Union, in its document "The Way Forward" published in December, observed that "the provision of adequate funds for horticulural research, development and advice is vital."

They have expressed themselves to me as being "extremely concerned" at the present position.

I do not propose to enter into what I take to be an unproductive debate about whether by one measure or another the United Kingdom is spending more or less than other countries on agricultural and horticultural research. I hope I have made the crucial point that such research is an investment in the vital interests of our country and, that, if anything, we need more of it.

In conclusion therefore I ask my hon. Friend to answer these questions. Will he and his right hon. and hon. Friends recognise the irreparable damage that the proposed cuts, if not restored, will do to the research services in agriculture and horticulture? Will Ministers therefore take steps to ensure that the food, horticultural and agricultural industries provide funds for research which will at least make up the shortfall before the Government proceed with the cuts that they envisage? Will Ministers accept that research needs a stable framework of finance and needs to be rescued from the hurly burly of politics? Will my hon. Friend acknowledge that, apart from the personal difficulties and distress that career disruption causes, research is a fragile, creative enterprise? Will he acknowledge that successful research depends upon complete and enthusiastic concentration and that present uncertainties and anxieties are demoralising and liable to be damaging to the quality of research?

I know that my hon. Friend is sympathetic. He is on the record as saying:

"The work done by the research councils and universities in scientific research is of fundamental importance to us all."—[Official Report, 22 December 1983; Vol. 51, c. 624.]

I appreciate that in much of what I have said I have inevitably dealt with matters which are not, at any rate in particular aspects, within my hon. Friend's ministerial province. None the less I hope very much that in answering this debate he will be able to respond constructively to the considerations I have put forward, and that he will give clear and positive answers to the questions that I have put to him.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Peter Brooke): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) for giving the House the opportunity to debate this important matter. I thank him for the serious and sober manner in which he has presented his case. We debate science too little in the House. Every opportunity is therefore to be welcomed, even in the circumstances such as he has described this evening. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for being present tonight on the Front Bench, because the interests of our Departments in agricultural research march together.

The national vegetable research station, which is situated at Wellesbourne in Warwickshire, is a state-aided agricultural research institute which receives its funds through the Agricultural and Food Research Council. The AFRC supports a total of 22 such research institutes in England and Wales, together with seven Scottish agricultural research institutes which are funded by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland. The network of institutes constitutes the agricultural and food research service.

Within the AFRS, the remit of the NVRS is to undertake research on the production of outdoor vegetables, to maintain and where possible improve the competitiveness of United Kingdom vegetable growers, to meet the needs of consumers and to avoid undesirable impacts of production systems on the environment. This is clearly important work, and the NVRS, which was established in 1949, is currently working on a range of essential vegetables including various kinds of beans, sprouts, cabbages, tomatoes and many other familiar vegetables.

I understand that the station has received the Queen's award for technical achievement in recognition of its contribution to onion production in the United Kingdom. The control of a disease known, with accuracy but perhaps infelicity of language, as neck rot has extended the period in which home-grown onions are available. The NVRS's research on the control of fungal disease of oilseed rape, as my hon. Friend said, has also contributed to substantial savings in production costs by the industry, and the station has also done important work on the fluid drilling of pre-germinated seeds and on reducing fertiliser requirements.

I say all that in acknowledgement of the valuable work that the station has done and is continuing to do. Nevertheless, AFRC's decisions about the future funding of the station have to be taken in the light of the council's scientific priorities and of the resources made available to it by the Department—by way of grant in aid from the science budget—and by funds from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which commissions work of a more applied nature of particular and more immediate importance to the industries concerned.

The AFRC is having to address the consequences of reductions in the funding it receives both from the science budget and from the Ministry. The science budget reductions stemmed from the advice given to my right hon. Friend by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils in 1982, and were taken account of in the council's first corporate plan which was published in December 1983. In the light of that plan, and of the council's total resources in 1984-85, which were £46·7 million from the Department and £52·1 million from MAFF, the NVRS's recurrent budget for 1984-85 was set at £2·59 million. This amount was approximately the same in cash terms as the previous year's and thus obviously represented some reduction in terms of the work the station could do. I understand that this reduction in real income was not out of line with reductions elsewhere in the AFRS. As a result, however, 16 posts at the station have been lost this year out of a total complement of 208, 10 of them by compulsory redundancy. My hon. Friend referred to that trend.

Although some of the work which the NVRS does is strategic research paid for out of the science budget, the greater part of the work, about 87 per cent., is commissioned work paid for by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The announcement by my right hon. Friend, the Minister for Agriculture, on 22 January, that the agriculture Departments' research and development budgets are to be reduced in 1986-87 and 1987-88, will almost certainly mean that further reductions will have to be made in AFRS research programmes. The NVRS, with its high proportion of commissioned work, can hardly expect to escape from having to bear a share of these. I understand that the agriculture Departments are awaiting the advice of the priorities board, as my hon. Friend mentioned, on how reductions between the various sectors of research and development they support might be apportioned; thus, it is too early to say what the precise effects on NVRS will be.

As my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food said in reply to the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) in the Adjournment debate on 13 March, to which my hon. Friend also referred, the reductions in the Ministry's planned expenditure reflect the Government's intention that industry should contribute financially towards the R and D from which it benefits and be more fully involved in determining the scale and nature of the R and D programme. The extent to which NVRS is successful in attracting funding from industry will clearly also have a bearing on the quantum of work which will in future be sustainable at the station. In this regard, I would note that, hitherto at least, it has not been the council's practice to reduce allocations to institutes on account of their having been successful in attracting outside funding. I understand that the council has no plans at present to change this practice, which clearly provides a valuable incentive to enterprise.

In the meantime, the AFRC published earlier this month its second corporate plan, covering the period 1985-90. The new plan notes that the programme of restructuring started in 1984 will continue. It cannot, of course, yet quantify the effects of any further reductions in activity brought about as a result of the loss of commissioning funds from MAFF.

With regard to horticultural research, the second corporate plan announces a review of this area of work aimed at improving the operational efficiency of AFRS programmes through unified management and by strenghtening links with MAFF's Agricultural Development and Advisory Service. I understand that the review is looking at all horticultural research in the AFRS —the total value of which is some £9 million annually —with a view to seeking reductions of the order of 18 per cent., a figure quoted by my hon. Friend. This review, which is being conducted by a working party headed by Professor John Harper, FRS, will advise the AFRC plants and soils research committee and, through it, the council, on how best rationalisation and savings can be achieved. The institutes mainly concerned, apart from the NVRS, are East Malling research station and the Glasshouse Crops Research Institute. I understand that there has been detailed consultation with the directors concerned in drawing up a proposed strategy which will be considered by AFRC's council in April. The advice of the Priorities Board for Agriculture and Food R and D will, of course, be taken fully into account as this exercise develops.

For the immediate future, I understand that the council has allocated NVRS a provisional recurrent budget of £2·58 million for 1985-86, recognising that this represents a further reduction in terms of the work the station will be able to do. No assessment of the number of further job losses has been made, nor indeed will that be possible until the overall financial position and the priorities of research in 1986-87 are clearer. When that point is reached, I understand that AFRC aims to make a statement outlining its strategy in the various areas of research for which it is responsible.

I should like to clarify and stress the fact that, in terms of the reductions in funding to which my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food referred, it is £10 million in the first year — 1986-87 — and a further £10 million in 1987-88. The £20 million is a cumulative figure embracing the two years.

My hon. Friend also referred to levies. Ministers will wish to consider the full range of possible options and methods of funding, and would not, therefore, want to exclude any options, including levies, at this stage, although they raise special difficulties.

My hon. Friend also asked about industry funding and the timing of the reductions contingent upon that funding. The agriculture Ministers are considering industry funding of research and development and have asked for the views of the priorities board on how this might be done. The Government's view is that it is not unreasonable for industry to bear a part of the cost of a service from which it benefits, as my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary said last week. When the priorities board has given its advice, agriculture Ministers will consult the industry about the mechanisms which might be appropriate for securing its greater involvement. Ministers do not embark on this exercise with any predetermined areas for industry support in mind.

As to timing, while I cannot give my hon. Friend the assurance which he sought, I would emphasise that my right hon. Friend's announcement on 22 January does not envisage any reduction in planned expenditure in 1985-86, and the full reduction is not due to take effect until 1987-88. It is considered that this will allow adequate time to take the necessary decisions and to consult the industry on how it can be fully involved in the funding of the research effort.

I wholly sympathise with those whose job it is to plan and conduct research in times of financial difficulty and some inevitable uncertainty. I recognise that it is not easy to sustain high morale among staff, especially the scientists, whose energy and creativity is the essence of a successful research enterprise such as that conducted at NVRS. Changes of the order of those currently in progress in AFRC present practical and personal problems as well as opportunities. The Department is doing what it can to ease the transition to a lower level of science budget funding. The ARFC's grant in aid for 1985-86 of £50·3 million includes an element of £4·8 million to assist with necessary restructuring.

I repeat that the implications of the reductions in the agriculture Departments' research and development budgets have yet to be considered, both from the point of view of the future work programme of the NVRS and more generally. The Departments concerned with the ARFC are urgently considering this matter so as to allow the consequential implementation to proceed smoothly. The House is not so full tonight that my hon. Friend can have missed the scale of advice available to me on the periphery of the Chamber from among all the interested parties, and that in itself is an index of the importance we attach to, and the concern we all feel for, an orderly process.

I echo the views expressed by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary in the debate on 13 March, when she pointed out that, even with the reductions which are now taking effect or are in prospect, the Government will still be making a major contribution to agricultural research. I have no reason to suppose that this will not apply equally to research on vegetables, which is the business of NVRS, as elsewhere.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL FINANCE

Value Added Tax

1. Mr. Beith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of value added tax on building alterations to village halls and community centres since its imposition in 1984.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Rees): Information is not held in a form which would allow such an assessment to be made.

Mr. Beith: Does that mean that the Chief Secretary does not realise that the village halls which are maintained by voluntary local effort, rather than those which are provided by local councils and are VAT exempt, are bearing this burden? As many were built before the war or soon after it and will need building alterations, would it not have been a better Budget if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had announced that he would stop raiding jumble sale proceeds and let village halls use their money to maintain their buildings by voluntary effort?

Mr. Rees: Not only do some village halls benefit from the community programme, but direct grants from central Government to charities — I assume that the hon. Gentleman regards them, properly, as being charities— have increased to £180 million in 1983-84.

Counter-Inflation Policy

3. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about counter-inflation policy.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): Since 1980 inflation has fallen from 20 per cent. to 5 per cent.—the lowest level since the 1960s. In my Budget statement I reaffirmed the Government's commitment to continue the drive against inflation through sound monetary policies.

Mr. Jones: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on re-stating his commitment not only to maintain his drive against inflation but to reduce and eliminate it entirely. Does he agree that a counter-inflation policy is a counter-unemployment policy, and that there is ample evidence at home and abroad of the destructive effects on jobs of inflation?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. It is a significant fact that successive Governments since the war have presided over higher levels of inflation and higher levels of unemployment at the same time. This Government have succeeded for the first time in getting the level of inflation down. That is a sound basis, coupled with the other measures that we have taken on the supply side, for dealing with the serious problem of unemployment.

Dr. Marek: Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer agree that the measure of monetary growth is not the only factor which determines inflation? Does he accept that he should be able to devise a policy to reduce unemployment through a certain amount of capital spending which, incidentally, would have the beneficial effect of ensuring that our infrastructure does not rot to pieces?

Mr. Lawson: I entirely reject the suggestion that our infrastructure is rotting to pieces. We are substantially increasing expenditure on roads, and on the sewers and water industry generally. If reducing unemployment were simply a matter of increasing Government spending, there would be no unemployment anywhere in the world today because there is nothing easier than for a Government to spend other people's money.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Would my right hon. Friend care to speculate on how much inflation would be fuelled if this afternoon the building societies foolishly and short-sightedly increased rates for mortgages?

Mr. Lawson: An increase in mortgage rates—that is obviously entirely a matter for building societies and has nothing to do with the Government—would in the short run cause an increase in the retail prices index. Over the medium term it would not have any effect on inflation.

Mr. Hattersley: Will the Chancellor expand on that answer a little? Will he tell us, because he must know, how much the retail prices index has already been increased by building society increases announced this year? How much will be added to it by the increase which we fear will happen today or tomorrow? Having given those figures, will he confirm that the increase in mortgage repayments endured by most householders this year will more than take up the amount which they might have received in tax reductions through his Budget?

Mr. Lawson: It is an impertinence for the right hon. Gentleman to address the Government about the problem of inflation. While he was in office—he was Secretary of State for Prices and Consumer Protection—inflation never came anywhere near as low as it is at present. It will stay low and get lower.

Mr. Stern: Does my right hon. Friend agree that even after the Government's success in reducing the rate of inflation, the fact remains that at present levels of inflation a person who starts his career today and invests £1 would, on his retirement, receive a capital refund of less than 12½p? Does he therefore agree that bringing down the rate of inflation even further remains a primary aim of the Government?

Mr. Lawson: I agree with my hon. Friend. Ensuring stable prices, or as near stable as we can possibly get, is the greatest social service that any Government can provide.

Exchange Rate Policy (Report)

4. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to reply to the fifth report of the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on exchange rate policy.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I refer the hon. Gentleman to what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said about the exchange rate in his Budget statement.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why should the Government have intervened when the pound fell below $1·10?

Mr. Stewart: Intervention in exchange markets was discussed in the G5 meeting, when it was decided that co-ordinated intervention by several Governments might be useful as and when conditions made that necessary.

Mr. Maples: Does my hon. Friend agree that a period of sustained dollar weakness might cause just as many problems as the recent dollar strength? Might it not now be in our interest to participate fully in the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS?

Mr. Stewart: I am not too sure about the relationship between the two parts of my hon. Friend's question. I do not believe that under present conditions it would be right for us to join the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS. With regard to the weakness of the dollar to which he has referred, it might be a little early to pass judgment on that phenomenon.

Tax Bill

5. Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much higher the total tax bill will be in real terms comparing 1985-86 to 1978-79.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): It is expected to be £27·6 billion higher at 1984-85 prices.

Mr. Pike: Would the Government not have done better to use that money to get people back into real jobs and to deal with the infrastructure problem rather than have to face the ever-increasing burden of unemployment that results from Government policies?

Mr. Moore: As my right hon. Friend said a few seconds ago, capital expenditure in this country is running at the record level of over £55 billion.

Mr. Meadowcroft: In a written answer before the Budget the Minister said that a single person had to be earning £23,000 a year before he was paying less tax than in 1979. What is the figure for the same single person since the Budget?

Mr. Moore: I should plainly need notice to give a detailed answer. If the hon. Gentleman had been with us during our debate last evening he would have heard me give illustrations of people on half, average, one and a half and twice average earnings, and how they are all substantially better off than they were five years ago.

Mr. Nicholls: It it not misleading and useless to talk about increased tax burdens without considering the relationship of a person in work and his standard of living compared with the rate of inflation? Is it not about time for Opposition Members to stop bleating about a tax burden while calling for increased public expenditure?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend is not only precisely right in all that he said, but he brings clearly to the House the recognition that inflation is a far greater scourge for those who have saved and those on limited incomes. The impact of inflation on their pockets has been greater than taxation.

Dr. McDonald: How does the Financial Secretary square the claim by the Foreign Secretary when he was electioneering in Oxford in April 1979 that every Labour Government put taxes up and every Conservative Government get taxes down, with the fact that the tax burden has increased by £26 billion between 1978-79 and 1985-86, and that only half of that is due to oil revenues? The present Budget will increase the tax burden by £3·5 billion. Is this not another example of broken promises by the Tories?

Mr. Moore: As I am sure those hon. Members who were present last night will remember, I pointed out that the taxes which have gone down — those on the employer — which are critical to the creation of jobs have to be taken into account, together with the ways in which the Government have radically reduced inflation by ensuring that honest taxation is preferable to the excessive borrowing levels of the last Labour Government.

Savings Ratio

7. Mr. Wainwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he estimates to be the prevailing savings ratio for the current year; and whether he expects a higher ratio in 1985-86

Mr. Ian Stewart: Figures so far available for 1984-5 show a personal saving ratio of around 10½ per cent.

Mr. Wainwright: Will the Economic Secretary be good enough to answer the second part of my question: does he expect a higher ratio in 1985-86? If he does not, why is the Treasury so supine in the light of a declining savings ratio? Is he not aware that in the United States the public tend to save more when inflation is low? Will he reflect on the successful French experience of the last seven years of tax incentives for the public to invest in industrial shares?

Mr. Stewart: I shall certainly answer the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question. I left it out in the interest of brevity. As is explained in paragraph 342 of part III of the Financial Statement and Budget Report, there will possibly be a small increase in the savings ratio during the coming year but it is unlikely to have any very substantial effect. As for the relationship between the savings ratio in this country and that in the United States, whatever the hon. Gentleman may say, the ratio of savings in the United States is very much lower than it is in this country. In fact, in this country the savings ratio has been above these levels only when inflation has been very high. I am glad to say that inflation has now come down.

Mr. Eggar: Does the lack of any change on the taxation of pensions in the Budget mean that my right hon. and hon. Friends are happy about the very high proportion of savings that are channelled through institutional means?

Mr. Stewart: We believe that savings should be channelled through both institutional means and direct investment. Many of the measures that we have taken should encourage direct investment by private individuals.

Budget

8. Mr. Winnick asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received regarding his Budget statement.

Mr. Moore: Several.

Mr. Winnick: Is not unemployment likely to be higher this time next year than it is now? If so, does it not show how irrelevant is the Budget to the the situation that faces the country? Bearing in mind the increases that are due to take place in gas, electricity, mortgages, rates and prescription charges, why does the Minister not admit that after the Budget most people will be worse off rather than better off?

Mr. Moore: The House might be more interested in the remarks of the director-general of the Confederation of British Industry, who suggested, when commenting on the Budget, that the Chancellor has got it right, that interest rates should fall because the Chancellor is getting a grip on inflation and on borrowing, and that this Budget ought to be good for growth and for jobs, which is the essence of the point that the hon. Gentleman is seeking to make. It is some kind of cheek for the Opposition to refer to gas and electricity prices, when during their last period in office gas and electricity prices increased by 2 per cent. every six weeks.

Mr. George Gardiner: While accepting all that my hon. Friend said, has it yet been represented to him that the Chancellor's proposals regarding employers' national insurance contributions on higher income earners could have a penal effect on those very enterprising firms which pay out their profits in the form of salaries to owner-directors? Will my hon. Friend turn his attention to this point to see whether he and the Chancellor can avoid hitting some of those very firms which they are seeking to encourage?

Mr. Moore: Some people have drawn our attention to that point, although not in quite those terms. However, there are far more, including the CBI, who have so far recognised the benefits and potential for those at the bottom end of the earnings scale, who may be given considerable opportunities by the recommended reconstruction of national insurance contributions.

Mr. Bidwell: In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) the Minister said that he had received several representations. That does not really tell us what the volume of representations has been. Is not the truth of the matter that they are coming in daily, and that although he has not yet reckoned them up they are obviously considerable?

Mr. Moore: I thought, two days after the Budget, that it would be most convenient for the House if I simply indicated that several representations had been received. Of course, many more will be coming in. I could cite other comments that have been equally supportive of the Budget, such as the comment by the Institute of Directors [Interruption.] Those who have some recognition of the problem of trying to offer people work, which I thought was of some interest to Opposition Members, said that my right hon. Friend

"has skilfully squeezed a wide range of employment and enterprise measures from a limited range of resources."

Mr. Stokes: Is my hon. Friend aware that he should not listen too closely to everything that the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) says? Is he further aware that yesterday I spent a day in the west midlands visiting a very large factory and did not receive a single complaint about the Budget?

Mr. Moore: I always listen with considerable care to my hon. Friend. I know that he will be reassured when I remind him that the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) was my losing opponent in the October 1974 election.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: The Financial Secretary seems to expect a big reduction in unemployment as a result of the changes in national insurance contributions, but will he take into account the fact that they will cost only £450 million in a full year, whereas the reduction in the national insurance surcharge cost £900 million last year, and even more the year before? That did not do very much good for unemployment.

Mr. Moore: The right hon. Gentleman should not underestimate the size of the reconstruction. It is a question not simply of the Government's overall contribution to the restructuring of national insurance contributions but of the redistributive effect of the £800 million odd that comes from the upper income limit. Some people are already criticising, but that makes a total of about £1·2 billion.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Have any representations been received from the building societies? If so, has my hon. Friend suggested that they might follow the example of the banks and lower their rates rather than increase them?

Mr. Moore: As far as I know, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not received any representations, but I shall certainly draw his attention to that point.

Mr. Blair: If we accept the Financial Secretary's protestations that this is, indeed, a Budget for jobs, are we agreed that,, if by the time of the next Budget there has not been a significant reduction in unemployment this Budget will be accepted as a failure?

Mr. Moore: I was not asked for my protestations. I was asked about what representations I had received. I referred to the representations of two of the major employers' organisations in the country. I could refer to others, such as the Associaton of British Chambers of Commerce, which said that the Budget was a fair and competent package.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

9. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of the public sector borrowing requirement for the coming year.

Mr. Peter Rees: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer indicated in his Budget statement, we have set the PSBR at £7 billion, equivalent to 2 per cent. of GDP.

Mr. Hamilton: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that that news has been greeted with some acclaim in the City, and that it is good news for industry in this country in general, and in particular for manufacturing industry? After all, it holds out the prospect of lower interest rates and a stabilising of the currency.

Mr. Rees: I am grateful for those comments. The figures certainly signalled to the world outside that the Government are still on course and pursuing a sound financial policy that will be of considerable benefit to the economy.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: In that case, might it not have been more accurate to describe the Budget as a Budget for the City rather than for jobs? If the PSBR target and the other figures in the Budget strategy represent a Budget for jobs, how is it that the impact of the Budget on the economy will not be deflationary?

Mr. Rees: If the hon. Gentleman considers the growth record of the past four or five years and the prediction of growth for the coming year, he will realise that his strictures are wide of the mark.

Mr. Hugh Brown: Will the Chief Secretary say how much of the forecast public expenditure for next year will be due to capital receipts from the sale of council houses, and does he now know what the Labour party policy is on that matter?

Mr. Rees: Without notice, I am afraid that I cannot give the projected receipts.

The hon. Gentleman asks me about Labour party policy. With notice. I derive my knowledge from the Labour manifesto, which states that Labour will:

"End enforced council house sales, empower public landlords to repurchase homes sold under the Tories".

Public Expenditure

10. Mr. Maude asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the real percentage increase in total public expenditure in each year from 1979; and what is the anticipated real level of public expenditure for the forthcoming five years.

Mr. Peter Rees: In real terms the year-on-year percentage increases in the public expenditure planning total since 1979-80 have been 1·5, 2·7, 1·6, 1·6 and 3·2. This last figure, which relates to the year now ending, reflects coal strike costs, without which it would have been 1·2 per cent.

Mr. Maude: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that there is widespread concern that the planning totals have consistently been exceeded, that those totals were too high to begin with, and that it is essential to have some reduction in real terms if we are to have real tax cuts in future?

Mr. Rees: I understand my hon. Friend's concern. Provided that we contain public expenditure within the planning totals, and on the basis that there will be growth in the economy, I hope that my right hon. Friend will have increased scope for making the tax cuts that my hon. Friends all want.

Mr. Gordon Wilson: In view of the very small increases in public expenditure to which the Chief Secretary has referred, is he aware that in Scotland this year rates will rise by about 20 per cent. because of a drop in rate support grant authorised by his Department and also because of revaluation? If he is approached by the Secretary of State for Scotland for more money to ease the problems of domestic and commercial ratepayers, will he make more money available for that purpose?

Mr. Rees: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has made his position clear on that point. The hon. Gentleman is right to emphasise the fact that the increases are at least partly due to the domestic revaluation.

Mr. Dorrell: In his concern to restrict the future growth of public expenditure, will my right hon. and learned Friend remember that important services such as health and education are, for the vast majority of the electors, provided exclusively out of the public sector, and that therefore it would be quite wrong artificially to hold down the level of those services because they happen to fall in the public, rather than the private, sector?

Mr. Rees: I do not entirely accept my hon. Friend's analysis. He and the whole House will realise that there have been real increases in both programmes since we came to office.

Value Added Tax

11. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will transfer the responsibility for value added tax from Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Moore: No, Sir. When VAT was introduced in 1972 Customs and Excise was responsible for managing purchase tax, one of the taxes replaced by VAT, and the decision to introduce VAT in the United Kingdom on a transaction basis, rather than an accounts basis, was finally decisive in favour of laying the administration of VAT to Customs and Excise rather than to the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Will the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that, in relation to tax, businesses have to concern themselves with two very different types of Government Department, and that Customs and Excise is acknowledged to have far less knowledge of the workings of business and to be far less flexible in dealing with the real problems currently faced by businesses?

Mr. Moore: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's reservations. The taxes are very different in kind. The needs are different and so are the methods of collection. I am confident that Customs and Excise exercises its authority in this matter in a proper way.

Mr. Stern: Does my hon. Friend agree that the suggestion implicit in the question would be a retrograde step, if only because the record of Customs and Excise on making its rules and regulations available to the public has recently been rather better than that of the Inland Revenue?

Mr. Moore: I do not accept my hon. Friend's latter point, but I agree that the suggestion would be a retrograde step for the taxpayer, the country and the administration of the Revenue and Customs and Excise.

Treasury Model Computer Programme

13. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in the light of recent experience, he will change the assumptions upon which the Treasury model computer programme is based in regard to lower wages and job creativity.

Mr. Peter Rees: No, Sir.

Mr. Atkinson: Does the Treasury understand that those who advise the Chancellor assume that the lowest paid in manufacturing industry produce the lowest unit labour costs, and that if wages in the public sector go down 10 per cent. in aggregate that will increase employment prospects by 10 per cent.? Will the Chief Secretary review those assumptions and come to some better understanding, if policy is to make sense?

Mr. Rees: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we review the Treasury model's operations fairly regularly. If he is doubtful about the assumptions that are fed in, he is quite at liberty to feed in his own assumptions and have a go on the model himself.

Sir Anthony Meyer: As full industrial employment in the old-fashioned sense is unlikely to return under Governments of whatever colour, if only because of technological change, and as it is better for people to have a part-time job than no job at all, should not the Government take pride in the fact that this is a Budget for part-time jobs?

Mr. Rees: Whether part-time or full-time, we take pride in the fact that this is a Budget for jobs. A range of measures, many of which my right hon. and hon. Friends have drawn attention to, such as the restructuring of national insurance contributions, the raising of thresholds and improvements and additions to the youth training scheme and the community programme, all demonstrate that it is a Budget for full-time and part-time jobs.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Chief Secretary aware that unemployment has gone up ever since the Treasury model was installed? Would it not be a good idea to get rid of this computer? Was it developed by Tycom—like the one which the Conservatives used but found they had to get rid of?

Mr. Rees: I regret to say that I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman whether it is a Tycom model. However, the basic thrust of our policies depends on sound common sense and a grasp of basic economic principles. We do not need the refinements of the Treasury model to assist us there.

Mr. Budgen: Does the Treasury model show that a high proportion of people who are paid large wages are employed by big firms? Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that big firms have recently enjoyed a considerable increase in liquidity and profitability—as is shown by the high level of shares on the Stock Exchange—and that the change in the employers' contribution is unlikely to cause any increase in unemployment among rich people?

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friend has perceptively summed up the matter, as is so often the case.

Interest Rates

14. Mr. Weetch asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the recent rise in interest rates and their effect on industry.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Without the rise in interest rates there would have been a risk of a return to inflationary conditions, threatening the prospects for industry and for continued growth.

Mr. Weetch: Is the Economic Secretary aware that the minimum lending rate of 13·5 per cent. is a major constraint on British industry and commerce and stands four square in the way of any substantial industrial expansion? Does he agree that, with an inflation rate of 5 per cent. and a minimum lending rate of 13·5 per cent., real rates of interest in Britain are about the highest that they have ever been in the past 50 years? What are the prospects for interest rates coming down so that British industry might have a less crippling rate for the price of money?

Mr. Stewart: I am glad to be able to say that interest rates are now lower than when the hon. Gentleman tabled his question. British industry has been doing very satisfactorily.

"Interest rates should fall because he is keeping a grip on inflation and on borrowing."

Those are the words of Sir Terence Beckett of the Confederation of British Industry.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: Does my hon. Friend agree that the best way to keep interest rates low is to reduce the competition for scarce funds from the public sector and allow the private sector to create jobs by spending more money?

Mr. Stewart: I have no doubt that my hon. Friend is correct to point out that the higher budget deficit which is involved in higher public expenditure places a strain on interest rates and therefore causes damage to the private sector.

Mr. Haynes: Does the Minister not realise that the people sitting on the Treasury Bench are absolutely useless, except for the Lord Privy Seal and the Whip? Is he aware that his Government are hitting industries in my constituency in two ways, because a number of them are dependent upon contracts in the public sector, and at the same time he is banging up interest rates? They are still going to be laying people off, and yet they say that they are a Government who create jobs for people so that they can work. What is he going to say about that?

Mr. Stewart: I am going to tell the hon. Gentleman that inflation destroys jobs and that the policy of this Government is to maintain monetary conditions which continue to bring down inflation.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Budget at least gives great encouragement to the banks to lower their interest rates because of financial rectitude? Was he not disappointed by the timid approach of the banks in cutting interest rates by only 0·5 per cent.? Is it not time that the banks stopped making their money out of home industry and losing it overseas, and instead reduced their interest rates at home?

Mr. Stewart: I was glad to see that the banks reduced their base rates, and that, of course, has now been validated in the markets. If and when conditions are such that monetary constraint can be maintained at lower levels of interest rates, that will be very welcome.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Minister convinced that if interest rates were to be reduced by 1 per cent. that would have a detrimental effect on the dollar-sterling exchange rate?

Mr. Stewart: The dollar-sterling exchange rate is influenced by many factors other than the level of sterling interest rates because it is measured against many other currencies as well. I believe that we should maintain short-term interest rates in this country at the level required to deliver the monetary conditions and the pressure against inflation, which is Government policy.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend share my sense of mystery as to how Opposition Members can praise the United States approach to budget deficits as an explanation for growth but be unable to recognise that the United States economy can still flourish with the differential between money and the real interest rates of the United States economy?

Mr. Stewart: There are many contradictions in the Opposition's interpretation of financial affairs in the United States. We must all recognise that the large deficits in the United States have caused problems for many other countries and may well cause problems for the United States as well.

Mr. Wainwright: In view of the public uncertainty and concern about the Government's policies on interest rates, will the Economic Secretary elucidate the bald but very pregnant sentence in his right hon. Friend's Budget speech in which he said, without explanation, that he was increasing the provision in public expenditure figures for future years for debt interest?

Mr. Stewart: I thought that that was very clearly expressed by my right hon. Friend. It was a realistic assessment in the light of current projections for interest rates. If interest rates turn out to be lower than we have projected, we shall all be very glad about the public expenditure consequences of that. But, since it is the prime purpose of our monetary policy to maintain monetary conditions to bring down inflation, we have to accept that that has a cost in interest rates as well.

Budget (Income Tax)

15. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many taxpayers are no longer liable for income tax as a result of his recent Budget.

Mr. Lawson: Some 800,000 people on low incomes, 100,000 of them widows, who would have paid tax if I had not raised personal allowances will pay no tax at all in 1985-86.

Mr. Carlisle: That is an encouraging figure. The raising of tax thresholds by twice the rate of inflation, combined with the reductions in national insurance contributions, will be of real help to those on low pay. Will my right hon. Friend now address himself with urgency to the further measures that are required to eliminate the poverty and unemployment traps?

Mr. Lawson: Yes, indeed. It has been a constant objective of the Government, both under my predecessor as Chancellor and myself, to reduce the effect of these traps, and particularly the employment trap. Thresholds have now risen by more than 20 per cent. in real terms over what they were under Labour. My hon. Friend is right to direct attention to the restructuring of the national insurance contributions system, the first time that such restructuring has ever been done, and I believe that it will have a very helpful effect indeed where unemployment is at its most severe.

Mr. Fisher: Is the Chancellor aware that tax thresholds have risen by 10 times more than child benefit has risen over the period? Is he aware that a rise in child benefit is the only way to help the 500,000 working families with children, whom tax thresholds do not help at all?

Mr. Lawson: Tax thresholds help families with children, just as they help the single and those without children, whereas an increase in child benefit helps only those with children. It is a matter of judgment as to where the Government put their limited resources. I am confident that a reduction in taxation is the best way to help the economy grow and prosper.

Mrs. Currie: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that 260,000 of those who will no longer be paying tax as a result of the Budget are over working age? Does he agree that, apart from a few well-paid pensioners, such as certain Opposition Members, the Chancellor and the Treasury should, on the whole, keep their sticky fingers off the pensions that people have worked so hard to provide for themselves?

Mr. Lawson: I am not sure whether my hon. Friend is praising the extent to which tax reliefs have gone to the elderly or whether she regards what has been done as excessive. The elderly benefit from the changes in the Budget. It is extraordinary for the Opposition to maintain that the proposals in the Budget concerning national insurance were derived from the Labour party manifesto. Following what the Leader of the Opposition said about that, I looked into the matter and found that all that they said in their manifesto was that the upper earnings limit for employees should be abolished. That was the one thing that I conspicuously refrained from doing.

Mr. Hattersley: Will the Chancellor now answer the question which he refused to answer half an hour ago? Will he confirm that if the mortgage rate is increased in the coming 24 hours, for most house owners the increase in mortgage repayments this year will more than exceed any reduction in their income tax?

Mr. Lawson: That is a typically confused calculation —[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."]—because the benefits in income tax terms will last for the entire year whereas the extra burden in mortgage interest will last for only so long as the mortgage interest rate is higher—which will be considerably less than a year.

Mr. Yeo: Does my right hon. Friend agree that while it is advantageous for many thousands of people no longer to be liable for tax, even more welcome is the fact that many people who were earning too small a sum to be liable for tax will benefit from the reduction in employees' national insurance contributions?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It also makes an important difference to the relationship between earnings in work and income out of work. That was an important aspect that we had to change for the better, and that is what the Budget has done.

Budget (Job Creation)

16. Mr. Fatchett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the effect of his Budget proposals on the level of unemployment.

Mr. Lawson: The Budget proposals will substantially improve the prospects for jobs without taking any risks with inflation.

Mr. Fatchett: Will the Chancellor predict the extent to which unemployment will fall before he presents his next Budget to the House?

Mr. Lawson: It is most unwise to make predictions about the precise level of unemployment — [Interruption.]—because it depends on the behaviour of people — of trade unions, workers, employers and managers — throughout the economy. As the hon. Gentleman will know, the community programme enlargement alone will produce 100,000 more jobs.

Mr. Spencer: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in one youth training scheme in Leicester for clerical trainees the success rate is 77 per cent. and that in another scheme for catering trainees it is 80 per cent.? Does he agree that more youth training places mean more employment?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. The youth training scheme has been a conspicuous success. That is why we are proposing an extension of it, provided that employers are prepared to pay an adequate share of the bill, as I am sure they will be. Of course, nowhere has the youth training scheme been a greater success than in Leicester.

PRIME MINISTER

Q1. Mr. Budgen asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity today to make a speech about wages councils? Will she explain that it is unlikely that many people will take jobs at rates below the level that would be given to them by supplementary benefit? Will she further give the House and the country the leadership that we have come to expect from her? Will she explain that she is not in favour of a fudge and that she shares the preference of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for complete abolition?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has made the point very effectively himself. The consultative document on wages councils will be out later today. I believe with my hon. Friend that, especially for young people, lower wages would mean more jobs. Those who are interested in solving unemployment will, I believe, follow that course of action.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister aware that the 1 per cent. rise in mortgage rates announced this afternoon will cause very grave hardship to millions of home-buying families? Because of that, will the right hon. Lady support those building society chiefs who favour a system for setting mortgage rates which is more rational and more stable than the present system, which follows short-term market fluctuations?

The Prime Minister: Yes of course I regret the 1 per cent. rise in mortgage rates, but I think that the building societies must be the best judge of the rates necessary to get in sufficient money to enable them to continue to meet the demand for mortgages.

Mr. Kinnock: Does not even the Prime Minister, who heads this high mortgage Government—[Interruption.] That is absolutely true. The mortgage rate has never been in single figures since this Government came into power. Does not even the Prime Minister understand the immense anxieties of families with a mortgage of £20,000, whose rates of repayment have gone up by over £30 a month since last summer alone? Does she think it is right that families paying mortgages should be the victims of short-term speculation by big money speculators? If she does not, will she take steps to introduce a system that will mean that mortgage payers can enjoy greater stability and greater security in the price that they pay for their houses?

The Prime Minister: Building societies can only lend money that has been lent to them. There are some 14 million or 15 million people who put their savings in building societies. They can choose where their savings go. The building societies have to pay a rate of interest that will attract the savings of 14 million-15 million people into building societies rather than elsewhere, otherwise there would not be money for mortgages. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman is so concerned. I hope that he will also consider the need to keep down rates to counteract the increase in mortgages.

Mr. Kinnock: The rise in mortgage repayments that has taken place under the right hon. Lady in just the last year is bigger than almost any rate that ordinary people who are buying their houses have to pay. If the right hon. Lady is so concerned, why does she not use the powers of the Government to help the building societies, because public money would then be literally as safe as houses and people could have a stable rate of payment for their mortgages?

The Prime Minister: I repeat that the building societies have to attract the savings of the people. The people have the choice where to put their savings. It is important that the building societies have enough money to lend out on mortgage. If the right hon. Gentleman had his way, there would be far fewer owner-occupiers in any event.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. Friend reassure pensioners that she is looking to local authorities to continue concessionary bus passes and to improve the efficiency of their local bus services?

The Prime Minister: We have made provision for that in London, but outside London it will be up to local authorities to decide.

Dr. Owen: Is it not extraordinary that the Chief of Defence Procurement cannot be shown the documents affecting a £200 million contract? Is it not extraordinary that he was a political adviser who was then illegally appointed to be a permanent civil servant? Is it not time that the Prime Minister withdrew that appointment and did not continue to compromise the integrity of the Civil Service in the way that she has done?

The Prime Minister: The integrity of the Civil Service has not been compromised. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would agree with many people who think that it is right that there should be more interchange between business and the Civil Service. It is often thought that that is one of the ways of increasing the knowledge of the Civil Service of business and how it works. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, permission has been given by the commissioners of the Civil Service for the appointment, which has now taken effect.

Mr. Adley: Did my right hon. Friend hear the extraordinary comments of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who sought to equate the cost of what he called fighting the miners with the amount of money available for tax reductions? Is it not clear that the right hon. Gentleman and the Labour party could not recognise a principle if they saw one? Presumably, on the right hon. Gentleman's thesis, in 1939 it would have been cheaper if we had merely sat on our hands instead of fighting Fascism.

The Prime Minister: I do not know what view—[Interruption.] This Government could never have given in to violence and intimidation, even if the Opposition wanted us to do so.

Mr. Heffer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take points of order later.

Q2. Mr. Fisher asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fisher: Can the Prime Minister clarify the position of YTS and the entitlement to supplementary benefit in the light of the Budget? The Chancellor said that the cost of his YTS plans would be £125 million in 1986-87 and would in part be offset by savings in social security payments. How will those savings be made? Will the right hon. Lady make it clear that there is no intention during the lifetime of her Government or this Parliament to make YTS compulsory and so make savings in that way?

The Prime Minister: There is no change in the arrangements for YTS. Clearly, those who are drawing amounts for YTS will not be drawing supplementary benefit. When the full YTS scheme is in place, I believe that it would be right to say to young people, "You have the choice of a job, education or training." Unemployment should not be an option. That can only be considered when that scheme is in place. I believe that the overwhelming majority of parents and people would agree with me. The hon. Gentleman may prefer unemployment for young people—we do not.

Q3. Mr. George Gardiner asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Gardiner: Now that the fears of all those in company pension schemes have been allayed by the Chancellor, will my right hon. Friend point out to those people that the only threat they face is from a Labour party committed to directing pension fund investments according to the whims of a Labour Government and not with a view to maximising the profits of the members of such funds?

The Prime Minister: Yes, the fact that the threat has been made makes it more unlikely that the Opposition will ever be in a position to carry it out.

Mr. Dormand: What effect will the Budget have on unemployment in the northern region, where unemployment has increased every month since the right hon. Lady's Government came into power, and where the unemployment rate is still the highest in the country outside Northern Ireland? What possible hope can there be for the north in this "do nothing" Budget? Will the right hon. Lady set up an inquiry into the special problems of the northern region?

The Prime Minister: I hope that the north and the north-west will gain from changes in both the YTS and the community programme, which should provide more jobs, particularly for those who have been unemployed for a long time. Although unemployment is very high in the north, indeed it is the highest of all, the wages in that region are also comparatively high. They are the third highest in the country. The two might be related.

4. Mr. Hayes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hayes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the country is faced with a tragic paradox: with, on the one hand, massive unemployment, and, on the other, a tremendous skill shortage? Therefore, will she use all her powers to urge the Manpower Services Commission to set up long-term training for young people, lasting for two years or more, to provide the skills that industry vitally needs?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is correct. In spite of unemployment and massive amounts spent on training, universities and polytechnics, there is a skill shortage. We hope that the measures announced this week, both the switch in the universities to more engineering and technology courses and the extra money for YTS, will result in training young people for some of the jobs that need higher skills. This is the biggest investment in the training of young people that has ever been made.

Mr. Norman Atkinson: The Prime Minister has again reiterated that lower wages means more job creation. How many jobs does she estimate that the chairman of ICI, in taking a 65 per cent. wage increase, will have cost the work force at ICI?

The Prime Minister: ICI has had, as the hon. Gentleman knows, a record year. I hope that he is pleased that it is one of the outstanding companies in Britain. With regard to the link between wages and jobs, between 1974-1984, in the United States earnings were down by 10 per cent. and jobs were up by 21 per cent. In the United Kingdom over the same 10 years, earnings were up by 19 per cent. and jobs were down by 4 per cent. That would seem to show an effectively close link.

Q5. Mrs. Roe asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Roe: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to study the situation in Hackney? Does she agree that if this Labour-controlled council fails to set a rate it will not be able to pay its 7,000 employees, and any claim that it is defending jobs will be seen to be sheer hypocrisy?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. If the council does not set a legal rate the consequences will fall on its staff and the electorate—both of whom the council will be punishing—and possibly on its future as well.

NATO (Equipment)

Q6. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister on how many occasions since 1979 the United Kingdom has availed itself of the provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's agreements with the United States of America for the supply or use of equipment outside the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation area.

The Prime Minister: None, Sir. I know of no NATO arrangements of the kind suggested by the hon. Member.

Mr. Dalyell: Why then, under this agreement, should Mrs. Jeane Kirkpatrick write in The Times on 4 March that precisely such an arrangement made it possible for us to get all the American intelligence that we wanted during the Falklands campaign? When did the right hon. Lady learn from American intelligence of the recall signals on 1 and 2 May from Argentina to the Belgrano? When did she know from American intelligence?

The Prime Minister: The North Atlantic Treaty provides only for mutual defence in the North Atlantic area. Members of the Alliance consult on a wide range of issues inside and outside the treaty area that affect their common interests. Any arrangements made are on a bilateral basis—nothing to do with NATO.

Mr. Heffer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During Question Time the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley)—incidentally, that is where I happened to be, with lots of other people, with the Royal Air Force during the war—suggested that Opposition Members would actually accept a policy of appeasement towards dictators and Facism. May I draw to his attention and the attention of the House——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point for me. The hon. Gentleman must find other methods of drawing the matter to the attention of the House——

Mr. Heffer rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have a particularly heavy day, with two statements, business questions and a long list of speakers who wish to take part in the Budget debate. If it is a point of order that I can answer, I shall do so, but the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) must not try to reply to the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) through a point of order.

Mr. Heffer: Is not the hon. Member for Christchurch misleading the House when he fails to tell hon. Members that it was the Anglo-German Friendship Society, supported by the Conservative party——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an abuse. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to desist. Business questions.

Mr. Heffer: Further to that point of order. Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I gave the hon. Gentleman an opportunity to put a point of order to me, and he is now seeking to extend Question Time because he disagrees with what the hon. Member for Christchurch said.

Mr. Heffer: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is what he is doing.

Mr. Heffer: No.

Mr. Speaker: Put a point of order to me, and I shall deal with it.

Mr. Heffer: I am putting a point of order to you, Mr. Speaker, on the basis that it is your duty to protect the interests of Members of the House. I say that Opposition Members have been deliberately misrepresented because of the statement made by the hon. Member for Christchurch. I believe, in the interests of the House and of honesty, that he should withdraw that statement and learn a bit of history.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Every day we hear things in the House that hon. Members disagree with.

Mr. Heffer: It is a fact.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must find other methods of raising the matter.

Mr. Ryman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Well, Mr. Ryman.

Mr. Ryman: Despite your disdain, Mr. Speaker, I have a genuine point of order, and it is this. Is it or is it not in order during Prime Minister's Question Time for sycophantic Tory Back Benchers to ask a supplementary question that is not within the Prime Minister's responsibility, but is simply for the purpose of making a cheap, partisan point?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that that is a matter for me, either.

Business of the House

3.33 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

Monday 25 March—Conclusion of the debate on the Budget Statement. Motions relating to the National Health Service Charges Amendment Regulations. Motion on the Mineworkers' Pension Scheme (Limit on Contributions) Order.

Tuesday 26 March — Motion for the Easter Adjournment. Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (No. 3) Bill.

Wednesday 27 March—Progress on remaining stages of the Local Government Bill (1st Allotted Day). Motion on the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) (No. 2) Order.

Thursday 28 March—Completion of remaining stages of the Local Government Bill (2nd Allotted Day). Motion on the Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) (Amendment) Order.

Friday 29 March—Private Members' motions.

Monday 1 April—Consideration in Committee on the Interception of Communications Bill. It is expected that the Chairman of Ways and Means will name opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

Mr. Kinnock: Why have not the Government been able to ensure that the debate on the increase in prescription charges is held in prime time? Is it because the Government are so ashamed of the measure that they want to minimise press reporting? What other conceivable reason could there be for having such an important and controversial debate after 11 o'clock on Monday evening?

In the light of the revelations in The Guardian today that the Home Office is pursuing a policy of deliberate delay by establishing long queues of people claiming a legal right to enter Britain from the Indian sub-continent, may I once again press the right hon. Gentleman to provide time for a debate on the report of the Commission for Racial Equality? I have raised this matter with him on several occasions.

On the motion on the Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) (Amendment) Order next Thursday, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that extra time is allocated because it is clear that a large number of right hon. and hon. Members will want to take part?

On a number of occasions I have asked the right hon. Gentleman to announce a debate on the star wars initiative. In the light of the controversy surrounding the Foreign Secretary's statement last Friday, and the subsequent statements by Herr Kohl and Herr Genscher this week, does not the right hon. Gentleman think that it is now high time that we had such a debate in the national interest?

Mr. Biffen: I realise that the motion on Monday evening on prescription charges is of real public interest. However, it is customary to have such a debate at that time of the evening. Certainly, the House has never resiled from recognising the importance of a topic, whatever the time of the day. However, I take note of the right hon. Gentleman's comments.

I accept at once that the right hon. Gentleman has already asked for a debate on the report of the Commission for Racial Equality, and we could pursue that through the usual channels.

The right hon. Gentleman requested that the debate on the Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) (Amendment) Order scheduled for Thursday evening should go beyond what is now prescribed. Again, that is something that we could consider through the usual channels. I recognise that it is a matter of great interest to both sides of the House.

As the right hon. Gentleman knows, no time has been allocated for a specific debate on the star wars issue, but again we could consider that further.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): Does my right hon. Friend remember that last Monday we had a debate on the European Community proposals for the 1985-86 CAP prices? Prior to that debate Mr. Speaker permitted a private notice question which restricted the time for the main debate. In addition, the last time that we debated the CAP was late at night. Does my right hon. Friend propose to give the House the opportunity of a full debate in prime time on the 1985-86 CAP price proposals?

Mr. Biffen: I have to give a direct and disappointing answer to my hon. Friend — no. He may wish to consider the scope offered to him by the debate on Tuesday on the Consolidated Fund Bill.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Does the Leader of the House recognise what wide and progressive policies have been endorsed in another place on such issues as reform of the Official Secrets Act and reform of the electoral system in local government? Will he bring those issues before this House with the guarantee that the Government will be as accommodating to progressive opinion here as they were in another place?

Mr. Biffen: I suppose that the other place has now become the refuge for liberalism, but it is a sad cry from the days of Lloyd George.

More specifically, I must tell the hon. Gentleman that no provision has been made next week for debates upon the topics he mentioned. Nor are such debates immediately foreseen in Government time. However, other occasions may be available to the House.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: The House well knows that I always try to give Back-Bench Members an opportunity to ask business questions, but today we have two statements and an important debate in which many right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part. I shall, therefore, allow business questions to continue until five minutes to 4 o'clock.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the considerable speculation about the future level of the British Broadcasting Corporation licence fee and, indeed, about the future of television and sound broadcasting. May we expect a statement from the Government soon and also a debate on these issues?

Mr. Biffen: I shall refer to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary my hon. Friend's anxiety that a statement should be made about the television licence in the near future. I take note and take account of the interests of the House in how we next proceed to consider the matter of the televising of this place.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): To revert to the question of immigration control raised by my right hon. Friend the leader of the Opposition, does the Leader of the House accept that the allegations made today that entry clearance procedures are being deliberately rigged, effectively setting up quotas for those entitled to come to this country, are extremely serious? Will he therefore ensure that the usual channels work extremely quickly to enable Home Office Ministers to come to the House to defend their actions of the past 18 months?

Mr. Biffen: I shall draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to the hon. Gentleman's point about the report in The Guardian today.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill passed its Committee stage in the early hours of this morning after more than 30 hours of consideration in Committee, and now awaits further examination by the House on Report? Can my right hon. Friend assure me and the House that no exceptional measures will be taken to assist the progress of the Bill in view of the Government's declared neutrality on the issue?

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure that officially I yet know of these transactions. However, I should like to emphasise that on Second Reading the Government's position was one of neutrality, and there it stands.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does not the Leader of the House think that there should be an urgent debate about the position facing rate-capped authorities, and that the Secretary of State for the Environment, as he is apparently not prepared to talk to the representatives of rate-capped authorities, should explain to the House why the Government have selected the poorest inner city areas for vindictive action to destroy their services and damage the democracy that brought those services to them?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman would be well advised to seek to make the speech that he has in mind during the debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill on Tuesday.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Southwark, South): In view of the fact that the interests of thousands of children are now being severely damaged by the teachers' strike and that in consequence the esteem in which the teaching profession is held is declining, will my right hon. Friend consider giving an opportunity for debating the problem on the Floor of the House?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes a pertinent point in the general public debate. I must say to him, as I said to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), that the Consolidated Fund Bill provides precisely the circumstances for the contribution that he might seek to make.

Mr. Willie. W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) raised a point which I support. Is the Leader of the House aware that in the Second Reading debate on the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill the Government made it clear that they wished to introduce their own comprehensive Bill to deal with the Warnock committee's recommendations? In the light of that, will he give an assurance that on no account will the Government provide time to facilitate the passage of a private Member's Bill which would run counter to their own policies?

Mr. Biffen: I gave a clear answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch). I cannot go beyond that.

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): My right hon. Friend will remember writing to me kindly offering time for a debate on youth affairs. This being International Youth Year, can he offer a date for that debate?

Mr. Biffen: I regret to say that I cannot, but I shall continue to bear in mind the point that my hon. Friend has raised.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the serious nature of the allegations made in the document leaked from the Home Office to The Guardian that the Minister of State, Home Office has been lying to the House and the country about the nature of Government immigration——

Mr. Speaker: Order. No Minister lies to the House.

Ms. Short: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether you have seen the document——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must rephrase her question and withdraw that language.

Ms. Short: Deliberately misleading the House and the country——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is just as bad. The hon. Lady has been here long enough to know that we do not use such words as "lying" and "deliberately misleading". I ask her to withdraw them and use a different phrase.

Ms. Short: The Minister is deliberately saying to the House and the country that the Government's immigration policy is other than it is. Secondly, the Government, according to the Home Office advice, have been deliberately breaching the European convention on human rights and operating illegally. In those circumstances, will the Leader of the House require the Home Secretary to make a statement to the House immediately on this serious matter?

Mr. Yeo: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I did not hear the hon. Lady withdraw her allegation that the Minister was telling a lie.

Mr. Speaker: I hope that the hon. Lady, by putting her question differently, was withdrawing that. I think that she did.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not believe that the hon. Lady needs the help of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). He is being chivalrous, but will he please allow her to answer?

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet.

Mr. Skinner: I will put it later.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe that the hon. Lady withdrew her comment.

Ms. Short: In accordance with the rules of the House, Mr. Speaker, I rephrased my comment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I asked the hon. Lady to withdraw those words. It is simple for her to do that and put the question in another way. She put it in another way. I only wish her now to say that she withdrew those words. She can indicate by nodding.

Ms. Short: It is obvious that I withdrew the words, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Biffen: If I may round off this cheerful exchange, I am sure that the hon. Lady asked her question in good faith that extended to all on the Treasury Bench. I shall of course add her name to those of Members who have requested that that point be taken by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will remember that yesterday, for about 20 minutes, we were subjected to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury refusing to withdraw a statement which was particular to the Opposition when it became——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am anxious not to take time out of business questions because I have already limited them. I shall take the point of order afterwards. Unfortunately, it will then take time out of the debate.

Mr. Skinner: You have made a rod for your own back, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must not threaten the Chair.

Mr. Skinner: I am not threatening, Mr. Speaker. I am just making a statement.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): May I reinforce the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) that we should have a speedy decision about what is happening concerning the BBC licence, bearing in mind that many of my hon. Friends do not wish to see it increased by much, if at all?

Secondly, will my right hon. Friend provide time for a debate on yet further union disputes in the newspaper industry, this time at The Sun?

Mr. Biffen: I take account of what my hon. Friend says about the television licence fee, but I can say no more than I have already said on that topic.

My hon. Friend might like to raise the question about industrial disputes in the newspaper industry during the debate on the recess motion.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Is the Leader of the House aware of the enormous anger and distress being caused in Scotland by the present rating revaluation? Is he aware that the anger is such that the rating of his party has now sunk to 19 per cent. in the latest opinion polls in Scotland? In view of that, is it not disgraceful that the only occasion when this House will be able to debate revaluation will be at midnight on Wednesday evening rather than in prime time? Ought not Scottish Members to be allowed to express the views of their constituents at a proper time?

Mr. Biffen: I have a genuine sympathy for the hon. Gentleman's point. All hon. Members would like subjects which have a direct constituency bearing to be dealt with in prime time rather than late in the evening. However, that is not the only occasion next week when the hon. Gentleman can make the speech which he may be harbouring on this topic. He could make it on the Easter Adjournment debate or on the Consolidated Fund Bill next Tuesday. He could also make it on the motion of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) on Friday week.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Will my right hon. Friend give an undertaking that between the publication of the consultative document on the wages councils and any decision that is taken on them there will be a full debate in Government time and also that between the ending of consultations on the extension of the youth training scheme and the implementation of the two year youth training scheme there will be a full debate on the extension of YTS, again in Government time?

Mr. Biffen: I shall give the most serious consideration in due course to both proposals. Meanwhile, I should have thought that they could easily feature in any speech that is to be made this afternoon.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Since the Secretary of State for Defence is to attend the NATO nuclear planning meeting to be held next week in Luxembourg, could the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether it would be possible for him to make a statement on that meeting as soon as he returns to this country?

Mr. Biffen: My right hon. Friend is literally at my left elbow and will have heard that question.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Is the Leader of the House aware that his continued refusal or inability to find time for a debate on the Commission for Racial Equality's recent report on immigration procedures is seen by the country as political cowardice on the part of a Government who have so much to hide that they are unwilling to allow a free and open debate to take place on the subject?

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure whether the views of the country at large mirror the liberal conscience of the hon. Gentleman. As I said earlier, this matter could be considered through the usual channels.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): Is my right hon. Friend yet able to say when the promised debate on the Auld report will take place? He gave an undertaking that it would take place at an early date. Perhaps he could now fulfil that promise.

Mr. Biffen: I cannot be specific about that matter, but I assure my hon. Friend that the intention is to hold such a debate.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): Because so many hon. Members have supported the request of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition for an early debate on the report of the Commission for Racial Equality, a debate upon it being long overdue, may I reinforce what my hon. Friends have said. Furthermore, a liberal conscience does not exist only among Opposition Members. The Race Relations Act 1976, which set up the commission, was supported by a considerable number of right hon. and hon. Members of the Conservative Party. Therefore, there is a nationwide basis for such a conscience and it proves that a debate is needed at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Biffen: I note all that the hon. Gentleman says. He speaks with the authority of somebody who has been engaged in these debates over the decades. However, I had better leave the matter where is rested after I responded to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): It is not good enough for the Leader of the House to dismiss Scottish revaluation as a constituency matter. Is he not aware that the revaluation is causing acute alarm and distress to every householder and shopkeeper in each of the 72 Scottish constituencies? Will he accept that midnight on Wednesday is not an appropriate time for the Government to try to smuggle this business through the House?

Mr. Biffen: I would never be dismissive about anything Scottish. The hon. Gentleman made a trite observation. If an hon. Member has a Scottish constituency and Scottish rating is under consideration, it will have a very strong bearing upon constituency interests. I cannot add to the reply that I gave previously.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): As there is a good deal of support in the House for the decision taken yesterday in the other place regarding section 2 of the Official Secrets Act, will the right hon. Gentleman reconsider the possibility of holding an early debate on that subject? Is it not true that when the Conservative party was in opposition the present Home Secretary, Attorney-General and many of the right hon. Gentleman's other Cabinet colleagues were very much in favour of repealing section 2?

Mr. Biffen: I do not think that section 2 exactly inspires a great clan of friendship in the House. The trouble was that when attempts were made to set it aside it was found that there were formidable difficulties. I take note of what the hon. Gentleman says, but as far as next week is concerned, he had better try to make his speech during the debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): What are the Government's intentions about the timetable for the Prosecution of Offences Bill, which sets up an independent prosecution service? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the management consultants report came out only very recently so that there has not been time to study it? Is he further aware that there is grave anxiety among many members of the staff of prosecuting solicitors up and down the country and in the Metropolitan police area that the report's implementation and the Bill's enactment may have far-reaching effects on their individual careers?

Mr. Biffen: I believe that the measure is currently before the other place, but I shall certainly draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to the hon. Gentleman's points.

Consolidated Fund (No. 3) Bill

Mr. Speaker: I have a short statement to make about arrangements for the debate on the motion for the Adjournment which will follow the passing of the Consolidated Fund Bill on Tuesday 26 March.

Members should submit their subjects to my office not later than 9 am on Monday 25 March. A list showing the subjects and times will be published later that day. Normally the time allotted will not exceed one and a half hours, but I propose to exercise a discretion to allow one or two debates to continue for rather longer, up to a maximum of three hours.

Where identical or similar subjects have been entered by different hon. Members whose names are drawn in the ballot, only the first name will appear on the list. As some debates may not last the full time allotted to them, it is the responsibility of hon. Members to keep in touch with the developments if they are not to miss their turn.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take it later, after the statements.

RAF (Basic Trainer Aircraft)

3.57 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Michael Heseltine): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the selection of a new basic trainer aircraft for the Royal Air Force.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement informed the House on 18 December 1984 that best and final offers were being invited from British Aerospace and Short Brothers to clarify and amplify certain aspects of their tenders for aircraft to meet the Royal Air Force's requirements in order to enable a final decision to be reached. It was subsequently agreed that Westland Helicopters Ltd. and Hunting Engineering Ltd. which has also submitted tenders in the first round could submit their own best and final offers. All four tenders have now been fully evaluated.

The prices quoted by Westlands and Huntings, although substantially reduced compared with their original offers, remain well in excess of the other two bids, thus confirming our earlier assessment that on cost as well as technical grounds the choice effectively lay between the PC9, proposed by British Aerospace in association with the Swiss firm, Pilatus, and the Tucano, proposed by Shorts in association with the Brazilian firm, Embraer. Procurement of either aircraft would provide much better value for money than the alternative option of refurbishing the Jet Provost fleet.

The choice between these two fine aircraft has proved to be evenly balanced. Both comfortably meet the minimum specification and either is capable of meeting the RAF's training needs very satisfactorily. Selection of either would boost jobs for British industry, both directly through the order for the RAF and indirectly through the export sales which the successful firm could be expected to win. In the end cost has been the decisive factor. Our policy is to reduce the cost of defence equipment through the maximum use of competition, thus providing better value for money for the taxpayer and stronger defences for the country within the resources available. Of the two best and final offers, Shorts' is the cheaper by a clear margin.

Subject to final completion of contractual negotiations, therefore, we shall be placing an order with Shorts for 130 Tucano aircraft. The contract will be on a firm price basis: that is to say, the price is fixed in cash terms, and any cost escalation or foreign exchange risks will be borne by Shorts.

Allowing for potential overseas sales, our decision should result in over 1,100 job opportunities in the United Kingdom, with over half of them in Northern Ireland. In addition, the American firm Garrett, which will be supplying the engine for the Tucano, has given offset undertakings which will bring further work to British industry. Shorts' partnership with Embraer in this venture should open up many commercial opportunities.

I should tell the House that the decision I have just announced is an important one in the context of our enhanced competition policy. The price of the contract is approximately £60 million or 35 per cent. less than that which my Department had originally envisaged in its forward costing process.

This is a good decision for the Royal Air Force, for British industry, for jobs and for the taxpayer.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I congratulate the Secretary of State on showing his high regard for the RAF by choosing an aeroplane which has not flown, which the RAF does not want, and which has not even gone through the Boscombe Down evaluation with the Garrett engine. Had the interests of the RAF been paramount instead of the ideological attitude of the Prime Minister, who is seeking to make Shorts safe for privatisation, the PC9 would have been chosen.

What has been the reaction of the Swiss Government to the Secretary of State's decision, particularly given the knowledge that £96 million worth of potential sales of the Hawk have now been lost, as well as other potential military sales? What estimate has been made of the general sales potential for Hawk as a result of the loss of the marriage between the PC9 and the Hawk?

The Government are shortly to put on sale their shares in British Aerospace. It is likely that this decision will affect the value of those shares and the amount of money that the Government will receive. A penny off each share is equivalent to £1 million. If the Government make a similar disastrous decision about the European fighter aircraft before the shares go on sale, or if that decision is still in doubt at that time, the whole policy of selling the shares will be at risk and, with it, the Chancellor's policy. It seeems that by this decision the Secretary of State has shot the Chancellor in the foot, as well as himself.

I congratulate Shorts on getting the contract. Not only was the goal posts moved for it on occasions, but the conscience of the Minister of State for Defence Procurement was in the company's pocket because of the number of jobs that he lost for Northern Ireland's industry during his tenure there.

A major Government defence contract is going to Northern Ireland, and it will create new jobs there. How will the Secretary of State ensure that all sections of the community enjoy the benefits of the contract? Has Shorts given any undertaking to accelerate the implementation of its fair employment policies? On this contract, has it given undertakings about how many members of the minority community will be employed and, in particular, how many youngsters will be offered skilled apprenticeships? Is the offset agreement with Garrett as good as that offered by Pratt and Whitney, in particular with regard to the jobs that were at stake in Scotland?

The Government seem to be paying part of their debt to the Brazilian Government for their help during the Falklands campaign. Is this the final settlement, or do other debts remain to be paid? The Government have paid this debt at the expense of the finest air force in the world and the best pilots. It is a pity that the Government had to show their contempt for the RAF in this way, and their lack of trust in British industry's ability to design a plane that would meet the RAF's requirements. Once they had reached the decision to buy off the shelf, this disastrous decision was inevitable.

Mr. Heseltine: I shall not follow very closely the hon. Gentleman's line of approach. It bears no relationship to the way in which the Ministry of Defence goes about its evaluation processes. The hon. Gentleman's suggestions about the position of the Ministry of Defence are without foundation.

The RAF and my other advisers spent a great deal of time on the matter. While it is well known that the RAF has a regard for the PC9, as I tried to make clear in my statement, it also fully recognises that the Tucano meets the specifications that it laid down.

When procurement decisions have to be made in the Ministry, for every winner there must be a loser. It is impossible for us to make a decision which benefits one company or one country without other companies and other countries feeling that they have missed out. Our primary responsibilities are to the defence of this country, the taxpayer and the national interest. We conducted a fair competition, and there was a clear winner. When such a clear winner emerges in terms of the cost to the taxpayer and the defence budget, it would not be right for us to take into account issues such as the hon. Gentleman has raised. That is my response to what the hon. Gentleman had to say.

Of course the Swiss Government will be disappointed, just as the Brazilian Government will be pleased. In different circumstances, the situation might have been reversed. That is not the first consideration that I have to bear in mind.

The hon. Gentleman will not expect me to comment on the arrangements for British Aerospace. That is a matter for the company rather than for me, and the same applies to Shorts in Northern Ireland. If the Opposition are concerned about the arrangements, they should address their questions either to the company or to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. It would be wrong for the Secretary of State for Defence to pursue issues such as the hon. Gentleman raised, and I do not believe that any Secretary of State for Defence would have done so.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the chosen aircraft fully meets the staff requirements put forward by the Minister of Defence, and tell us about the export potential of his decision? Could he say a final word about the beneficial effects that there will clearly be on the economy of Northern Ireland, which is so much in need of assistance?

Mr. Heseltine: All four aircraft in the later stages of the competition met the RAF's specifications, at least on paper. Some of them have not yet reached full development stage.

Export possibilities must, in essence, be matters of calculation. It is considered that the arrangement that Shorts has with Embraer, giving it exclusive rights in some territories and competitive rights in others, provides a significant export opportunity. It is up to the company to grasp the opportunities, but I am advised that as many as 200 aircraft might be in question.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): Is the Secretary of State aware that we welcome his announcement, which will be a great morale booster for the people of Northern Ireland and of great economic benefit to the whole community? I agree that the decision a just one, bearing in mind the cost and performance of the aircraft available for contract, in that the aircraft will fit the requirements of the RAF. Those who saw it perform at Farnborough before it was fitted with the upgraded engine know just how fine it is.

The decision is a just one also from the point of view of employment. The contract maximises the potential for new jobs in the United Kingdom. Finally, the decision is a just one from the point of view of the taxpayer. It retains in competition with British Aerospace another firm which is highly skilled in airframe construction.

May I, however, utter a word of warning? It would be unjust and unworthy to suggest that the contract was awarded for political reasons. The contract was awarded to a firm with a highly skilled work force and very good labour relations, whose management, as it has proved by sales to the United States air force and by its relations with China, conducts the business in an efficient way.

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but I should like to make it clear that the contract was awarded solely because Shorts, on commercial ingenuity and merit, won on price. That is what the competition was about. It is not for me to intrude into Northern Ireland politics, but the best thing that I can say for Shorts is that it won without any attempt to influence how the decision was taken, in terms of jobs or other political issues. If I had had to take such issues into account, I should have been as concerned for the levels of unemployment in Scotland, the north-east of England or anywhere else where there might have been opportunities for jobs. However, the competition was on price, and on that basis the Tucano wins, although I am the first to recognise that British Aerospace's offer of the PC9 is a very good aircraft, which would have created many jobs.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this difficult and important decision will give great satisfaction to all sections of the hard-pressed and decent people of Northern Ireland, especially the dedicated workers and management of Short Brothers, who, by their tremendous efforts, are turning Shorts into one of the nation's success stories? As to the allegation of religious discrimination, the right hon. Gentleman can rest assured that Short Brothers is endeavouring to encourage Roman Catholics to take employment in the firm and that there is no religious discrimination.

Mr. Heseltine: I deeply regret the fact that the result of fair and honourable challenge means that the Opposition must search for underhand motives. Shorts is a first-class company which has won in a straight commercial battle. The whole House should get behind it and back it. That is the best way in which to help the country, including the economy of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): In view of what the Secretary of State said about Shorts being a good firm and getting the job because of what the defence staff said, does he agree that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland was wise in 1976 to keep the firm in public ownership, to extend public ownership and to ensure that it did not become part of British Aerospace, with the result that it has never been privatised? That former Secretary of State is extremely pleased at the great praise that has been given to a publicly owned firm.

As skilled jobs are involved, will the Secretary of State confirm that some of the work is to move to the De Lorean site in west Belfast? As skills are necessary and not anyone can get a job there, will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that training will be given to young people in west Belfast to ensure they are able to get jobs?

Mr. Heseltine: The right hon. Gentleman will know that I do not have responsibility for how Shorts manages a contract such as this. If it is as good as the right hon.

[Mr. Heseltine]

Gentleman and I believe it to be, the training of adequate recruits will be at the forefront of management's responsibility. I am sure that it is best left to it to make that disposition.

Sir Patrick Wall (Beverley): Is my right hon. Friend prepared to deny that the PC9 is the aircraft that the RAF wanted? Is he aware that his decision will probably cost 2,000 jobs in England and Scotland and the loss of the Pratt and Whitney factory in Scotland? It has long been obvious that Shorts can cut its prices — being a nationalised firm, it does not have to bear the losses— whereas British Aerospace cannot.

Mr. Heseltine: I understand, as does the House, that when such difficult decisions are made people whose interests might be in another direction question what is done. This was a competition about price. All the entrants to that competition were acceptable to the RAF in that they met the specification which the RAF had laid down in advance. If someone puts in a specification about that which the competition is about, it is possible for a more attractive but more expensive option to be on the table. The judgment was on the original standards laid down by the air staff. As long as those standards are achieved it would be wrong to take account of standards over and above those considered necessary because, in those circumstances, anyone who lost the competition could say that he had been invited to participate on a false prospectus.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that many people believe that he has made the right decision and welcome the clarity of it? We hope that he will be able to make an equally clear decision in favour of a wholly British manufacture, the AST 404, in the near future. As price is the determinant, what was the price differential?

Mr. Heseltine: There is not a convention that we give a list of those who have failed to win a contract. The differential at the close of the competition was significant. There were later bids which did not change the fact that Shorts had won at the close of the competition, although they substantially narrowed the lead. I should have had to disallow the later bids anyway, because they were out of time.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Will my right hon. Friend accept the congratulations of many of us on choosing the best aircraft for the United Kingdom? Thirty years after the end of the last war, will he take the opportunity to remind the House and the country that, in that war, Brazil was an ally which put 25,000 troops into Italy on our side and lost 90 per cent. of her merchant fleet in our cause, and that Switzerland has never done that?

Mr. Heseltine: As always, my hon. Friend has made a most valuable point. He is stretching the perspective that I bring to bear on these matters to an even wider historic dimension. If I had taken that wider issue rather than price, I should have reckoned a substantial opportunity for British industry in South America, especially Brazil. Shorts will be able to work well with Embraer. This will be the beginning of a considerable partnership to our advantage and theirs.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Is the Secretary of State aware that there will be considerable anger and dismay in Scotland and in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger) — the Secretary of State for Scotland — over this decision? How many fights on jobs in the Cabinet does the Secretary of State for Scotland have to lose before he does the honourable thing and resigns? Can the right hon. Gentleman give us an estimate of how many jobs will be lost in Prestwick? What is the difference in terms of export orders between Short Brothers' aeroplane and that of British Aerospace?

Mr. Heseltine: Such an attack on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is contemptible. The House understands that any responsible Minister with integrity does not reveal the arguments that he employs in Cabinet. In my experience, Scotland could not have a man who fights with more determination than does my right hon. Friend in the interests of his job. [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes, in the interests of his job."] In the interests of his job as Secretary of State for Scotland. My right hon. Friend would never be prepared to reveal the cases that he frequently wins in the Scottish interest; nor would he expect his colleagues to reveal arguments deployed when the decision has gone against the best Scottish interests. The aeroplanes were clearly evaluated. All were satisfactory to the RAF, and a judgment was made on price.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Perhaps my right hon. Friend will allow me to share in his warm tribute to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. Nevertheless, there will be great disappointment in the Scottish aviation industry. Why does my right hon. Friend put so much store on cost, bearing in mind that the life of the aircraft is 20 or 30 years? Does he agree that, as evaluated at Boscombe Down, the PC9 is outstandingly the best training aircraft?

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for taking exactly the same view as I do about our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. Of course I understand, as all Ministers with my responsibility clearly understand, that when decisions have to be taken on major procurement issues there are massive constituency interests and that this can lead to disappointment. It is impossible to satisfy them all. One has to make a judgment about where the best interest of the nation as a whole lies. It is my responsibility to get the best possible value for money for the £8,000 million spent on defence equipment, 95 per cent., or thereabouts, of which is spent in this country. The more that I pursue value for money within the quality demands laid down by my advisers, the more successful the British economy will be, not only in satisfying our legitimate interests, but in exporting to the rest of the world.

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): Is the Secretary of State for Defence convinced that the specifications of this aircraft meet all the criteria laid down by the RAF? Will he tell the House that there is no doubt at all in his mind, because there is some in mine, since the specifications have not been tested on all the aircraft? That is one of the problems with which the Secretary of State will have to deal. Will he take it from me that there will be great disappointment in Ayrshire and the whole of Scotland and on Humberside at the loss of jobs that might have flowed from this contract in areas which suffer from very high unemployment? These matters will certainly not be taken lightly in those areas. Does he understand that the shop stewards and trade unionists who have persistently and consistently lobbied Parliament over the past 12 weeks, particularly those from British Aerospace, will be going home tonight very disappointed at having to tell their men that the contract has been lost purely on cost?

Mr. Heseltine: I repeat what I have already, I hope, made clear; that all the tenders evaluated towards the end of this competition met the air staff target. The hon. Member is well aware that the Garrett engine has not yet been fitted to the Tucano, and to that extent has not been proved through its final testing, but that is a common phenomenon in competitions for defence equipment. This country has bought Garrett engines in the HS125 and the Jetstream and found them to be thoroughly satisfactory. The military advice that I have is that there is no likely reason why the Garrett engine will not be developed and will not prove perfectly satisfactory. I am fully aware that, as the hon. Gentleman said, people who have been lobbying me on the other side will be disappointed tonight, but that could not be a guiding principle. As I have been lobbied by every conceivable pressure group for months on end, there are bound to be people who are going to be disappointed tonight.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Despite the hysterical outburst from the Opposition Front Bench, I am sure that my right hon. Friend's Department has taken a properly balanced decision. Does my right hon. Friend recognise, however, the very considerable disappointment that this will mean to my constituents in British Aerospace, and can he reassure me that an early decision will be announced on the EFA?

Mr. Heseltine: I realise, of course, that my hon. Friend's constituents will be disappointed that they have not won this commercial contract. With regard to the European fighter aircraft, I spent several hours yesterday with British Aerospace looking at its proposal for a national solution to the requirement that could develop in this context. It is my responsibility to discuss with my European colleagues whether a collaborative venture is possible for this very ambitious scheme. I assure my hon. Friend that in those negotiations one of the issues at the forefront of my mind will be the interests of British Aerospace.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Does the Secretary of State not realise that his decision will be regarded in Scotland as an act of sabotage against the Scottish economy? Does he not realise that Scotland, in terms of population, has a very low share of the defence procurement? We get the bases and the danger, but never the jobs that go with defence procurement. Will he undertake, when he looks at his plans over the next year or so, to steer towards Scotland a fairer and larger share of the defence procurement so that we get the jobs to which we are entitled in the United Kingdom, if it is really united?

Mr. Heseltine: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will join me in welcoming enthusiastically the substantial expenditure that I have just committed to Scotland for the development of Britain's independent nuclear deterrent, the Trident.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton (Edinburgh, West): Can my right hon. Friend tell the House exactly what was the technical advice of the Royal Air Force on the performance of the two aircraft? Will he bear in mind that associated aerospace industries in Scotland have a considerable interest in the development of the European fighter aircraft?

Mr. Heseltine: On the last point, I fully understand the interest of the Scottish as well as the rest of our aerospace industry in the European fighter. As to the advice of the RAF, it was quite clear that all the results that I had to evaluate came within the staff target laid down. After that, it was a trade-off between the additional cost of going for one solution as opposed to the cheaper cost of going for the other, compared with the different specifications, which were above what it considered to be necessary for the task that it had defined. It would be wrong for me to try to evaluate the precise way in which the RAF would try to quantify the judgment as to whether it would be right to pay the premium that was offered to us for the opportunity of going to the PC9. The RAF accepted that all the aircraft that I had to consider came within the specifications, and accepted also that it was a legitimate judgment whether we would save the money or go for a more expensive specification.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall allow questions to go on for a further 10 minutes, but then we must move on.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Did more favourable regional assistance and higher grants in Ulster enable Shorts to submit a lower tender?

Mr. Heseltine: The positions of Shorts and British Aerospace would be identical in this matter, to the best of my knowledge, because grants would be available to those companies under the broad concept of either Northern Ireland policy or regional policy. There would be no specific grant associated with this particular project.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): May I express my joy and the joy which many unemployed in Northern Ireland will experience at what amounts to a vote of confidence in Northern Ireland industry? Does the Minister agree that the awarding of this contract to Shorts will create jobs not only in Northern Ireland but in other parts of the United Kingdom, through the supplying of parts, and so on? Does he also agree that, in spite of a considerable reputation in aircraft manufacture and a wide interest in Shorts products by other air forces throughout the world, only 2 per cent. of the aircraft output of Shorts went to the Ministry of Defence in the United Kingdom? This contract will perhaps redress that situation and therefore ought to be welcomed by the whole House.

Mr. Heseltine: I cannot find the figure immediately, but I shall give it to my hon. Friend later, and I think he will find that the amount of Short's turnover that comes from the Ministry of Defence is very much higher than the figure that he gave. I should perhaps have stressed to the House that, while there are perhaps 600 to 700 jobs to be located in Northern Ireland, that is just over half, perhaps, of the job opportunities that might develop from this contract, and the rest of them will be spread throughout the rest of the country.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Is the Secretary of State aware that those who represent constituencies in Northern Ireland totally deplore the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara)? We very much welcome the decision that has been made and the opportunity for Shorts to prove that it can compete, when given the opportunity, with any other company in the United Kingdom. Does the Secretary of State agree that the decision confirms the claims made by Shorts in the whole period leading up to this decision that the Tucano met the technical specifications and the requirements of the RAF and was the best value for money for the taxpayer? Does he agree also that the contract has been awarded to a company which has offered the best product at the most competitive price? Will the right hon. Gentleman encourage Shorts so far as possible to subcontract work to companies in Northern Ireland which have the competence to deal with such work?

Mr. Heseltine: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that I have clearly shown that where companies in Northern Ireland are able to compete effectively and make the product that, in this case, the market requires I see every reason why they should attract the orders that they have won in fair competition. I therefore repeat my absolute certainty that Shorts can carry through this work and that, having won it, the firm deserves to get the contract.

I can now answer the question posed by the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea). Approximately 50 per cent. of British Aerospace turnover relates to Ministry of Defence business. The proportion for Shorts is less than half of that, and the majority of it is on missiles.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): Bearing in mind the importance of the so-called two-way street — reciprocal sales and purchases between the United States and this country—which is out of balance in favour of the US by two to one, what offsets have been arranged for the purchase of the Garrett engines?

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point. One third of the Garrett engine will be manufactured at Rolls-Royce, the remainder in the US. It is the intention of Garretts, however, to see what further offset can be arranged, and discussions on that are under way.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the last best offer, the Hunting Firecracker, was fully considered by him? What reciprocal arms export sales has he managed to secure from Brazil as a result of this deal with Tucano, and what other export sales has he been able to secure as a result of it?

Mr. Heseltine: I assure my hon. Friend that the Hunting Firecracker offer was closely examined. It did not come within range in terms of price of the two to which I have referred most prominently. In terms of contracts overseas by way of offsets in this context, there are no specific contracts. However, there is an ongoing relationship with both countries concerned, though it is difficult to lay down a time in respect of which any arms negotiations shall take place.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): Will my right hon. Friend accept that part of the disappointment about his announcement must inevitably turn on the reduced prospects of selling the whole range of training aircraft, including the Hawk and PC9, and that that must have an impact on prices over a whole range of aircraft in the long term? Having said that, and recognising that the deal has been done, may I ask him to say how widely avionics contracts will be placed in this country?

Mr. Heseltine: I appreciate the point that my hon. Friend makes. The avionics contracts will largely be placed in this country. I hope that he will understand if, in the circumstances, I do not get drawn into commenting on the strategy of British Aerospace.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Without challenging the choice of the airframe, in that Shorts was the cheapest, is it not illogical to choose a plane which is powered by an engine which has not been used in it, when the air staff requirement was met by that very plane with a different engine, which was the Pratt and Whitney? Would it not be more sensible to stick with Pratt and Whitney, which met all the requirements, which is better for training purposes, which does not need redesign work, so causing delays in the contract and which has been the subject of long-established subcontract work in this country, including in my constituency, and which is not easily done by this American company?

Mr. Heseltine: I appreciate the real interest of my hon. Friend. He will understand that my concern must be to secure a competitive environment for that which the Ministry of Defence wishes to procure. Interestingly enough, it was because the Ministry of Defence pointed out to Shorts that its earlier options would not provide an engine power sufficient to match that which was required that Shorts went back to Garrett and reconsidered the position. That enabled a competitive environment to come into existence. That competitive environment, the House will wish to remember, has secured economies of about 35 per cent., or nearly £60 million, over and above what we might otherwise have been able to achieve if the estimates of the planners in the Ministry of Defence had prevailed. This, therefore, is an immense enhancement to the value-for-money principle, which is at the centre of what we are trying to achieve.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): In answering a question put by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson), the right hon. Gentleman talked about Scotland's share of defence procurement orders. Is he aware that he could please enormously my constituents in Greenock and Port Glasgow if he were to place orders for the SKK24 conventional submarine with a certain shipyard on the lower Clyde?

Mr. Heseltine: I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman is right and that I could please his constituents in that way. But I have a feeling that a number of hon. Members who represent other constituencies would feel rather aggrieved by such an arbitrary use of power in the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): As a Leicestershire hon. Member, may I ask my right hon. Friend to accept the disappointment that will be felt throughout the area over the fact that the Hunting Firecracker has not been successful in winning the contract? Will he consider that aircraft for other purposes? We offer good wishes to Shorts on being the best of the others that were competing.

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the broad-minded approach that he adopts. My view is clear in that we are opening up competitive opportunities to the Ministry of Defence as widely as we can. It is up to the companies concerned to take advantage of that new freedom to compete.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker (Belfast, North): The Secretary of State has mentioned price in the decision to give the order to Shorts. Will he accept that he will be getting an aircraft of exceptional quality, based on 50 years' experience by Shorts in the industry, during which time that company produced the wonderful and famous Stirling and Sunderland aircraft which contributed so greatly to our victory in the last war?

Mr. Heseltine: I appreciate that, but I must make it clear that I would have got a very fine plane had I chosen the British Aerospace solution. I was not making a judgment between one good and one indifferent candidate. I was faced with two desirable choices. It is simply that on the first criterion, that of cost, Shorts clearly won. From that moment on, the issue was whether there was a political reason why anyone should want to raise the question of overturning a decision which the market had dictated. There are no issues which would have justified some of the more partisan approaches that have been adopted by hon. Members representing certain parts of the country.

Mr. McNamara: It would be to the satisfaction of the House if the Secretary of State would inform us whether there were any regional differences in terms of grants for re-tooling or for buildings or matters of that nature. Perhaps he will write to interested hon. Members about that so that we may reach a decision on it.

The reasons that the right hon. Gentleman has given for his decision are absolutely amazing. We are dealing with a major contract worth £120 million and the Ministry of Defence, in placing it in Northern Ireland, is not in the least concerned about labour conditions and export potential. Is it suggested that the Secretary of State sat down in a little room with an ice pack on his head and judged two aircraft, one against the other, without any concept of the industrial, political and economic background to the case? In view of what was said earlier on other matters, I find that hard to believe.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will have heard me say many times that a whole range of factors had to be considered. The issue was whether any of them was of such significance as to override the essential first consideration—value for money for the defence budget. The idea that if ever there were another Labour Government they would be applying the sort of criteria to which the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) referred in every judgment that Governments are supposed to make would be a devastating indictment of the standards of high public accountability that people expect of this country.

Supplementary Benefit (Board and Lodging Payments)

4.39 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on proposed new arrangements for supplementary benefit payments towards board and lodging charges.

The House will recall that consultative proposals were referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee in November 1984. We are today laying before the House the committee's report, together with the Government's response to its recommendations. We are grateful to the committee for the constructive approach it has brought to its task, and have taken its views fully into account in framing the regulations which are also laid before the House today. Subject to the approval of Parliament, the new arrangements will come into operation on 29 April 1985.

The maximum weekly amount payable for ordinary board and lodging, which is at present set locally for each DHSS office and varies from £40 to £110, will be set for each area at one of six standard amounts ranging from £45 to £70 per week. For this purpose, DHSS local offices will be grouped, taking account of Department of Employment travel-to-work areas so as to reflect so far as possible established patterns of employment and job seeking.

Subject to these limits, there will be no restriction on access to board and lodging accommodation for people aged 26 or over, or for those of any age who come within defined categories such as those who are chronically sick or disabled, those who have a dependent child, and those who have been in the same accommodation while in employment. For unemployed claimants aged 25 or under, unless they are in an exempted category, each area will have a limit of two, four or eight weeks on the period for which board and lodging payments will be made.

Hostels—I know that this is a subject to which the House attaches importance—which have hitherto been subject to the normal board and lodging rules, will be treated as a separate category, reflecting the importance which the Government attach to them. They will have a higher limit—set at £70 a week nationally—than most ordinary board and lodging accommodation; and there will be no restrictions on the length of stay for hostels.

For residential care and nursing homes the Government intend to set new limits at a level which they believe will allow reasonable charges to be met in homes meeting the new registration arrangements under the Registered Homes Act 1984. At present, local limits vary from £51 to £215 per week for residential care homes and from £80 to £295 per week for nursing homes. The limits for residential care homes will be £110 a week for the elderly, £120 a week for the mentally ill and for drug and alcohol misusers, £140 a week for the mentally handicapped, and £170 a week for those who became physically disabled below pension age. A sum equivalent to the higher rate of attendance allowance—currently £28·60 a week—will be added to these limits for people in nursing homes. There will be an additional hospice category, with a limit of £198·60 a week.

In future, "topping-up" payments by local authorities towards the cost of younger people in residential care homes will not reduce the payment of supplementary benefit; but attendance allowance will be taken into account in full in assessing supplementary benefit entitlement for those in private and voluntary residential care and nursing homes. The rate of personal expenses allowances for people in these homes will be set at £8·50 a week — 30p a week higher than proposed in the consultative document.

Existing claimants will, of course, need a period to adjust to these changes. Those over pension age in residential care and nursing homes can continue for life to have their charges met at the level of payment in force when the new limits are introduced. Those under pension age in residential homes, hostels or boarded out by local authorities can continue for a year to have their charges met at their current levels. Those in ordinary board and lodging will have between four and 13 weeks to find alternative accommodation if their current accommodation is more expensive than the new limits.

The Government accept that, following the standstill on existing local limits in recent months, it would be appropriate to review the proposed new limits earlier than November 1986, as envisaged in the consultative document. They will therefore be reviewed within 12 months of coming into operation.

There can be no doubt that action is needed to control this form of social security expenditure, whose increase has gone far beyond what can be justified by sensible social priorities. We believe that our proposals, modified in the light of advice from the Social Security Advisory Committee, will enable real needs to be properly met while avoiding unacceptable waste and abuse. But we shall monitor carefully the effects of the changes, and be ready, if necessary, to make further changes.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): Is the Minister aware that this statement makes a farce of the consultation process since it almost completely dismisses the overwhelming evidence put before him, severely criticising his proposals, in more than 500 submissions, four times more than the DHSS has ever received on any other issue? Is he aware that this is yet another case where the Government have themselves created the social casualties and are now punishing those casualties by withholding necessary expenditure, so that people forced into homelessness by Government housing cuts are now being forced to meet the cost of that homelessness themselves?

Is he aware that board and lodging payments have been rising, not because of increased charges, as he claims, since last year's rise in charges was the lowest for five years, but because of the huge increase in the number of claimants brought about by the Government's policies— by the more than doubling of youth unemployment, by the halving of housing investment and the drastic shortage of housing, by the failure to tackle homelessness and by the iniquitous rule restricting supplementary benefit single payments for furniture, which prevents claimants moving into unfurnished, cheaper accommodation.

On the specifics of the Minister's statement, is it not clear that these new board and lodging limits, starting even lower than proposed in the consultative document, are too low when in many cases they are actually below the market rates charged for board and lodging accommodation, so that more people will be forced on to the streets? Even if the £70 maximum limit is adopted for London, is he aware, for example, that Paddington DHSS office reassessed board and lodging costs in August last year at £110 per week in that area?

Is he aware that the two, four or eight-week rule to be used against unemployed single claimants under 25 is harsh and unfair discrimination against those genuinely seeking work when, under regulation 9 of the requirement regulations, the DHSS already has powers to stop young people and others taking holidays by the sea, if there is abuse? The next question is just as important. By what justification is he now extending these restrictions to those aged 18-25 in their home areas, which was never mentioned in the consultation document?

Regarding residential care, nursing homes and hostels, is it not obvious that his proposals for a single, nationally-fixed scale are far too rigid and unrealistic since they take no account of substantially differing capital and labour costs between different areas? Again, are these national limits not being fixed too low when they are only half the level of local limits currently existing in some places?

The Minister preens himself on the fact that the personal expenses allowance for pensioners in these homes is being set at 30p a week more than was proposed in the consultation document. Is he aware that what he is not saying is that that is still £1·80 a week less than they now receive? How does he justify pensioners having to take a cut of £1·80 a week in their allowances when two days ago the Chancellor gave away £155 million to the rich through capital gains tax concessions and another £50 million through the abolition of development land tax?

Is the Minister aware that the real answer to the whole problem is that it is not only better but in the long run much cheaper to allow councils and other socially responsible agencies to build and convert homes for rent rather than to pay commercial landlords what are often exorbitant rents for substandard and sometimes dangerous board and lodging accommodation? Until that is done, we strongly reject these harsh and discriminatory measures as yet another attack by the Government on the living standards of some of the poorest and most vulnerable members of our society.

Mr. Newton: On the so-called "farce of consultation", the hon. Gentleman has only to read the Government's response to recognise that we have responded in many ways to the suggestions of the Social Security Advisory Committee. If the hon. Gentleman wishes me to do so, I shall list at least eight ways in which we have significantly responded to the committee's suggestions. I completely reject the suggestion that the problem has arisen solely because of unemployment and the other aspects to which the hon. Gentleman referred — unhappy though those problems are. Our response to the committee sets out clearly the fact that the number of boarders who are 25 and under increased by 60 per cent. in 1982-83 and by an estimated further 51 per cent. in 1983-84 and, other things being equal, will increase by a further 52 per cent. in 1984-85. That is greater than any percentage increase in unemployment among that age group that the hon. Gentleman could possibly find.

On market rates and the policies of local authorities towards housing, I have no doubt that the operation of these regulations has been driving up what are seen as the market rates to the detriment of those who are paying their own bills, whether in board and lodging or in residential care and nursing homes. Equally, I have no doubt that the regulations have been creating an incentive for councils to place homeless people in the most expensive board and lodging accommodation rather than to exercise their proper responsibilities and powers under housing legislation. I believe that this measure will give councils a significant encouragement to act more responsibly.

We shall certainly not rule out further consideration of the suitable alternative furnished accommodation rule in the light of the reports that we expect from the inspectorate and from the Social Security Advisory Committee and the work of the social security review. The operation of the rule will be modified by the fact that this type of furnished accommodation will, by definition, not be available to those denied board and lodging payments under the new rules.

We have sought to judge the limits of two, four or eight weeks according to the nature of the areas to allow what we believe to be a reasonable time for the sort of job search which all of us are anxious to encourage. I believe that we have accurately judged the limits, but they can, of course, be examined if the need is shown.

On limits for residential care and nursing homes, we concluded, having studied the figures carefully, that at this stage there was no proper basis for drawing the type of distinction which the hon. Gentleman seeks to draw. The capital costs of nursing homes will not vary regionally but will vary according to other factors. We propose to commission further work on this subject with a view to refining the system if a need is shown, and we shall certainly keep a careful eye on it. At present, we think that the limits are correct.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) drew attention to the fact that the personal expenses allowance is lower than the rate currently paid in private and voluntary homes. I accept that, but I point out that it is higher than the rate paid to those in local authority homes. We are seeking to bring about a fairer situation.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have an obligation to protect subsequent business. I have already said that a large number of right hon. and hon. Members seek to take part, so I shall allow questions on this statement to continue until 5.10 pm.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is essential to prevent the abuses in the system that have been developing during the past few years and at the same time ensure that those who will be affected by the announcement will suffer no unnecessary or unreasonable hardship?

Mr. Newton: That is why we have placed alongside these proposals what the Social Security Advisory Committee described as generous transitional arrangements.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): What was the nature of the representations received by the DHSS from Scottish Office Ministers, given the stress that they have recently placed on youth homelessness in Scotland? Is the Minister aware that his decision on the national limit for hostel provision will seriously discriminate against the large number of homeless Scots in London, and that the figure he suggests comes nowhere near the figures produced by those who work with the homeless, such as the Centrepoint service? Will the hon. Gentleman admit that the use of the travel-to-work designation areas, especially those in Scotland, is extremely dubious as they were greatly discredited in the regional aid survey that was carried through by the Government?

Mr. Newton: If evidence can be produced to show that the existing pattern of travel-to-work areas, which we have used loosely to group DHSS local office areas, is wrong in a particular case, we can examine that aspect. The hon. Gentleman will understand that it is not the custom to reveal interdepartmental discussion of this kind, but he may know from hearing some Opposition colleagues that my hon. Friend the Scottish Office Minister with particular responsibility for this matter was present with me at a meeting last week with Scottish Members of Parliament.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): Does my hon. Friend accept that the representations made to him about hostels and the security offered to elderly people over 65 who are now in this type of accommodation clearly demonstrate the rubbish coming from the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher)? Does my hon. Friend accept that this measure proves that my hon. Friends have taken great care to listen to and accept good advice?

Mr. Newton: I think that I can content myself with an expression of gratitude to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Will the Minister give a categorical assurance that no one currently covered by board and lodging allowances will be made homeless because of these changes?

Mr. Newton: Clearly, I cannot give that kind of categorical assurance. I can say, however, that the transitional provisions which we have made, the alternative provision that exists within the social security system and the exemption categories which we have carefully worked out, modified and extended considerably because of the work of the Social Security Advisory Committee, enables me to be confident that we shall not experience the type of hardship that some of the more extravagant allegations suggested during the consultation period.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Is my hon. Friend aware that many of us believe that the statement is long overdue? There have been far too many rackets in providing accommodation and accepting it involving landlords and those seeking accommodation. These measures might stabilise the market, because stating the prices and charges will mean that more people will know that they can build this accommodation and find people wishing to use it. Will my hon. Friend examine the matter in six months to ensure whether regional variations need protection?

Mr. Newton: Our formal response to the Social Security Advisory Committee's suggestions has made it clear that we shall commission further work and monitor the changes carefully in a number of ways. As I have said a number of times, if the need for further change is shown, we shall be ready to make that change.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the Minister confirm or, if he cannot do so, undertake to ensure that nothing in these regulations will in any way worsen the position of those spouses who have cause to leave the matrimonial home with or without their children because of a court order or the conduct of the other spouse?

Mr. Newton: In creating the new hostel category and giving it the highest level of the limits that we propose for other forms of board and lodging, we had in mind in part hostels for battered wives.

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): Few hon. Members can feel no sympathy for those who are genuinely homeless, but no sympathy should be shown to those people, especially the young, who move from one area of high unemployment to another merely to receive higher benefit. I broadly welcome my hon. Friend's measures, particularly the differential benefits. Will my hon. Friend reconsider whether there should be an imposition on those wishing to move from one area of high unemployment to check that jobs are registered in the area to which they move? Will my hon. Friend confirm that he will carefully examine the whole range of proposals that he is introducing to ensure that the system is working? Will he consider this to be an interim step along with the other review of social security benefits?

Mr. Newton: I give my hon. Friend the assurance that we shall bear his suggestion in mind in considering any further refinement of the system and, as we have already said, we shall have in mind whether additional improvements can be made within the context of the review of social security.

Mr. Hugh Brown (Glasgow, Provan): What evidence does the Minister have of housing authorities in Scotland not fulfilling their obligations in providing accommodation? Does he not realise that, with housing cuts, cities such as Glasgow are desperately anxious to provide suitable accommodation, particularly for young people, and there will be great resentment about the exploitation of some limited abuses in some other parts of the country, which will be seen as an attack on young people?

Mr. Newton: I have already said that one of the problems with the system that we have been operating is the incentives for many local authorities to place people in expensive board and lodging accommodation rather than meeting their needs in other ways. One of the puzzles is the amount of empty council property that exists, and I am told that that is as true of Glasgow as elsewhere. It is necessary that councils should look more carefully at the alternative options for providing more effectively for the needs of this group. We should then not have the suggestions about homelessness that we have had from the hon. Member.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Will my hon. Friend accept my thanks and those of many hon. Members who represent seaside constituencies for the steps that he has announced this afternoon to terminate the exploitation and abuse of the social services system and of young people? However, will he give an undertaking that the measures that he has announced this afternoon will not lead to a two, four or eight week shuffle of young people between unscrupulous hoteliers? Will he also take steps to ensure that the steps that he has announced will not lead to a plethora of sudden registration of seaside hotels as hostels?

Mr. Newton: The provisions for defining hostels should prevent the risk to which my hon. Friend has referred. I pay tribute to the work that he has done in exposing some of the worst abuses that have taken place. As to people moving around, young people would be able to re-qualify for further periods of board and lodging in another area, but that is part and parcel of the search for jobs, which we are not anxious to inhibit. It will not be possible for them to engage in successive periods of two, four or eight weeks in the same board and lodging area, where they will be disqualified for a further six months.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Has the Minister estimated how many hostels could close because of the restrictive limits that he has imposed, or of the cost that could accrue to his Department as a result of the limitations?

Mr. Newton: I have made it clear that our special provisions for hostels are intended to avoid any hostels closing, and we have their interests particularly in mind in what we propose.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I welcome my hon. Friend's announcement that payments will be made only to proprietors of residential and nursing homes that are up to standard. Is he aware that some are up to standard but require structural changes to come within the new guidelines? Will he take that into account in making any final decision about such establishments?

Mr. Newton: I cannot take that into account in making a final decision on these regulations, but if evidence that that is a significant problem is produced, we can look at that at the appropriate time.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): What is being done to make furniture grants easier to obtain? What new money is being made available to local authorities to inspect these premises? Does the Minister not understand that local authorities are faced with great difficulties in meeting their obligations because of Government policies of rate capping, imposing penalties and making massive reductions in rate support grant?

Mr. Newton: Nevertheless, the fact remains that I am advised that some 50 local authorities already run registration schemes for houses in multiple occupation and a number of others are considering it. What some local authorities can do satisfactorily, other local authorities should be able to do.

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): I accept the need for a review of the present system. However, will my hon. Friend bear in mind that there are areas, such as the city of Oxford, where there are genuine pressures as a result of accommodation for students and tourists, which produce a real level of cost of board and lodging above the limit that my hon. Friend has announced? In the past, that problem has been met by the discretion available to the local DHSS office. Does my hon. Friend have any plans to allow such discretion to continue at local offices where it is clear that there is a special case that drives up the real cost of board and lodging beyond the limit?

Mr. Newton: We do not have plans for discretion, which is how we got into the position of the absurdly wide range of limits. If my hon. Friend can produce evidence that makes us think that we should look at the limit for Oxford, I am willing to look at it. However, part of our thinking in this is that it is right for Ministers to set levels of supplementary benefit that it is reasonable to expect the taxpayer to meet. There will be some areas in which it is too expensive for people on supplementary benefit to live.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Will the Minister consider some form of appeal? I have been in touch with the citizens advice bureaux in the Barnsley area, which are concerned that the limit will be inadequate there. At the moment, it is on an average of £60 and rising, and they can see problems. Is the hon. Gentleman willing to meet such people to discuss these problems, because the travel-to-work area in my constituency will cause many discrepancies?

Mr. Newton: I should want some experience of how the system is working before giving too many undertakings to meet delegations from all quarters. However, as I have already said to other hon. Members, if a case is made for looking at part of the provisions, we should be prepared to examine it.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I welcome my hon. Friend's wise and careful statement. Does he agree that the rate of increase of expenditure on these payments has gone up 10 times in five years, and last year reached £570 million? How many hundreds of millions of pounds will it cost in 1985, and when may we expect to see an end to this wasteful and damaging haemorrhage of public money?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend is right to refer to the escalation of expenditure in this sector. Expenditure has risen from £100 million in 1980 to an estimated nearly £600 million last year. I cannot give my hon. Friend a figure for what the cost will be in 1985, given the changes that have already been made, the psychological change that has occurred as a result of the Government's announcement of their intentions, and the proposal that we are announcing today. As a rough estimate, we would expect benefit payments to be £70 million lower in 1985-86 than would otherwise have been the case.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Does the Minister realise that, after this announcement, he will have on his conscience the fact that a number of people, perhaps a large number, will be driven to sleep rough, with all that that entails? Will he look at one of the reasons why there has been an upsurge in board and lodging accommodation demand? One reason concerns housing benefit deductions which make it difficult for some youngsters to stay with their parents. There is also the absence of, or difficulty in getting, the single payments for furnishings, which prevents younger people in particular, but sometimes families, from getting housing of their own from local authorities where housing exists.

Mr. Newton: We do not rule out some consideration about the rules on single payments for furniture, in the light of various current studies. The operation of the rule will be altered by the application of these regulations. As I hope that I have already made plain, I see no reason to believe that people need be made homeless by these provisions, in view of the transitional arrangements, the exemption provisions and the alternatives that exist for many of them. I am satisfied for the moment that we have our limits about right to meet the aims that we have set out.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): How will the Minister's statement affect worthwhile voluntary projects, such as the Stepping Stones project in Newcastle? They aim to provide a form of sheltered accommodation for the young homeless and provide standards and quality of accommodation for them that is well in excess of board and lodging that would be provided if they were cast into the private sector. However, they rely on his Department to pay some money to those who live in the project.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will realise that I cannot make an off-the-cuff comment on a specific case, but from what he says it sounds as if that project would be likely to qualify as a hostel, in which case it will come within the hostel provisions.

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): May I give my hon. Friend the opportunity to correct one of his answers, which I do not think he meant? He said that it was too expensive for people on supplementary benefit to live in some parts of the country. I do not think that he meant that.

Mr. Newton: What I meant was that there may be parts of the country in which the costs of, for example, board and lodging accommodation are above those that we think it reasonable to meet out of the supplementary benefit system. I think that that is absolutely clear.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

[Relevant documents: European Community Document No. 10277/84, Annual Economic Report 1984-85 and the Unnumbered document Annual Economic Report 1984-85 (final version as adopted by the Council).]

5.10 pm

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Tom King): I welcome the decision to focus today's debate on the subject of employment and unemployment. The Budget makes the creation and tackling of unemployment a top priority. Following the announcements on Tuesday, I am now able to give the House the details of the proposals on which we have been working in recent months. They cover training, deregulation and employment.

The essential precondition of all that work has been the maintenance of a sound economic policy, with public expenditure and inflation under firm control. The record is clear. Shortly, we shall be entering the fifth year of economic recovery, the most sustained period for 40 years. Investment and exports are at record levels. Manufacturing output rose by 3·5 per cent. in 1984, the biggest increase in any year since 1973. Inflation has been around 5 per cent. for over two years, something which we tend to take for granted now, but an achievement which, a few years ago, seemed impossible. In terms of employment, after years with hundreds of thousands of jobs being lost, now at last again more jobs are being created. Half a million more jobs have been created in the past two years, but that has not yet been enough to reduce unemployment.

The first benefits of our strategy are coming through, but within that strategy there are several further steps which we can take, and have taken, both to encourage the creation of more jobs and to help those hardest hit by unemployment. I refer first to the youth training scheme. The first of the steps is the expansion of the YTS. Since 1979 we have instituted what is nothing short of a revolution in education and training, particularly for those in the vital 14 to 18 age group. We are now seeking to carry that revolution forward by offering two years' training for everyone leaving school at 16.

The YTS was launched in 1983 as a successor to the old and much less satisfactory youth opportunities programme. Since then the YTS has provided up to a year of work-based training for over 700,000 young people. That in itself has been a tremendous achievement. It is almost as if in the past two years we had set up an entire new scheme of further education. That system has already proved its merits. It is popular with youngsters themselves and, most important of all, it has shown that it can get them into jobs. The latest indications are that nationally about 65 per cent. of the trainees are going straight into jobs and further education. In many areas, and in many individual schemes, the figure is more like 90 per cent.

We now intend to build on that success by launching a major new initiative to develop and expand the scheme further. From April 1986 our aim is to offer a second year of training to 16-year-old school leavers and a one-year place to 17-year-old school leavers. As a result, for the first time ever all our young people leaving school at 16 will have the chance to get vocational qualifications. Once the new scheme is fully in operation, everyone under 18 will be able to have a job, education or training, so unemployment need not be an option for them.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Will the Secretary of State clarify his statement? It is noticeable that he is using exactly the same words as the Prime Minister used when she replied to me this afternoon. Will the right hon. Gentleman make it clear that there will be no enforcement of the YTS and that if a young person chooses not to go on the YTS, and is not in a job or full-time education, he will still be entitled to supplementary benefit?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. If he tells me that I am using exactly the same words as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, that seems a wise step on my part.

I heard the hon. Gentleman's interesting question. The point that he made was based on a fallacy. He observed that the figures quoted by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer were net of savings on supplementary benefit. Obviously, we hope that a considerable number of young people will go on the YTS. We have made an estimate of up to 200,000 in the first year. If they do, inevitably there will be savings on supplementary benefit. For that reason, the hon. Gentleman should not believe that there is a sinister plot that conceals within the figures the fact that it ceases to be a voluntary scheme. That is not so. I should like to make that absolutely clear. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made it clear in her answer to the hon. Gentleman, and I think that the hon. Gentleman will accept that. I heard my right hon. Friend's answer, and have a note of it. She said that there would be no change in the arrangements for the YTS. In an intervention in the speech on Budget day by the Leader of the Opposition, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made the same point:

"Had I any new proposals to make on that front, they would have been contained in my speech."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 807.]

I make it clear that we have no proposals for changes in the arrangements for supplementary benefit. The scheme will continue on the voluntary basis about which the hon. Gentleman asked, but we are anxious to get the new scheme accepted. I say this in all seriousness to Opposition Members, many of whom have supported the YTS. I hope that they will recognise that in the proposals that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced in his Budget speech is something which many of us have been keen to see for a long time. It somewhat depresses me that the focus of interest among Opposition Members has been entirely on that point about benefit, when surely no one wants to see young people with no option but to take the dole. There has been little recognition of the real achievement and breakthrough, and of how important it is that a united voice goes out from the House that all of us want to see that opportunity for young people. I hope that we can get that spirit of support, because it will be a challenge to launch the scheme, not least because of the contribution that we are looking for from employers. I hope that the House will speak with one voice on the importance of the two-year YTS.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): I take the Secretary of State's assurance that there is no intention to change the regulations. However, will he assure the House that, as at present 1,000 people a month have their benefits cut by 40 per cent. for refusing to go on or for leaving the YTS, that principle will remain?

Mr. King: The Prime Minister said in answer to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) that there would no change in the arrangements for the YTS. As the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) knows, it is only for a short period that the benefit is affected. I am grateful for the opportunity to clarify that point. Having done so, I hope that we can focus on the positive approach to YTS and not on that particular aspect of it.

It has been an ambition of myself and I know of many of my right hon. and hon. Friends to see the two-year YTS launched. I am delighted that it is possible. I pay tribute not only to the constructive discussions that I have been able to have with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, but to the work of my noble Friend the Minister without Portfolio and the Minister of State in my Department, who is not able to be with me today. I have asked the Manpower Services Commission to begin discussions immediately with all those concerned, with the aim of launching the new scheme from April next year. I have asked it to make recommendations to me by the end of June this year.

Employers will have a particularly important role to play in making a success of the new development, as they have had in the latest scheme. When we launched the original YTS, the Government met much the greatest share of the cost, although it was understood from the beginning that employers, too, would contribute. Since then it has become clear that employers have benefited substantially from the scheme, and I have been deeply impressed by their enthusiasm and commitment to it.

We now wish to develop the scheme further in partnership with employers. The second year's training will provide even greater benefits for them because of its greater occupational relevance. Therefore, we shall be looking to them to make a substantial contribution to the costs of the new scheme. Provided that satisfactory arrangements can be made, the Government are prepared to make additional resources available, £125 million in 1986-87 and £300 million in 1987-88, in addition to the £800 million that we were already intending to spend on the YTS in each of those years. I have asked the MSC to begin immediate consultations on that basis.

It is right that the Government should concentrate their resources for the under-18s on the extended YTS. To ensure the maximum encouragement to employers to participate in the scheme, we have decided that the young workers scheme will close for new applications on 31 March 1986. That will leave the way clear for the new training scheme when it is launched in April 1986.

Of course, we must not view training in isolation, but as part of a process of preparation for life and work that begins at school. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has already done much to develop a school curriculum better geared to the needs of the future. We have also developed a technical and vocational educational initiative which is opening up a whole new range of practical and educational courses for schools. Many of my right hon. and hon. Friends and other hon. Members have seen the new approach to TVEI and I know that it has warm support.

We believe that further progress is needed, and I can announce two important new measures today. First, we will reinforce TVEI and the similar initiatives in schools with a special programme of in-service teacher training, specifically aimed at supporting the new approach. I have authorised the MSC to spend £5 million in 1985-86 on getting the programme under way. I have advised the commission that it will receive a further £20 million for that purpose in 1986-87. These arrangements will enable the programme to make an effective start in advance of their being carried forward under alternative arrangements by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Secondly, we need to ensure that the system of vocational qualifications is better able to cope with the demands of the technological change and the mobility of skills. I have therefore asked the MSC to carry out a comprehensive review of vocational qualifications with the aim of ensuring that we have a system which people can readily understand, which they can join at any stage, which is based on achieving recognised standards rather than time serving, which provides proper opportunities for people to progress to higher skills and which is really relevant to the world of industry and commerce. It is a key element in our proposal that the two-year YTS should give our young people an opportunity to gain such qualifications.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's remarks, but I wonder whether the proposed consultations will take account of the quality of training in the YTS. I am sure the hon. Gentleman must be aware that grave anxiety has been expressed about that in some quarters. Will he ensure that the qualifications gained at the end of the course are worth something and, perhaps, lead to further qualifications?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. As he knows, we are devoting increased resources to trying to improve and upgrade the YTS. It has been a massive undertaking—something not always recognised by some of the critics, who choose to pick on the difficulties and problems. We have sought progressively to eliminate the worst aspects and to upgrade the scheme.

It is important to recognise that it is not just an announcement of a two-year YTS. It is an intention to develop a new scheme which goes beyond the one-year YTS and genuinely provides young people with a vocational qualification at the end of the course. That is a vital additional component to making a real success of the YTS.

We want to ensure that every young person is in education, has a job or is receiving training that will lead to qualifications. With the help of all parties in the House, employers and trade unions—and I pay tribute to the role of the unions in launching the scheme—I am confident that we can achieve exactly that objective.

Training is not the only area that affects employment and where change is essential. Our approach has been to take every possible opportunity to encourage employers to take on people and to remove obstacles in the local market which prevent them from doing so. Therefore, I come next to the changes announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to national insurance contributions. Of course, the most important announcement was the intention to reduce the cost to employers of taking on new employees. That is why the change that my right hon. Friend announced to the structure and level of national insurance contributions is such a central part of our approach. The reduction in the cost to employers of national insurance contributions for wages below the national average will make it easier and cheaper for them to offer more jobs, especially to the unskilled and the young, who are traditionally on the lowest wages.

At the same time, the raising of the tax threshold by 10 per cent. and the reduction in national insurance contributions for employees on lower than average wages should make it easier and more worthwhile for those currently unemployed to take jobs that become available. It is an important measure. I do not think that the merit of the proposal has yet been fully recognised, but it will become increasingly apparent. I do not mind disclosing to the House that in the work carried out in my Department we identified this as the most helpful of all the measures that could lead to an improvement in the employment position. I was delighted that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor decided to make the proposal a central part of his Budget.

There are other obstacles in the labour market which deter employers from taking on more people. I doubt that I am the only hon. Member who in recent years has had the frequent experience of meeting employers who have admitted, perhaps in private, that they could take on more employees but that for various reasons they were not prepared to do so. The reasons were many and varied. In many cases they used to be faced with problems of tax, the feeling among senior management and business owners that there was not sufficient incentive and encouragement, the concern of older owners that because of the problems of succession tax and inheritance there was not the incentive to provide for their families for the future.

Those problems have been significantly alleviated by the actions of both the present and the former Chancellor of the Exchequer. However, there are still significant complaints about obstacles to employment. Two of the complaints that I most frequently come across relate to wages councils and the operation of the Employment Protection Acts. No Government can ignore those complaints if they care about unemployment. The Government's job is to strike a proper balance between protection for those in jobs and improving the opportunities for the minority without jobs. If the voice of the unemployed is to be heard, a new balance must be struck.

That is why the Government believe that some changes in the regulations are now necessary. Wages councils lay down minimum rates of pay and detailed conditions for 2·75 million workers in 26 industries. The system was first introduced in 1909, since when economic conditions have changed dramatically, the welfare state has been established, real average pay is much higher and the hours worked are much lower. There is an extensive framework of legislation protecting the welfare, health and safety of individual employees. The changes in the circumstances have significantly altered the position in which wages councils now operate. Two out of every three of the employees whom they now cover work only part time. At present about 1 million of the workers covered earn minimum rates or just above them. Therefore, there is reason to suppose that the councils set wage levels which have a harmful effect on employment, especially those for young people for whom the councils sometimes set percentage minima above the going rates for other industries, and above the level for apprenticeships and the YTS.

At the same time, employers complain that the councils' awards are complex and lengthy, and that in many cases they simply add to the red tape and bureaucracy of employing people. Many people argue strongly that the only way to tackle this fundamental problem is to abolish wages councils and that the councils harm job prospects for all the unemployed. Others say that the faults in the system could be dealt with by reform, that councils could be limited to setting a single hourly rate, that their ability to award retrospective wage rises could be stopped, or that young people could be taken out of the system.

On either view, action is essential and urgent. I am therefore today issuing a consultative document on those two options—reform or abolition. I am asking for comments by the end of May so that we can move quickly to decisions on the next steps. The consultative document also deals with our obligations under international labour convention No. 26 on the fixing of minimum wages. The rules of the International Labour Organisation provide an opportunity for Governments to reconsider their positions on convention No. 26 every five years and, if they wish, to deratify the convention. The next period for reconsideration runs from June 1985 to June 1986. In the consultative document I propose, subject to the formal consultations required, to take the next opportunity to deratify convention No. 26. In my view, the convention is now restricting our flexibility in a crucial area of policy. If we are to help the unemployed, we must regain our freedom to take whatever action we think is necessary in the light of consultations.

Mr. Prescott: That must be the most deplorable announcement that the House has heard for some time. The Government have now decided to attack really low wages, the average of which is approximately £63 a week. As the Secretary of State is determined to take the action because it will reduce wages and create jobs, will he tell the House why the Government did not renounce the agriculture wages board, which should have been done last year?

Mr. King: That matter must be addressed to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who is responsible for it. The hon. Gentleman will have a chance to debate all these matters, because I have issued a consultative document. We shall undoubtedly debate the matter again. Because there is clear evidence, and because it is important that we deal with the issue of employment, I am putting a consultative document to the country today.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Will my right hon. Friend tell the House the sort of time scale that he is considering for the consultative document? How long will the consultations take, and when does he think we shall get some action on wages councils?

Mr. King: I said that I was asking for comments by the end of May.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): As the Secretary of State launches into his consultations, does he notice that most of the most vociferous critics of wages councils have high salaries and are protected by good employment contracts? Is it not morally repugnant to see people on high salaries who want incentives for the rich thinking that the way to create economic expansion is to remove the institutional regulation for our poorest people? Is that not morally repugnant?

Mr. King: I recognise the interest which the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues in the Select Committee are taking in this matter. He knows that there has been an extremely significant change in, for example, the groups covered by wages councils. When the councils were originally set up they covered manufacturing industries, but now they work more in the retail area. It is fair to draw attention to the point made earlier, that the whole welfare system and the floor that it provides makes the position different. A further overwhelming and significant difference is that two thirds of people covered by the councils are part-time workers. Therefore, the decision is right. [Interruption.] I am not trying to walk away from the issue. The House knows that I am issuing a consultative document today. I am sure that there will be ample opportunity for right hon. and hon. Members to raise the matter, and that we shall have ample time to discuss these issues. The issues are serious, and I make no apology for bringing them before the House in this way.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend point out that many Conservative Members and people in employers' organisations do not want wages councils abolished because they believe that there would be an extension of trade union activities in the industries formerly governed by wages councils? If the councils were abolished, might not many Opposition Members be pleased, because it would lead to an extension of trade union activity?

Mr. King: I listened to what my hon. Friend said. I am aware that in the trade union movement there are divided views about the role and efficacy of wages councils. That may reinforce some of my hon. Friend's points. On the understanding that we shall have a healthy debate on the matter in the weeks ahead, I shall, with the permission of the House, now move on to the other area of complaint. Employment protection legislation, especially the unfair dismissal provisions, causes small employers anxieties about the difficulties of such procedures and makes them reluctant to take on more employees.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South) rose——

Mr. King: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman, but the House will recognise that I have given way frequently. I am aware of the time factor, as we have had three statements today, and many hon. Members wish to speak.

We have already since 1979 taken some major steps to make the industrial tribunal system simpler for employers, but I accept that despite the changes the burden of this legislation can deter employers from recruiting more people. At the same time, I firmly believe that after a reasonable period of service people should be entitled to protection against arbitrary unfair dismissal. I make no apology for the fact that a Conservative Government introduced the specific proposals for protection against unfair dismissal, and I emphasise that, before Opposition Members get too excited in defence of the measure.

I have, therefore, decided that the right step to take to achieve the right balance is to bring the law for large and small employers into line, and to raise the qualifying period for claims in all cases to two years. About a quarter of all unfair dismissal claims come from employees with less than two years service. Therefore, the change should significantly lighten the burden on employers, without removing the protection for longer serving employees.

I have described the major steps that we are taking to improve training, and to remove the obstacles to the creation of new jobs. At a time of high unemployment we must also, however, provide direct and immediate assistance to those hardest hit by unemployment. I have spoken about the extension of the YTS, which, as well as reforming our training system, will provide new opportunities for one of the worst affected groups—the young unemployed.

I come now to the Government's proposal to expand the community programme. That programme has proved successful in providing opportunities for the long-term unemployed. Many excellent projects of real benefit to local communities have been carried out. In addition, it has an encouraging record of helping people into permanent jobs. We now intend to make a major expansion of the programme, from 130,000 to 230,000 places by June next year. The programme will then be able to help some 300,000 long-term unemployed people per year.

In addition to that expansion of the existing scheme, I am proposing three new approaches. It has so far been difficult for industry and commerce to play a major part in the programme. I believe that they could well make a real contribution to this work and that many companies would be ready and willing to do so. I have therefore invited the MSC to investigate immediately ways in which the private sector can be involved in the programme.

The second approach that I wish to launch is that I want to see charities and voluntary organisations being able to play a much bigger part in helping the long-term unemployed. In the past, a number of them have been deterred by the community programme's rules. I have now asked the MSC to see how we can make it possible for them to employ the long-term unemployed in their valuable activities.

I believe that many hon. Members will understand that that may be a valuable approach, which I hope can be a real benefit to the charities and voluntary organisations and to many long-term unemployed people who would like to play a part but who, due to the previous arrangements, have not been able to do so. I hope that I shall have the support of both sides of the House for this new approach.

Thirdly, I am anxious to see how we can develop the voluntary projects programme. It has already helped some 55,000 unemployed people in the past year, including some of the most disadvantaged, to undertake useful voluntary work. I have therefore asked the MSC to consider ways in which it can provide further help for the long-term unemployed through that programme.

To carry forward the expansion of the main community programme up to the figure that I mentioned of 300,000 people being helped per year, which will be the new figure when the new scheme is at its highest, and to make possible the further new initiatives that I have described, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has agreed to increase my Department's programme by £140 million in the coming year and £460 million for 1986-87, in addition to the £592 million already set aside for the programme in the coming year.

From April we shall also be expanding the enterprise allowance scheme by a quarter to help 62,500 unemployed people to set up business in 1985-86. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary has already announced changes that we are making to the job-splitting scheme and the part-time job release scheme to make them more attractive to employers. We are continuing the full-time job release scheme. We are aiming to double to 250,000 places our provision for adult training in 1986-87. We shall include for the first time training for 50,000 people under the community programme. The open tech programme will be doubled by 1986-87 to provide distance learning for 50,000 people. We are also considering an experimental scheme of training loans to give people the chance to take retraining opportunities.

As I listened to one or two speeches in the Budget debate, including those of the Leader of the Opposition and the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), which implied that we were making no efforts to tackle some of the most difficult and intractable problems of unemployment, I wondered how many hon. Gentlemen realised that by 1986-87 we shall be spending more than £3 billion providing help for over 1 million people in the programmes that I have described.

Those programmes represent a cost-effective use of available resources. I listened with interest yesterday to the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook talking about investment in infrastructure. I suppose that I have had an accelerated course of infrastructure. In the past two years I have been Secretary of State for the Environment, Secretary of State for Transport, and Secretary of State for Employment. I have had the chance to see the relative merits and cost-effectiveness of investment in sewers and the water industry, for which I was responsible, and, in terms of jobs, investment in housing, railways and roads.

Whaever the economic argument, I am not someone who would argue against the proper place for a good level of investment in infrastructure. Figures for public and private sector investment in the coming year are extremely encouraging. However, if the criterion is employment, and the issue is the tackling of unemployment and the provision of more jobs, there is no question but that the measures that I have described are the most cost-effective way to tackle the problem.

Measures on their own can never be an answer to the problems. They must always be part of a wider strategy. We have first to ensure that we maintain a sound and stable framework for the economy as a whole, because that is the foundation upon which all our other efforts to tackle unemployment depend.

Within that strategy we have to take action to help the labour market work and to ensure the creation of more jobs by removing obstacles such as wages councils and the Employment Protection Acts, to which I have referred, which may deter employers from taking on more people, and by tackling the regulations which prevent people taking advantage of the available opportunities. At the same time, we must help people acquire the training and retraining which they need to find employment in a rapidly changing economy.

We must develop practical, direct measures to help hard-hit groups among the unemployed cope with and adapt to change. The measures that I have described—the community programme and the enterprise allowance scheme—fit within that part of the strategy. Those measures take our policies several steps forward. They are part of a consistent, coherent and, I believe, essentially honest strategy that is based on economic reality—a strategy that takes account of the interests of all the people.

It is vital that we take into account the interests of all people, whether they be employed or unemployed. It is vital that we all understand the realities of the employment position and the part that we all have to play. That is why I can now tell the House that I shall shortly be publishing a White Paper on employment. Against that background, the Budget marks a course that we must follow. I commend it to the House.

5.47 pm

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): Now we have the truth—a Budget for jobs, we are told. The Chancellor is going. I would go if I were the Chancellor. The Budget has nothing to do with full-time jobs. It is to do with part-time jobs paid for by different schemes and financed by the lowest paid in our community—those covered by wages councils. That is the reality of the Government's employment policy.

The Secretary of State announced at the end of his speech that there will be a White Paper on employment. I do not know whether it will contain anything different from what he said, but I should like to remind him, as he reminded us, that it is the fifth year of economic recovery under this Government; that there are still more than 4 million unemployed. The measures announced in the Budget will not materially change the ever-increasing amount of unemployment arising directly out of the Government's policy.

The truest thing said by the Secretary of State was that the unemployment problem would not be solved by the schemes he described. It is the Government's strategy that determines the level of employment. I do not wish to spend a great deal of time upon the very powerful points that were made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and by other hon. Members. I want to refer briefly to the straitjacket imposed by the Government's policy. The reality is that the Budget will increase the number of people on schemes. Very few full-time jobs will result from the measures announced in the Budget.

If one compares the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech last year with his Budget speech this year one notices that the rhetoric has increased. It was clear from what he said when introducing the 1984 Budget that the Government believed that it would inevitably lead to an increase in employment. However, unemployment has increased since then by 138,000, despite the promise of the Chancellor that his Budget would create new jobs. Today the Secretary of State for Employment referred to the magic figure of 1 million; all he meant was that he would be adding another 300,000 to the 700,000 people who are already on various schemes. That gives us the magic figure of 1 million people on some form of Government scheme.

I am not against the various types of Government schemes. Because of the nature of the unemployment problem that we face, I believe that such schemes will have to form part of the attempts of all Governments to deal with unemployment. However, I dislike the quality of some of them. I must make the point that when the Prime Minister was Leader of the Opposition she carped constantly about the last Labour Government's introduction of such schemes because, she said, they did not create real jobs. On that analysis, the 300,000 jobs that the Government are creating by means of the Budget are not real jobs.

If one considers the censure debates on the performance of the last Labour Government and all the debates leading up to the 1979 general election, one realises that this Government are not doing very well by their own criteria. The Secretary of State has announced that the wages councils will possibly be abolished. He has not gone so far as to say that they will be, but he has indicated to the international community that we shall possibly renege on our international obligations. Of the 94 countries that ratified the ILO treaty, ours will be the only one to renege upon its international obligations. We are announcing to the world that our unemployment problem requires us to attack those who are low paid by means of the abolition of the wages councils. That is the gravest indictment that can be laid upon any civilised Government who are trying to deal with the unemployment problem facing all developed countries.

The Government have been unable to forecast the creation of real jobs by means of the fiscal changes that have been announced in the Budget. The Treasury says that if real wages are reduced by 1 per cent. real jobs can be increased by 100,000 or 200,000. The Treasury economic computer model often estimates the number of jobs that will be created by different policies. Did the Government obtain the estimates through the Treasury's economic model? Were they processed by means of the London Business School model? Various models are available. All of them give employment projections. It is peculiar that in a Budget that is supposed to be a Budget for jobs there is no such prediction. All we have been told is that 300,000 jobs will be created by means of various schemes.

This Budget has not achieved the objectives set for it by the Government's monetary policies. I shall not discuss that matter because my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is to deal with it in winding up. Instead I shall concentrate my remarks upon the proposals relating to the wages councils that the Secretary of State for Employment outlined in his speech. However, it is clear that the Chancellor has ignored the various suggested alternatives. Nobody can say that there are no alternatives. TINA — there is no alternative — no longer remains supreme. A remarkable number of alternatives have been put forward by various Conservative Members, the trade unions, the Confederation of British Industry, bishops—even by the newspapers. All have a common objective: to reduce the mass unemployment that has been directly created by the Government's policies. Therefore, we cannot accept that there are no alternatives.

This point was put very powerfully last night during the Budget debate by the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) who said:

"it does not look like a Budget that has been conceived with the stimulation of employment on a substantial scale as its main objective." — [Official Report, 20 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 901.]

This was before the Secretary of State for Employment, or perhaps we should say unemployment, announced the measures to be taken as a result of this Budget. Since the Secretary of State's statement, it is even clearer that the Budget will not stimulate employment.

Although the alternatives suggested by the Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress are starkly different, nevertheless they are clearly convinced that there are alternatives. Measures that are before the House now are designed to save public expenditure in one form or another, but the result will be a reduction in employment. The Transport Bill, which is in Committee, will reduce the level of subsidy for cheap fares leading to a loss of 50,000 jobs. The shipping industry has lost over 1,000 ships during the five years that this Government have been in power. We hear about the face that launched 1,000 ships. This Prime Minister has got a face that has sunk 1,000 ships and destroyed one of the most powerful merchant navies in the developed world. The result of that loss of ships is 30,000 unemployed seamen. By this Budget the Government are taking from seamen their tax allowance, and their wages have now been cut by £10 a week. The Government say that we have to compete with foreign ships employing Asian seamen who earn £40 a month. How can any seaman in this country compete against such a rate? My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) asked earlier this week whether our coasts are to be reserved for our own coastal shipping. The Secretary of State for Transport said:

"The policy of this Government is to press for the opening up of foreign cabotage trades to British vessels." — [Official Report, 18 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 373.]

Therefore, not only will the North sea be lost to British ships and to British workers; we are now in the process of losing the trade around our own coasts, something which every other country in Europe keeps to itself in the name of preserving their merchant fleets and, therefore, their jobs.

In those two areas, therefore, the Government's policies have a direct and consequential effect upon employment. This Government lack an industrial policy. They believe that by reducing the public sector borrowing requirement and the level of inflation their monetary framework will lead to increased employment. Anybody who believes that in the sixth year of Tory Government we are in the middle of an economic recovery must be living in cloud-cuckoo-land. Therefore, the Budget has not achieved the targets set for it.

[Mr. John Prescott]

In his 1984 Budget speech the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the proposed tax reforms would create new jobs. We all know that the reality is that 12,000 jobs per month went down the drain. That is the success that is attached to that Budget. If we ignore the fiddling of the unemployment figures — which is what the youth training schemes are really about—[Interruption.] If the Secretary of State does not realise that one of the consequences of putting people on to youth training and community schemes is to reduce the unemployment figures he does not understand what is happening. After all, that is one of the consequences. What may be in doubt is whether he intends that as a matter of policy. However, I believe that he does intend it.

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): The hon. Gentleman is being less than fair to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The Department of Employment's gazette publishes all the figures and shows the impact on the unemployment register. People can calculate the difference themselves. It is not a question of trying to hide anything, because all the information is there.

Mr. Prescott: I am glad to have that confirmation. But when the Secretary of State comes to the Dispatch Box to give the unemployment figures, he talks not about the additional number of those on schemes, but simply about the registered level of unemployment. That is all that ever goes out on televison or in press statements. We know that that is the name of the game. Why do hon. Members think that only the registered unemployed appear in the figures? It is a fiddling of the figures.

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Prescott: I shall not give way. I should not have thought that that issue was in doubt. These Budget statements clearly show — [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] All right, let us see how fantastic the hon. Gentleman's intervention is.

Mr. Eggar: Earlier, the hon. Gentleman quite reasonably said that he was in favour of the schemes, although he had some criticisms to make. However, he has now said that the schemes are all about fiddling the figures. That is a gross slur, and is very unfair to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Will the hon. Gentleman care to withdraw or amend what he said?

Mr. Prescott: I confirm that the schemes are about fiddling the unemployment figures and under-playing the real level of unemployment. [Interruption.] We can leave the electorate to decide what the truth is. But of course those schemes are about fiddling the figures. A comparison can be drawn between the squawks of Conservative Members when I tell them what has been happening to the figures and their reaction yesterday when the Chief Secretary accused my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook of something totally untrue, and would not withdraw it. There was not a word of protest from them then.

Mr. Tom King: I think that the issue that has caused concern among my hon. Friends is a matter of some consequence. The hon. Gentleman began by making a helpful contribution. Unfortunately, we seem to have got into more difficult waters. Perhaps I can give him the opportunity to say that he supports the development of a two-year youth training scheme and that it is the Opposition's policy to support it. The remarks that he has just made could not have been more unhelpful in that respect.

Mr. Prescott: I was going to come to that point—[Interruption.] One cannot prepare one's speech knowing what the interventions will be. But the Secretary of State knows, because I have said it before, that we stand for a two-year scheme. That was in our manifesto. We have constantly said that. There is no doubt about it, and the right hon. Gentleman knows it. I accept that there may be different motives. But the differences are not only between myself and the Secretary of State. They go wider than that even within the Chamber.

I do not want to damage the principal provision of the youth training scheme. However, serious criticisms should be considered. The Budget seeks to continue the Government's policies, and after five years of them, unemployment stands at the highest level this century. It is at an historic level, and is higher even than it was in the 1930s. There has been a phenomenal increase in unemployment. The Prime Minister and her Ministers constantly say that unemployment increased under the Labour Government, as if it was anything like the same order of unemployment. Unemployment may have doubled under the Labour Government to 1·3 million, but this Government have trebled the level that they inherited, and the figure now stands at about 4 million. If the Secretary of State is shaking his head in disagreement, he cannot be counting the number of those in schemes, and that is the point that I was trying to make before.

During five years of Labour Government the population increased by 1 million. However, we still left office with 250,000 more people in work than when we were elected to office. During five years of a Labour Government, 1·25 million more jobs were found, which means 250,000 a year. But more than 400,000 jobs have been lost in every year since this Government came to office. That has happened despite their claim of five years of economic growth.

I hope that Ministers will not keep repeating these untruths—I am told that one cannot say that they are lies—when they come to the Dispatch Box. The facts are issued by the Department of Employment each year. As a result of the Government's policies, we have an industrial wasteland. Those who have visited the west midlands and the north in particular will understand the scale of the collapse. The Government keep talking about record investment, but there has not been record investment in manufacturing industry. There has been, instead, a massive decline in such investment. There has also been a massive decline in its earning potential. There has been a massive deficit in trade in the manufacturing industries. Many of the regions have suffered as a direct result of the Government's policies.

There has also been a huge decline in full-time work and an increase in part-time work. It is part of the Government's argument that the increase in jobs is reflected in the fact that about 350,000 extra part-time jobs have been created. Those people are not recorded in the figures, because they are in part-time work. The development of part-time work is an increasingly worrying factor. I believe that it is part of the Government's policy to develop a low-paid, part-time labour force that will undermine the working and wage conditions of the rest of the work force.

Let us consider the scale of the poverty that has resulted from the Government's policies. In preparation for the debate, I read a speech that was made on 1 November 1978 by the Prime Minister, who was then Leader of the Opposition. She said:

"Whenever there is a Labour Government there will be poverty, because Labour concentrates far too little on wealth creation and far too much on redistributing what there is."—[Official Report, 1 November 1978; Vol. 957, c. 24.]

Under this Government there has been a massive redistribution of wealth the other way. The number of those in poverty and dependent on supplementary benefit has trebled. The number of those in the poverty trap has also trebled. The Prime Minister had the nerve to talk about Labour Governments creating poverty, yet her policies, which were designed to reverse those trends, are creating poverty on a massive scale. Unemployment and low pay are major factors in the increase in poverty.

Thus the Prime Minister has not achieved her aims. Any of the part-time jobs in Britain are covered by the wages councils. The Secretary of State may say that there are a lot of part-time workers and that they are on average wages, but he must know that that is not so. They get paid an hourly rate. We are talking about people who earn £1·50, £1·60 or £1·80 an hour. That is the sort of remuneration that they receive for their work. The new enemy—those who are holding us back from economic recovery—is apparently the waitress in the hotel or restaurant, the hairdresser, the hospital or school cleaner, the manual worker or the farm worker. On average, those people earn £60 or £70 a week, and all of them are covered by wages councils. Many of them are women and migrant labourers. Those people are the new often non-unionised enemy within. The Government are not only attacking those people through legislation but contemplating the possibility of renouncing their international obligations—the only Government to do so—in order to savage people in low-paid, high-poverty industries. That is the course upon which the Government have embarked.

This is an opportunity for us to look at the differences between Governments. While on the subject of wages councils, it occurs to me that Parliament is a wages council. We were in the position of a wages council when we were informed yesterday that the Duke of Edinburgh was to receive £192,000 a year.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Cheap.

Mr. Prescott: It is not cheap. That sum is equal to the average wage paid to 50 people in wages council industries.

The Duke of Edinburgh tells us to talk not about the unemployed but about the employed. If he makes such comments, he is likely to hear responses from some in this House which would show that we are very concerned about the level of unemployment.

I should like to quote from some Cabinet papers that have come into my hands. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I have some documents about wages councils that illustrate the difference in attitude between two Secretaries of State, the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) and the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit). The present Secretary of State has nailed his colours to the Chingford mast. The right hon. Member for Waveney received the advice that if wages councils were abolished,

"Young persons and part-timers (mainly married women who work part-time of necessity) probably account for about half the total number of employees covered by wages councils. They are amongst the lowest-paid in the workforce. The majority are not trade unionists. A move to exclude them from minimum-level wage protection would be widely portrayed as an attack on those who are particularly vulnerable. Public sympathy would be readily enlisted on their behalf."

That advice was given on 12 February 1981 to the right hon. Member for Waveney. He concluded by saying that

"My conclusion is that the exclusion of young persons and part-time workers from the scope of wages councils would be unlikely to lead to more than very marginal increases in job opportunities for these categories, and that largely at the expense of full-time adult jobs. I am in no doubt that the serious political legislative difficulties of such a course would outweigh any conceivable benefits."

The right hon. Member for Waveney obviously persuaded the Cabinet of his view. No doubt that incident contributed to his moving from that job.

The next Secretary of State was that "semi-housetrained domestic polecat", the right hon. Member for Chingford. In July 1982, he obviously gave the Cabinet exactly the opposite advice. He believed that one could go ahead and abolish the wages councils. Presumably those recommendations, which originated in the think tank, are the ones that the Secretary of State has now brought before the House.

There is also the case of the unfair dismissal provisions — another international obligation arising from the social charter in Europe. The right hon. Member for Waveney said in a confidential memo dated 17 July 1981:

"My conclusion therefore is that there is insufficient justification to amend the employment legislation further in favour of the employers. Moreover, I believe that any attempt to do so would alienate large sections of the working population, trade unionists and others, and would therefore be politically damaging to the Government."

I share the right hon. Gentleman's view. The right hon. Member for Chingford took a different view. He recommended to the Cabinet in a letter to the Prime Minister dated 20 December 1982 that not only unfair dismissal, but maternity provisions, redundancy payments and other matters should be considered as protection rights that could be taken away from the workers. He concluded that there was a case for the unfair dismissal legislation but that on industrial tribunals there should be a "radical recasting of the system".

We are witnessing a major attack on the rights of people in work—rights embodied in the employment protection legislation. The situation adequately displays the real differences between the hard right of the Tory party now in control and those who would wish to change the party's present thinking.

Another good example of that is the Chancellor's proposals for national insurance and tax changes. Those changes are welcome for low-paid people but are geared towards forcing wages down and encouraging employers to turn to the lower wage bands. The Government are encouraging the growth of part-time employment. In their press notice of 15 March they say that they intend to encourage part-time working, as the Secretary of State has confirmed, and that they will pay employers £840 in three instalments so that those employers can create two new part-time jobs. A new part-time labour concept is developing. [Interruption.] The period may be two years.

Mr. Eggar: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Prescott: The argument must be about real jobs, not part-time jobs. I recognise that the hon. Member for

[Mr. Prescott]

Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar) knows more about part-time than full-time work, but we are concerned about the development of full-time work and real jobs.

I welcome the development of community schemes, although I assume that the Secretary of State is now reassessing the question whether people may make profit out of those schemes. That used not to be the case, but I would not set my face against it.

I welcome any improvement in the redefinition of social need. However, I cannot accept that at the same time as the Secretary of State is increasing the number of places for the long-term unemployed—and the number of long-term unemployed now is greater than the total number of unemployed in 1979—the Government are making thousands of workers unemployed through the local authority cuts and the housing allocation programmes such as in Hull where 200 are to be made redundant in the housing department. While the Government are making people unemployed, the Secretary of State is stepping in with community schemes providing lick-of-paint jobs rather than the real building jobs that a housing programme would offer. That is the major cause of our disagreement with the approach of the Secretary of State to the creation of jobs.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is considerable concern about the extent of racial discrimination in the YTS? Is he confident that the Government will be more successful in ensuring that there is no unacceptable racial discrimination in the expanded community programme?

Mr. Prescott: That is a matter of considerable concern. I have talked to YTS trainees. There are some very good schemes and some very poor ones. There have been complaints from Youthaid and other bodies about the 20 per cent. of trainees who leave the schemes. We should address ourselves to the criticisms of the schemes, and I am glad that the Select Committee is considering some of those aspects.

The most crucial matter to those joining the schemes is the work that they will do when they leave. The training aspect is crucial. The extension of the scheme to two years is an important development. In adopting that policy, we are joining our European colleagues. The Opposition endorse and support the development. However, the quality of the scheme is important. We might be more convinced that the Government were extending the scheme solely to improve the quality of training if the same Secretary of State had not announced the closure of 29 skillcentres. We would have been more convinced by the Secretary of State's reasoning in saying that employers must pay their share of the schemes if the right hon. Member for Chingford had not abolished the levy schemes for 16 of the industrial training boards where apprenticeships have collapsed.

On the one hand, the Government are destroying quality training. On the other, they are running in with schemes and begging the employers to find different ways of providing different types of training, not all of it of high quality. That is what the Opposition cannot accept. Ultimately, it is the type of jobs into which trainees go that matters. Our quibble about the scheme concerns safety cover and pay. If trainees were now paid the equivalent of what they were paid in 1978, they would receive much nearer £40 a week.

It is interesting that the Secretary of State is anxious about the youngsters who are paid too much. I assume that he considers them to be a factor in the wage market in regard to wage councils and wants wages reduced there. The right hon. Gentleman wants to split jobs in wage council industries, and I do not suppose that full-time pay will be paid for half-time work, even with subsidy given by the Secretary of State. He is beginning to develop part-time work which is geared up to absorb people leaving YTS into low-paid dead-end jobs. That is the sum of the skill being acquired in these schemes. When increasing the input of YTS trainees, the Secretary of State will be under pressure not to allow the percentage going into jobs to fall. If he does nothing about expanding the economy and the real level of jobs, he must find more jobs for them.

The Chancellor has said that there is resistance to work because benefits are too high or pay is too low. The Secretary of State is gearing the system up so that he can force those leaving YTS into part-time jobs in wage council industries. That is the type of work that many women now do merely to make some contribution to keep them out of the ever widening poverty that the Government's policies have put them into.

The Budget was apparently designed to deal with jobs and was billed as a Budget for jobs. It cannot claim that. The mouse that the Secretary of State has produced goes no way to justifying that claim. The Budget was never intended to create jobs and to reduce poverty and injustice as a result. It is committed to increasing unemployment and worsening the employment conditions of those in work. It goes in the opposite direction of every other civilised European Government who give greater priority to employment and do not rat on their international obligations to maintain minimum standards.

The Budget has been designed at a time of mass and growing poverty to make the rich richer by making the poor poorer, and to make the employee weaker and the employer stronger. The Budget is acclaimed on the financial markets as clever and sophisticated, but it has an obnoxious smell which will enter the nostrils of the civilised people of the country, who will expel it and the Government to make way for a new Labour Government who will reverse present policies and take us back to full employment and a fairer society.

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) has been very combative and I shall endeavour to reintroduce an element of consensus to our proceedings.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East said that he was not against special schemes. I am strongly in favour of them and I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the wise things that he said about them this afternoon, especially YTS. My right hon. Friend has the advantage of being able to elaborate on the most welcome and praiseworthy parts of the Budget, and he did so wisely and encouragingly. In last year's debate on this day, I chided my right hon. Friend for describing the Budget as a Budget for jobs. This year, correspondingly, I congratulate him on studiously avoiding that phrase.

With unemployment in mind, some of my right hon. and hon. Friends and both Opposition parties have criticised the Budget for not expanding the economy and for not increasing borrowing. That criticism understates what is happening. The Government's financial deficit is a much more significant figure than the PSBR, which is distorted by sales of assets and other matters. Table 6.5 of the Red Book shows that that financial deficit is estimated to be £13·9 billion for 1984-85 and that it is forecast to be £9·8 billion for next year. The difference of £4·1 billion is miles larger than any imaginable cost of the miners' strike and therefore represents an unmistakable tightening of the fiscal stance.

Some of my hon. Friends might say that the forecast of the deficit or of the PSBR always turns out wrong anyway, so what is £2 billion or £3 billion between friends? I am inclined to agree, but wish that the £2 billion or £3 billion had been in the expansionary rather than the contractionary direction. I am also inclined to agree with what Professor Desai said in The Guardian recently—that the chief purpose of setting a precise figure for the PSBR seems to be to see by how much that figure has been overrun one year later. It is wrong that the Government should set such store by the PSBR when the Chancellor's predecessor, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, described it as a fickle and delusive statistic. Nevertheless, the Government set great store by it, so presumably the considerable tightening of the fiscal stance is intended and is meant to be significant. In that event, the tightening seems to be an extraordinary confession of failure that, after six years of this policy, the supply side of the economy is so weak that a cut has to be made to avoid inflation.

The tightening is also a mistake. The Budget is billed as a Budget for jobs—as was last year's—but we are not likely to get a great budget for jobs by cutting demand. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury said yesterday that there is no evidence of a lack of demand. What an extraordinary claim. What matters for real output and real jobs is real demand, and there is plenty of evidence that there is a lack of that. One might ask what my right hon. and learned Friend would regard as evidence of lack of demand. Does he not regard the fact that taxes have increased from 40 per cent. to 45 per cent. of gross national product from 1979 to 1983 or that there are 3 million or 4 million unemployed as evidence of lack of demand? How many millions do there have to be before the number shows lack of demand?

At the same time, there are only 150,000 vacancies. If we multiply that by three, as we are told we should by my right hon. Friend's Department, we still get to only 450,000—a small fraction of the number out of work. Earlier this year, the Confederation of British Industry asked firms whether they were working at full capacity and 54 per cent. said that they were not. It seems to me that the evidence of lack of demand is overwhelming. If we really want a budget for jobs, we must increase demand and improve supply.

I strongly welcome the employment measures in the Budget, but I do not believe that they go far enough. Some key ingredients are missing in the strategy for jobs. There seems to be no viable strategy for tackling unemployment in the medium term, for example. The necessary and sufficient condition for getting unemployment down is that real output should rise substantially faster than it has in the past few years. On previous figures, it seems that a reduction of only 1 per cent. in the level of unemployment —some 250,000 jobs—would require sustained growth of output of at least 3·5 per cent. per year. Indeed, it would probably have to be 4 per cent. or more, year in, year out. On the Chancellor's own figures, the chances of that happening are negligible.

The projections for growth at table 2.4 in the Red Book are 3·5 per cent. for 1985-86—that is very good—but 2 per cent. for the following three years. Those rates of growth cannot possibly reduce unemployment; they cannot even hold it at the same level. They are bound to generate increased unemployment.

I am not suggesting that the requisite rates of growth can be achieved by tax and expenditure policies alone, however cleverly they may be designed. Fiscal expansion is of course necessary, but by itself it would soon run the economy up against the three major constraints that it has suffered from for a long time: inadequate productive capacity, our inability to pay for imports on the scale required by much faster growth, and the renewed onset of inflation at unacceptable rates.

I am no crude expansionist. The possibility of achieving sustained growth turns on the relaxation of these constraints. I know that my right hon. Friend has these in mind. Only then will fiscal expansion be feasible and a faster growth rate sustainable.

The essence of a growth strategy — which is necessary if we are to get unemployment down—must therefore consist of interrelated measures to improve the competitiveness of British industry combined with an international initiative to encourage our trading partners to pursue compatible policies.

The recent fall in the sterling rate of exchange coupled with expansion of output in the United States should have been getting us off to an excellent start. British exports have been doing well and rising at a very satisfactory rate since the summer. In the past three months the volume of non-oil exports was 10 per cent. up on the previous year and the value of non-oil exports was up by no less than 19 per cent. It is a great pity that these favourable factors have not been exploited to achieve a higher rate of growth, but as things are we should have quite a good year this year, although the underlying constraints on a sustained high rate of growth are still there.

Charts 3 and 4 of the Red Book, which show our declining share of world exports and the ever-growing import penetration ratio of manufactures into this country, are deeply alarming, as I am sure my right hon. Friend would agree.

It is therefore vital that the breathing space which we are now afforded be used to strengthen the competitive position of industry when the constraints are most likely to present themselves again in an acute form—that is, in 1986 and subsequent years. The Government should give much higher priority to giving direct assistance to industry by fiscal and other means.

Unless we are prepared to accept a further devaluation, or several further devaluations, the most promising course of action is to achieve now a national agreement to limit incomes and prices. That would simultaneously improve the competitiveness of British industry and insulate the recovery from inflation. The choice, of course, is not between having an incomes policy and and not having one; it is between having a bad incomes policy and having a good one. At present we have an incomes policy based on three elements: high unemployment, discrimination against the Government's own employees, and a great deal of tireless ministerial exhortation.

Monetarism was meant to make all this unnecessary, but unfortunately it has not quite worked out like that. Indeed, as Professor Phelps Brown put it a shade ironically a year or so ago:

"Monetarists urge trade unionists to make monetarism work."

Not surprisingly, they are not wildly enthusiastic about doing that.

If, instead of an unsatisfactory incomes policy based upon exhortation and discrimination against a background of rising unemployment, we had an incomes policy based on negotiated consent as part of a deal which included substantial growth in employment, we should be likely to be much better off.

Incomes policies have acquired a bad reputation in this country because they have always been introduced in the past at times of national crisis as part of restrictive packages. They have also invariably borne the seeds of their own destruction by simultaneously interfering with differentials. It would be an entirely different matter to introduce an incomes policy at the beginning of a real recovery and as an indispensable part of the strategy to achieve it.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend explain how any incomes policy, particularly a long-standing one, can avoid interfering with differentials?

Sir Ian Gilmour: I could if I wanted to go into detail. These have often been put forward. In particular, one of the main features of the last Labour Government's incomes policy was to interfere with differentials. But I do not think that my hon. Friend is right in saying that it is an integral feature of incomes policies.

Anyone who sniffs at the suggestion of a rise in output fast enough to reduce unemployment by hundreds of thousands over the next four years and a national consensus comprising the strict limitation of money incomes and prices should reflect very earnestly on the likely consequences of continuing without any strategy at all to deal with the alarming situation that confronts us. Unless the expansion accelerates, real unemployment will not fall but will continue to rise. Unless agreement is reached on incomes, inflation too may well rise again.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I have listened to these arguments about incomes policies both in the House and before I became a Member. There have been about seven since the end of the war. I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman supported most of those ideas because they came from the same consensus as that to which he has been addressing himself in the past few minutes. I am not against his attacking the Government as he did in the early part of his speech, but I hope that he realises—for God's sake, he is supposed to be a clever man—that this Government have an incomes policy and have always had one. It is based upon having a reservoir of unemployment in order to try to depress the wages of the workers. The fact is that, despite all efforts, the business men, whom he probably favours, managed to get a 20 per cent. increase.

Sir Ian Gilmour: I do not blame the hon. Gentleman for not listening to me, but I specifically made the point that the Government had an incomes policy. I understood the hon. Gentleman to say that I had missed it out.

Mr. Skinner: I said it was the business men who made it.

Sir Ian Gilmour: It may well be. All I am saying is that the difference is not between having an incomes policy and not having one but between having a bad one and having a better one.

The Chancellor has stuck to his policy of cuts in income tax, although at a much lower level than was previously trailed. Everyone likes having his taxes cut, but I think that it is generally agreed that these tax cuts are just about the worst way of relieving poverty and the poverty trap and the worst way of creating jobs. To relieve poverty and the poverty trap the Chancellor should have made a substantial increase in child benefit, and to create jobs he should have spent money on increasing public investment. Instead he has chosen the worst possible option.

The basic error of this Budget is that it is more of the same. And more of the same policies leads to more of the same results. The Budget confirms that what the Chancellor has called the "British experiment" is nothing of the kind. An experiment is a test of whether something works. The reaffirmation in this Budget of a six-year-old strategy which is still manifestly failing to achieve its objectives makes it plain that such a test is not being applied.

Changes are needed, but, alas, they have not been made. That is the fundamental error. That is why, despite the Chancellor's brilliant presentation and conciseness, this Budget, like last year's, is a disappointment. It fails to deal with Britain's fundamental problems and therefore represents yet another missed opportunity.

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): The right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) congratulated the Chancellor on the "brilliance" of his presentation. When replying to yesterday's debate, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury congratulated his right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) on the "brilliance" of his presentation. That must be a new code word in the Conservative party. In other words, if Conservative Members cannot agree on anything else, they can at least agree that a case—a totally inaccurate one, a case flying in the face of all logic and reason—can be presented in a brilliant manner. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) that he, too, presented his case in a brilliant manner. What is more, I agreed with it.

I can well understand why the Prime Minister found the right hon. Members for Chesham and Amersham and for Cambridgeshire, South-East tiresome. They present their facts and criticism to the House in a totally dispassionate way, not only disagreeing but giving the reasons why they disagree. In a Government who require of Ministers that they be not only passionate acolytes of the Prime Minister but also cheer-leaders, it must have been extremely distasteful to have had those grains of sand irritating in the Cabinet. I have no doubt that they were expelled for the greater unity of the Cabinet. Their expulsion was, however, for the greater interest of the House, for we have enjoyed the contributions that have been made in successive Budget debates by former members of the Cabinet who found themselves unable to agree with the policies being followed.

It would be tedious of me to repeat the arguments that have been put eloquently today and yesterday by my hon. Friends; tedious also because this is an utterly forgettable Budget. Indeed, it was forgotten this afternoon until the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham brought us back to the need to discuss the real problem, that of unemployment and how to match the nation's unused resources of manpower with the human needs that are unmet.

The test of the failure or success of the Budget must be whether the Chancellor has made as a centrepiece the paradox, as it has been described, of the question that is in desperate need of answering but which the Government have failed to answer. The question is how we are to match the vast unused resources of manpower in Britain with the unmet needs which have been referred to time and again and which speak for themselves. One need only talk to one's constituents on a Saturday morning to hear about, for example, their desperate need for council housing. In recent years the housing lists have increased by 150,000.

I mention that because it has been pointed out time and again by hon. Members on both sides of the House that the construction industry does not employ imported material to any great extent. Here is a human need that is unmet, with human resources available to meet it. That should have been the centrepiece of the Budget, and my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East brought us back to that central issue.

Like others, I fully support the training scheme that the Secretary of State for Employment has introduced and I trust that every effort will be made to make it work. However, as the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham pointed out, it is not correct to talk of this as a Budget for jobs. It may be a Budget for increased training, and that is to be welcomed, and it may even be a Budget for the rehabilitation, if that were possible, of the Chancellor's credibility and reputation—I do not believe that it has succeeded on that account—but it is not a Budget for jobs. It does little harm and precious little good.

Being a Budget for training, the Government have still to answer the major question of where the jobs are to come from when the training period is over. In other words, when the youngsters have their qualifications, having undergone their training—we have spoken time and again of the need for training—where will they find jobs?

What is the view even of the Government's friends? Sir John Hoskyns wrote a powerful series of articles in The Times—he was the Government's chief think tank adviser—admitting that the policies of the Government in the medium term had failed, and he thought that they were not likely to succeed. It is not good enough simply for Ministers to come to the House and say that they have met great success. In his peroration, the Secretary of State said today that investment had gone up, that growth had increased and that new jobs had been created. All of those aspects depend on the point at which one starts.

After six and a half years, the Conservatives are still way behind the position reached by the Labour Government in 1979, before we left office. That is true in many respects. I will cite a few. The Government seem now just about to be catching up in terms of growth compared with the position in 1979. Investment in manufacturing is now lower than it was then; unemployment is far higher; and our balance of payments has deteriorated to the point where, without oil, the country would be in an impossible position.

I do not know what the value of sterling would be were it not for oil. No doubt exports are increasing, but that is because of the value of sterling against the dollar, and there is no doubt that our competitive position has declined seriously in the past few years.

How are we to reverse the trend? First, until the Government admit that that is the position, we shall not begin to reverse it, yet they are still endeavouring to persuade the country that the situation is not serious and that we are improving. Any dispassionate examination of our position reveals not only that the long-term decline has not been reversed by the Government but that it has continued to deteriorate under Conservative rule. I take no pleasure in saying that, but it is necessary to correct some of the untruths——

Mr. Prescott: Lies?

Mr. Callaghan: No, I do not want to start what we had from the Chief Secretary yesterday and a debate lasting 29 minutes on that issue. It is necessary to correct some untruths that are spoken.

One of the consequences of the serious decline in our economic position is the impact on our social benefits structure. We are trying to carry a first-rate social benefits system on the back of a second-class economy, and we cannot do it. Nor can we avoid the problem because it affects hon. Members on both sides of the House.

After all, when, after the next general election, my right hon. and hon. Friends form the next Government, they will have to face that serious problem. [Interruption.] There is a good chance that we shall regain power. Indeed, present Tory policies and attitudes are giving the Labour party the opportunity of having our biggest majority since 1945. I only hope that we shall take advantage of it, but that will be a problem to us. We shall have the chance of gaining a large majority at the next election because the people are beginning to understand what is happening.

The nation's social benefits system is operating from hand to mouth. The people working it are living from hand to mouth and the citizens who should be benefiting from it are also living from hand to mouth. The continuation of present Government policies will mean that the resources will simply not be available to meet the needs of the elderly, the sick and the poor at their present levels. A crisis is looming in our social benefits structure.

That is why, no doubt, the Secretary of State for Social Services is casting round for ways to push the crisis back as far as he can. But it will come upon us unless the Government find ways and means of escaping from the present dilemma in which they find themselves. They are training, but the jobs, at the end of the period of training, are not in view.

The Government's utter reliance on market forces to solve our national problems has failed and will continue to fail. Hon. Members were greatly impressed yesterday by the speech of the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East. He said that he had failed to discern a coherent strategy in the Government's policies.

[Mr. Callaghan]

The right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham said the same today. I agree with them. Does it not follow that a Government who believe that the blind operation of market forces, acting in aggressive competition, will provide the growth, the prosperity and the employment that we seek are by definition unable to produce the coherent national strategy that the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East was asking for yesterday? If they had such a strategy that would indeed contradict their basic approach.

The right hon. Gentleman asked why, when conditions for growth had been supposedly created—"supposedly" was his word, not mine—the output of manufacturing industry is lower than it was six years ago. Modesty forbids me from reminding the House who was in power six years ago. The right hon. Gentleman also asked why an increase in company profits had been accompanied by a decline in investment, which is now, I may add, lower than it was six years ago. That was a rhetorical question. The right hon. Gentleman knows the answer well. In one way he gave the answer in another part of his speech. It is that the Government are artificially restricting demand. Demand is what is needed. Because it is restricted artificially costs per unit increase inevitably. That makes us less competitive, not more. As the right hon. Gentleman said, demand should be stimulated through increased public sector investment. It is the Government who are keeping unemployment higher than it need be. In the judgment of many of us, the Government could increase demand without incurring the penalties of higher inflation that they so much fear.

The need for a coherent strategy is felt not just in the overall management of the economy. I should like to take four examples that strike me particularly in vital sectors of our industry and national life—energy, agriculture, and, in the newer areas, our inadequate thrust in biotechnology applications and high density technology in information technology.

Energy and agriculture are vital to the nation, as everyone must agree. Yet in agriculture there is more and more uncertainty. The common agricultural policy has been an obvious failure. Probably it would be a good thing if the Government could summon up the courage to abandon it completely and go back to a system of national deficiency payments. We should examine the prospects for abandoning the common agricultural policy. Cereal stocks are high and there is a danger of livestock producers being flooded out by cereal growers who in their turn will produce an excess of foodstuffs. There should be a clear policy, and we do not have one. There is more uncertainty in agriculture today than there has been for many years.

Then there is the hesitation in regard to energy. The supply division between coal, gas, nuclear energy and oil has been abandoned. I see no sign of it now. The right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) will correct me if I am wrong, but it seems to me that the pattern that was once fixed has been departed from. We are producing too much oil, much more than was anticipated during the time when I presided over the Cabinet. We then intended to produce sufficient to meet our needs and to leave the reserves in the ground so that they could be used by later generations. We thought that that made sense. Now, at a time when there is serious overproduction, our production of oil is far higher than was originally intended. That in itself must depress oil prices in the world as a whole, with consequences for the structure of the market.

There should be new statements of policy by the Government on both energy and agriculture. I do not care whether the Government produce Green Papers or White Papers, so long as we have a statement of policy that can be debated. In that way we could get a clear idea of where we are going. For heaven's sake, let us get away from the belief that market forces will provide a solution. They never solved the problem in agriculture and they will not solve it in energy. Let us get away from the belief that the Government can abdicate from their responsibility in some matters because they believe that market forces will solve the problems for them.

The Government want to move to a new high technology society. There is no doubt that progress is being made in the application of biotechnology to industrial and agricultural processes. We have some first-rate people working on that. They are well up to the standard of the rest of the world, but by comparison we are lagging behind Japan and America. I welcome the statement in the Budget that the sums to be devoted to technology training are to be increased by £40 million over three years, but that does not begin to match the effort that is being made by the Japanese or by the Americans. We know from the available figures that Japan is devoting twice the resources that we are to technology training. The Americans are devoting 50 per cent. more of their resources than we are. The provision of £40 million over three years is not enough to meet the needs.

We are also wrong in our approach to research. The Japanese are restructuring their research by placing more emphasis on basic scientific research as well as keeping up with applied technology. On the other hand, we seem to be shifting our resources away from basic research. Indeed, the resources being devoted to basic research that is vital to the country have been curtailed over the past four or five years. I shall not dwell on this except to say that Government rhetoric is not matched by their performance. Britain will be a laggard in high technology. I quote these illustrations to point out the deficiencies of our reliance on market forces and our inability to construct a national strategy or even to thrust policy in the direction in which it should be going.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East told us about what is happening on bus deregulation and on shipping. That made me think again that this country is passing through a phase where a number of bright young men are rediscovering all the fallacies that we abandoned 40 years ago; they are palming them off on the Government and on the people as though they were newly minted wisdom.

I now have more time for reading and the other day I was reading a work of J. M. Keynes, not "The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money" because I never got far with that, but "Essays In Persuasion". I ask hon. Members on both sides of the House whether the quotation that I am about to make at least awakens some echoes in their minds. Let me quote what Keynes said in 1931:

"The Government's programme is as foolish as it is wrong. Not only is purchasing power to be curtailed, but road-building, housing and the like are to be retrenched. Local authorities are to follow suit . . . What are we releasing resources for today? To stand at street corners and draw the dole? When we already have a great amount of unemployment and unused resources of every description, economy is only useful from the national point of view in so far as it diminishes our consumption of imported goods. For the rest its fruits are entirely wasted in unemployment, business losses and reduced savings."

Pretty well everything in that short paragraph is being argued about once more in 1985.

On the Government's half-stated intention to abolish wages councils for the low paid, we have not heard that they intend to put anything in their place. They have already abandoned the fair wages clause, which was a mistake. It is unpleasant to think that the Government believe that the solution to our problems is to impoverish the lower paid even more and to suggest that they should be reliant upon family income supplement if they are not earning sufficient in wages. I believe that I shall bitterly offend the Secretary of State for Employment — no doubt he will mutter something—when I say that the Government's economic policy during the past six years can be summed up in one sentence: tax cuts for the rich and pay cuts for the poor.

The poor have the weakest bargaining power of all. They tend to be non-unionised. Some of them are from ethnic groups. The Government have weakened the unions and their power to represent those people. I admit that the wages councils have had a mixed history. They have not done the job as well as they should have. All hon. Members—Front Benchers as much as Back Benchers—have a responsibility to protect the weakest in our society in employment. The Government will not fulfil that duty if they abandon the wages councils. [Interruption.] That is my view. I hope that we shall all—I hope that we are joined by Conservative Members—fight this tooth and nail.

The labour movement has often considered the idea of a minimum wage. Because of the impact on differentials, interference with voluntary collective bargaining, and so on—I have heard all the arguments adduced over many years — we have not adopted that idea. The Trades Union Congress is not opposed in principle to wages councils. After hearing what was said yesterday, last night I looked up what the TUC said in 1982. The TUC said:

"The general council have never been opposed in principle to the concept of a statutory national minimum wage . . . they said that they would reconsider the question of a statutory minimum wage in the light of progress on the TUC target."

The workers will not get that target. The Government's actions require us all to make up our minds. The time has come for the TUC, and the labour movement in particular, to declare in favour of a national statutory minimum wage system and to campaign for it. If the wages councils go because of Government action, only in that way will we be able to protect the weakest and least organised in our society.

A minimum wage, like every other system, has its disadvantages, although I dispute the argument which is often put that it will mean the loss of wages. We shall, no doubt, hear that argument during our debates on this matter. As far as I know, there is little evidence in countries with a national statutory minimum wage — France, Canada and the United States—to show that it means a loss of jobs. It means that many small employers have to invest more, modernise and bring themselves up to date.

Mr. Budgen: Can the right hon. Gentleman explain approximately how much above the level of supplementary benefit he thinks a national minimum wage should be fixed?

Mr. Callaghan: I cannot. I have not gone into it in such detail. No doubt, as the argument develops, we shall all have views on this matter. I would object strongly if it were suggested that we could get rid of the wages councils and then allow the least unionised, the poorest and the weakest members of our society to rely on family income supplementary benefit, and so on.

The system will have to be phased in. There is a similar system already for health. We must accommodate part-time workers. I could not see the point made by the Secretary of State for Employment that we have too many part-time workers. That is a case for saying that hon. Members must have greater responsibilities to those workers, because they are least able to bargain. They cannot organise or be organised easily.

The time has come for us to make up our minds that, even with its deficiencies, a national minimum wage, phased in so that part-time workers can be accommodated within it, should be a matter not only for discussion but for campaigning by the trade union movement, the labour movement and many others. Their consciences will be outraged if they feel that the statutory protection that the low paid have had for 70 or 80 years will be removed and nothing will be put in its place by the Government. I would regard that as a disgrace. I hope that my colleagues will support this idea and will pursue it.

7.5 pm

Mr. Julian Critchley (Aldershot): What, after all, is a Budget? It is an annual ritual; an infertile mating dance in which Stravinsky has replaced Vivaldi as our springtime composer.

What are my impressions of the Budget? It should please the Government Whips, but they are essentially simple men. Clearly, the wets and whingers will not be appeased. We had hoped for something more relevant and robust. On the other hand, the Thatcherites, so-called, cannot hide their anguish. The cry has gone up that the counter-revolution has been betrayed, which is the theme of the leader writers of The Times and the Daily Telegraph.

It is not for me to intrude upon so public a display of grief. After all, it should be a matter of no little satisfaction to discover, at last, that Thatcherism is no longer infectious. Even so, I do not look forward to a period of harmony on economic policy among those who sit on our Benches — far from it. The Chancellor may have postponed the advent of the brave new world until safely after the next election, but the differences between Amersham and Croydon will remain. We shall still be able to distinguish between Sir William Gilmour and Sir Ian Clark.

As for the Budget itself, it is much more interesting for what it left out than for what it put in. Faced with an army of letter writers with special interests to defend, the Chancellor, who in the past was plainly a man of substance, has become a man of straw. A trained economist, to whom the arcane notions of the money supply were an open book, and who could discuss financial matters on equal terms with Sir Alfred Sherman, he has been routed by "Disgusted, Tunbridge Wells". No one has so flattered only to deceive since the Duke of York left Britain for the Low Countries.

Whatever the rights and wrongs of the extension of VAT to newspapers, books and children's shoes, or of the taxation of pensions—I have no enthusiasm for any of them, save perhaps for the extension of VAT to newspapers whose owners' names begin with the letter "M"—the Chancellor got the message, namely, that in politics it is important to be loved, even by one's own supporters.

From 1979 to 1983, and for as long as the Government's targets remained the great institutions, and especially the great working-class institutions like the trade unions, all went well, but an attack mounted against the privileges of the middle class is a different matter. We have stumbled, if only upon our own supporters.

The victors of this Budget are the lobbyists, the exponents of single-issue politics, the pressure groups and our constituents with a gleam in their eyes. It is not for me to look them in the mouth. So many gift horses are a welcome reinforcement in what has been a long-running and uphill task to curb the zeal of the ardent ones in our great party. The victims of the Budget remain the unemployed. The Chancellor's measures are unlikely to do much more than stabilise unemployment in the short term, while any slowdown in the economy next year will see a further rise.

An overwhelming majority of our people see unemployment rather than inflation as the main problem facing this country, and the same majority favour higher spending to reductions in taxes. Another opportunity, alas has been missed, but at least some of the shine has come off the ideology.

7.10 pm

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): I find it difficult to follow the speech of the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley). All I can hope to do is to make my contribution as short as his.

This Budget has been received with little enthusiasm in any quarter. The only comment that I have read, which is a consensus of all that has been written and said, is that we must be thankful that the Budget was not a lot worse. The nation is wasting its economic substance in heavy unemployment, and most people agree that something bold and imaginative was needed to come to grips with the basic problems. There was no change in the Chancellor's strategy, even though that strategy has proved to be totally ineffective.

I read in the newspapers that the Chancellor is excessively orthodox. I find nothing orthodox in his economics, but I can find a good deal that is perverse. His strategy is of aiming to impose stringent limits and to reduce public expenditure at a time when we are in the teeth of a serious business recession. There is no orthodox economic sense in that, and there never has been. All this is happening at a time when we have considerable under-used industrial capacity, 3·5 million people out of work and a strong balance of payments. All that put together is an economic proposition which I find incredible.

I shall first make a number of general comments about the Budget, but the bulk of my remarks will relate to the area that I know best, East Anglia. The strategy is wrong because it is excessively cautious in the face of the quite daunting problems facing the British economy. Any Budget—and I have listened to 12 in this Chamber—has to do two things. It has to make short and medium-term changes, but, more important, it has to make a contribution to the long-term restructuring of the economy. The long-term problems that we have to face arise from the fact that our economy is in a long-term decline. It has been so for the best part of 100 years. There has been a long-term decline in the management and cost-efficiency of the economy. We have become perceptibly less efficient than our main economic competitors.

The Chancellor has made little attempt to make any inroads into solving the problem. If it were not for the revenue and the industrial production of the oil industry, the economy would be in a worse mess. The problem that we have to solve is to develop other industries and services ready for the time when oil production becomes a less important component of our industrial framework. The Chancellor has not made any start in this at all.

I have never believed that massive reflation through printing paper money and creating credit in the short term is any answer either. It has already been said in the debate that the infrastructure of British industry is in no shape to respond to such a move. It would be like trying to get more steam out of an old engine, and it would not work. We should be making a start with a gradual reflation, which should be well thought out, planned and selected. Again the Chancellor has made no start on that.

East Anglia is one of the areas which have great potential for growth. Its population is growing at a faster rate than that of any other area. It has geographical proximity to the EEC and there is great promise for industrial and commercial expansion. However, this potential is being wasted by policies which are wrongly conceived. East Anglia has had a bad deal from this Budget and from preceding ones for the following reasons.

In the first place, East Anglia is an area of low pay. Although that has improved slightly in recent years, the position still leaves much to be desired. I shall quote one sentence from the East Anglian Consultative Council report on the last financial year. It says:

> "Men in East Anglia need to work more hours per week than their counterparts elsewhere for earnings that are 94 per cent. of the national average."

The threat to abolish the wages councils will make the position in East Anglia much worse.

Secondly, in so far as they have lower incomes, the move from direct to indirect taxation has hit people with low pay proportionately harder than anybody else.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Mr. Julian Amery.

Mr. Weetch: I was giving way to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn).

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): As East Anglia is a low-wage economy, has this been reflected in the last few years on the rate of unemployment? Does my hon. Friend believe the Government's argument that lower wages create jobs?

Mr. Weetch: I am sorry that I created all that excitement.

There has been no perceptible improvement in the number unemployed in East Anglia, which directly contradicts the proposition that low wages and more jobs go together. It simply is not true.

When in 1979, the rate of VAT went from 8 to 15 per cent., people on low wages in East Anglia bore the brunt. If it is part of the Government's strategy to move from direct taxation to an increased base of VAT at 15 per cent., I am against that strategy, because it harms the poor more than the rich. It is wrong in principle.

In addition to the change in the centre of gravity in taxation, there are such measures as the increase in prescription charges by tenfold over the same period and, through the Government's tampering with the borrowing requirement, the increase in gas prices by more than was necessary, and other such moves. This is not called taxation in a formal way, but in its practical effect that is what it is: The essential principle to grasp is that it hits people on low wages more than anyone else. If we believe, as I do, in the virtues of progressive taxation, it had better be said here and now. That is why I put it on the record.

I welcome the adjustments that have been made in the Budget, as far as they go. They are a help. I am referring to the changes in both tax thresholds and national insurance contributions. However, the adjustments have led to other problems. Those at the other end of the scale will lead to real difficulties.

Let me give the House an example. The port of Ipswich is important for the prosperity of south-east Anglia, but the changes will be costly. It will cost us between £80,000 and £100,000 more to run that port this year, with the changes, than it did last year. Felixstowe, similarly, will be affected. Industry in East Anglia has given the measures, for the most part, the thumbs down because the changes make only marginal adjustments.

The Confederation of British Industry has been mentioned several times. Mr. Michael James, chairman of the eastern region of the CBI, said:

"The new initiative for YT is only a palliative."

What I suspect as I go up and down East Anglia looking at industry is that there is a prevailing feeling that the measures might mean cosmetic changes to the unemployment statistics, but that they will not provide any foundation so that young people can find a job after their two-year period on the YTS.

Every day when I go into the centre of Ipswich I see many young people hanging about the bus station. They are there in large numbers. They are full of energy and want to do some work. There is not very much work. When I ask them about the YTS and the scheme before it, I receive two answers more frequently than the rest. First, they believe that they have been taken for a ride as cheap labour. Secondly, they have no confidence whatever that after the period of industrial and commercial experience is over they will get a real job with any future in it.

Not much has been said about the increased duty on petrol. In East Anglia we regard petrol going up in price as inevitable as the plague was in the middle ages. However, East Anglia is an area in which public transport has undergone an almost continuous collapse in the past five years. The motor car is more important in East Anglia than elsewhere because there are more motor cars per family than in any other region. The increase will cost people a good deal of money. Both the changes—the increase in the duty on petrol and in vehicle excise duty—will have a serious effect in a rural area where public transport is very bad. That will increase social problems and the cost structure of the area.

This Budget is a disappointment. My right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) said that it was instantly forgettable. He was absolutely right. I do not know whether the Chancellor is treading water so that he can have more of a swashbuckling attempt next year, but certainly this Budget has been a disappointment in the House and outside it, especially in eastern England.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): I would not presume to try to compete with the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) on the particular problems of East Anglia. However, as the volume of our trade with Europe increases all the time, as against the trade that we used to have with other parts of the world, based on Liverpool and so on, it seems that the future of East Anglia is likely to be improved. Whatever else may be said about the common agricultural policy, I should have thought that it very much favoured the great cereal producers of East Anglia. However, I must leave that matter in the hon. Gentleman's hands.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the Government's economic strategy. It has to be seen against the international and domestic background. The international background is dominated by the American scene. People argue and disagree about whether the American growth will continue. I am inclined to think that it will. It is not just the high interest rates that have attracted foreign money into the United States and domestic investment on a vast scale, but the return on capital, healthy industrial relations and, above all, the commitment of the Federal Reserve to make sure that inflation does not take off again. Both Americans and foreigners feel that if they put their money in America it will be safe.

I would not presume to overcriticise the deficit financing. After all, a great part of it is spent on defending Europe and European interests overseas. There are tactical advantages that are not open to us in this country. If an Administration incurs a deficit, the legislature is a little reluctant to press for extra expenditure, whereas if there is not a deficit the field is wide open, as it is over here. That is one of the problems that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will be conscious of.

I do not believe that the American economy is drawing money away from this country. Our interest rates are higher than those in America. It is not a serious problem. Plenty of money is available here for any worthwhile project in which people want to invest. Nevertheless, there are dangers in the present situation. There could be a revival of protectionism in the United States. The banking system could be affected by the overhang of foreign and even domestic debts. Therefore, I think that we would be wise to use the time of general world recovery—sometimes we talk here as if there were a crisis, but things have been going much better than they have been for some years—to try to break down the barriers to trade and payments that still exist in the European Community.

In 1931, after the great crisis that affected not only the United States but the world, we came out of it through Empire preference and the creation of the sterling area. We cannot do that again. However, we could make the European Community a better trade and payments area than it is today. I urge my right hon. Friends to make that a matter of urgency. I do not know whether it involves joining the EMS. It would be easier to do these things now while things are relatively good than it would be if we ran into rough weather.

One might not think it from what has been said in the debate, but the overall picture of the British prospect is pretty good. Growth, at 3½ per cent., is well above the average over the past 20 years. Living standards for those at work and on pensions have either gone up or remained in keeping with inflation. Profits and investments have been good and exports have been boosted by the weak pound. Our domestic manufacturers have benefited from what one might call tariff protection as a result of the weakness of the pound. Above all, inflation has been kept more or less under control. I say "more or less" because 25 years ago we would have been shaken rigid at the idea of inflation at 5 or 6 per cent. It is not a bad picture. But world markets do not quite appreciate that.

What was the reason behind the fall in the pound? We exaggerate the argument that other countries see sterling as a petro currency. I believe that, despite the end of the coal industry strike, they are still suspicious of our industrial relations. Our unit labour costs remain a great deal higher than those of our competitors, despite our relatively lower wage levels, much higher indeed than those of any of our competitors.

Above all, there is the fear that we might embark upon a reflationary policy. That is not surprising because Opposition Members have pressed for reflation, and so too have a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends. My right hon. Friends the Members for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) have both urged increases in public expenditure. My right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East said that the Government's bogeyman was borrowing. I do not agree, and I hope that the Government do not agree. The real bogeyman is inflation, which could lead to a collapse of the currency. I am not dramatising that. It has been evidenced during the past few weeks. We have seen what the markets can do to sterling when they suspect possible reflation.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor was right to be cautious in the light of what has happened during the past few weeks, which was possibly sparked off by imprudent speculation by my right hon. Friend in November that he could do better than he has in fact done. Of course, what the House decides must not be determined by market forces, but they must be taken into account.

Criticism of the Budget has fastened mainly on inadequate provision for the creation of jobs. Unemployment appears to fall into two categories. Last year 1·75 million registered unemployed people found new employment within a year, and more than half of them within six months. I appreciate that it is painful to be out of work, even if some people have received redundancy payments. There are domestic upheavals such as moving home and transferring children from one school to another. However, that should not cause despair. In the United States, people readily accept such changes. Although we do not hear much about it, there has been tremendously heavy unemployment in the United States, with the transfer of resources from declining to growing industries.

Unemployment in the United Kingdom is higher than it is in most European countries largely because our overmanning in industry has been worse than theirs. It is part of the cost of modernisation, but the country should bear that burden cheerfully. I should certainly support a move to improve conditions for people transferring jobs.

It is generally agreed that hard-core unemployment stands at about 1·2 million, which is not a great deal more than Lord Beveridge regarded as the norm. However, I do not think that we regard it as the norm. Although unemployment is unacceptable, we must accept that there has been a technical revolution and that unemployment will be with us for a long time. The problem is how to deal with it. Mr. Scargill's recipe was to keep alive uneconomic industries. I do not think that the House would accept that. We could, of course, create jobs as President Reagan has done. We could increase the intake into the Armed Forces or the defence industries. We could make a contribution in such industries as construction, although I am not sure how practical that would be. Training is important. But I feel a little disquiet about the ideas put forward by the Leader of the Opposition about the right of youngsters from 16 years of age to live at the expense of the taxpayer. There is room for subsidies—they were available in Lancashire with the running down of the cotton industry. The National Coal Board has tried to start new industries where it is closing pits.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook, (Mr. Hattersley), my father's old seat, asked for a £5 billion injection into the economy, to be raised by taxes and borrowing. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup put forward a similar proposal. Hon. Members may have read an interesting book called "Poor Britain", which shows that, although most of those surveyed would be prepared to pay 1p in the pound to relieve poverty or unemployment, they were not prepared to pay 5p in the pound.

The impact on world markets and sterling of any major reflation at this stage would be not far short of catastrophic. It is only by creating new wealth that we can beat unemployment, overcome the hard-core, long-term unemployment and alleviate the poverty that still affects one in every seven or eight people. What can the Government do? The answer is, not much. They could cut taxes or they could encourage interest rates to fall. Those are the only two instruments available to them other than direct investment, which has been singularly unsuccessful in the past.

President Reagan appears to have had considerable success by cutting taxation dramatically, balancing that by slashing domestic expenditure—except on defence—and tightening the screw on credit to the Federal Reserve Bank to ensure that the result of his actions was not inflation.

However, there is a difference between the UK and the USA. I hope that I shall not be out of order if I reveal a confidence. I happened to lunch with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and I noticed that he was being unusually abstemious. I asked him, "Are you trying to lose weight?" He replied, "No; I am trying not to put it on." That is exactly what he is trying to do with public expenditure. No one has been keener than my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor to cut public expenditure, but they have not been able to do so. Therefore, they are trying not to increase it. That is not difficult to understand in view of the increased pressure of wages, and other inflationary pressures.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) made an extremely important speech, and I agree with him on a critical point. The truth is that this Government, like previous Governments, are boxed in by the framework of Government expenditure that is heavier than our producers can bear. Of our population, one third are resting or retired, one third are learning and the whole burden falls on the one third who are working.

I suspect—I do not want to be dogmatic about this—that the social services structure built by Beveridge, health by Willink and Aneurin Bevan, education by Butler and the nationalised industries by the Attlee Government, all of which have been amended and added to, were conceived 40 years ago in a different, much poorer Britain, although it was more optimistic about its chances of prosperity. As I think the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth pointed out to his Front Bench, the only way to solve the problem is by a radical rethink about the structures of Government expenditure.

I welcome the idea of Green Papers on taxation and social services, both of which have been promised to us. However, I would not underrate the difficulties of the task. Those institutions, created more than 40 years ago, like the monasteries of the middle ages, are almost as worried about their own survival as the services that they provide. The vested interests that they represent will not easily be challenged. It will be a Herculean work of education to get public opinion to face up to the changes that may be necessary. We have witnessed that with university grants. We witness it in the United States over Mr. Donald Reagan's proposals for taxation.

I shall now address myself more particularly to the Government Front Bench. Obviously the Tapers and the Tadpoles will say, "Why bother? The position is not too bad. You have 3·5 per cent. growth, the Opposition are divided and the British people are not all that keen on getting rich. Why don't you settle for a quiet life?" The Tapers and the Tadpoles may be right. If so, Britain will decline in the world league, not only relatively but absolutely. Will the British people be content with that? I suspect that we are approaching Shakespeare's and that if we do not advance we shall decline.

The Government are encamped on a high plateau. Behind them they have the victory over Galtieri, Scargill and inflation. They have reasonable growth. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is in complete command of her team, as the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth said. She has a substantial majority, a mandate to do what she likes and three years left to run. However, it is always dangerous to linger on the heights, as any mountaineer will know. The weather may break; night comes on; danger and death attend upon delay. Now is the time, if ever, to liberate the wealth-creating forces in the British economy. The process needs to be started now. The subjects that we must face must be debated in the House and up and down the country before we can even begin to legislate. I warn my Front Bench that it is later than they think.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): The right hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) gave a much rosier account of the economy than I would, but in the interests of time I shall merely place a question mark over his claims. I contest his thesis that one way out of our difficulties is to become more enmeshed in the European Community. He also said that because of the invention of robots there would be a lot of unemployment for a long time. I certainly agree, as would every hon. Member, that the invention of robots has had an impact on jobs, but we should not necessarily accept such a pessimistic outlook. We would have unemployment on such a level only if all amenities and the infrastructure had been completed and we needed only to work on care and maintenance. The country is a long way from that, and we should not accept unemployment as being a hard and fast development about which we can do nothing.

The Budget was much vaunted as the Budget for jobs, but that claim has been largely, if not completely, discredited. The Government's main strategy to reduce unemployment is to keep unemployment running at a high level. That may sound like a conundrum, but it is easily explained. By keeping unemployment high, the Government can rely on wage restraints to operate and, thus, hope that people will accept low-paid jobs. It is similar to operating an incomes policy, except that the Government are using the market forces to do their dirty work. It is as simple as that.

We are already used to low pay in Scotland. The Low Pay Unit, in a study of the problem throughout the United Kingdom in 1981, found that Scotland had a disproportionately high share of Britain's low-paid workers. In the United Kingdom as a whole, 16·9 per cent. of people were found to have earned less than £100 a week, but in Scotland the proportion was 18·6 per cent. Moreover, the Scots had to work longer hours. On the other hand, the south of England was found to be the least affected by low pay. I stress that these figures are not from the Scottish Nationalist party, but from the Low Pay Unit.

According to the Government's monetarist theories, unemployment is caused by workers pricing themselves out of jobs through excessive wage claims. If that were true, we would expect areas with the worst incidence of low pay also to experience the lowest incidence of unemployment. Unfortunately for the Government, the complete opposite is true, which blows a hole right through their precious theory. Scotland has the worst incidence of low pay and unemployment, whereas the south-east has the least low pay and the least unemployment. I should like to hear either the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Minister explain that one away.

Despite the fact that the evidence is against the Chancellor on that, he is determined to abolish the wages councils. He says that wages councils destroy jobs. That is rich coming from someone whose Government have destroyed more jobs than any Government in living memory. There has been a form of minimum wage legislation since 1909, and wages councils go back a long way. They have given protection from exploitation to workers in various sections of industry and agriculture who could not rely on organised trade unions to negotiate on their behalf.

During the past few years, however, the Government have run down the service that the wages councils have been able to give. Because of cuts in finance and staffing, councils have not been able to carry out their task effectively. It is not that the need for their services has lessened. In a clamp-down in the west of Scotland a couple of years ago when 566 establishments were visited by wages inspectors, 47 per cent. were found to be underpaying their employees.

The Government do not seem to be bothered about such matters. Despite the overwhelming evidence of contravention of the wages regulations, they are determined to phase out the wages councils. Today the Secretary of State announced that he would either reform or abolish the councils. That is an ominous declaration about their future. It is clear that the Government are on the side of exploitation and sweated labour.

[Mr. Donald Stewart]

That brings me to the youth training scheme. While genuine and adequate training apprenticeships are to be desired, a large question mark hangs over the schemes operated by the Government. Young people want real jobs, not something to keep them off the street for a year or two, for which they get peanuts.

Although the Chancellor has not indulged in large tax give aways in this Budget—his style was somewhat cramped by the effects on the PSBR of the coal strike—he said that he hoped to give way £3·5 billion in tax cuts over the next two or three years. That approach is all wrong. The wealth from oil revenues has been frittered away by this Government, just as it was by Labour. Scotland's wealth and future prosperity are being poured down the drain before our eyes on tax cuts, Trident, fortress Falklands and perhaps shortly even on some useless Channel tunnel.

That last development may end up as a blessing in disguise for Scotland, because one of the predictions of the Highland prophet, the Brahan seer, was that Scotland would be a free nation again when horseless carriages could travel from England to France. Most of his prophesies have come true, and perhaps that is a warning to me not to be so opposed to the Channel tunnel if it is likely to have such a desirable end.

I should like to say something about the whisky industry in Scotland. I welcome the Chancellor's decision to impose only a small increase in duty this year. That is useful, but I stress that it is not sufficient to solve the serious problems which the industry is experiencing. In 1981 the industry employed directly about 24,000 people in Scotland and about another 5,000 jobs relied upon the industry. The past four years have witnessed closure after closure. In February 1983, DCL, the largest company, closed 11 of its 45 malt distilleries, with the loss of 530 jobs. In the summer of 1984 the company had to lay off another 800 workers for two months of the summer. In January this year it closed another 10 distilleries and made a further 180 people redundant. In four years about 4,000 jobs have been lost through closures, redundancy and natural wastage.

Mr. Amery: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not think it discourteous if, on the strength of what he has said, I leave the Chamber before he finishes his speech to give some support to the industry about which he is speaking.

Mr. Stewart: I should find that entirely excusable.

I shall tell the Chancellor of three measures which he could introduce to help the whisky industry. In last year's Budget he abolished stock relief. That cost the industry an estimated £50 million. He should reconsider that and take action to mitigate the losses suffered by the industry. He should introduce an extension of the deferment period for the payment of duty. That would put the whisky industry on an equal footing with the other spirit manufacturers. To help the industry work out a long-term marketing and sales strategy, he should give assurances that increases in duty over the next two or three years will be less than the rate of inflation. That would help to create a climate of stability in which the industry could plan for recovery.

I was pleased that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) mentioned the Merchant Navy. The Government's neglect of what is happening to the Merchant Navy in terms of employment and trade is disgraceful. It is above all disgraceful in an aspect which I should have thought would have appealed to this Government — national defence. They even had to charter foreign vessels during the Falklands war.

During the last war, 25 per cent. of merchant seamen were lost at sea. That was a greater proportion than the numbers of men lost in what we call the fighting services. The Government have seen the Merchant Navy virtually shrinking away and disappearing. If the Chancellor were to restore the allowance on foreign-going earnings, that would help to arrest that decline. The effect of removing the allowance is that merchant seamen want increased wages. The Prime Minister says that that is the cause of their lack of competitiveness, and the position will be made much worse.

On my constituency's behalf, I wish to protest against the petrol and vehicle excise duty increases. There is not one mile of railway in my constituency. It must be one of the few in the United Kingdom in that situation. We depend upon motor cars and lorries for all transport. Such an increase percolates through the economy. It will be added to food and everything that is used in the area. Like the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch), I feel that that is a drastic increase to the cost of living in our area.

The Government cannot say that this is a good Budget for Scotland. For the reasons that I have outlined, my party will oppose the vast majority of the measures which the Chancellor has outlined.

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): It is always a pleasure to speak after the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart), particularly on this occasion because he has explained something of a conundrum that I have been trying to understand for some time. I understand that his party has, to some extent, had to disband its research facilities in Edinburgh. I was fascinated to learn that they seem to have been replaced by reliance upon the Brahan seer. It is an interesting point, which doubtless all my colleagues will bear in mind. It perhaps means that I shall face Scottish Nationalist opponents in the next election with greater trepidation than in the last one.

The first priority for Scotland, the Scottish people and Scottish industry and business was that nothing should be done in the Budget which might risk increasing interest rates. Representations have been consistently made to me in my constituency that that is the greatest problem that business faces. At a time when the level of interest rates is dictated largely by external factors it would have been unfortunate if we had had a Budget that had encouraged an increase in interest rates. I am glad to see that following the Budget there is a sign that interest rates are on the decline. I shall not suggest that yesterday's decline in interest rates was directly caused by my right hon. Friend's Budget. It had more to do with the state of the American economy.

If we had had an expansionary Budget of the kind called for by the Opposition and some of my right hon. and hon. Friends, interest rates would have been on the increase for internal, economic reasons.

Hon. Members who believe that we can increase the public sector borrowing requirement with scant regard to the market's response fail to understand the mechanism and that the market is sensitive to what my right hon.

Friend does in his Budget. Interest rates would have increased if the Budget had been as expansionary as some right hon. and hon. Members have suggested.

With regard to slightly more localised issues, the right hon. Member for Western Isles mentioned the increase in duty on whisky. I congratulate my right hon. Friend on restricting that increase. I am sure that all Scottish Members are aware of the difficulties faced by the Scotch whisky industry for a wide variety of reasons. I am sure that Scottish Members are grateful that my right hon. Friend has recognised that the industry is a special case and has restricted the increase in excise duty on whisky in response to the representations that have been made to him. It would be mean-minded of Scottish Members not to take that point into account.

Oil taxation affects my constituency to a somewhat greater extent. I was somewhat surprised to hear in my right hon. Friend's Budget statement a dismissal of the fact that incremental oil developments in the North sea were to be ignored for taxation purposes. My right hon. Friend announced in his Budget statement last year that it was a matter that he considered to have some priority and about which he would consult the industry during the course of the year. I understand that those consultations have taken place. I was somewhat surprised to discover that to some extent they had been ignored in my right hon. Friend's Budget statement. I noticed also that he said very carefully that he did not intend to bring forward proposals at this stage. It is on that point that I should like to make some observations.

The announcement in last year's Budget was welcomed. We are reaching the stage in the North sea where the development of new fields is going on, we hope, in parallel with incremental investment to develop existing fields a stage further than they are being developed at the moment. The problem about incremental development is that, while it is important for the production of North sea oil, under the present taxation arrangements it is not at all an attractive investment. Indeed, it is estimated by the oil industry that the rate of tax that will apply to new oilfields after the taxation changes in 1983 will be within a range of 35 to 50 per cent., but for new investment in incremental developments the rate of tax is still about 80 per cent. If incremental development in oilfields is being ignored or put on one side simply because of the rate of taxation, that is regrettable. During the course of our deliberations on the Budget, either during the debate on these resolutions or at a later stage, I hope that we can find out why my right hon. Friend did not consider it to be appropriate to make any changes in taxation in order to encourage incremental developments of that kind.

Incremental developments would have two results. First, they would probably be highly capital intensive in terms of the investment that they would generate. It would also mean that there was an increased overall tax take from the North sea. It is estimated by the industry that there would be a substantial increase — of about 1 million barrels — if incremental development took place. That must be in the interests of tne overall revenue that is collected from the North sea. It must also be in the interests of the industries that supply the North sea industry. Now that the stage has been reached where more and more of the investment that goes into the North sea is provided by British companies, and where they do more of the work, it would be regrettable if we passed over an opportunity that many of the oil companies believe is there to exploit, simply because the taxation level is unacceptable when an investment decision has to be taken.

I urge my right hon. Friend to make clear what the words "at this stage" mean. Do they mean that my right hon. Friend is prepared to look at the taxation of incremental developments on an ongoing basis? I hope that he will be able to make the position clear for the oil companies. My fear is that the window for making investment of that kind in the existing oilfields may be narrow. During their rundown there may come a time when their incremental development will no longer be effective. That argument has been put to me with some force by those who are engaged in producing North sea oil. I hope that my right hon. Friend will make a full rebuttal of the case that was amply and properly put to him by the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association for considering a tax relief of this kind. This is very important for my constituency where there is an increasing amount of onshore investment. It is also increasingly important for the offshore industry as a whole, not only as it exploits the North sea but as it develops the technological base that it needs if it is successfully to exploit other offshore opportunities in foreign waters. It is an opportunity that must not be given up simply because there may have been an inaccurate assessment of the position.

I turn finally to an encouraging aspect of the Budget statement. I have always thought that one of the cornerstones of the philosophy of a Conservative party and a Conservative Government must be to encourage a share-owning democracy. I believe that the Budget statement has gone one slight step further towards that aim. The change in the regulations that will allow shares owned by employees to be disposed of after a five-year instead of a seven-year period is a step in the right direction. However, I suggest to my right hon. Friend that it is only a very small step. Should not the Government consider more radical steps to encourage what is becoming an increasingly encouraging trend? Those who purchased shares under these schemes used to dispose of them very quickly indeed. However, a new pattern of ownership has developed as privatisation has taken place. I believe that employees now hold on to their shares for a far longer period, and they should be encouraged to do so. Indeed, employee share ownership is one of the first and most important steps that we can take if we are to move not only towards a property-owning democracy but beyond that towards a share-owning democracy. I would encourage my right hon. Friend to be a little bolder and to consider proposals that would achieve that aim.

I believe that this is a sound Budget. For reasons well outwith these shores, it is a Budget that has not been so radical or reforming as I am sure my right hon. Friend and many Conservative Members would have liked. However, Conservative Members are very grateful that it will secure the firm foundations which have been laid by this Government since 1979 for the continued and solid growth that has taken place over an unparalleled period in this country's economy. To have sacrificed that great benefit would have been irresponsible. On that basis it is certainly a Budget which deserves our support.

8.6 pm

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I agree with the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone) that it is disappointing that the Budget is not more radical and reforming, although I may not want to see the same radical changes and reforms as the hon. Member would have liked the Budget to include. However, I agree with him about the need for more radical changes over share ownership. I look forward to hearing about the kinds of proposals which in due course he will press upon his right hon. Friends. I am sure that the general thrust of his plea for more employee share ownership will be supported by the alliance.

First, let me comment on the main proposals in the speech of the Secretary of State for Employment. I shall then deal with the proposals contained in the Budget. I begin by repeating an intervention that I made during the Secretary of State's speech. We very much welcome the expansion of the youth training scheme to two years and the introduction of a certificate at the end of the course which can be used when trying to obtain other qualifications and employment — if there is any available.

If I may emphasise what I said during my intervention, we hope that the Government will turn their attention to improving both the quality and the amount of training within the scheme. There is considerable evidence of dissatisfaction among many of the young people on the scheme and among many participating employers and others who are associated with it. I hope that the Government will recognise that fact and that with some vigour they will seek to ensure that the money spent on the scheme and the work done under it lead to proper and worthwhile training for young people and to a qualification that means something to educational and other institutions and to potential employers.

I welcome the expansion of the community programme. Both of these proposals were advocated by the alliance. We believe that the expansion of this programme will have a beneficial impact on unemployment. It will provide people with work, which is very much needed.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Is the view of the hon. Gentleman's party on the community programme that it is desirable to have temporary schemes which create low-paid, marginal jobs rather than permanent jobs in the public sector? Which of those objectives would he prefer? Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the proposal by the directors of social services that they should be subsidised to employ permanent people to look after the old, the sick and the frail? Would he prefer that option?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: As the hon. Lady knows, at the last general election we advocated a scheme for taking more people into the personal social services to do necessary jobs, but the community programme provides worthwhile employment for many people. We know about the defects, and about the sceptism of many people, but in current circumstances the scheme should be supported in principle and hopefully, in practice, improved.

There were other aspects of the Secretary of State's comments which were not so acceptable, including, in particular, the proposal possibly to abolish the wages councils and to change the unfair dismissal proposals. We should be happy to look at any proposed reforms of the way in which the wages councils operate, but we believe that the Secretary of State and his colleagues have got the whole thrust of their policy in that area quite wrong. Indeed, I very much agree with the remarks of hon. Members on both sides of the House who have criticised the Government for attacking that end of the labour market. That is not where the major problems in our economy lie. Incidentally, before concluding my speech, I hope to come to some of the supply side things which the Government should be doing to increase employment. However, we do not believe that the Government should adopt such a policy as a priority, and we are sceptical about whether they are likely to bring forward proposals which will have a major impact on employment.

I turn to the general Budget strategy. I found the whole Budget very depressing, but it is even more depressing to hear Conservative Members and Ministers talking about the sustained recovery that is taking place, about the economy as though it was booming along, with a very low level of unemployment, and about our capacity being used to the fullest extent. This is not a Budget for jobs, but is, rather, a deflationary Budget, which will take further demand out of the economy. It is worse than it might appear on the plain, straightforward PSBR figures, because the Contingency Reserve is also being increased by £2 billion. In effect, the Government are reducing the PSBR to £5 billion. We need a 4 to 4·5 per cent. growth if there is to be a real improvement in the economy and if there is to be any impact on unemployment. That leads us to the certain conclusion that by this time next year we shall have once again seen a further increase in the number of those unemployed.

That is the main reason why I find the Budget profoundly depressing, but I find it depressing in another way. Indeed, an increasing number of people feel the same way about the Government's whole strategy. There is a black cloud hanging over the British economy. I refer to the diminishing supply of North sea oil and to the fact that the British people are worried about what will happen to their economy. If the international markets have pushed the value of the pound down so that it is almost on a par with the dollar, goodness knows what they will do if we do not have—as we will not have—the impact of North sea oil on our economy.

When one looks around the regions where manufacturing industry used to thrive, and when one sees the failure of the new technologies to match the growth taking place in Japan, America and other parts of the world, one becomes profoundly depressed about what will happen when the benefits of North sea oil run out. Of course, that will not happen until after the next general election. Indeed, this may well have been a Budget for the next general election, holdings things down now in order to come forward in a subsequent Budget, and perhaps in another Budget after that, with rather more rosy proposals than the Chancellor of the Exchequer was prepared to put forward this time. In the longer term, the damage to our industry will have a devastating impact on our economy unless the Government's strategy is changed.

This Budget must be given very low marks when it comes to helping those who have been hit hardest by the depression of the past three of four years. Its spending and taxation priorities are not the priorities that could most cost-effectively increase the number of jobs available, or help those suffering the greatest hardship. To spend £1,600 million on increasing the tax thresholds is not the most effective way of increasing employment. To spend that amount of money on increasing the tax thresholds is not the best way of targeting resources on those who are suffering the greatest hardship. We believe that the best way of doing that is to increase the rate of benefit to the long-term unemployed to the same level as the long-term supplementary benefit rate.

We also believe that the best way of helping those families who are suffering the greatest hardship and those on low pay is to increase substantially and to restructure family income supplement. Those are ways of cost-effectively achieving the targets of helping those suffering the greatest hardship and of getting people back to work. Unfortunately, the Government chose not to do that, and so we cannot support the Budget.

For some time Ministers and Conservative supporters have perpetuated myths. In the past few days another bit of Government propaganda has emerged. It is that, together with the so-called enormous growth in the economy, there has been a tremendous growth in employment. We hear figures trotted out of the number of people who have obtained jobs over the last year, but do the Government not understand — because surely the people do — that the important figure is that for the number of unemployed, whose idleness is damaging both to them and to the economy? Do the Government not realise that they cannot excuse themselves by saying that the number of people available for work has grown and that, therefore, they have not been able to provide them with jobs?

Those who are available on the job market are those who are the means of potential economic activity. If the Government pursued the right policies they could expand the economy and reduce the real unemployment figures. To argue that by increasing the number of people in work one has succeeded is to ignore the facts, and particularly the facts affecting those on the dole.

The other major lie which the Government have pursued and persuaded people about in recent times is that any expansion of the economy is bound to lead to inflation. They throw around references to the French experiment and to the policies of the Mitterrand Government who came to power in 1982, and seek to associate those policies with the proposals of the right hon. Members for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), and for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) or with those of the alliance. They seek to associate those policies with any proposals for an expansion of the British economy. What a farce. In 1982 the Mitterrand Government expanded expenditure by 25 per cent., made an immediate dash towards a 35-hour week and introduced a massive programme of nationalisation, so I am not surprised that that did not work. That was pie in the sky and is miles away from what we, and some of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Back-Bench colleagues, have been advocating. Our proposals do not bear any resemblance to what happened in France. We must nail some of those lies to the effect that any expansion is bound to lead to inflation.

Unlike the Government and the Labour Opposition, we have proposed — and as pay increases continue the Government will find it necessary to accept this—that a coherent anti-inflation package should accompany the expansion which we believe to be necessary and possible. The House will know, from the proposals that we have published, what the package consists of. First, we must maintain firm control over monetary policy and, in order to contend with the higher levels of interest rates that that will imply, introduce an industrial credit scheme to form the basis of a two-tier interest rate system to help to protect industry and investment.

To assist that policy it would be necessary, secondly, to join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. If the Government had done so in the past few months, they could have done so on much better terms than are likely to be possible at present or in the near future. I hope that Ministers will seek to begin negotiations with the Council of Ministers with the aim of joining. If they had already done so, they would, because of the existence of that discipline upon our policies, have had the confidence of the markets, a more stable exchange rate and more stable interest rates than we have recently had.

As the Chancellor implicitly acknowledged in his Budget speech, some of our interest rate difficulties are the result of the Government's own uncertainty about their policy on exchange rates — the Government's own incompetence. However, there is no doubt in my mind, in that of the governor of the Bank of England, or in that of the CBI and many other commentators that we would have had a more stable exchange rate and interest rates if we had joined the exchange rate mechanism of the EMF.

The third element of our package would be an incomes strategy. That has also been advocated by the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham. I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), after his experiences over the past two decades as Prime Minister and Chancellor, made no reference to the need for an incomes strategy. Recent history shows that that is necessary. One needs a back-up policy to help to ensure that the results of expanding the economy are not frittered away in extra pay increases and imports so that an immediate brake has to be applied to any further expansion.

What is the Government's policy on pay? They exhort firms to reduce pay settlements from the present level of 8 per cent. in the private sector. What do the Government have to say about the 4 per cent. increase in unit labour costs which the Chancellor mentioned in his speech? What do the Government propose to do about that? It will make our industry less and less competitive in world markets in the forthcoming year. What is the Chancellor's strategy for dealing with such pay increases and for dealing with the increasing head of steam that is building up in the public sector as a result of the Government's unfair policies towards public sector workers? We do not know. Neither the Government nor the Opposition have any policy to deal with the acceleration in pay increases that might follow an expansion of the economy.

I welcome the changes made to help bio-technology and information technology. However, the Government's support for the new technologies through direct investment and grants is chicken-feed in comparison with what our major competitors — Japan, America and also some European countries—are doing. We need more support, and a clear strategy to help to support the new technologies. However, we must also make our existing and older industries more competitive. I wish that Ministers would spend a little more time on the development of existing products, on research in that field, and on the whole area of design. It is wrong to think that the future of our manufacturing industry will depend entirely on the new technologies. Like Sweden and Italy, we must learn that we could gain export markets by dint of imagination and innovation in design. We should consider household products. Our kitchen equipment market has been overtaken in a devastating fashion by imports from Germany and other European countries. That has happened partly, or largely, because of the design work done on old products, for which there will be a continuing demand.

I also hope that the Government will do more to encourage industrial investment. The introduction of the industrial credit scheme could help to encourage industries, as the capital allowances are phased out, to invest more in new equipment and new plant so that we can achieve the higher rates of productivity and competitiveness which we so desperately need.

8.26 pm

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): Early in his speech, the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) said that the Budget strategy was depressing and deflationary. He certainly made it sound depressing and deflationary, and what worries me is that I have a nasty feeling that he may be proved right. However, I start by saying that it is as pleasant to be able to express gratitude to my right hon. Friend for not including in his Budget some of the more hair-raising ideas floating around in recent months as it is to be able to congratulate him on what he has included.

I know that some commentators believe that if my right hon. Friend had introduced radical tax reforms such as widening the scope of VAT and changing tax regimes on pension arrangements he would have given himself more room for manoeuvre to act on unemployment. However, as I believe that he has more room for manoeuvre than he has allowed himself in any case, I am relieved that he has forborne from radical tax reform.

On the other hand, the Budget contains a plethora of measures that are welcome. Foremost amongst them are the extension of the youth training scheme and the enlargement of the community programme. I am somewhat concerned about one aspect of the expansion of the youth training scheme. According to the Chancellor's proposals, referred to by my right hon. Friend today, it seems that employers will have to bear a considerable extra cost imposition. It may well be that they will be able to bear it but we shall have to watch events carefully. I hope that the MSC will be successful in its negotiations with employers on that point.

In the longer term, I imagine that the changes in national insurance contribution may have a most beneficial effect on real jobs, and that further ahead—presumably in the next Parliament — the application of the conclusions to be drawn from the Green Paper on personal taxation should bring great benefit and make much better sense of our tax and social security system. There is nothing new in the world; we travelled along this track in the early 1970s. The Government could refer to what was said and thought at that time instead of covering all that ground again.

I share the doubts expressed about the proposals to abolish the wages councils. I am prepared to accept that some reform may be necessary, but I do not believe that the abolition of wages councils will create more jobs. More jobs will be created only through greater demand. On the other hand, I believe that the abolition of the wages councils could have the effect not only of reducing the wages of the lowest paid but also of creating much doubt, worry and fear in the minds of those whose wages are now covered by wages councils. That subject must be approached with the greatest possible care.

None the less, the Budget contains several enticing crumbs and a few more succulent morsels, but I fear that they are not enough to create a cake adequate to make the country feel more prosperous, more optimistic or more content, although my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment said that we are now entering the fifth year of economic recovery. In certain respects that might be so, but the economic situation still gives rise to the greatest concern.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor tries continually to reassure us by quoting figures for economic growth, investment and low inflation. For the latter at least, the Government can continue to take credit, but behind the bald figures matters are nothing like so rosy. Output has grown, but for two years after 1979 gross domestic product fell. Even in 1984, the index of output stood at only 105·9 as compared with 103 in 1979. If oil and gas are excluded, the comparison is more odious — 103·1 in 1979 and 103·9 in 1984.

Investment has increased since the low in 1981, but table 3.9 of the Red Book forecasts that the increase in investment will now tail off, when it should continue to grow if our infrastructure is to be improved and our industrial competitiveness is to compare favourably, or more favourably, with that of other countries. Furthermore, Government capital spending is still about 40 per cent. below what it was 11 years ago.

There are more people in employment than in 1979, and there are proportionately more in work than in any comparable country, but there are nevertheless 3·25 million unemployed—2 million more than in 1979 and 150,000 more than at the time of last year's Budget for jobs. Nor can it be a matter of anything but the greatest concern that, in 1984, the year almost of greatest benefit from oil, our current balance of trade showed a surplus of only £51 million whereas there was a non-oil visible deficit of well over £11 billion, as the hon. Member for Stockport, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) noted.

In my judgment the situation is not rosy and the Government must think again. Perhaps the first thing that they should do is to see things as they are rather than as they like to believe they are. Secondly, they must break out of what my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) yesterday referred to as their self-imposed straitjacket. For that, the City might have to take a little of the blame. Nothing will detract from my admiration for what the City does for the country, most notably for our balance of payments, but it does a disservice by putting the fear of God into the Chancellor about what would happen if he expanded his borrowing requirement when, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East, said, there is no evidence that anything will be wrecked by an increase in the public sector borrowing requirement.

On Tuesday, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said:

"The great mistake of post-war demand management, which still has some devotees today, was to react to rising unemployment by injecting more money into the system, whether through the Budget or through the banks. So far from halting the upward trend of unemployment, this simply generated runaway inflation."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 789.]

I do not think my right hon. Friend remembers his modern history very well. Quite apart from anything else, he disregarded oil price increases. If he believed what he said in that paragraph, it is not in the least surprising that he adopts his policies.

Nobody is asking my right hon. Friend to throw money at the problem or to use it as confetti. If, sometimes in the past, demand has been raised too high, that is no reason now to keep it too low. If, for the current year, it is possible to overshoot the PSBR without disaster by £3 billion, mostly to cope with the consequences of a destructive series of events in the shape of the miners' strike, it is perfectly possible to have a PSBR of a similar £10·5 billion to be used for constructive purposes. After all, it is not the banks that put up interest rates, but the Chancellor. In any case, we know that interest rates are influenced far more by those in the United States and oil prices.

Someone infinitely greater than me recently asked how it was possible to have production unless one borrowed to produce. He who borrows can end up heading a great publishing house or some such. He who does not borrow will be lucky if he ends up with a corner shop. Indeed, he might have to find another job. The Government should have a little more courage, a little more faith and a little more confidence. If they demonstrate those characteristics, I have no doubt that the country will respond.

Let us have something approaching a U-turn. In industry, commerce or any other walk of life, if one set of policies fail they are ditched in the interests of the owners, the self-employed, shareholders and employees. Why therefore should the same not be so in politics? Is it fear of being laughed at by the media? It might be frightfully brave to continue to head for the rocks, but I do not think it very wise.

We should now have some changes in direction. We should remember a few more of the lessons of the past 100 years of our national history and that of the Tory party. In the end, we shall have and must have a larger programme of infrastructure investment because it is needed for the health of our economy. Why not now when there is so much slack in the economy? In the end, we must have a major housing improvement programme as, if we do not, much of our housing will deteriorate beyond the point at which it is repairable. So why not now? Possibly most important of all, as and when required, the Government must give more help to industry to enable it to compete at home and to develop new export opportunities.

To take another point from the hon. Member for Stockton, South, even if economic arguments have to be forgotten, we must for political reasons join the European monetary system. We almost missed the bus on the European Community and are in danger of doing so with the EMS. Like it or not, it is within the European Community that our destiny, hopes and future must lie. If we do not do those things, I fear for the future of our economy, for employment, for our balance of payments and for the social fabric of the country.

8.37 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): It is a great pleasure to speak after the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison). I only wish that he would bring more pressure to bear on the hon. Member for City of Chester (Mr. Morrison), the Minister of State, Department of Employment.

This is the sixth Conservative Budget for jobs. The first thing that struck me about it was the revelation of the prodigious multi-billion pound cost of the miners' strike —the cost of making war on our own people, styled as the enemy within—and what the Chancellor called a worthwhile investment. Paying that bill left no resources for anything else. That is why we have a timid, cautious non-Budget which will do nothing to boost industry and nothing for employment.

Last year's Budget was unveiled as a Budget for jobs and now, 12 months later, 150,000 more people are unemployed, interest rates are five percentage points higher and mass chronic long-term unemployment continues to grow. How many more of these mendaciously described Budgets for jobs can the unemployed take? The Chancellor's only contribution has been to strike at employment protection, making it easier to dismiss workers unfairly. That is a mean, contemptible and unnecessary sop to the hard Right. There is no evidence to suggest that those rights which were introduced by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) have deterred recruitment. On the contrary, they improved disciplinary procedures in industry and thereby improved industrial relations.

No one can assert that one year is not more than sufficient to assess the performance of an employee, and setting the clock back in this way, giving employers power to sack unfairly, will not create a single new job. It is a disgraceful reversion to Victorian values.

This is really a Budget for low pay. That is the theme that runs through it. Despite that, we all know that across the economy unemployment has grown much more rapidly for the low-paid groups than for the higher paid. In Hansard of 21 February, the game is given away. My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) put it rather well. He asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why employment was continuing to rise and he got the reply:

> "Unemployment is still rising because the majority of pay settlements are still too high."

Yet my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) asked the Secretary of State for Employment

> "why the reduction in real earnings in the motor vehicle industry relative to the economy generally in recent years has not led to an increase in employment in that industry."

The reply was:

> "The cost of labour is an important determinant of employment, but it is not the only one. Other elements such as productivity, international competition and the design and reliability of the final product also play a part."—[Official Report, 21 February 1985; Vol. 73, c. 516 and 563.]

The truth was blurted out there that there are other reasons—for example, cutting public expenditure in a recession, engineering an increase in interest rates. The high exchange rate over these years has destroyed British industry and our competitiveness. The exchange rate is far more important for our competitiveness than marginal movements in wages. These and the lack of investment are the things that have caused unemployment.

Let us look at wages councils. The far Right pressure groups wanting what they euphemistically call "more flexibility" have turned their attack on wages councils. These councils cover the most vulnerable, the weakest, the lowest paid of our people. Apparently, for the rich to work harder they need more incentives; the poor have to have lower pay.

[Mr. Ron Leighton]

I notice that the most vociferous critics of the wages councils all have very high salaries. They all enjoy very good employment contracts; and from that privileged position they all attack the weakest and the poorest. I find that morally repugnant because there is not a classical free market in wages. Wages, earnings and pay are not decided by the laws of supply and demand. The laws of supply and demand do not decide the pay of Members of Parliament, politicians, civil servants, the Armed Forces, the generals, the admirals, and the judiciary; and throughout industry we have collective bargaining. It is only the people at the bottom of the heap, who have no institutional machinery except the wages councils, who are to be hit. It is thought that if only we hit those at the bottom we shall catapult the country into some sort of economic recovery. I find that a morally reprehensible point of view.

However, there is no basis for this in fact. I put down a parliamentary question which was answered on 15 January this year. I was told that wages council rates 10 years ago, in 1974, were 73 per cent. of all industries and services. By 1984 they had gone down to 65 per cent. So there is no truth in the idea that wages councils are forcing up wages or are inflationary. It is all very well to have opinions and prejudices. Opinions are two a penny. We want the facts.

The Department of Employment commissioned a group of Cambridge economists and researchers to look into the question of wages councils. The report has not been published and I demand that the report be published so that we can see what that committee said. Let me quote a sentence from its conclusions:

"There can be no strong presumption that the retail wages councils have had an important independent employment effect."

Those are the facts; that is the truth.

Inquirers asked why firms had cut back on labour or reduced hours and they were told that the reason was a decline in trading positions. Firms were asked in what circumstances they would employ more staff. They replied, if there was an increase in sales and an increase in profits and if they had an increased share of the market or an expansion of business. They did not say it was because of wages councils. There is no point in trying to make a scapegoat of wages councils. If small firms are asked what is the cause of their problems, they say it is VAT or rates. They do not mention wages councils.

Nor is there any logical reason for young people to be excluded from wages councils. It would be against the whole spirit of the legislation. If adults need protection, why do not young people? They are the weakest and most vulnerable of all. Any increase in employment of young people brought about by a fall in their wages relative to adults, especially in wages council industries where they do similar work, would be largely at the expense of adults, who would be displaced. If employers were induced to employ more young people because of their low pay, the same inducement could lead to their dismissal on reaching adult age.

I should like to ask the Minister about the Auld report, with which he will be very familiar. The Auld committee was set up by the Home Office to look into the hours of shops and it was recommended that the hours should be relaxed. The committee was not asked to look at wages councils, but in the area it looked into this stuck out a mile. The committee said:

"Shopworkers need their protection in this respect as much as ever, in fact more so now when jobs are harder to find."

It said that it had been struck by how poorly paid many retail workers were, and said:

"We set great store by the preservation of the role of Wages Councils in fixing statutory minimum weekly rates, holidays and holiday pay for the retail trade."

It also said:

"Although it is not directly within our terms of reference, we strongly urge the retention for retail workers of the machinery of the Wages Councils for the fixing of satisfactory wages and premium rates."

It asked that their orders be properly enforced and wanted an adequately staffed wages council inspectorate.

That is the recent report of the committee set up by the Home Office. That is its recommendation and I should like to hear tonight that the Government will accept the recommendation of that reputable committee, not that of the various loony ideological think tanks which sometimes put forward their prejudices. We want the facts, not people's prejudices.

The Select Committee on Employment has been conducting an inquiry into this and we had evidence from the CBI. Perhaps the Minister would like to know what the CBI said to the Select Committee:

"There was little enthusiasm for the suggestion that all young workers should be excluded from coverage by wages councils."

In the appendix the CBI said:

"The question is whether youth pay and particularly the rates paid to young workers in the wages council sector have had an especially detrimental effect. In general, this does not appear to be the case."

So there is no rational or reasonable case at all.

I have pressed the Government for an extension of the community programme, as did the Select Committee last year. I am pleased to see this proposed, but I do not want the Government to spoil this for a ha'p'orth of tar. I want an upgraded scheme with more full-time jobs and an increase in the average payment of £63. The Government must obtain the approval and support of the trade unions, particularly those in local government. I wish the scheme well. But even with the numbers mentioned, the increase will represent only one in six of the long-term unemployed.

With the Select Committee, I have urged an extension and improvement of the youth training scheme and, therefore, I welcome the two-year scheme. However, the Government must be careful not to get it wrong. After all, the motives of many in the Government are suspect. People feel that it is a device to reduce the unemployment figures cosmetically, to keep youngsters off the streets and to reduce youth wages.

At present, the YTS is like a curate's egg. The latest reports of the Select Committee showed that one third of the schemes were unsatisfactory, that 56 per cent. of trainees left before the end of the scheme, and that one fifth—an extremely high number—of trainees left the scheme before the end.

We want proper arrangements made for the training of our young. Britain's record in this sphere is abysmal, we are way behind our competitors, and time is running out. Training the young must receive priority, but the first principle of any scheme is that it must be voluntary. There must be no compulsion. Any compulsion would kill the scheme stone dead.

That means that the Secretary of State must not succumb to the blandishments or pressures of his colleagues—we heard the Prime Minister on the subject today—and we want to end the meagre benefits that are available to the young who prefer to seek work. There must be no what might be termed compulsion through empty pockets. The scheme's success depends on its attractiveness and quality so that people want to join it.

Some hon. Members would pefer another form of compulsion. They want to remove young people from the ambit of wages councils and make youth earnings so low that there is no alternative to the YTS; in other words, to deny work to youngsters, so forcing them on to the YTS as the only option. If that were to happen, the YTS would be seen as a form of forced cheap labour. That would destroy the prospects of the nation having a decent training scheme for its young. We need major investment in the younger generation. We must devote the necessary resources to that task. Nothing could be more important for the future of the nation.

Is that what the Government intend? They originally said that they would spent £1 billion in the first year of the YTS. In the event, that was not spent. What do they propose to spend in the second year? The second year must be more ambitious, with more and better quality training, more training specifically related to jobs and higher allowances so that the scheme is attractive and is not seen as a second rate form of cheap labour.

How much, then, do the Government propose to spend on the scheme now? If they proposed to spend £1 billion in the first year, how much do they intend to spend on an improved second year scheme? When I saw the figures I was so astonished that I thought there had been a misprint. I read that, instead of £1 billion plus being spent in the second year, the Government intended spending a derisory £125 million in 1986-87 and £300 million in 1987-88. That is hopelessly inadequate, and one is bound to ask whether the Government are taking the matter seriously.

I spent two hours yesterday taking evidence in relation to the YTS from the CBI. The representatives of that organisation are shocked over what is proposed and it is clear that they remain worried, and that is why I remind the Government that the YTS is also voluntary for the employers. There is no reason why employers should not contribute to the scheme. After all, trainees work and contribute added value. Account should be taken of that.

That is also why trainees should have an adequate allowance. But for the Government to think that they can get off scot free and have a second year of the YTS for nothing—to have two years for less than they proposed to spend in the first year—is fatuous and asinine and casts doubt on their motives.

Do the Government want simply to massage the unemployment statistics, or are they serious about training the younger generation, our most precious possession? If they are serious, they will accept that if they could spend billions of pounds fighting the miners and more billions in the Falkland Islands, similar sums can be spent on our youngsters. That is what they must do and what I shall press for. We want a proper, high quality scheme with real training, adequate allowances and the prospect of a job at the end of training. The country needs and should settle for nothing less.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I wish at the outset to extend a warm welcome to all the efforts that are being made to improve the training of young people and the retraining of older people. It is tragic that so many youngsters should have been leaving school virtually unemployable when in many parts of the country—for example, in my constituency—there is a shortage of skills.

Schools and industry have drifted much too far apart and, as a former teacher, that makes me uneasy. It is an odd situation when young people who cannot get jobs at the age of 16 can join a good youth training course, such as that run by Rolls-Royce in Derby, and a year later 70 per cent. of them are first-class and welcome employees. That is probably an indictment of our schools system, and the efforts announced by my right hon. Friend this afternoon to improve the awareness of teaching staff about the needs of employers are appropriate and valuable.

One crucial problem concerns the rigidities and costs of employment, which have changed the patterns of employment under our noses without anybody having planned it. It is also an odd situation that when Mrs. Average takes her son for a job interview, not the lad but the mother gets the job these days. In the year to September 1984, 153,000 net new jobs were created, and 152,000 of them went to ladies working part-time. There is nothing wrong with that, but it is obvious that in many parts of the country the jobs are there and that the work force, to acquire them, will have to be more flexible, more skilled, more competent and cheaper.

It is sad to reflect that in many parts of the country the worker is, in far too many cases, not worthy of his hire and, as a result, he does not get hired. Thus, I support the end of wages councils. So long as we have a supplementary benefit system, there is, in economic terms, a minimum wage below which at least full-time wages cannot fall.

As for long-term unemployment, I welcome all the proposals in regard to the community programme. An imaginative set of measures has been set out today and I am particularly pleased to see, in view of my interest in health and social services, the proposals to help charities and voluntary organisations and the voluntary projects programme—a sensitive and valuable idea.

The Budget will also be welcome in the east midlands. It is clear, for example, that we have put far behind us the Socialist policies about which we have heard today from Opposition Members, many of whom have been talking absolute humbug. When in power, they imposed a tax on jobs which was called the selective employment tax. We have got rid of that. They had another tax on jobs called the national insurance surcharge, and we have got rid of that. That had price controls. The first time that I came to the House I was sitting in the Strangers' Gallery 19 years ago in 1966, and I heard Mr. Frank Cousins putting forward part V of the then Prices and Incomes Bill. I remember thinking then, "What an absolute shambles, and what a way to run a country; there has to be a better way."

The Labour Government also had an incomes policy. We have heard about an incomes policy this afternoon. One or two of my right hon. and hon. Friends are in favour of one. An incomes policy of the kind that we saw under Governments of all colours destroyed initiative, diverted effort into perks and into avoidance, and drove our best people overseas, including many of the people with whom I was at college in those years. Those were our best people, in the sense that they were the creators of employment. They have taken their ability to create employment elsewhere.

[Mrs. Edwina Currie]

We also heard from the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) about the alliance's income strategy. He did not actually say what the strategy of the alliance would be. As I understand it, at least part of it is to tax any pay rises over and above a certain level associated with inflation. The only country in the world that I know of which has a programme like that is Hungary, which I do not think is a model of economic probity. The only modern politician suggesting that, apart of course from the odds and sods in the alliance, is Senator Gary Hart of the United States, and we all know what happened to him.

The results of the Socialist policies in the five years of the Labour Government were miserable rates of growth of under 2 per cent., awful productivity with ¾ per cent. improvement, and a rapid rise in unemployment to the tune of it doubling within months. The last Chancellor who gave a forecast of what unemployment would be was the Labour Chancellor in 1975. He was desperately wrong and it has never been done since.

We had a level of inflation of over 20 per cent. I was a teacher when the Houghton award was given in 1974. We thought that we were doing well. We got a pay rise of 30 per cent. The following year inflation was 28 per cent. and we discovered we had been paid in paper money. Raising taxes to pay for the sort of pay rise that was then awarded throughout the public sector simply took money from companies in the private sector and put other people's work in jeopardy. How much better it is to approach the whole problem by saying to employers, "We will take less tax from you. We will give you fewer allowances and grants and let you decide how to invest the money. You can decide how to employ staff and pay them. You know better than Whitehall. You share the investment in the training scheme." It is about time we said that to employers. If they expect the benefits they should share the cost in a much more direct way than by taxing them and handing them back the benefits, as we have tended to do so far.

Whether or not this is a Budget for jobs we will find out. I think that it is. As has been said by the Opposition, it is certainly a Budget for the low-paid worker. I suppose that there is one sense in which it is a Budget for the little man. Given the comments that the Chancellor made about the importance of the family and getting the wife back into the kitchen, I guess that it is a Budget for the little woman as well.

We have 8½ million people earning less than £130 a week. The assistance that is being given to the individual and to his employer through changes in the income tax threshold, by raising thresholds by twice the level of inflation, and by changing the rules on national insurance contributions will be immensely useful. I am delighted that at last the Treasury has recognised that national insurance contributions are a tax. They are a nasty, regressive form of tax on the lowest paid. As a result, they are a deterrent to work, because so many people become better off at the margin by not working and making that a rational choice for themselves and their families.

I commented at Question Time this afternoon that some 260,000 people who are over working age will be taken out of tax. I had better make it clear that I welcome that. It is a good thing that pensioners should not have to pay tax on their hard-earned personal pension. Of the 800,000 people who will be helped by the tax rules, just over 500,000 will be of working age. That shows how difficult it is to change the rules to assist those who are at work.

Many of those who work and pay tax will still be paying national insurance contributions. The calculations show how hard it is to remove the poverty trap. If a man earns £80 per week, he will pay 5 per cent. in national insurance contributions in future and, taking benefits into account, he will achieve a net receipt of £95·33. If he gets a better job and earns £91 per week, he will pay 9 per cent. in national insurance contributions and he will be worse off because he will end up with a net receipt of £93·45. He will be almost £2 worse off by going for a job that brings in £11 per week more.

My right hon. Friend wants to shift the burden to the higher paid, but I am not sure that he was thinking of the £91 per week man as being higher paid. Perhaps we cannot eradicate the poverty trap. Perhaps all that we can do is shift it around. It seems to me completely wrong that a man cannot improve his position in life by working harder. I do not feel that we will have fulfilled all our Tory pledges until we have put that matter right.

What these measures should do is to shift attention to employing more men at lower wages instead of having people on overtime at time and a half and double time. At the end of 1984 the overtime worked in manufacturing industry — we have heard a lot about manufacturing industry today — was working out at over 12 million hours per month and was rising fast, with an average of 9 hours per man per week. That is equivalent to 300,000 extra jobs in manufacturing. I hope that some of the changes in the Budget will encourage the creation of those new jobs.

Altogether, nearly £1·25 billion in a full year will be spent on improving the employment prospects and initiatives for those on less that £130 a week. I should have thought that if the Labour party was really the party of the poor and the downtrodden, as its members claim, it would welcome the Budget.

I welcome the comments yesterday of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor about how the system discriminates against the family. It is surely an anomaly that a married man with a working wife gets two and a half times the single man's tax allowance, but a married man with a non-working wife gets only one and half times the single man's tax allowance. I shall watch with interest a change in the system such as the proposal at which my right hon. Friend was hinting yesterday that they should both have allowances of the same amount so that the married man with the non-working wife does not lose out.

There is one particular problem. If the Chancellor proposes to adopt the ideas of the Institute for Fiscal Studies—which would cost about £3 billion a year—although 2 million people would come out of tax, about 2 million ladies who currently are not paying tax will have to pay it in future, and they will not like it. We have a long way to go before it pays women to stay at home. I therefore welcome the Green Paper, which will look at the interaction of the tax and benefits system. It might well be better to look at the way in which the French tackled this problem in the post-war years and the ways in which we might better use the £4·25 billion of child benefit, perhaps making it payable only to women who stay at home with small children.

We heard much from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) about real jobs, and, no doubt, we shall hear more from the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). Three thousand coal miners in my constituency have real jobs. Much more could have been done in the Budget had it not been for the miners' strike. Right at the beginning of the strike, a year ago South Derbyshire miners took a vote and 83·5 per cent. voted to go to work. They have worked throughout. They have just voted to lift the overtime ban, and I am pleased to hear that. Yesterday, they refused to ballot on the 50p levy for dismissed miners. The general secretary of the NUM in south Derbyshire said that his men would murder him if any such suggestion were implemented in south Derbyshire. He said that the notion would be to pay these people who "threatened and abused" his workers. He said that, as far as south Derbyshire was concerned, they could "stuff it". That strike was expensive, destructive and pointless. All it did was slow down our growth to 2·5 per cent., which would have looked very nice during the Labour years.

Labour Members supported that strike, and the docks strike and the train strike. They support the teachers' strike and every strike going. We have yet to hear Labour Members say in the House, "There is a strike on, and we disapprove. We think that they should go back to work." Labour Members are more interested in disruption and disaffection than in the growth and development of our industry and country. All that that approach will do is to advertise to our customers all around the world British industry's unreliability. The result is that we lose customers, trade and jobs for ever. In that context, therefore, the measures of my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench are wise, workmanlike and worth while, and I am glad to support them.

9.8 pm

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): I suppose that after 12 minutes of listening to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), we have had our £5 worth of her. That was probably quite expensive at the time. We heard a unique speech from the hon. Lady, because she was the only Government Member to have been in any way supportive of the Government's policies. One can only hope that the hon. Lady's loyalty will be rewarded by a job in the Whip's Office, so that we may be denied for some time the privilege of listening to any more of her interventions.

I am sponsored by the National Graphical Association, so I wish to refer to the imposition of VAT on advertising in periodicals and journals. This is an unfortunate and unnecessary piece of taxation which is made no more palatable by the fact that it will not be imposed on books and the cover price of journals and newspapers.

The idea that journals and periodicals should be treated in the same way as radio and television is based on a misunderstanding of the economics of the media, which is likely to endanger many of the free sheets and to cause an increase in the price of newspapers. It is likely to result in a 3 per cent. decline in the volume of advertising, according to studies carried out by Price Waterhouse. It will have serious consequences for the print industry because free sheets have been a means whereby excess capacity and expensive new equipment has been taken up. Firms have invested in the new technology and have been encouraged by the printing unions to do so outside London. The provincial presses will be put into jeopardy, and many of the proposals for improvements in industrial relations could be jeopardised by this paltry taxation. Such is the poverty of the Government's thinking that their capability to raise taxation leads them to seek £50 million by a measure of this nature.

The disproportionate burden of this new form of VAT will be imposed on small advertisers, people who make use of classified advertisements and wish to get rid of equipment and so on. Such advertisements allow the poorest people the opportunity to sell things through the press. As charities are not in a position to claim VAT back, they will have to carry the burden right the way through. About £2·5 million a year is spent on advertising by the charities such as Oxfam and War on Want to bring to the attention of the public the significance of their case. Such an imposition on them, at a time when the Government are providing assistance in other forms to the charities, through the community programme—a move that we welcome—means that the Government are giving with one hand and taking away with the other. This tax is unnecessary and unwelcome. The amount of money that it will collect will be out of all proportion to the dissatisfaction that it will cause to the community.

9.12 pm

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): It is with some diffidence that I wind up this debate, given the high quality of the speeches that have been made. In particular, I am glad to welcome back my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), who was in excellent form. It must be comforting for the Government to appreciate that, although they have the less than total support of the right hon. Members for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour), for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) and for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and of the hon. Members for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) and for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley), they at least have the unstinting admiration of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie).

This Budget is significant only in its utter insignificance. To call it a "Budget for jobs" is to add the insult of a lie to the injury of mass unemployment. If it marks anything, it marks an end of pretence by the Government that they can fulfil their responsibility to the unemployed, and a consolidation of their strategy to disclaim responsibility for the unemployed. We have not a Budget of solutions but a Budget rich in excuses.

From now on, we shall be told two things ad nauseam by the Government. First, as the Chancellor put it in a broadcast in October last year, we shall be told that unemployment is not an economic but a social or human problem. In other words, the Government have nothing to offer the unemployed but their condolences. Secondly, Government strategy will, to an ever increasing extent, blame unemployment on the unemployed. Those in work will be congratulated, those out of work will be told that the fault is theirs for failing to take advantage of the new enterprise culture that the Government have visited on us and for their greed in asking for high wages. In other words, masochism will be elevated into a principle of public policy.

Central to that strategy is the lie frequently touted by the Government—we heard it again today—that the Government have done all that they can. We used to be told that unemployment would fall when recovery arrived. Looking back to the speeches that were made before the Government came to power in 1979, one sees that the Conservative party's constant refrain was that the Labour Government caused high unemployment, and its policies would reduce it. Now the Government realise that in fact unemployment will not come down and that it will not be substantially less at the end of their period of power than it is now. However, that has resulted in the Government not changing their policies but changing their definition of "recovery". I should like to examine in a little detail exactly what substance there is in the claim that the British economy has recovered.

[Mr. Tony Blair]

The Chancellor said that his speech set out the economic background to the Budget. It did not. It set out the economic performance of Britain in 1984 in the abstract. I should like to set Britain's economic performance in its proper context. The Chancellor laid great stress on output, investment and exports, and in particular he emphasised all those things in relation to manufacturing industry. It is true that in all those areas there was substantial improvement in 1984, but now let us consider the entirety of the Government's period of office — not just 1984, not just 1981 to 1985, as the Government are fond of doing, but the years 1979 to 1984 as a totality, in other words including the period 1979 to 1981, which is fact, and excluding the year 1985, which is forecast. When that is done and the figures for 1984 are put relative to the total years of the Government's period of office, particularly when the extent and depth of the recession in the late part of 1979 to 1981 is considered, a rather different picture emerges. It is right that output is up 2½ per cent. in 1984, but due to what happened in 1980 and 1981, average output under the Government is actually less than 1 per cent. per year. Let me put it another way. If output had continued at the level that it was at from 1974 to 1979, it would be some 6 per cent. higher today. In fact, the output for 1984 is average trend growth in a fully employed economy, and is wholly inadequate to deal with the depth of the recession that we were plunged into in 1980 and 1981.

Let us take investment. Total investment this year is up 6½ per cent. which, by itself, is attractive. Let us put it in context. In fact, 1984 is the first time that total investment has even achieved its 1979 level. It only now begins to compensate for the fall in investment of 5 per cent. in 1980 and of 8½ per cent. in 1981. Indeed, I have taken the most favourable assumption on investment because the truth about the 6½ per cent. figure is that to a large extent it is made up of firms using the changes in capital allowances to bring up their investment. If one looks at the Government's own forecast for total investment, one sees that it drops to 2 per cent. next year and to 1 per cent. in the first half of 1986.

Mrs. Currie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Blair: I shall give way in a moment, but I should like to finish this part of my speech.

Let us consider non-oil exports. They are up 9 per cent., says the Chancellor, but during 1984 the sterling index depreciated by some 10 per cent. There is no secret of competitiveness here. There is no magic cure that has been worked by the Government upon the economy to achieve that. Let us consider the opportunities. In the United States there has been an expansion of industrial production of about 15 per cent. in some 18 months, yet Germany, Italy and France all did better on exports to the United States than ourselves in that period. Of course, what picture of exports would be accurate without recording the non-oil trade deficit reached in 1983 for the first time? In 1984 it will be £4 billion, and in 1985 the Government forecast that it will actually rise.

Mrs. Currie: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman with great interest. Does he admit that business investment last year rose by 12 per cent. to an all-time high, as did investment in the construction and service industries? Will he tell the House during which year in the last Labour Government growth in the economy as a whole reached 2·5 per cent., which it did last year despite the miners' strike?

Mr. Blair: With great respect, the hon. Lady does not understand the point that I am making. It is not enough to look only at this year—we must look at the entirety of the Government's term of office. It is meaningless to say that recovery is happening now unless it is set in the context of what took place in the first years of this Government's term of office. That becomes even plainer when studying manufacturing industry.

Let us set the Chancellor's Budget claim in context. He said that manufacturing output was up by 3·5 per cent. —so it is, but it is still 9 per cent. below its level when they took office. He said that exports were up 10 per cent. Yet the Budget statement itself shows that the growth of manufacturing exports is no more than the world growth in manufactures for the entire year—and that with the current trade deficit. We have been told that investment in manufacturing industry is up 13 per cent.—yet it is still 30 per cent. below its 1979 level.

Even if we take 1984 in isolation, we must compare the output of this country with the average output of OECD countries. Their average this year was 4 per cent. to 5 per cent. compared with 2·5 per cent. for the United Kingdom. Even making allowances for the miners' strike, industrial production in the United Kingdom is the lowest of any OECD country. This is supposed to be the year of recovery. The truth is that over six years, measured by any sensible standard of success, this Government have failed.

All this has taken place at the same time as North sea oil has come on stream. Conservative Members do not like to hear too much about North sea oil or the waste of the revenue from it. By 1988-89, this Government will have received about £74 billion to £76 billion. This year alone, revenue is expected to be about £12 billion, and probably £13·5 billion next year. Let us suppose that that bonanza to the Government's revenue was not available—what would the private sector borrowing requirement be then? The truth is that we could never have managed without massive tax increases. We have had the revenue from North sea oil over and above what other countries have had, and viewed in that light the scale of the Government's failure is even greater.

When historians look back at this period of Government, they will do so with amazement and anger. How could a country be given such a windfall during recession, at a time when traditional industries were changing structurally and at a time when the world was coming to terms with the demands and advances of new technology, and used that windfall not to build growth, not to invest in new technology, not to finance industrial development, but to squander on the dole queues? I do not think that there are words adequate to describe the Government's failure. That is the true economic background of the Budget. Measured against that, we must decide whether the Budget is a Budget for jobs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) dealt with the community programmes and the YTS. The two main items that are supposed to bring about the supply side revolution in the British economy—the national insurance contribution changes and the tax allowances—must be set in context. For the purposes of argument, let us assume in the Government's favour that those two measures could, in principle, have the effect that the Government claim.

The net effect of national insurance contributions on employers' costs is £80 million. The total net effect of national insurance contributions would be £450 million. That is half, or less than half, of what was taken off last year in national insurance surcharge contributions. It was a good idea to do that, but unemployment rose during that year. The idea, therefore, that a measure that equals about half the benefit of those national insurance contributions will bring about a great revival in jobs in British industry is risible.

According to Treasury figures, tax allowances above the rate of inflation give about £2·32 a month to a single person and about £3·58 a month to a married couple on basic rates. The 1 per cent. rise in mortage rates in January and again today put £10 on repayments on a £10,000 mortgage and £20 on a £20,000 mortgage. In other words, these tax allowances have not nearly compensated for the rise in building society rates.

The notion, therefore, that as a result of these changes the economy will take off and the recession will end is laughable. That cannot possibly happen and, with respect, I do not believe that the Government think that it will happen. That is the economic background of an economy which is nowhere near coming out of recession and of a Budget which cannot honestly be called a Budget for jobs.

Why have the Government got themselves into this state? They are a victim of their own obsessions. It is often said that the Government are radicals, but in truth they are reactionaries. It is just that the life experience of most of us does not go back long enough to remember the time when such views were prevalent. My right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth said that the Government were applying the remedies of the 1930s. I wonder whether they are not in fact the shibboleths of the 1830s. Their belief in the sanctity and wisdom of market forces would gladden the heart of a 19th century Liberal, never mind someone of the 1930s.

The folly of their faith in the sanctity of markets in the modern world is best illustrated by the exchange rate crisis. One week the Prime Minister told us, and the press was briefed, that the market would decide the rate of exchange, and that there was no doubt about her resolution and steadfastness in that matter. The market did decide. But then, of course, there had to be a humiliating about-turn and intervention on a massive scale to restore the Government's credibility because of their initial position that market forces would operate. The outcome of this fiasco was a £1 billion extra load on the costs of industry's borrowing, and the highest real rate of interest in the Government's history. Yet they are a monetarist Government who told us that monetarist policies would reduce interest rates. Six years later interest rates are the highest that they have ever been.

We are in the same position with the question of investment versus tax cuts. I do not doubt that tax cuts may have an impact on jobs, although mainly through boosting consumption à la Ronald Reagan. The supply side argument to tax cuts seems to be extraordinarily remote. If I understand it rightly, it is that tax cuts replace wage demands, which ease the pressure on employer's unit costs so that with the extra money they can either recruit more employees or become more competitive and, thus, the economy is lifted out of recession. The assumptions behind that are questionable, if not bizarre.

In any event, the evidence shows that any effect of those tax cuts, or of even greater tax cuts than are in the Budget, is minimal. It is especially absurd that we should consider tax cuts as the engine of recovery, when a perfectly good means of attempting the process of recovery exists, that is, by investing in programmes of construction and in manufacturing industry. That would have a major and direct impact on jobs. As the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham said, the notion that, with 3·5 million unemployed, there is no shortage of demand in the economy is ridiculous. Infrastructre work, for example, can and must be done. If it is not done now it will have to be done later. We impose, in effect, a tax upon future generations by not doing it now. Delay in repair makes the remedy more expensive. Infrastructure work improves the efficiency of industry. The case on the grounds of necessity is overwhelming. The job creation impact is direct and immediate.

But there is not simply the case of the infrastructure. There is Government funding in other ways. Let us take what has happened—some of my hon. Friends who represent Scottish constituencies will be aware of this—to the Scottish Development Agency. It has brought together the electronics industry in Scotland. That is not dogma. It is common sense. The agency marries the community's resources for the benefit of the community. It is the Government enabling people by providing expertise and resources to release ideas and initiative within the community and build the economy. There is no magic in that. It rests upon ordinary human common sense. The Government reject that because it offends against the divine rule of the market.

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): Perhaps therefore the hon. Gentleman will congratulate the Government on supporting the SDA and encouraging its role.

Mr. Blair: It gives me great pleasure to congratulate them on that, but why do they not learn lessons from that? The lessons to be learnt are that the state and the Government have a role in the economy.

Allied to the myth of market infallibility is the equally absurd obsession with public spending. People treat public spending as if it were all the same. There is no idea of why we want public spending and what it should be used for. Let us look at where that obsession led the Government. It has often been said about the Budget that the Chancellor was boxed in by the market. He was not. He was boxed in by his own talisman—the PSBR. He has solemnly to assure us that the PSBR must keep to its stated target in 1985 or dire consequences will follow. He says that in a year when he sacrificed the talisman to the defeat of the miners' strike.

The point about the miners' strike in this context is not whether the Government were right or wrong to do what they did. We will disagree about that, and I do not have the time to persuade Conservative Members. If it were a sufficient priority to raise the money to defeat the miners, why is it a lesser priority to defeat unemployment? That is the issue.

Our economy could easily accommodate a more relaxed fiscal stance provided that the money was used to finance expansion. Our financial balance, as measured by the OECD, is tighter than Japan's and Germany's—countries whose economic growth will outstrip ours in 1985. The trick is not to set illusory targets based upon mistaken dogmas but to allow balance. The Government's great fault is that they are absolutists. They are attached to the money supply or the PSBR with the fever of medieval schoolmen with their metwands. When the Government fail to attain the targets they are surprised that they leave around them not confidence but confusion. That is the background to the Budget.

We are left with a mixture of empty compassion and exhortations to people to price themselves into work. The Government say that that will be aided by measures designed to reduce the protection that people have against exploitation. In place of the jobs which are being cut from manufacturing, the aim will be to push into work in low-paid, no-tech jobs those who to the Government will represent a token reduction in the unemployment figures. It is a policy of the most contemptuous cynicism. It is difficult adequately to describe the hypocrisy of those who advocate solutions for others that they would never dream of accepting for themselves.

The tragedy is that unless we alter the economic agenda that the Government have set we will not deal with the problems that the country faces. What are those problems? They are the structural changes in our traditional industries, the impact of new technology and how we integrate the new technologies into our traditional industries. I was appalled to see that the trade deficit, for example, in information technology is now some £2·3 billion. In electronics and electrical engineering, it is about £8·3 billion.

How do we maintain adequate research and development? How do we ensure that the training of people in these new disciplines is adequate? Above all, how do we deal with demographic change and mass unemployment? These are tremendous problems. They are too important to be left to the whim of market forces. We need a Government policy not of abdication but of action. We need the partnership of Government, industry and people in order to provide resources and enable the ideas and initiative of people to prosper. I believe that it was the right hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) who said that there are resources within the community that are not liberated. The crime of this Government is that they do not liberate the resources of the community.

People refer to the immorality of unemployment. What about the waste of unemployment: the waste of the vitality and energy of our young people? This is a Government of waste and, above all, of inefficiency in the use of resources, personified by a Prime Minister who enjoys exercising power and who wields power like an ancient despot but who refuses to use power creatively for the benefit of the people in the community. The Prime Minister is concerned more with demonstrations of autocratic behaviour than with dealing with these real problems. Where is the determination to combat mass unemployment? Where is the conviction that poverty must be eradicated? Where is the courage to recognise that we shall not solve the problems of the present by gazing resolutely into the past?

The challenges that we face are considerable. We can and should face them as a community, not as individuals in competition with each other in the race for survival. If we do not begin to tackle mass unemployment the casualty will be not merely those who are unemployed but, I fear, democracy itself. This Budget has been hailed by the Chancellor as a Budget for jobs. So were all the others. We can attach no more credibility to this Government now than we did then. We shall not truly begin to make a start on rolling back mass unemployment and creating jobs in industry for our people until this Government have gone.

9.37 pm

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I begin by welcoming the participation of the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) in our debate. I believe that it is the first time he has spoken from the Opposition Front Bench in a Budget debate. We shall look forward to many more contributions from him during the proceedings upstairs on the Finance Bill.

There have been many distinguished contributions and contributors to our debate today. I recall what was said by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan)—that the "buzz" word is presentation and that one should be congratulating hon. Members on presentation. It would be churlish of me not to congratulate all the Privy Councillors on both sides of the House who spoke from the Back Benches on the very adequate presentations that they made, but if one were to choose a man of the debate there is no doubt in my mind that on a free vote of the House the award would go to a parliamentary gem of wit and brilliance from my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Crichley). Those hon. Members who were privileged to be in the House will remember his contribution, I suspect, rather longer than many of the others, including my own.

Budget debates tend to highlight the differences between the parties. Therefore, I was particularly pleased that a consistent theme throughout nearly all of the speeches today and, indeed, throughout the Budget debate has been support for the Government's proposal to extend the youth training scheme. The two-year scheme, with a recognised qualification at the end, is an extremely important development. This was recognised by the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), who spoke on behalf of the alliance. I assure him that the quality of the training element within the extended scheme is of considerable importance. Attention will be paid to it by my right hon. Friend and his colleagues at the Department of Employment.

I was also particularly glad that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) positively endorsed these plans. However, I was a little sorry that his political spleen forced him into questioning our motives and that he should talk of fiddling the figures. It is important that the message should go out from the House that all hon. Members support this endeavour to extend, deepen and improve our youth training scheme, and I am delighted that they have done so in our debate today.

The restructuring of the national insurance system has been given a more guarded welcome. When the Leader of the Opposition rose immediately after my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had introduced the Budget, he claimed paternity for the idea and said that it was in the 1983 Labour manifesto. But having checked the manifesto, we now realise that it was not there at all. The only thing stated there was that the upper earnings limit should be removed for employees. But I do not quarrel too much with the Leader of the Opposition. I have always been told that that is the hardest speech that the Leader of the Opposition ever has to make, because he is expected to rise just after the Chancellor of the Exchequer has sat down and to make an impromptu speech on the Opposition's view of the Budget. In those circumstances, he is allowed some poetic licence.

But there can be no doubt that restructuring brings considerable benefit to the lower paid. Indeed, I was sorry that the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) spoke of the Government's policy as being—I think that I got his words right—to impoverish the lower paid. That description cannot be applied in any way to the restructuring of national insurance contributions. Indeed, I shall give some figures shortly.

Some Opposition Members have criticised the new steps at £55 and £90 and have claimed that they widen the poverty trap. Of course, it is true that the big poverty trap, where there is a high marginal rate of tax under the existing system, will be reduced and replaced by smaller traps that are less severe further up. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) suggested that the lower earnings limit should be turned into a threshold like the one we have for income tax. But that would be enormously expensive, and would cost about £6·5 billion to tackle both employer and employee contributions at present contribution rates, and with a starting point of £35·50.

It has also been suggested that we should increase the lower earnings limit to £50. But that is a very odd solution to propose, because it would replace the present "cliff edge" of £3·71 for employers and £3·20 for employees with an even bigger one of £5·23 and £4·50 respectively. It is open to the same criticism as hon. Members have made of the Government's proposals. It would reduce contributions for about 1 million employees earning between £35·50 and £50 a week, and they would be better off. But they would be faced with a far greater disincentive than at present to increase their earnings. Moreover, it would remove about 1 million people from entitlement to national insurance benefits and would leave them to rely on the means-tested safety net.

Last night, the hon. Member for Great Grimsby suggested that we should give new jobs a national insurance holiday. I take it that he means——

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): The Minister is supposed to be answering today's debate, not yesterday's.

Mr. Hayhoe: These points were raised, but were not dealt with last night. I think that they were referred to again during the debate, and it is useful to respond to them.

The idea is to exempt for one or two years workers taken off the unemployment register. There could be real difficulties at the end of one or two years. The employers might seek to avoid paying the extra 10·45 per cent. by replacing that worker with another fresh from the unemployment register, who would also qualify for the holiday. There are real difficulties in the idea of a restructuring based upon a holiday from paying national insurance contributions.

Last night, the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) talked about the problem of piece-rate workers manipulating—[Interruption.] I want to deal with this point in connection with the points made by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald). We have replaced the sharp graduation at £35·50 by two smaller steps. The Opposition seem to dismiss as irrelavent the fact that those under the new limits will have significantly higher take-home pay. They will be better off. With the changes in the tax thresholds, a single person earning just under £90 a week will be almost £3 a week better off. For a family where the husband is on average earnings and the wife earns, say, £50 a week, there will be an improvement of nearly £5 a week. A young married couple both in employment and both earning just under £90 a week will benefit, with the changes in tax and the restructuring of national insurance, to the tune of £6·50 a week.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth suggested that those measures, which give a significant cash advantage in real terms to the lower paid, amount to a policy of impoverishing them. If my tax was reduced by such an amount, I would not mind being impoverished myself.

Mr. James Callaghan: The hon. Gentleman should get his quotation right. What I said was very simple and clear. I said that the Government's policy as a whole appeared to be that of tax cuts for the rich and wage cuts for the poor. I stand by that.

Mr. Hayhoe: The effect of raising income tax thresholds is to give the largest advantage in percentage terms to the lowest paid. When one adds the national insurance restructuring, the improvement for the lower paid is very significant indeed. To describe that as a policy of tax cuts for the rich and lower wages for the poor is an absurd invention.

All that the Opposition have proposed in connection with national insurance contributions is to abolish the upper earnings limit, as I understand it, for employees as well as employers. The Government's action involves a massive redistribution of £800 million towards improving the cost-benefit position of employing the lower paid and will lead, by any standards, to future improvements in job opportunities for that group.

If the upper earnings limit were also abolished for the employees, there would be additional taxation for those earning £13,700 a year or more. The amount of tax that they pay on their incomes above that level would be increased by 9 per cent. For a very large number of people working in industry and commerce and earning between £15,000 and £20,000 a year, that would be a severe disincentive. I hope that people in that salary band will realise that the Opposition have made it abundantly clear that they would want such people, as well as those on even higher incomes, to pay more tax.

As I am responsible in the Treasury for indirect taxes I should like to say something about my right hon. Friend's promise to propose legislation this year to implement the recommendations of the first and second volumes of the Keith report on VAT. I hope that they receive general support. The House is traditionally the guardian of the British people against the depredations of the tax collector. The details of our proposals will be examined with great care by the House. The Government aim that the revenue authority should be given the powers necessary to do the job that Parliament has assigned to it—no more, no less. Many of my hon. Friends have been worried about the proposed limitations on appeals to independent VAT tribunals, especially when the taxpayer feels that he has a reasonable excuse for failing to comply with the law. I recognise the importance of this matter and assure the House that full account is being taken of those representations.

In considering the proposals, I am sure that the House will bear in mind the sizeable amount of money involved. The average outstanding arrears on VAT are £1·2 billion. We hope to halve that figure by 1988-89 as a result of implementing the Keith recommendations. Speeding up the collection of that revenue will have a material effect on Budget making in the next three years. Those who deliberately delay payment of their VAT are getting an interest-free loan from the Revenue. That is unfair to taxpayers who pay their tax on time and to competitive traders who have to get their loans commercially and pay interest on them. I hope that Lord Keith's report, which was designed as a balanced package and should be seen as a whole, will be agreed to.

Sir William Clark: The whole House accepts that those who deliberately hold back payments of VAT should be penalised. May I take it from what my hon. Friend has said that there will be a right of appeal if a taxpayer is fined? According to the present clauses, there is none.

Mr. Hayhoe: I hope that my hon. Friend will read with great care what I said in which the words "reasonable excuse" appear. He will see what I said about the representations that are now being received. The clauses have yet to be tabled in the Finance Bill. The recommendations of the Keith committee have already been the subject of enormous public consultation since they were published in 1983. As my hon. Friend knows, the draft clauses were published in the autumn of last year. It is now for the House to examine the clauses which the Government will table. I assure my hon. Friend that account is being taken of those representations in amending the draft clauses which have previously been circulated.

I should like to say something about the relief of goods temporarily imported for process or repair. Since the withdrawal of postponed accounting for import VAT, my Treasury colleagues and I have received many representations from all parts of the House about the burden of financing import VAT on the full value of goods temporarily imported for repair. It was argued that this burden is often out of all proportion to the value of the processes and could place the United Kingdom company concerned at a disadvantage compared with our competitors overseas. This was certainly not what my right hon. Friend intended in withdrawing postponed accounting last year.

We have therefore undertaken an urgent review and concluded that there should be relief for goods imported temporarily for repair, or for processing which does not change their identity, and reexported, providing ownership is not transferred. The processors concerned are exporters of their services and the relief will enable them to regain competitiveness in their markets, to the benefit of the United Kingdom economy and of the workers in those firms and companies.

As an additional relief, re-importers of goods temporarily exported for process or repair will pay import VAT only on the cost of process or repair carried out abroad.

Mr. Eggar: I particularly thank my hon. Friend for that concession. It is very welcome, as he knows, particularly to Johnson Matthey, which is involved in processing precious metals.

Mr. Hayhoe: From the number of representations and letters which I have had from hon. Members on both sides of the House I know that this is an important concession which will be welcomed, particularly by the firms and workers in the companies concerned.

Without getting too deeply involved in the very broad context of the arguments about public expenditure and tax cuts, in the whole of the Budget debate—which I am sure my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will be addressing when he winds up on Monday—there really is no consensus, as the hon. Member for Sedgfield suggested in a television broadcast in which I was participating on Tuesday night, on the relative merits of tax cuts and public expenditure. Time and again in this debate hon. Members on both sides of the House have suggested that we solve our problems by greater public expenditure.

I can only say to them and to those people who have said that there is a shortage of demand within the economy that paragraph 3.21 of the Red Book tells a very different story. It shows import volumes, excluding oil, up by 10·5 per cent. last year and the import of manufactured goods up by the same amount. Hon. Members in all parts of the House have been making the point that we now have a deficit on our trade in manufactures. In fact, last year, as I have said, imports were up by over 10 per cent. and there was a 5 per cent. growth in domestic demand, which means that there was greater import penetration.

It is not lack of demand that is leading to the situation in which nearly half the cars in this country are imported. The demand is there. The problem is that British manufacturers are not producing goods of the right quality, at the right price or at the right time. As an engineer before I became a Member of the House, I look at the British engineering industry and remember its dominance and the number of products of which we were great exporters to the rest of the world. It is not a question of Government public expenditure; it is a question of all concerned with those industries — management, workers, designers, salesmen and everyone else—having failed to meet the challenge. As a result, jobs have been lost, but I am delighted to see that in many parts of the British economy, as a result of restructuring, of new investment, of getting rid of overmanning and of a better attitude among the trade unions, we are now becoming more competitive. We shall then be in a better position to produce goods that our own people and people abroad want to buy.

Opposition Members bemoan higher interest and mortgage rates, yet they call for increased borrowing, which would make matters worse. They search out statistical comparisons to try to prove that taxation is higher now than it was in 1979. At the same time, they demand increased spending, which would inevitably mean higher taxes or higher borrowing, or a mixture of both. They regurgitate the words and promises that they swallowed after their self-admitted failure to convince the electorate in 1983, and as with any other regurgitation it is unattractive.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Monday 25 March.

International Famine

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

10 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise the question of international famine. I begin by reminding the House that 30 million people in Africa are facing immediate starvation. They are already desperately hungry. This famine is, without doubt, the worst crisis to reach the hearts and minds of the British people, and it has led to a flood of donations to the various aid agencies.

The Government say that they have spent £90 million so far this year on famine relief, but that is one tenth of 1 per cent. of their total budget. Far from increasing their overseas aid, the Government are cutting back. In 1979, we spent £939 million, but by this year that sum has fallen in real terms by 18 per cent. and it is due to fall by a further 2 per cent. next year.

This runs directly counter to public opinion. A recent survey commissioned by Oxfam showed that 76 per cent. of those interviewed thought that the Government should spend the same amount or more, while only 18 per cent. thought that they should spend less. A few days ago a petition containing more than 750,000 signatures was presented to 10 Downing street by seven aid agencies. It called, as I do tonight, for more emergency aid, the immediate release of EEC surpluses and more money for the type of long-term development work that can avert future famine.

At present, most Government aid is used for industrial development—for building dams and airports and other prestigious projects—whereas the crisis facing Africa demands a more urgent approach. Aid should be used to reafforest denuded land, find water in drought areas and improve subsistence agriculture, not to provide more power stations for capital cities.

Another challenge for the British Government is to speed up the present lumbering bureaucracy that makes EEC food aid so slow to reach famine victims. It was only after the public started screaming that Europe's bulging grain store split a little of its surplus in the direction of starving Africa. The public again showed imagination and compassion when they generously gave about £40 million to Ethiopia, compared with £26 million from the Government. If we are not careful, Ethiopia might be the beginning rather than the end, for it happened in spite of all the warnings that were given, not least in this House.

Great problems are building up elsewhere. The United Nations has strongly urged us to apply our thoughts to the Sudan. We are told that, unless food aid improves enormously, 4·5 million people will suffer from malnutrition by June of this year, and that country was once British. Indeed, India, with its own major problems, was at one stage committed to give more in aid than the whole of the EEC put together to that part of the world.

We have benefited greatly from the wealth of the British Empire and it is not unreasonable that we should give something in return for the fruits of past colonialism. The crises in Ethiopia and in the Sudan were predictable and were predicted. We knew of the drought; we knew that the rains had failed and we knew of several harvest failures as well. Yet, if we are being honest with ourselves, we should admit that our response was appalling.

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

The aid agencies told us of the problems in plenty of time, if we had wanted to deal with them. Are we to assume that our embassies and high commissions did not tell us? What would have happened if that television crew had not been in the right place at the right time? What would have happened if the public imagination had not been stirred by people like Michael Burke and Richard Kershaw? The crisis was not in Ethiopia alone but was widely spread throughout Africa and beyond, as it is today.

The quality of aid is important, especially viewed in the context of future development. The last available figures for 1983 suggest that United Kingdom aid to Africa amounted to £200 million, but of that only £27 million went to agriculture and natural resources. The rest went to industry, power stations and so on. Of course, much of that was important but much of it was simply prestigious. We could have done more with £74 million than simply build a power station in Khartoum.

We can see a global pattern emerging in the Government's contribution to the OECD. Of our aid programme, 13 per cent. goes to agriculture and related issues compared with 27 per cent. from the United States and 33 per cent. from Switzerland. Certainly there has been much talk and wagging of heads culminating in the recent pledging conference in Geneva. What was the outcome of that conference? I congratulate the Minister on giving more money, but let him not congratulate himself. If he had persuaded the Foreign Office and the Treasury to give even half the new amount five or six months earlier, considerable heartache would have been prevented. What is being given is too little and too late. It is pragmatism in place of a strategy. It is public relations instead of a planned approach. As a development policy for the future it is not good enough.

The British Government have provided development aid to Ethiopia via their contributions to multilateral agencies, notably the World Bank and the EC. It would be misleading to say that those contributions are sufficient. Ethiopia, one of the poorest countries on earth, receives lower per capita external investment than any country in the Third world. The chronic under-resourcing of that country does much to increase its vulnerability to drought.

The obvious weakness in coordinating international efforts adds to the difficulties. Indeed, the problem of refugees in the Sudan, with people coming from Ethiopia, Chad and other countries, makes it clear not only that we require much real coordination between developed countries but that we need an effective early warning system as well.

As well as asking the Minister to clarify what took place at the Geneva conference, I should like to put some specific questions to him. I invite him again to respond to the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) on Monday about the International Fund for Agricultural Development. Will he accept that emergencies will continue to arise in Africa unless IFAD and other agencies doing similar work can get the funds that they need to support and promote small scale domestic food production? Directing British aid to famine relief without supporting IFAD is storing up trouble for the future.

What matters did the Minister raise this week with the Ethiopian Foreign Minister? Was the extra money offered at Geneva made possible by cuts in other aspects of the aid budget, or is it coming from the contingency fund? If so, how much is left in that fund?

Is the Minister satisfied with Britain's contribution to the 21 African countries most in need of food aid? How can he be satisfied, when the United Kingdom gave 35,000 tonnes of grain compared with 109,000 tonnes from Australia, 200,000 tonnes from Canada, 2·4 million tonnes from the United States, 133,000 tonnes from the Netherlands, 56,000 tonnes from Italy, 33,000 tonnes from Sweden and greater amounts from Germany and France? Is the hon. Gentleman pleased with our contribution of grain to the Royal Red Cross in Ethiopia, when compared with 40,000 tonnes from the United States, 17,000 tonnes from Bulgaria, 25,000 tonnes from Canada and 10,000 tonnes from Sweden, the United Kingdom gave a meagre 6,500 tonnes? How can the hon. Gentleman be satisfied with that?

It is not enough simply to relieve the symptoms of poverty after disaster has struck; there is a need for a long-term development programme. We must tackle the problems of agriculture, health and social development to deal effectively with the underlying causes of poverty. I accept that many intractable problems are rooted in the lack of political will on the part of some Third-world Governments who pay mere lip service to the basic needs of the great mass of their people. It is impossible to ignore the negative response — some might say, despite the whole Brandt exercise, the indifference — of most developed countries to the structural inequalities between North and South. The absence of political will to deal with the structural causes of poverty by Governments of the North and South is all too obvious in the growing food crisis. The number of hungry people has roughly doubled during the past decade, so that today more than 500 million people—one eighth of humanity—are suffering chronic malnutrition.

The debt crisis represents an intolerable burden on the poor. Mr. Clausen, the chairman of the World Bank, recently explained the problem. He said that developing countries took on high levels of borrowing in the 1970s when Western banks were keen to lend out the increased oil revenues on deposit. After 1980, as Mr. Clausen put it, the Third world was doubly hit—interest rates went up sharply and, at the same time, commodity prices fell dramatically, leaving them less to pay. All this had a devastating effect on the lives of the poor.

At the very least, I would urge that new solutions to the debt crisis should be explored to take the burden off the poor, to encourage long-term sustainable development and to give priority to local food self-sufficiency. We should be strongly urging the IMF to accept the need for changes in IMF conditionality to achieve these objectives and end enforced austerity measures that serve to aggravate hunger and poverty.

I ask the House to recognise, too, that, on top of all their other problems — world recession, interest rates, commodity prices, higher costs for manufactured goods — Third-world countries have seen their financial and development aid fall. In 1983, the share of British national income allocated to aid dropped to almost the lowest level for 20 years. Bilateral aid—despite a noticeable increase in public awareness—has fallen this year in real terms. As I have said earlier in relation to the Oxfam poll, this trend runs directly counter to public opinion.

Time after time, the Government have said that they subscribe to the United Nations target of 0·7 per cent. of GNP for overseas aid. So far, Britain is only haf way there and may be moving backwards. The Chancellor's Budget should have at least set a timetable for reaching that target, but he did not say a word on the subject. The greatest challenge is to use this aid to help effectively the wretched of this earth to become free from disease and starvation.

I have expressed concern about the emphasis on the growth of United Kingdom aid and trade provisions, which are a central feature of Government policy. In this, as in so many other matters, they are out of step with the thinking of the British public. The Oxfam opinion poll showed that only 14 per cent. of the respondents thought that the main purpose of British aid should be to help to obtain export orders for British goods from developing countries. British goods are important to those who produce trucks at Bathgate or agricultural equipment in the midlands, but local alternatives should be encouraged. People are concerned that the Government should ensure that bilateral and multilateral aid is allocated and development criteria are not under ideological considerations. If any priority is given, it should be to Governments who have demonstrated their commitment to social development and the needs of the poor. On that basis, the Government's record on aid to Nicaragua hardly stand up to examination. Britain gave far more bilateral aid a decade ago to the Samosa dictatorship, which left its people in abject poverty. That has shown in the Government's memoranda to the OECD. On page 4, it says:

"a greater focus of aid resources on those sectors where it is felt there was a need for assistance, where local policies seemed likely to be supported of aid efforts".

Most people would describe that as a fair view, but it is not one that is being followed in that part of the world.

The inconsistencies in United Kingdom policies towards central America are evident in the fact that Costa Rica, with a GNP that is 1·5 times greater than that of Nicaragua, receives almost 40 times more United Kingdom aid per person than Nicaragua, whereas Nicaragua, with an acknowledged good record of spending development aid, according to Baroness Young, received bilateral aid from Britain of only £64,000 in 1983 and even less last year. Neighbouring Honduras received over 100 times more.

Similarly, the people of Kampuchea are being frozen out, despite the urgent need for humanitarian and development aid. Given the Government's rhetoric on East-West relations, they should worry that this could fuel a self-fulfilling prophecy of dependency on pro-Soviet countries. There are parallel dangers in aid to Namibia, and I invite the Minister to respond on that point.

It is one of the ironies of our time, in view of technological advances, that there should be such poverty amidst plenty in our universe. It is the will that matters. A country such as ours, which sent £1,800 million of arms equipment to the Third world countries last year, can produce a better aid policy in its own right and as an example to others. International famine and world poverty offer a greater threat to peace than any other factor; and time is not on our side.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): The hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) chose the subject of international famine, which is one of the greatest concern. I shall concentrate on that rather than following him into the paths of Latin American aid and development. Whatever one thinks about the politics of Nicaragua, the level of income per capita is well above the low level of the countries to which we give grant-aid. On that score alone, it does not qualify strongly for assistance from the United Kingdom.

It is right that the hon. Gentleman should have brought the subject before us. It is a little time since we last debated it, and the terrible famine persists. As the House knows, there is a debate tomorrow that is likely to go over some of the ground that we have covered this evening. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the British public still clearly feel deeply involved with, and concerned about, events that are happening in Africa, above all.

I should like to give the House a brief summary of what the Government have been doing to meet the immediate food crisis in Africa, where the situation is so serious. Before doing so, I want to assess briefly the causes of the famine, and something of how the present crisis has arisen. Obviously, the immediate cause is the succession of droughts which have struck in some parts of eastern and western Africa. I emphasise the succession of droughts, because in most of these areas drought is the recognised occupational risk for farmers and herders, and they take steps to insure against it. They can usually get by if the rains fail once, twice or even three times in a row, but beyond that all their resources are used up and there is nothing for it but to seek relief. One main lesson for all of us is the need not only to improve the early warning system run by the FAO but to see it supplemented by more efficient field observations on the ground.

However, behind the weather lie other factors which have made the risks much worse. The first of these is the growth of population. Kenya, for instance, had 2 million people at the turn of the century and now has 20 million —and this figure might again double by the end of the century. Yet already people are moving into the drier lands where the rain fails more often than not. Bush and tree are cleared for cultivation and firewood, and the fragile balance of nature is seriously unsettled.

Then there is the preoccupation of many African Governments with procuring cheap food for the towns. This has led to insufficient reward for the peasant farmers —often amounting to near-exploitation—and increasing calls for food aid.

In Ethiopia, for instance, farmers in surplus areas are not allowed to sell their grain freely in deficit areas like Tigre or Wollo. So the farmers produce less and the supply in the needy areas also shrinks. These things are within the capacity of each Government to tackle.

I should like to refer to the short-term factors, but before I do so I shall take up one or two points from the hon. Gentleman's speech. One is that he said that only £27 million of our aid to Africa went to agriculture last year. That is not true. That figure does not include either our programme aid, much of which is used on agriculture requirements, or our technical co-operation. Counting those in, the share of natural resources expenditure is broadly one third of our bilateral aid to Africa. It is important to remember that a road project, for instance, can be of real value in the development of agriculture in those countries.

With regard to IFAD, I told the House at Question time on Monday this week that I very much hoped that we would be able to achieve a replenishment, and I gave the figure of $600 million as the sort of figure at which we were aiming. Incidentally, in doing so I apparently completely satisfied the Opposition Front Bench spokesman on the subject.

I now refer to the short-term factors. When famine strikes, as it has done, only one human response is possible, and that has been given in generous measure by both the British people and the Government. It is perhaps worth reminding the House that in the two years up to last October, when the television films moved people so greatly, the Government had committed over £15 million, through all the available channels, specifically to relieve famine conditions in Ethiopia. So the idea that we had done nothing before October's television films is untrue. When the full scale of the tragedy became apparent we stepped up our aid, and we have since committed another £34 million for use in Ethiopia. In the Sudan we have committed over £14 million for use since last October, but that is not the whole story. As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, in the financial year that is about to end we have committed over £100 million to the relief of suffering and famine in the whole of Africa.

Almost half of all that is going through our membership of the European Community, which, as hon. Members will know, has launched a very large emergency programme. This programme gives effect to the commitment made at Dublin in early December that the Community and member states would provide 1·2 million tonnes of grain to famine-affected countries in Africa this year. A good deal of work has been done by the Commission in mobilising the first part of this programme —around £50 million is now in the hands of local Commission delegations and international and voluntary agencies, a further £50 million is shortly to be distributed, and the first 175,000 tonnes of cereals from the Community's 1985 programme have been committed. Commitments for 1985 by the Community and member states have reached the target set at Dublin for the worst affected countries, and stand at 1·5 million tonnes for all drought-affected African countries. But I entirely accept that the need now—as I told the vice-chairman of the Commission, Senor Natali, a few days ago—is to press on with delivery.

As for our intentions, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, I told the United Nations conference in Geneva that for the 12 months beginning in April the Government propose to provide a minimum of £30 million as a bilateral allocation for the victims of catastrophe in Africa, whether they be drought victims, refugees or others suffering from disaster. This will come from our aid budget for next year. Part of it will be drawn from the Contingency Reserve—there is no doubt that we shall have to use that reserve—and part will come from our food aid allocation. We expect to spend at least another £30 million as our share of Community action, which altogether will mean a minimum of £60 million. As I said in Geneva, if more is necessary we shall do all that we can to find it.

In the meantime, millions of men, women and children remain at risk in Ethiopia, the Sudan and elsewhere. I share fully the concern that has been expressed about the problems of supply and logistics that have left such large numbers at risk. Others may be getting enough food, but remain without proper shelter. I have seen these things on the ground.

I should like to pay tribute to the dedication of relief workers of many different nationalities, including the countries concerned. They are working as hard as those who have come from overseas. I am sure that the House would wish me to pay a special tribute to the work of the Royal Air Force in delivering supplies to remote corners of Ethiopia by means of its Hercules aircraft. We are considering how long the team should remain there. Whatever happens, we will not withdraw it without giving at least a month's notice. The RAF has set a real example in efficiency and also in the spirit in which it has appproached the operation, which has been quite outstanding.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the conference that I attended in Geneva last week. It was designed to draw attention to the needs of the affected African countries. There is no doubt that it succeeded in that purpose. One hundred countries sent delegations, including a large number of Ministers. President Nyerere, speaking for the Organisation of African Unity, set the tone early when he spoke with great realism of African Administrations' shortcomings in forecasting and dealing with the emergencies on the scale now before us. He recognised that African agricultural production is not meeting the need.

During the conference all donor countries made statements about the aid which they expect to make available to Africa in 1985. It will be difficult and will take some time to sort out all the details, but we have a provisional idea of the picture of cereals food aid, which is the essence of the matter, of which 6·9 million tonnes have been requested by the African Governments. Much of that is for balance of payments aid rather than direct relief aid. Those needs and harvest prospects require close scrutiny. Against that, 5·5 million tonnes have been firmly pledged by donors. Another 945,000 tonnes have been provisionally pledged, making a total of 6·445 million tonnes, leaving an apparent gap of about 450,000 tonnes.

Particularly important are the needs of the worst affected countries. A provisional analysis shows that well over 1 million tonnes of food aid is already in sight for both Ethiopia and the Sudan. About 300,000 tonnes must still be found for each of them and for the five most affected countries of the Western Sahel. Taken together, that is a gap of just under 900,000 tonnes. However, we expect further allocations to be translated from pledges into commitments.

That picture is not without certain encouragement. The quantities of food aid pledged are truly massive. However, we cannot be complacent—and in particular we cannot be complacent about the great problem of ensuring that the food is delivered on time. When I was in the Sudan I was struck by that more than by anything else. The food need there is all too evident, but it is crucial to get as much as we can to the Sudan before the rains come, we hope, in June. When I returned from the Sudan I pledged another 30,000 tonnes of food aid from the United Kingdom. I made it clear that I attached great priority to getting it there as quickly as possible.

In June, we shall know whether the rains will fall and what the prospects are for the next harvest. That will be a crucial moment. In the meantime, as I told Commissioner Natali, it is crucial that all countries in the European Community translate the substantial pledges into actual food on the ground. Until it is actually reaching the sad people who occupy these countries, I do not think that any of us should sit back and rest.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Ten o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Africa (Famine)

9.35 am

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I beg to move,

That this House recognises that death and suffering from starvation and diseases related to malnutrition of millions of Africans are capable of being prevented by mankind working together; notes that prevention of famine also promotes international trade and thereby the reduction of unemployment in richer countries; congratulates the people of Britain on the generosity of their contributions to the voluntary relief agencies; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to respond with equal generosity and wisdom.

It is a happy coincidence that we should be considering the subject of the African famine in the week that has been dominated by consideration in the Budget debate of our own domestic economic problems. I hope that this debate will set Britain's economic position in its rightful international context, for we are a nation that depends on international trade to a greater degree than most other countries. We export 33 per cent. of our gross domestic product compared with 12 per cent. in Japan and less than 8 per cent. in the United States. For our prosperity and, therefore, the employment of our people we depend upon the health of the world trading community. Countries that cannot repay the capital we have lent them or the interest on it, that cannot buy the spare parts from our factories to maintain their pumps to irrigate their fields and their trucks and vehicles, that cannot produce or purchase fertilisers or seed or even simple agricultural implements, clothes and blankets are a real concern to us economically and, of course, from the simple human standpoint of human compassion for starving and dying fellow human beings.

One of my other reasons for selecting this subject for debate is to pay tribute to the generosity of our people. Since seeing the harrowing films in October of the desperate condition of people in Ethiopia, they have contributed well over £50 million to the principal charities engaged in relief work in Africa—the Save the Children Fund, Oxfam, Christian Aid, the British Red Cross, the International Red Cross and War on Want. In paying that tribute, I should like to express my admiration for those who are working for those charities in Africa, for their devotion to their work and for the effective, vigorous and cheerful manner in which they carry out their tasks, sometimes in the face of daunting physical and bureaucratic obstacles. In saying that, we should not forget the importance of the work carried out by charities in this country, without which nothing could be achieved on the ground.

It fills me with pride to belong to a country full of such generosity and compassion, but I hope that this debate will help to deepen the understanding of the problems that must be faced by the people of Africa so that the people of Britain will not be disappointed to find that the problems of the poor—malnutrition, disease, high infant mortality and starvation—cannot be cured in a short time. When the rains come, that will not be the end of starvation. I hope that this debate will help to deepen understanding so that the people's generosity of spirit will not turn to cynicism and indifference when they learn of poor administration of food aid, bureaucratic muddle, even corruption, and the failure to feed some of the starving.

To correct what has gone wrong in Africa will take perseverance in the face of difficulties and the continued determination of our people and those of other countries to wipe the evils of starvation and malnutrition from the face of the earth. There is no doubt that mankind is capable of achieving this, but can we muster the political will, the willingness to make sacrifices ourselves, the patience and the determination to achieve our goal? My answer to that question is that we can and we must, and Ethiopia and the famine of 1984-85 must be the starting point of our crusade against famine and disease.

When the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs visited camps in the Sudan and saw, even in the camps where feeding and medical treatment had been established, the total destitution of the refugees and Sudanese alike, the little children desperately thin, coughing and wheezing, and on their deathbeds, tended by their desperate mothers in the ramshackle structure that had been established as a hospital, two overwhelming thoughts came to me. Here was a massive failure of mankind of terrible proportions. But in the same camp were dedicated Sudanese officials, American, Swiss, Swedish and British doctors, nurses, engineers, vets, administrators, diplomats, civil servants and even politicians, trying, in spite of the difficulties, to re-establish life and hope for those unfortunate people, regardless of the cost to themselves. Hope and despair existed side by side in the camps.

There were other camps that were not so fortunate, where the drinking water had been polluted and then exhausted, and it had not proved possible to get food into the camps or establish medical treatment. But even in those conditions there were people who cared and were trying to get the camps moved, including the Sudanese official responsible for refugees, the British ambassador's staff, the leader of the United Nations development programme, the International Red Cross, and the representative of the European Economic Community. Therefore, help and hope were round the corner, even for those people.

No one can turn his face away from the tragic plight of once fiercely proud, independent, loyal and thoroughly admirable people. The British Government are playing their part, and I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development and his Department on the early and quick response that they have made to the crisis. No doubt my right hon. Friend will detail for the benefit of the House the help that he has given on our behalf. However, I hope that in his recent visit to the EEC Commissioner, Mr. Natali, who is responsible for EEC aid, he told him that we must make certain that the deliveries of EEC food to the feeding centres and the villages take place before the rains come.

I ask my right hon. Friend to appoint an official in his Department to report to him daily on the progress that the EEC is making in conveying food from storage to the docks and on to the ships, the whereabouts of those ships on the high seas, their arrival time in ports, and the unloading, delivery and distribution of the cereal and other vital foodstuffs such as milk, pulses and vegetable oils. The food must be stockpiled in the feeding centres and the villages before the rains come, which make it impossible to make deliveries by truck across the roadless deserts.

Because Britain's main efforts to bring food to those starving people is through the EEC programme, if that programme fails to deliver, Britain fails to deliver. The fact that the Americans have delivered food well ahead of the EEC is a fact for which we should thank the Americans, but we should be ashamed that we cannot act so quickly and effectively ourselves. The EEC must become a more effective deliverer of assistance, and we must insist upon it. No doubt our Prime Minister will help us to achieve that objective as I understand that it was on her insistence that the Dublin EEC summit committed itself to provide 1·2 million tonnes of food to Africa in the emergency.

Let us hope that, by the combined effort of the countries that are afflicted by famine, and with the help of the international community, we succeed in saving millions of starving people from death this year. However, are we to leave them to die from starvation next year or when drought affects them again? Drought is endemic in those areas, as we read in the Bible. How will we achieve sustained development in those areas so that famine does not stalk those countries again? It can be done. It has been done in India, where I first saw the degradation of mankind that starvation and poverty bring. It has become a net cereal exporter over the past 15 or 20 years.

When the rains come, starvation and poverty will not stop unless, first, the process and the will to overcome those difficulties is borne in the hearts and minds of the people and governments of the countries whose citizens are so afflicted. Do not let us mince words: much of the cause of the nightmare that we are witnessing has its roots in the mistaken policies of those Governments. Unless they are prepared to change and to learn, nothing can be achieved. There are governments in Africa characterised by neglect, indifference and corruption, who are so dedicated to an ideology or religion that is counter-productive that no one can help them. Most outright starvation takes place in countries in which savage military and guerrilla activities are taking place — such as Ethiopia, the south of Sudan, Chad, Somalia, Mozambique and Angola. Such fighting must stop and a return to the negotiating table must be insisted upon by the Organisation of African States, the Soviet Union, the United States and South Africa as well as the EEC, in accordance with the United Nations charter to which we all belong.

We must have the courage to stand up to such Governments and tell them that unless their economic strategies change there is no way that we can help them. However, we must be willing to help them change through programmes agreed with the International Monetary Fund to relieve the short-term chronic indebtedness, and, through the World Bank, to aid them in longer-term financing. The conditionality of the IMF and the World Bank must be carefully and sensibly worked out with them and then insisted upon, with flexibility. Such programmes must not be undermined by bilateral aid donors encouraging countries to evade the necessary financial disciplines.

We in Britain acknowledge a need for aid co-ordination, but I am puzzled, as are The Economist, The Times and other observers, by the behaviour of the British Government in recent months in failing to join the special fund for Africa established by the World Bank and to contibute directly to the recently held United Nations conference on the African emergency.

It is only by supporting such funds and co-ordinating with them that we can possibly hope to bring about the necessary changes in domestic policy to begin to reconstruct those economies. We cannot do it by ourselves. If the argument is that we shall gain more procurement by keeping the money within our own bilateral programmes, why have we recently agreed to untie the British aid to those programmes? I suspect that the recent announcement that Britain would be able to tender for procurement from the fund itself was connected with that decision. Particularly as, historically, for every £1 that we have put into the World Bank International Development Association we have received orders worth £1·50, why not join the fund wholeheartedly in the first place, as we have always supported IDA and were willing to contribute to a supplementary IDA when the Americans reduced the last IDA by 25 per cent.? It is only by working together, all focused on the same objectives, that we shall achieve the development necessary to prevent starvation. Will the Minister explain the British Government's policy on that matter?

The World Bank, the IMF and the EEC are developing policies that can help impoverished African countries to change economic policies, such as programme aid and policy dialogues—they are called by many other strange names. Many projects have failed in the past because of hostile Government economic policy. For example, if the Government centralise marketing and control the price of agricultural produce, whether food crops or cash crops, at a low price that discourages the farmers from producing, projects in cotton, sugar, coffee, tea and so on, and crops for food in the African countries, will fail. It is only by being hard-hearted and speaking with one voice that donors will get such pricing policy changed.

The same applies to exchange rate policy, which, by over-valuing the currency, can encourage imports and discourage local production. There are policies such as the enforced collectivisation of farming, as in Ethiopia, the enforced social engineering of the Ujemaa village in Tanzania, and the establishment of masses of parastatal corporations that are so inefficient that they discourage production. All these economic policies must be changed to those that will enable the people of the country to help themselves, with outside assistance. If they will not change, we should have the courage to unite the donors and decline to continue assistance, and prepare for the inevitable emergency that will follow. The pump-priming role of aid in those poorest countries is essential if the African economies are once more to expand.

At the moment the position is very serious. Annual per capita grain production in the 24 countries most affected by drought has been falling on average by 2 per cent. a year since 1970. Per capita GDP is estimated to be 4 per cent. below its 1970 level. Part of the reason is that the population has been rising at more than 3 per cent. per annum. The necessary programme is set out in the World Bank's publication, "Towards Sustained Development in Sub Sahara Africa", and was largely agreed with African countries in the Lagos declaration in 1980.

The outline of the programme is as follows. First, there should be health and other programmes to reduce the rate of population growth. Secondly, there should be changes in the structure of education and training to ensure greater relevance to the needs of the African economies. Thirdly, there is a need for budgetary and pricing policies, including the correction of over-valuation of exchange rates, that will switch the internal terms of trade in Africa to agriculture. Fourthly, there is a need for improved financial control, including more realistic interest rates, to improve the efficiency with which investment projects are selected and implemented. Fifthly, there must be greater emphasis on smallholders rather than large mechanised farms, producing their own food crops with a surplus for sale. The sixth point is the stimulation of employment outside the public sector through incentives to the private sector, including foreign direct investment. Seventhly, foreign exchange earnings from both traditional and non-traditional exports must be stimulated. Eighthly, foreign exchange savings should be stimulated through official substitution of domestic for imported supplies to meet energy requirements, consumer demand for food and manufacturers, and the needs of industry for materials and inter-market capital goods. Lastly, we need more economic integration in Africa, particularly to meet food and energy requirements.

If Britain is to play its part in those longer-term plans, we must attempt at least to maintain our aid programmes at the level that they have now reached. We must not accept the reduction through exchange rate fluctuations or domestic or overseas inflation of our programmes, estimated in this year alone to reduce the aid budget by £14·4 million, and, as much aid is denominated in sterling, to reduce the amount of aid to the host country.

It is no use pretending that our expenditure on emergency food aid and other life-saving projects comes from a contingency reserve kept in readiness for the purpose. That is a shabby deception and unworthy of our Minister. But for the emergency, that money would have been used for other longer-term development purposes. It would not have been returned to the Treasury with thanks. The Overseas Development Administration has estimated that in 1984 expenditure on famine in Africa has been £100 million, compared with £44 million in 1983, an increase of £56 million. If we add to that figure the loss through overseas risen costs of £14 million, an extra £70 million from the Treasury to the ODA budget would be appropriate to meet the exceptional circumstances of the famine. It would match the clear wishes of the British public and would not affect the medium term financial strategy.

I appeal to the Government to make this gesture. It would be a gesture by Britain of enormous benefit to the African countries concerned, and would also benefit British exporters, enabling them to take on more staff, thus reducing our unemployment. Britain could supply consulting services and technical assistance of great value in railways rehabilitation schemes, road building, well-boring, water storage and delivery, and plant and machinery to process cotton, sugar, tea, cocoa, palm oil, millet, and so on. We could also assist with power supplies, port facilities, roads to transport agricultural products, trucks, vehicles and spare parts.

Britain and the EEC should throw down their tariff barriers against imports from such countries, such as textiles, by abandoning the multi-fibre arrangement. We should be willing to accept more of the products of such poorer countries, as we have done under the Lomé agreement. Britain and the EEC should improve the financing of exports through the export credit guarantee system and more generous insurance of overseas private investors against political risks, so encouraging inward private investment. It is in Britain's interests, as well as those of Africa, to maintain and increase our expenditure on aid, and it is in line with the Government's economic policy.

The Cancun conference, held to take action on the recommendations of the Brandt report, was described to me by a distinguished observer from an African country as the most expensive adult education course ever organised. It taught the President of the United States that aid is not only about giving food to starving people as handouts or charity. It is about stretching out a hand to help people help themselves by giving them seeds to plant and simple instruments to cultivate the land, or a fishing rod with which to fish, to enable them to sustain themselves and their families and to recover their dignity and self-respect. By offering a helping hand, we benefit our own people, providing them with extra work and with cheaper goods imported from developing countries.

There are some developing countries whose policies are such that we cannot help them, no matter how poor they may be. We should not be afraid, in co-operation with the worldwide organisations to which we belong, to bring every pressure to bear — including stopping financial assistance — to get such countries to change their destructive policies. If that is called neo-colonialism, so be it. We are interested in helping other people to help themselves. If we cannot help them, those independent sovereign nations must go their own way, but we must stand ready to help the people who will starve in the next emergency — it will inevitably come — through our admirable voluntary agencies which manage to work in such countries, whatever the nature of the Government, in most cases.

To follow this policy we must at least maintain our aid budget in real terms and replenish it to take account of the emergencies that it has to reach. The whole House applauds the Minister's drive for aid effectiveness, but no amount of increased efficiency will make good the shortfall in funds of £70 million to which I have referred.

I call upon the Government to stick to their principle of helping people to help themselves, and to keep faith with our people by joining them in giving money to the starving of Africa.

9.57 am

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): First of all, I congratulate the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) not on his luck — luck should not be a matter for congratulation — but on his wisdom and humanity in choosing this subject for debate. We do not often debate these matters at length in the House and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman—I am sure that other hon. Members will be too — for giving us the opportunity of joining in on the basis of the excellent start that he has given us.

I wish to concentrate on two issues that are relevant to Africa—population and food supply, both of which lie at the root of the current crisis of sub-Saharan Africa and threaten many other parts of Africa too.

[Mr. Eric Deakins]

The bare statistics are almost frightening. The current population of the whole continent, from north to south, is 450 million. By the end of the century, regardless of anything that we or any Government can do, that population will have risen to 850 million. Another 400 million people will be requiring food, education, health facilities, water supplies, accommodation and, above all, jobs. That will be a very big burden indeed on perhaps the least prosperous continent in the world.

The growth rate of population in Africa is 2·9 per cent. a year. That does not sound much, but it means that the population doubles in 20 to 25 years—using the figure as a compound growth rate. The world figure is 1·7 per cent. Generally speaking, many nations are aware of the population problem and have taken steps to reduce the rate of fertility increase. However, the situation in Africa is extraordinarily bad. Not merely does Africa have some of the highest reproduction rates in the world, but it has the youngest age structure. No less than 45 per cent. of the total population are aged under 15. That means that 45 per cent. of a total population of 450 million are children who have not yet reached child-bearing age. Africa also suffers from very high fertility rates—much higher than in the rest of the world.

We know all these facts because last year saw the conclusion of the greatest and most important social survey that has perhaps ever been mounted—the world fertility survey. I should like to refer to a few of its findings, which have not received much currency in Britain or other advanced countries.

In Africa, current fertility levels range between six children per woman in Sudan and eight children per woman in Kenya. During the recent past, when fertility rates have been declining in every other continent in the world, in Africa there has been no change. The percentage of women who want no more children than those that they already have is lower in Africa—only 16 per cent.—than in any other region of the world.

Sir John Osborn (Sheffield, Hallam): I had several conversations with African chiefs and I found that the real problem is that Africans all over Africa regard children as the best form of social security for their old age.

Mr. Deakins: I agree that that is what many men in Africa wish. However, when women were questioned in their own language, 16 per cent. of them said that they wanted no more children. That emerged from what is a marvellous social survey which cannot be criticised on any of the usual grounds. One of the problems in Africa is that it is not merely the men but also the women who want more children. The average desired family size was highest in Africa. On average, men and women wanted seven children. We must face that problem in the future.

Countries in sub-Saharan Africa such as Benin, Chad, Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Mali, Mauritania, Somalia, Sudan and what used to be called Upper Volta but which is now called Burkina Fasu have populations which range from 300,000 in Djibouti to 35·6 million in Ethiopia. There are wide differences. But the number of children born per woman in all those countries ranges from a low—if that is the right expression—of 5·9 children per woman in Chad to 8·1 children per woman in Kenya. When we look at the percentage of the population aged under 15—in other words, children—in each of those countries which are the particular subject of today's debate, we find that the lowest percentage, 42 per cent., is in Chad, and the highest, 51·8 per cent., is in Kenya. I know from going to the first African population conference of parliamentarians in Nairobi in 1981 on behalf of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, United Kingdom branch, that a quarter of the population of Kenya is aged under five. That will impose tremendous strains on the education and health budgets of that prosperous country.

The population growth rates in the countries that I have mentioned also range fairly widely. Chad, at 2·1 per cent., is almost good, but it goes right up to 4·1 per cent., in Kenya. The average is probably somewhere between 3·5 and 3·75 per cent. Therefore, all those countries in the region that we are particularly concerned with which have problems of famine, under-development and drought have populations which are likely to double by the end of this century. That poses a problem not only for us and other bilateral aid donors, but for the United Nations organisations and the World Bank.

The World Bank has a special programme to take account of the problems in the area. I think that I have every justification in hoping that the World Bank, which is now fully conscious of the need to take appropriate action, with the co-operation of most Governments, to try to reduce population pressures and growth rates, will also take account of the second African population conference in Kilimanjaro in January 1984, which issued a wonderful declaration full of good words. I hope that they will be followed up by appropriate Government actions. It is important that the African Governments should recognise the problems, and it is fair to say that they do now.

The first principle that that conference put forward was:

"Population should be considered as a central issue in development strategies and plans."

One of the major recommendations at the end of that conference was number 90:

"Governments and donor agencies are urged to provide more resources to UNFPA"—

the United Nations fund for population activities—

"to enable it to provide increased support to national governments and to organisations of the United Nations system working in the field of population in Africa."

I hope that I have said enough to illustrate that the population increases in prospect in Africa, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa, of the magnitude that I have described, will impose almost impossible strains on food and water supplies and land resources, quite apart from imposing strains on the social infrastructure of those countries in terms of the extra education and health facilities that will be needed.

We, as a good bilateral aid donor, will need to take action in co-operation with Governments, especially on issues such as mother and child health care facilities and the availability of family planning information and facilities throughout the region. I hope that that will be done in co-operation with the World Bank programme in sub-Saharan Africa.

I thank the Minister for the fact that he has increased Britain's contribution to the UNFPA and the International Planned Parenthood Federation. That is a marvellous response from the Government to existing needs, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa.

In 1983 the International Wheat Council, together with the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation, estimated that more than 20 million people in Africa were facing severe food shortages. It was estimated then that 600,000 additional tonnes of food were needed in that year to enable those people to survive. That was before the famine became a matter of world comment and interest. I am afraid that the situation is even worse than that. In 1983, the FAO report said:

"many African countries have been unable to earn enough foreign exchange on traditional export products, such as cocoa, rubber and coffee to finance their food imports."

In addition, it estimates that Africa will need to double its food production in the 1980s to have enough to feed itself.

The final sobering conclusion is almost one of despair. It said:

"Africa is the only part of the world that now grows less food per head of population than it did in 1960. Since then, production has increased by less than 2 per cent. a year and the growth rate is now falling, whereas the population has grown by well over 2 per cent. a year and the rate is rising."

In the areas that we are particularly concerned about in sub-Saharan Africa the lack of growth in food supplies is even worse and the population growth is even higher. There are real problems which will need to be worked out in association with other donors.

The United Nations Children's Fund estimated last year that no less than a quarter of the young children in Africa, those aged from nought to four, were suffering from either mild or severe malnutrition. That figure is likely to be much worse in the areas about which we are now talking.

I hope that the debate will show that the Government, in co-operation with the World Bank, other bilateral aid donors and United Nations organisations, need, in order to put right what is wrong with food production in Africa, to reduce the emphasis that has existed for the past 20 or 30 years on the production of cash crops for export, often at the expense of growing food for domestic consumption. We must also do our best to try to convince some of the African Governments that in order to encourage local food production they will have to adopt rather more realistic pricing policies than in the past. Often the facilities are there but the incentive to grow food for domestic markets is not.

We need to survey existing agricultural practices in the region, many of which are environmentally destructive, quite apart from the fact that they do not result in much increase in food production, to see whether the aid donors and the World Bank can give appropriate advice to put right the longer-term problem. That is a task that the World Bank might undertake as part of its special programme. If that is not done we shall have crises not merely every few years but increasingly from year to year and they will become almost a continuous process. The emphasis on domestic food production must be a top priority.

In the light of the problems of population and food supply, aid must be seen as a long-term activity. Obviously, there are short-term crises and a need to get food to the people through our own agencies and organisations, such as, Oxfam, Christian Aid and War on Want. We must make it clear that people cannot expect results immediately, other than safeguarding people from immediate starvation. It will take time to get agricultural practices right and to spread knowledge of and the facilities for family planning services in sub-Saharan Africa. When one bears in mind that some Governments are neutral, to put it mildly, especially Chad, which has adopted pro-natalist policies, one realises that we face a big task.

I agree with the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) that there is a great deal of good will in the United Kingdom and in other countries. I am delighted to see the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) in his place, because he was an architect of both Brandt reports. As he spent much of his time travelling with my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) and with my former colleague, Frank Judd, who is now the director-designate of Oxfam, and speaking to marvellous public meetings in 1981 and 1982, he will know of the tremendous response from the British people. That response died down because it was not taken up politically and it seemed that there was nothing that individuals could do. The response has been resurrected by the current famine.

The good will of the British people extends beyond the task of merely giving emergency aid. Increasing numbers of them appreciate that we are engaged in a long-term activity which will not merely require the sort of measures that I have mentioned in relation to sub-Saharan Africa, but the many other measures which were the spurs of both Brandt reports, especially the first report. There are many good points in it which need to be taken up. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) will develop that theme shortly.

I know that the Minister is well aware of the importance of development education. We need to continue with it in this country with some public backing, not merely because our children and people need much better education about the real problems in sub-Saharan Africa, Africa and the developing world generally but because, strangely enough, many people who work in the aid sphere, especially those in voluntary agencies, are not aware of the true nature of the problems. Their approach sometimes tends to be rather simplistic, and that is the one thing that one cannot be about the problems of the developing world. One cannot blame the position wholly on Governments or economic systems. They are important factors, but not the only ones. Therefore, I ask the Minister—I do not expect a commitment from him today—to take on board the need to maintain a continuing programme of development education in the United Kingdom about these issues and the wider issue of the relationship between rich and poor countries.

10.13 am

Mr. Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): I am glad to be able to support my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) and to say how much I agree with him. The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) mentioned the support generated by the Brandt report when it was published in 1980. I assure him that that deep interest remains. Last Saturday morning I addressed 1,200 Rotarians and their wives in Bournemouth, who specifically asked me to deal with the two Brandt reports and with relations between North and South. The number of invitations that I receive from business groups, universities, schools and sixth form colleges is far beyond anything that I can meet. We should not think that the interest that was aroused then has in any way disappeared or weakened.

The most striking phenomenon recently was the impact of the television pictures of famine and the consequences of it for those involved, especially in the sub-Saharan belt, on people who would not normally take an interest in the Brandt report. That shows that, although many of us have been talking for four years with some effect, albeit limited, when famine appears on the screen in the sitting room or kitchen, people realise what is happening in the sub-Saharan belt and respond immediately. That was a most extraordinary phenomenon. Those who have had the opportunity of seeing Mohamed Amin's new film "African Calvary" were so deeply moved that it was almost impossible to say anything. It will have a similar effect on all British people and people throughout the English-speaking world when they see it.

I commend my right hon. Friend the Minister on what he has already achieved, and especially on the personal interest that he took by visiting the most affected areas and by the battle that he has fought for overseas development in extremely difficult conditions. The Government have made a substantial financial contribution in trying to deal with the problem, but in many ways they have not received the commendation that they deserve. There is probably a psychological reason for that. Despite everything that my right hon. Friend has done, the Government have not appeared to take the lead, but have responded to pressures from other sources. At times, that may be necessary and perhaps good for a Government, but not in this case. If we are seen to be taking the lead, the Government can influence public opinion in the direction that they wish to take to help solve these permanent problems. Without the Government taking the lead, stating what they think is right and organising it, remaining public opinion will drag. I know that my right hon. Friend has been trying to deal with that, but it remains a permanent problem.

The other aspect is departmental bureaucracy in Government. Someone expressed to me the fear that in a month air transport would no longer be available for transporting food. The Minister will be able to tell us whether that is the case. I can see the problem clearly. The Department will be unwilling to carry the financial burden in its Vote and will insist that another Vote carries it. If we were truly acting as a Government, the Department would agree to carry it on its Vote because the matter was essential to the policy of the country and for the welfare of a large part of Africa.

The last review by the Food and Agriculture Organisation showed that at the end of December there were 35 countries either suffering from or facing famine and that three quarters of them were in Africa. All the countries that are suffering from famine are in the sub-Saharan belt. That summarises the position.

I am anxious that we should maintain the interest of the Government and the public in these problems. We should never let it be thought that what was seen on television screens is a one-off problem. It is a continuing problem, which will continue in its present severe form for at least a year. Many observers report that the matter is now getting worse in some areas. In areas where it has been possible to transport food to the people, there is an obvious improvement, but in other areas the situation is becoming worse.

It will be a long-term problem, and not just until the autumn when we see what the harvest is like and how long the drought will continue, but for many years after that. That is why it is necessary to go a stage further. I want the Government to take the lead in organising a strategic plan for dealing with the long-term problems of the sub-Saharan belt, including those that have already been mentioned in the debate.

Of course, fundamental to those problems is the population, which has increased by 3 per cent. a year for the past 20 years. We have seen the consequences of that, but it can be handled. It is being handled in Sri Lanka and in China, and if we set our minds to it there is no reason why it should not be handled in the African countries. They have institutions that could organise it.

Hon. Members have mentioned the long-term future of agriculture. During the past 10 years, per capita food production has decreased by 11 per cent. in those African countries. That was partly due to drought, and partly due to inadequate provision for agriculture. The hon. Member for Walthamstow said that some countries are exporting foodstuffs, and Ethiopia has been criticised in the press for sending exotic foods to the London market from time to time. However, we must realise that those countries have had to raise money in any way they can to cope with the repayment of interest and of debts. This has meant that they have denied themselves things which we would say were essential in a desperate attempt to hold their own with the problems of interest and debt repayment.

That points to the need for an overall strategic arrangement with those countries to deal with the problem of their indebtedness. Of course, in recent months, the problem has become worse. For every point that interest rates increase, the developing world must find $3·5 billion. They must export a tremendous amount of commodities, raw materials and metals to recover $3·5 billion. When interest rates increase in the United States or Europe by 4½ percentage points in three days — although it can be said that it is necessary for our policy —the impact on the developing countries can be fatal. One aspect of the reconstruction of debt is that it has been applied almost entirely to major countries, including Mexico, Brazil, Argentina and Venezuela, although it has not gone far in Nigeria. However, for the mass of smaller countries, so far little action has been taken.

The British Government were among those who said that they would turn debt into grants in the poorest countries, and they have already done so for 19 or 20 countries. The cost is comparatively small. To do so for all those countries would cost only about $4 billion, which is a small sum compared with the other money that is at stake. I hope that we shall use our persuasive powers to force other countries who have made loans to the poorest 30 nations to take similar steps.

Britain could do much to create an overall strategic policy for the organisation of food. There is a problem of confidence, because many countries still believe that we want them to remain primeval and agricultural while we develop our new technology and become even richer than we are. Any group that produces an overall plan must try to deal with that problem of confidence. We can provide all the seed, stock and basic instruments that those countries need, and as Britain has so many past connections with Africa and present connections with Commonwealth countries it should provide leadership in that respect.

Far too little attention has been paid to water. We are halfway through the United Nations water decade. In 1980, the United Nations promised that every village in the world would have clean ater, but we are nowhere near that objective. Britain produces basic machinery for deep boring and the machinery for getting the water up. Again, it is a matter of resources. Denmark and other countries can supply more elaborate machines using solar energy.

but we have the basis now. It costs comparatively little to carry out the simple business of deep boring and constructing equipment at the top of the well to get the water up. This is another area in which Britain could take the lead. The provision of water is essential both for irrigation for food and for clean water for people in order to avoid disease.

I come to the broader questions of international strategy and especially the resources that are being made available. The sixth IDA replenishment totalled $12 billion. For the seventh replenishment, Mr. Clausen asked for $16 billion, but he is getting only $9 billion, largely because of the attitude of the United States. That is a reduction of $3 billion on the previous replenishment and one of $7 billion on what Mr. Clausen asked for. As chairman of the World Bank, he is a hard-headed banker—he was formerly head of the Bank of America—and he is not asking for unnecessary money to throw around for wasteful purposes. There is a problem of resources, and we must all pine for the day when Washington will resume its former policy, expressed in the Marshall plan and in the support that it gave to international organisations up to the end of the 1970s, which enabled them to do so much work which at present they are inhibited from doing.

There is some difficulty in deciding what will happen with the Africa fund. I wish that the Government had simply said, "Yes, this is an emergency. Therefore, we shall contribute $75 million to the fund." However, as I understand it, Britain will not contribute that sum directly through the fund and it will be removed from our normal development aid programme. That is neither logical nor justifiable. It is illogical because, in a world crisis, the position in other countries which we had planned to help with our normal development aid will not have become so much better that they do not need the money. If it is a world crisis, or a crisis in Africa — it is a major continent—we are justified in saying that we should make special contributions. I do not believe that the United States and Britain cannot afford to make the contributions that France, Italy, Germany and other countries will make. I also wish that Japan would do more. It has an enormous credit balance, and could do much more for the developing world, especially the African countries.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will continue urging the Government to treat this as a special objective which we must meet immediately, and not to remove the money from our normal development assistance.

People constantly ask me, "Can we do anything about this?" In some ways, that is a difficult question to answer, but there is something for everyone to do. There is the opportunity for individuals — a considerable number have done it—to offer their services to deal with the problems. There is a special need for doctors, nurses and administrators. They are indeed the salt of the earth when they offer voluntarily to go there and deal with the problems, although they know that the risk of disease is enormous in some areas. Individuals can also contribute to the voluntary organisations, which play a major part. Also, public opinion can exert much influence on organisations and on Governments to resolve the problems.

The water realisation decade fund, which is aimed primarily at transnational companies, has just been started. It should be possible for individuals, and especially shareholders, to influence transnational companies to make contributions to the fund. It is largely concentrated on Africa, and is designed to cover the cost of equipment for producing water. The fund is beginning to grow, and I hope that the transnational companies will show that they are not wholly interested in profit from Africa but are prepared to make their contribution to the general welfare of Africa, from which I have no doubt they will benefit later on.

It is the Government's responsibility to organise international institutions, particularly the World Bank, the IMF, the Food and Agriculture Organisation and the World Health Organisation into forming a strategic long-term plan for coping with the problems in Africa. We cannot go on living from hand to mouth and bilaterally doing so many things without any co-ordination and without knowing that we are going to achieve our long-term purpose. That is the way to waste resources and to be unsuccessful in what we are trying to do. In this again, British Government can take a forceful lead in bringing these institutions together and putting them on the path of working out an overall strategic plan.

I know about the political difficulties, and there is a difference here between Washington and almost the rest of the world. I was delighted when the Foreign Ministers of the Community had a meeting in central America and said that they would help these countries regardless of their political regimes.

The Ethiopian regime is often criticised, but we have done far more in the past six months to influence it than we ever did before, and more than we would ever do by telling their Government that it is their problem and that, as they are responsible for a large extent of it, they will have to get themselves out of the mess. From the political, international point of view, we can have far more influence by dealing with the basic problems from which these countries, with millions of people, are suffering than we can by trying to boycott them or put them on one side and tell them that, because of their political regime, there is nothing that we can do.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the increase in public awareness of the problems of Africa that has arisen in the past few months would be rapidly dissipated if it were felt by the people of Britain and Europe that we are helping Ethiopia to feed itself while it is using its resources to buy arms and weapons to prosecute a civil war in its own country? Such help as we give should be met equally by the Ethiopian Government in the ways that they adjust their own policies.

Mr. Heath: It has that effect on public opinion, and the only way to handle that is by our efforts and those of our diplomats and Ministers, who can explain to these people what we are doing and the dangers of not recognising that fact. Countries that have revolutions always have such problems, and rebellions go on for many years, just as they have in Ethiopia. However, the one means of influencing the Ethiopian Government is by following the advice of my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford rather than saying that, because of a distasteful regime, a country must be left on one side.

I thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development for the strenuous efforts that he has made over the past few months and for the contribution that has been made by the Government. I hope that my right hon.

[Mr. Heath]

Friend will keep up the pressure to deal with existing problems, which will last for at least a year and probably longer. Above all, we should try to get the rest of Europe and the United States into a co-ordinated strategic plan with the international institutions so that we can use our resources to the best advantage and show Africa that it has a long-term future.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for initiating this debate and for his record in the House in bringing to the attention of hon. Members and the country the sad and tragic events that have been happening in Africa for a long time, but most specifically in recent months. On a day when in our press and media we hear about the savage, brutal attacks taking place in another part of Africa, it says a great deal for the House that this is one of the issues on which there is enormous respect for the comments made by hon. Members, irrespective of the party to which they belong. I hope that the press, television and radio will show us in the light that we generally are in when we express our concern, our knowledge and the hopes which we, as Members of Parliament, wish to see fulfilled by our Government.

It is always a great pleasure to listen to the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) not only on this but on many other issues on which he has spoken in recent years. His comment about the audiences to which he spoke last weekend is a sign of the great respect in which the people of this country hold him. They listen to his comments on many crucial issues which now face the country. In the area of south London which I represent, unemployment is a major problem and my constituents often refer to comments made by the right hon. Gentleman. It is a great pleasure to listen to the right hon. Gentleman on a subject about which he has enormous knowledge. He has spent a great deal of his time trying to ensure developments in many parts of the world.

I pay tribute to the television companies, which have reported events in Africa with great dignity and respect. It would be easy to try to sensationalise the suffering that people of all ages have, sadly, had to experience, and are still experiencing. The television companies and the people connected with them have shown great restraint and great respect in presenting these pictures, which have had a dramatic effect on the attitudes of people in this country and in many parts of the world.

We have to consider two aspects of this problem. First, there is the immediate need of countries such as Sudan, Ethiopia and Somalia, which is undoubtedly food, and we are now aware that a great deal is starting to reach those countries. Equally, the need for food will continue, not only this year and next year, but for several years to come. No one can say that he is unaware of such needs or that there is a great shortage of food. Millions of tonnes of grain in many parts of the world are surplus to the requirements of the countries that have produced it. Already there are reports that the next food mountain within the EEC will be the grain mountain.

I have obtained some figures from the Library about last year's production of grain. Within the EEC, 76 million tonnes of grain were produced, while the United Kingdom figure was nearly 15 million tonnes—an increase of 37 per cent. over 1983. The Eastern Daily Press yesterday carried a report headed "Grain export boost urged", and went on to say that the Grain and Feed Trade Association was asking the Government to take action to help in the export of grain. The president of the association said:

"The current grain surplus of almost 10 million tonnes is worth more than £1 billion. If the grain remains in Britain's intervention store, the Government will be forced to pay more than £50 million in interest charges on the stored grain."

We all know the deep concern that our people feel when they hear of mountains of one commodity or another. I hope that the British Government will play a major role in the EEC to ensure that that surplus grain is used wherever possible to help those countries in Africa which are in desperate need and that we shall not hear of further suffering there in a few months.

Hon. Members have been supplied with a background briefing by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Because of the television coverage we are all aware of the plight of such countries as Ethiopia and the Sudan, but I see from the briefing that in Kenya, for example, it is estimated that 2 million people are at risk, that in Mozambique there are between 2 million and 4 million people at risk and that in Tanzania there are 2 million people at risk.

Given the evidence that we already have, and with the knowledge that there are enormous food stocks in Europe —I concentrate on Europe; there are also food stocks in the United States of America — we cannot allow a situation to develop where again we see appalling pictures of suffering. There is plenty of food in Europe. I hope that in the ensuing months we shall see a great deal of activity on the part of the EEC in getting this food into those countries which need it.

Mr. Deakins: My hon. Friend has pointed out that people in Britain and elsewhere are alarmed by the food stocks that we have in Britain and the EEC countries— especially cereal food stocks — and our inability sometimes to get those stocks to where they are most needed. Will the British people not be even more aghast to learn that our Government, the Governments of EEC countries and the European Commission are working on plans to convert surplus cereals grown at a high cost in Europe into starch, ethanol, plastics and other industrial materials? Is that not disgraceful?

Mr. Cox: It is disgraceful, and my hon. Friend has expressed the disgust that British people will feel. Obviously his comments will receive publicity, but I hope that the Minister will seek to reply specifically to my hon. Friend.

To give the House some idea of the problems, I cite the example of the Sudan. Yesterday, in The Guardian, there was a report on the problems likely to face the Sudan in the near future. There are enormous problems there already. Yesterday the senior medical officer of the Save the Children Fund said that it was estimated that 500,000 refugees would arrive in the Sudan in the next few months. The report said:

"Relief efforts were building up in the overcrowded camps of eastern Sudan and new settlements were being created, although these would take two to three months to become established with good water supplies."

I pay tribute to the Government of the Sudan. I am not concerned with their political ideology. Despite all the problems in that country, they have never stopped allowing refugees from adjoining countries to come into the Sudan. Great credit is due to a country with enormous problems which is still willing, despite its meagre resources, to say that it will try to help people who, for whatever reason, are leaving their countries and coming into the Sudan.

The Government of the Sudan have estimated that they will need about 3·5 million tonnes of grain for this year, but they estimate that their own grain production will be in the region of only 1·5 million tonnes. They have no reserve stocks. In the course of this year they will be seeking 2 million tonnes to meet the food needs of the people in their country.

I concentrate my remarks in this connection specifically on the EEC, because we are a member, and obviously we have great influence in it. We must do all that we can to ensure that our surplus food finds its way into the countries which need it.

In the debate we have heard about countries which possibly do not seek a great deal of help because of their political philosophy, but that does not apply to all countries. We have a long history of relationships with such countries as the Sudan, Somalia, Kenya and Tanzania. They are close allies of ours. They welcome our help. Often they criticise us about the key issues on which we should be helping them. I hope that we shall hear from the Minister today and in the coming months that the British Government are doing all in their power to ensure that the surplus food stocks in Europe are going to those countries in Africa which need them.

Both the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup and the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) said that we needed to have a vision which was far wider than just the immediate needs of those countries. Again there is a great deal of help that we can give them. The Sudan, for example, has enormous potential. It could become one of the major food producers in the whole of Africa, but the Sudanese need the skills which we and many other countries have, and we should be doing all in our power to ensure that that technical knowledge and those skills are made available to them.

Hon. Members who represent farming constituencies are aware that we are able to produce a crop or a breed of cattle suitable for the climatic conditions of those countries. We have that skill, and I cannot believe that such a skill, along with assistance in the general development of agriculture, cannot be made available from our Government and those of the member states of the EEC. The countries to which I refer have the land and the labour force available, but they need the modern know how based on our experience so that they can start to develop their own crops.

We also need to be told—we have not heard a great deal about it this morning—the kind of industrial help which countries such as our own are starting to give countries in Africa. It is one thing to grow food, but there has to be an much wider base than just food production. Many of these countries have their own raw materials. It would be interesting to hear from the Minister about any discussions that he has had in recent months with, for example, the CBI.

I pay tribute to the Minister for his willingness to visit these countries and see what is happening. During his visits, has he been told about the kind of industrial base which they would like to develop and has he been able to get some feed back from British industry about the kind of help that it would be prepared to provide?

This is not a political debate. However, one of the most regrettable decisions of this Government was to increase charges for overseas students. Without a doubt there are many capable young men and women in African countries who need the opportunity to develop their abilities in our universities. When the Minister and hon. Members meet representatives of African and Commonwealth countries, they are told of the effect that the increase in student fees has had on the number of young people whom they would like to send to this country. Can the Minister say how many young African people are coming to study in our universities?

If the argument is that money is in short supply, can the Minister tell us whether he has held discussions with some of the aid groups which have so generously allocated money to these countries about setting up a joint funding project, which would enable young people to come to this country to study in our universities, their fees being paid by this country?

In recent years, major economic summits have been held—although many hon. Members believe that they are quickly becoming a non-event — in the United States, in Mexico and in London. At those meetings of Heads of Government of the major industrial powers, there is a great deal of talk, but not much action follows those talks. The first of the economic summits took place at Williamsburg in the United States of America. If, two of three years later, we were to ask what followed the economic summit in Williamsburg, I do not believe that we should find very much evidence of help having been given to the Third world. Therefore, I return to the role which I believe the European countries should play.

Enormous skills and research projects are to be found in Europe. Parliamentary and Government commitment to helping African countries needs to be increased. Can the Minister say whether he or his senior colleagues are to hold meetings with senior representatives of the European Community countries to find out whether the EC can begin to develop joint projects for the benefit of the Third world, specifically African countries? Although I refer specifically to Africa, in no way do I minimise the problems that face other Third-world countries. However, if the will is there, because of its relative proximity to this country and the willingness of people to travel to and work in Africa, the problems of Africa do not present us with very great difficulty. I hope that the Minister will say exactly what kind of projects the EC can begin meaningfully to develop in co-operation with African countries.

In conclusion I return to the points made by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup and the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford. Undoubtedly there is a great willingness on the part of the British people to respond to Africa's needs. If the British people see that the Government are responding in kind to the generosity shown by large and small groups throughout the country, they will continue to support the efforts that are being made to help African countries. If Parliament does not respond by showing the British people what it can do to help those countries, I believe that their efforts and concern will diminish. Nothing would be more tragic than to allow that to happen.

10.57 am

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), who I know shares my keen interest in the Sudan. I agree with his remarks about the unique contribution made to the debate by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). He has made a unique contribution over the years to increasing the interest shown by the people of this country in the problems of the Third world.

The hon. Member for Tooting referred to the grants made to overseas students. This subject has been considered by the Select Committee. Whatever the original decision, the package of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) restored the ability for students of many of these countries to come here to study. However, our last investigation showed that many of the available places were not being filled. We need to examine why they are not being filled. As the hon. Member for Tooting knows, one of the problems in the Sudan is not so much the training of students, as the loss of management and other able people —about half a million—to the Gulf states, where they can earn so much more money and enjoy a better life style, thus adding to the problems of the Sudan.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for initiating this debate and congratulate him on his untiring work on the subject, both in the Select Committee and in the all-party group on overseas development. He devotes a great deal of time to these meetings. The fact that he has given such a lead has made this debate possible. It is apposite that it should take place in the middle of our debate on the Budget. It would have been easy to hold a debate this week on a more domestic topic. When we are arguing about Government expenditure which runs into many billions of pounds, it is right that we should seriously consider famine relief and trade and aid to Third world countries. The Select Committee was looking at famine relief and aid generally even before the tragic scenes on television which led the people of this country to realise how serious this problem is.

The House of Commons has set up an all-party group on overseas development, with a membership of over 70. It has active working parties studying long-term aid to Africa. That shows that there has been a mood change here as well, because during the 11 years that I have been in this place there has not been that degree of involvement and work by official organisations within the House. The number of hon. Members who are worried about such matters reflects the changed attitude of the country as a whole.

The change has not been recent because of the horrors of starvation that people have seen; there has been growing interest, which started with the world development movement lobby here in 1979. It showed the massive public interest in the issue. We have all received many letters. They do not deal only with the starvation emergency for which we seek to provide help. They also raise long term issues. People want to know what is happening in the long-term. That is right, and it is important that we should follow that.

Many of us in the House, in particular Conservative Members, have had the opportunity to visit the areas about which most anxiety is felt, because of our involvement on the Select Committee. Standing here on a cool March day, with the green Benches around us, and having had a reasonable breakfast, it is difficult to think back to when we experienced the destitution of Derudeib. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister feels the same. The Minister and I have visited Derudeib. We saw the Sudanese refugees. The Beja nomads are a proud people. They have lived for centuries in the Red sea hills, but are now reduced to living in tiny straw tents and depending for every mouthful of food on the emergency relief services. They also depend upon two nurses.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said that individuals could do a great deal. I remember now those two fresh-faced nurses in Derudeib, who were working with about 7,000 people. Nothing stopped their cheefulness. They got on with the job. They were prepared to work with the people, although they had few facilities, and given the chance they would load up their Land Rover with food and drive off into the Red sea hills to find those who were too weak to get to the camps.

We have seen camps with 95,000 people in them. That is about the population of my constituency. It is not a camp in the sense that we think of it. Those 95,000 people are spread out across the desert living in little shelters and completely dependent upon aid.

We have also experienced the desert and its growth. We recognised how serious that is. In Mali the desert has been growing by 10 km a year for the past 10 years. A swathe of Africa—a land mass far larger than this country—is becoming desert. We experienced the dust and the dust clouds. We were dust-bound for two days because we could not fly out of Bamako. Cape Verde islands out in the Atlantic can also be dust-bound by the dusts and semi-fertile soils of west Africa. When one realises that the dust reaches as far as that, one recognises the size and seriousness of the problem.

A year ago I was also in the Sudan studying the UNICEF water programme. There I saw the results of people on the move. El Obeid, the capital of Kordofan, is by Sudanese standards a reasonably prosperous little town, but it now has 28,000 destitute people living outside it. If we convert the total figures into our domestic setting, we see that they are the equivalent of about 3·25 million starving Welshmen, Scotsmen, Irishmen or Frenchmen descending on our shores. When we think of it in that context, we get some idea of the size of the problem.

What should we seek to do about it? I join my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup in paying tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister for what he has already done, the money that he has found and the way that emergency requests have been dealt with. I support the plea of my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford that a special allowance should be made to the ODA budget at the beginning of the financial year. Sitting in the cool of the House of Commons, we all understand the budgetary procedures, and we recognise that we are at the beginning of the financial year and that there are funds to deal with contingencies, but there is here a uniquely difficult problem. It would be worth while if, at the beginning of the financial year, the Government recognised that and gave an amount—however small, it would be important—from the major contingency fund to ODA to enable it to respond to the demands that will be made for far longer than this year.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was one of those who took the lead in trying to co-ordinate the United Nations operation in Ethiopia, and we must continue to work on that. In the field one sees how difficult that is. Separate United Nations efforts are being made in different areas. They have developed their own infrastructure, empires and money raising. The problem demands that they come together. Senor Perez de Cuellar has asked Brad Morse to head a group in New York. It is important to see the work on the ground and how the relative positions of different countries and the relative merits of different United Nations groups come together. I am sure that that is something that the Government can continue to support and encourage so that the maximum effort is focused on the ground and not dissipated in surveys or by talking about the problem.

The same applies here with the non-governmental organisations. They are doing marvellous work. The way that the Government have increased their help to the non-governmental organisations reflects that. It is often individuals, like the two nurses whom I mentioned earlier, who can bring about tremendous changes in one place. They can change a place where many children are dying into one where many children are surviving. They also have a problem. There has been an enormous response from the public, and I am delighted about that, but the result is that such people are increasingly having to organise food relief and the distribution of food relief. That is a good thing, but it is not part of their normal long-term development programmes. It is not part of what they often believe they were set up to do. Having received the emergency relief money, they must recognise that they must help to organise relief and distribute it in areas where there are political difficulties.

There are political difficulties. In Dafur, food prices rose by about 1,000 per cent. in 12 months. The Government there preferred to see food going on to the market because they thought that it might help to bring prices down and therefore help the urban population. There was a reason for that, because if grain costs about 160 Sudanese pounds to feed a family of six for a month, and a civil servant earns 40 Sudanese pounds a month, even someone in work and with an income can buy only a quarter of the food that he needs.

Against that, there are the destitute who have no money or resources, and who have a gourd and very little else. It is right that the non-governmental organisations should reach out to them with food aid and see that they are fed. Indeed, that is what people want them to do. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister can do everything possible to help, and that while devoting attention in the short term to saving lives we shall not lose the objective of long-term development programmes.

I turn to the European development fund and to the European front. There have been criticisms about the Commission's speed of action. However, it is unfair to criticise it, because it is we politicians who have devised the procedures that have to be gone through. The Commission did not invent them. Indeed, that was clearly revealed to us in Mali, where there is a desperate need for lorries. The European Commissioner there said, "It is no good my putting in to Brussels for lorries, because there is a procedure whereby the contracts must go out to tender to Mercedes, Leyland, Fiat, and Renault. They will all put in their bids, and by the time the lorries have been shipped the people will be dead." Thus, within the Commission and the European development fund we must consider how we can respond quickly and urgently to the sort of disasters that are still to come.

We should not think that because we have seen the figures on paper the crisis is anywhere near over. More things are likely to happen. If more refugees came over from Eritrea and Tigre into eastern Sudan, I could not answer for the effect that that would have on an already stretched inferior sub-structure, where people are already giving up what little they have to share with the refugees. Thus, we need to remain vigilant and able to respond quickly.

There are also other factors to be considered. Within the ODA budget there is a pound-for-pound scheme which helps non-governmental organisations, and although only small amounts of money may be involved, that money can help, in particular, agricultural projects. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will seek to develop that scheme and to work alongside the many groups in this country which now feel that they want to make contributions. They may have subscribed to non-governmental organisations such as the Save the Children Fund and Oxfam, and that is fine, but that may be just a one-off thing, and they want to do something to help in the long term.

There are many things which can be done to help in the long term and which our people understand. For example, they understand the importance of trees, of water and of wells. They also understand the importance of health and rehydration techniques to save children's lives. They understand the importance, particularly for women, of milling grain to make flour, sorghum and dura. The more mills there are the better the mix of food, and that work can be done in local communities. We should encourage any groups that want to come together to provide facilities for resources for such work, and the Government could, with their pound-for-pound scheme, encourage that response from people to people. That is what genuinely moves people. They are not moved by a response from people to Government and from Government to Government, but rather by a response from people to people.

The disaster unit has been widely praised for its efficiency and speed of action, but it could be given a bigger remit. I think that its expenditure limit is about £250,000. That may sound a lot, but the way in which the unit can respond quickly to a request on the ground may well prove vital in the months and years ahead. I know that it works well now, and that all those involved with it pay it great tribute. It is a good thing to build on success, and we should ensure that money is available for it to respond even more quickly. Those of us who have been on the ground recognise that, if the rains come, there may be an urgent need for seeds, small amounts of fuel, and so on. The disaster unit already helps with that, but my right hon. friend could try to ensure that it is able to respond to any requests made in the critical months ahead.

Many of us would like more resources for the serious problem of long-term development and aid. We realise that those resources need to be given to programmes that work and that will be successful. It would appear from the statistics which the ODA has provided for us that there has been a fairly constant level of programme aid—I think on or below 29 per cent. of total aid—for agriculture in African countries. I recognise that policy changes can be made only over a period, but it is important to reconsider our priorities and our use of resources. The greater share of aid devoted to Africa could go to agriculture, and to agriculturally related projects. I know, for example, that a road to a fairly remote area may be just as important to a farm as the things on the farm. That is one of the issues that we must try to deal with over a longer period.

[Mr. Jim Lester]

In Africa we have seen the tragedy of devastation and destitution, and it has sharpened the way in which we think and our reactions, perhaps, for the future. We have seen African Governments who have come round to recognising that agriculture, food, and cash crops are important. Hon. Members should bear in mind that food is also a cash crop. Cash crops are grown not just for export but to raise the standard of living of those who grow them. Governments have come round to realising that they are important elements in their policies. We have also seen the great international organisations, such as the World Bank, accepting that conclusion.

Given how the great mass of our people feel, regardless of political persuasion, I hope that the Government will continue to respond as well as they have done to the emergency and disaster, and will respond with even greater generosity in future to the huge problem which we all know lies ahead.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. As many hon. Members wish to speak in the debate, I hope that hon. Members will help one another by making brief speeches.

11.16 am

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I too thank the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for introducing the motion. Thanks are in order, because several of us have considerable sympathy with it. But I am puzzled about whether it will have the Government's full support. I think that it will have considerable support from the Minister, who deserves some credit for the position that he has taken on Ethiopia and the Sudan. Indeed, he has made a major effort there.

But it must also be said that this Government's record on aid is dismal. Aid was one of the first things to be cut by them, and cut quite dramatically. It is a tragedy that, as far as I can recall, it is still about £100 million less than when the Labour Government left office in 1979. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) seems to be shaking his head as if to say that it is not correct. But the answers are in Hansard and he can look them up. Of course, we are talking in real cash terms, because there is no other way of measuring aid.

My other criticism of the Government concerns their lack of overall strategy. I think that there are hon. Members on both sides of the House who are genuinely concerned about what happens in the Third world. I do not want to attack Conservative Members for what they have said this morning, because I agreed with much of it, and felt very sympathetic to it, but our problem is more extensive than we sometimes realise. We all know that today's debate will not obtain much coverage in the media. Today I have already done several radio and television interviews on the tragedy of the killing and police siege in Earl's Court. Obviously that is a newsworthy subject. But it is deeply distressing that the concern expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House in a debate such as this will not obtain the media coverage that it deserves.

To some extent, that reflects the decline of the influence and power of this House, and the way in which the power to assist in a big way in such situations has switched to the European Assembly and to North America. Sadly, the United States is no longer playing its full part, and under Mr. Reagan is in many ways being counter-productive towards the Third world.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) mentioned the interest of the public in the subject, as did the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester). Many years ago aid to the Third world — or the under-developed world, as it then tended to be called—was regarded as an electoral liability. All the parties felt that it was not a subject that would win the sympathy of voters. I do not think that that is true any longer because there has been a change in the climate of opinion, in some ways for the worse and in some ways for the better.

Opinion has changed for the worse in that we have tended to dismiss the United Nations and to give up hope in the various international organisations which were doing such good work in the 1960s to help the whole of humanity, but there has been an increase in public concern about the Third world.

I represent the London borough of Hammersmith, an inner city area with more than its fair share of social and economic problems. Yet, despite those problems, my mailbag frequently contains letters asking me what I am doing and what the Government and Parliament are doing about the famine in north Africa and about aid generally. I find that very encouraging, as do other hon. Members.

I am sure that we were all encouraged by the record issued last Christmas, "Do they know it's Christmas?" It was a marvellous initiative by a number of people in pop music. It was fantasically successful and that sort of effort should be encouraged. Unfortunately, the public's interest is often frustrated. People recognise that we are, in effect, involved in crisis management. Many people have written to me asking why politicians have allowed the various crises to occur when we knew for several years that they were likely to arise.

We knew several years ago that Ethiopia was approaching a crisis of vast proportions. It did not suddenly emerge overnight. For at least two years we have known about a major problem in north Africa, and for the past six to 12 months we have known that it would reach catastrophic proportions. The reaction, when it came, was to television programmes bringing the full horror of the crisis into our drawing rooms.

I have been urging people to make sure that there are constituency groups throughout the country supporting the world development movement in various ways. One such group was organised in my constituency some years ago. All the candidates at the general election and at the elections for the European Assembly were asked to give their views on aid from the public platform. Members of the public who are concerned about the problem should be asking their Members of Parliament what they are doing about it. It is a difficult question to answer, as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said.

It is extremely important that there should be political pressure on this House. If people are genuinely concerned about the subject at a deep level throughout the country, it is right that that concern should be transferred to their representatives in this House so that we can then transfer it to the Government. In that way we may be able to persuade the Government to restore the cuts in aid which have been made in the past five years. I should like to see the Government beginning to focus on a strategy for the Third world. I recognise the difficulties, because they have to do it together with other countries, and it is far from easy to get agreement with them.

Early in this Parliament I was amazed that the Government had chosen to cut aid at the same time as the British Leyland truck factory at Bathgate in Scotland was getting into acute difficulties. Those difficulties were aggravated by the cut in aid. That factory was producing trucks for countries with a poor road infrastructure and was ideally suited to helping them. When aid to east Africa was cut, that had an effect on British Rail production facilities in several parts of Britain.

Many people are aware that we cannot be prosperous if other countries are in a state of poverty. On our television sets we see pictures of people dying of poverty because the distortions in aid and trade are allowed to continue.

It was war and world poverty which, more than anything else, persuaded me many years ago to think politically and to come into politics. In the 1970s, and particularly in the 1980s, I have been deeply troubled by the appallingly close link between the arms trade and the growing poverty and instability in the Third world. I think that we all know what is happening. When the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup was speaking, the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) intervened to ask what the British public would feel if aid to Third world countries were to be used for military purposes. In a way that is a fair question, but it should also be directed at our own country.

In the developed world we have been spending more and more on arms production, and now all the arms-producing countries are pressurising Third-world countries to buy their arms. In many Third world countries, up to 40 per cent. of the budget is spent on arms. It might be suggested that that is the fault of the countries concerned, but that is not necessarily so.

If Conservative Members are asked why we should spend so much money on arms, their answer is, "If the Russians would spend less, we would spend less." As the expenditure on arms increases, the money available for aid from the developed countries is reduced. More importantly, as the Third-world countries spend more on arms, they in turn are less able to deal with their own internal difficulties, particularly in education, health, agriculture, and so on. The borders of most of those countries were drawn in colonial times; they are not stable nation states which have been in existence for many years. There are conflicts of interest over territory. When those conflicts are combined with an arms race and with political and economic instability, there is bound to be trouble. At that stage, the armed forces are the only group in the country which can keep control. They have the technology and the discipline to maintain a Government in power, thus the Government have to rely on the armed forces. They have to keep the armed forces happy and provide them with their needs; otherwise the Government are in danger of falling.

Mr. Deakins: My hon. Friend is dealing with a very important point, particularly for those of us who are on the Left in British politics. We do not always give sufficient thought to the question whether there is a substitute for international expenditure on arms by Third world countries — for example, more effective peace-keeping by the United Nations. Is my hon. Friend aware that during 1985, for the first time ever, total world arms expenditure will exceed $1 million million? According to the president of the World Bank two weeks ago, that is equivalent to the total income of the bottom 50 per cent. of mankind.

Mr. Soley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. I was not aware that that figure would be reached this year. It is a damning indictment of all of us. It behoves us not just to criticise Governments which are in an unstable position but to consider what we in the developed world can do about it.

I am well aware of the past effort by Labour Governments — and I think by Conservative Governments, although I am not sure of my facts. Certainly the last Labour Government tried to control the arms trade with the Third world, and probably other Governments have tried to do it. The fact that we failed is not a reason for not continuing to try to control that trade. It is an extremely difficult problem. I am not suggesting to anyone or to any Minister that all we have to do is to stop trading in arms and that that will solve the problem. Sadly, it is not realistic to pretend that this will happen in that way.

The arms trade link between the growing cycle of poverty and the danger of instability followed by the danger of war is intense. I shall give one example. I am a little dated in my facts. I have not kept up with these matters as much as I should have liked because of my other responsibilities during the past few years. Several years ago, the Libyans gave £600 million—which had come from the sale of oil primarily to Western countries—to Syria, which passed that money on to the Soviet Union to pay for the tanks that had been knocked out by the Israelis who had been financed by American money. One can cite many examples; in a sense, the countries are incidental. We realise the dangers in which we are becoming involved when we notice the effect of this process on the political stability and economic development of the world. The two aspects are clearly linked.

This is an enormous topic, and in a way goes beyond the motion. I am sure that the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford is aware—I think that I shall probably take him with me on this point—that the system and events that I have described have had those effects on certain countries, and particularly Ethiopia which provides us with a classic example. The position in Ethiopia is especially tragic.

Agriculture, especially afforestation problems, is another matter that has troubled me greatly, and I am afraid that the Government have not had a clear strategy in dealing with it. People often express concern about nuclear power, oil, coal and pollution—they are right to be concerned about those matters—but, in a way, they pale into insignificance compared with the dangers of continuous wood burning and clearing of areas to provide agricultural land in the Third world. The problem involves not just tropical rain forests—those problems have been well portrayed by "The World About Us" on BBC television and, recently, by ITV — but marginal land areas where trees are cleared not only to grow produce but to provide fuel. That has a devastating effect on agriculture.

A couple of years ago, the Prime Minister was asked about aid to international bodies trying to reverse this process. I recall that Canada was the only country that had not cut aid and that we had cut ours out. President Reagan is now declaring war on the Planned Parenthood Foundation. The Western world stands condemned by its short-sighted policies.

If we do not solve these problems, we shall not be immune from their consequences. They will affect all of us dramatically—not only through seeing the horror on the television set of something happening elsewhere but because of what is happening to the environment of this planet and the way in which we are exploiting it. The arms link is of central importance. I wanted to link that point with a request to the Government and the Minister, who has made a major effort with respect to the Sudanese and Ethiopian famine, to win the case for putting together a strategy for the Third world.

In a way, the Brandt report, which the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup did so much to present, was a classic example of what can be done. Some people feel that the Brandt report has not gone far enough while others feel that it has gone too far. Surely no one can deny that the report was a major milestone showing what we should be doing. We should take up its points, instead of retreating, as we are doing constantly in the 1980s, into our national fortresses to protect ourselves and in so doing putting ourselves at greater risk.

Mr. Peter Lilley (St. Albans): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on bringing this issue before the House. I congratulate him also on bringing to the debate his considerable experience of these problems and highlighting the importance of trade as well as aid. His notable mixture of realism and compassion is of considerable benefit to the House.

Reports which my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford and other hon. Members have brought back from Ethiopia and the Sudan have spoken directly to the hearts of the British people about the suffering of our fellow human beings in the countries of sub-Saharan Africa. I agree with my right Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) that it is essential that we do not let the response generated by this initial concern flag as the problem fails to diminish. It is the duty of all of us, if we have learnt anything from our Christian heritage, to recognise that while people are starving, no matter how distant or different they may be from us, we have a duty to come to their aid.

To a large degree, the concern that has been generated has rehabilitated in the minds of the British people the concept of foreign aid. But "aid" is a word covering a variety of aspects and uses. If we are to understand and get our priorities right, it is important that we recognise the different uses to which that word may be put. The highest priority must be humanitarian relief—the aid that is called for when there is famine and distress with which the local population cannot conceivably cope themselves.

That is, however, only a comparatively small part of the total budget that is labelled "aid". In my experience, a large part of what is called aid is simply an export sudsidy. I venture no opinion on whether it is wise or foolish to subsidise exports in this way, although I have always thought that the easiest way to ensure a trade balance was to have a floating exchange rate. We should not accord the same moral approbation to the subsidy of British exports as we do to other forms of aid.

Overlapping with export subsidy is state development aid, whereby this country, through its Government, tries to help other Governments to develop their economies. For many years, I worked as a consultant economist, mainly in underdeveloped countries and on aid projects. I should like to make a few points in the light of my experience. First, I think that there is a more limited scope for this form of Government-to-Government aid to assist development than is often supposed. Secondly, inevitably this aid involves a great deal of bureaucracy. Thirdly, few of the projects that are beneficiaries of aid could not be done as well, if not better, by private enterprise acting in response to the natural incentives of the market place.

I recall my first big project. I was based in Addis Ababa. The project covered the whole of east and central Africa and was carried out by the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa. Its aim was to identify potential plants and industrial enterprises exploiting the fact that Africa produced its own copper but did not, at that stage, fabricate much of it into items that Africans used. The project looked for copper fabrication plants that could be established in Africa.

Our report was ecstatically received by the United Nations Economic Commission in Addis Ababa. More and more copies were required, and I recall thinking wryly that the cost of the paper on which the report was printed was considerably greater than my salary during the time I had to prepare the report. As so often happens, the report remained unacted upon in the headquarters in Addis Ababa, and, for all I know, it is still there. That has been disappointing, because the Governments liked the idea but could not agree among themselves. The report was bogged down in bureaucracy.

Happily, I discovered some years later that all the plants that I had identified, which had been suggested for location in countries that allowed free enterprise to operate, were subsequently initiated by free enterprise, now exist and, as far as I know, are trading away merrily. That suggests that free enterprise can do the job if it is permitted to do so. The intervention of state development aid is not necessarily required.

The great problem about state development aid is that almost inevitably it leads to state control of development. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) said, that can be damaging. From my experience, one danger is that once the state becomes involved, it loses sight of the real need of the country, which is to make more value by consuming fewer resources. It becomes involved in prestige projects. Let me give an example. We carried out a study in east Africa in which we considered a range of industries that might be developed. One that was continually thrust under our noses for attention by local Governments was establishing car assembly plants. Those Governments wanted to have a car industry. That was the glamorous, prestigious project. It was easy to see that, as the knock-down parts of a car cost more than a fully assembled car, any such plant would be loss-making because its raw materials would be more expensive than the value of what it produced, even not taking into account any other costs involved.

There were other projects, such as the manufacture of lorries, which were economical at a local level because the scale of production was much smaller and the scale of demand much greater, relatively speaking. However, those projects were not so appealing to local Governments, so the prestige projects were carried out and naturally absorbed the aid. That is damaging to the countries that fall victim to it. However, if the economies were left—with some help from the Government, of course—to free enterprise, such waste would not occur.

Of course there is a role for the state in any country. There is a role for the state in our country and in underdeveloped countries. However, in the West we recognise that the role of the state is comparatively limited, and we recognise more and more that perhaps it should have been more limited in the past than it has been, and that we should allow private industry and private enterprise more scope. That is understood increasingly even in the Socialist world. China has made great advances by allowing free enterprise greater rein. If free enterprise is good for us, why is it not good for the underdeveloped countries? Why must we foster and encourage the extension of state control? We know perfectly well that if we nationalised agriculture in this country we would have a famine. Why do we help other Governments in underdeveloped countries to nationalise and collectivise their agriculture, producing the famine and undernourishment that are the inevitable consequences?

There is often a whiff of neo-colonialism and latter-day imperialism in some of the talk about development aid, as if those countries cannot achieve without our help what we managed to achieve unaided. From my experience in Africa and Asia, I have considerable confidence in the ability of people in those countries to develop and bring themselves up to the level where they can take advantage of modern technological developments and contribute to them. However, that development will come primarily from their own efforts, and the best way to harness their own efforts and their immense abilities and resources is through the free market. We should not hamper and hinder the extension of the free market by subsidising the extension of state ownership in those countries more than is appopriate.

Two consequences follow from that. The first is that the West must not close its markets to the underdeveloped countries. If they are to develop by harnessing their efforts through free markets, we must make our markets open to them. We must, profitably to them and to us, trade with them to our mutual benefit. That will—and it does, to the extent that we already do it—involve a more rapid pace of change and development in this country. Old industries may decline more rapidly than would be the case otherwise as they give way to cheaper imports from underdeveloped countries. It may therefore be necessary to spend money in this country on the retraining and assistance of those who lose out in the process. We should recognise that that is a valid form of aid, which ultimately will be to the long-term benefit of the underdeveloped countries, and should receive more moral approbation than the subsidy of British exports.

We should also recognise that the underdeveloped countries would be foolish to exclude our investment. We should try to encourage them to accept investment from the western world, of large and small companies. Indeed, the abolition of British exchange controls has considerably contributed to that. I understand that private flows of investment to underdeveloped countries are now about four times as great as public flows from this country. That is much to be desired, because in general it will produce greater benefit to the recipient countries.

I conclude by re-emphasising that our first and overwhelming priority on this matter must be care and concern, and relief of famine and other emergency humanitarian calls upon our aid. That should always have top priority. However, if we are also to contribute to the long-term development of those countries, and although undoubtedly there will be a continuing role for state development aid, we must recognise that the main role must be through opening our markets to trade and allowing our investors to invest in those countries to bring the most rapid possible development so that the prospect of famine and poverty can be banished entirely from those countries.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): I should like to thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for your indulgence in permitting me to take part in the debate, although I have had to miss a great part of it. I apologise to those right hon. and hon. Members who have already spoken. I was particularly sorry to miss the speech of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). The fact is that I have been involved with the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in a long-standing engagement. Among the delegates who are visiting this country are many politicians from African countries, so perhaps my activity was not so totally out of line with the subject of the debate.

I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on choosing this subject and on the way in which he introduced it. I am glad that we are able to have a debate on this important subject during a time of considerable crisis in Africa.

The experience of the past year or more is a bitter commentary on the aid efforts of the past three decades or so of so-called development in Africa. I do not think that we can lay the blame at anyone's door in particular. Many of the pundits, Governments, aid experts and others have been seriously wide of the mark. I remember coming back from Kenya in 1962, having witnessed famine in Africa, and addressing Freedom from Hunger meetings, confident about the answers and knowing the remedies. How wrong I was, and how wrong most of us were in those confident early days. The problems of development turned out to be far more difficult than most of us had assumed 20 or 30 years ago. There have been success stories, but there have been too many failure stories as well.

Perhaps the most prescient of people at that time was Aneurin Bevan, who predicted with horrible accuracy that modern technology would make it possible for half of mankind to watch on their television screens the other half starving to death. That is what millions of us in this country have been doing over the past months.

When faced with a record of failure, people are apt to take up extreme or strongly held philosophical positions. There is a temptation at the moment to say, for instance, that the food crisis in the continent of Africa is so serious that attention should be concentrated on food crops, to the virtual exclusion of cash crops for export, as if Africans are no longer capable of earning a living. Some people, like Lord Bauer and others at the other end of the political spectrum, reject all aid and say that it is counter-productive. Others reject all official aid flows, arguing that money invariably falls into the wrong hands and causes much corruption. It is said that the trickle-down theory does not work and that the poor can be reached only through the non-governmental organisations. Yet others argue for this or that political system—oblivious of the fact, to which Julius Nyerere drew attention in London this week, that the disaster that has struck much of the continent is no respecter of political systems or ideologies.

I believe that there is a danger in such simplistic fashions. Whatever else may be said of the experience of the past three decades, we now have an immense amount of experience of successes and failures to draw on. Perhaps we are wiser today than we were 30 years ago.

Many of us recognise the impressive contributions made by the non-governmental organisations. As a member of the board of Christian Aid, I am very much aware of the unique contribution of that organisation. When I saw the Ethiopian Foreign Minister in this country on Tuesday, he expressed his gratitude and that of the Ethiopian people for the work done by Oxfam, the Save the Children Fund, Christian Aid and other bodies in his country, with the generous support of the British people.

It is wrong to reject official aid as ineffective in reaching the needs of the poor. Contributions to solutions will come from a variety of sources. My only plea is for a recognition of the potential for complementary relationships between official and unofficial aid, between bilateral programmes, and between bilateral and multilateral aid.

The all-party group on overseas development has set up a working party which is currently examining the effectiveness of British aid to agriculture in Africa. The working party is taking evidence from a great variety of experts. Without attempting to anticipate its conclusions, I suspect that it will suggest a greater measure of co-operation between agencies of various sorts working in the field.

I disagree with those who think that we should try to bypass African Governments, or suggest that developmental objectives can be achieved despite the Governments of African countries. It is only through Governments, or Government agencies, that the development of the infrastructure is possible. One of the advantages inherited by Zimbabwe from colonial days, as I learnt last August, is a much better infrastructure than exists in any other African country that I have visited. That gives Zimbabwe a head start over other countries, to its ultimate benefit.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Would it not be fair to say that a great deal of the benefit which the hon. Gentleman says Zimbabwe derived from colonial days in fact derived from the fact that there were many Europeans there who thought that they had a permanent place in the country? Was it not thanks to their expertise and devotion to the country that standards were so high at the time of independence?

Mr. Barnett: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman is making a political point. I merely stated the facts. It is also a fact that the existence of European farmers in Kenya for some years led to the development of an infrastructure superior to that in, for example, Tanzania. The lesson that I draw from that fact is that countries need an infrastructure, and that developing an infrastructure is the business of the Government, whoever happens to be running it at the time.

Those who reject working in co-operation with and in support of established Governments must recognise the serious dangers that arise from the collapse of government and law and order in Africa today. We remember the Congo disaster of 1960, and the civil wars in Angola, Ethiopia, Uganda, and Rhodesia which set back development in those countries.

We should not turn a blind eye to abuses of human rights or to repressive policies, provided that we recognise the fragility of many of the regimes with which we have to deal. The social and economic pressures on those regimes are enormous. For example, the population of Kenya is growing at a rate of over 4 per cent. a year. There are 7 million people without jobs and there is hardly any cultivable land for settlement.

That is only one illustration of the daunting problems with which some African Governments have to grapple while facing near-bankruptcy. They cannot hope to tackle problems of such magnitude without outside help, but we, the Americans and the other Western nations are pursuing policies which are about as unhelpful and damaging as they could be.

First, debt servicing for the continent as a whole has escalated from $5·8 billion to $7·2 billion between last year and this. Brian Walker, the former director-general of Oxfam, described that burden as a "millstone around the necks of the poor".

At a splendid banquet in the Mansion House on Monday, Julius Nyerere asked the City of London whether he should pay up and starve his people. That is the nature of the choice he faces and which others will soon face if they do not face it now. That being so, how can the Government go on hiding behind the coat-tails of the American Administration by tacitly supporting policies pursued by world financial institutions, or by failing to make a strong stand against the current attack which has been launched on some of the agencies of the United Nations? There is the failure to fund the International Fund for Agricultural Development, or even to support UNESCO, and the failure, in effect, to play a full part in improving the effectiveness of the bodies in doing the jobs which they were set up to do.

Secondly, there is the movement in the terms of trade. I believe that between 1973 and 1981 low-income Africa lost 23 per cent. as a result of the movement against primary products. That again reduces the money available to Governments for the development of their own countries. Lack of development of the insfrastructure makes such countries unattractive to private investors.

The hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. Lilley) should bear in mind that private investors will not invest in a country where the infrastructure does not exist or is poor. Julius Nyerere claimed that less than 10 per cent. of capital is currently invested in countries with a per capita income of £500 or less. That is a point that must be faced by those who claim that private investment is the solution to the problems of the seriously underdeveloped countries. Those who are content with current official aid flows must face the stark fact that the West is currently taking more out of Africa than it is putting in. The result can only be —the signs are there—a series of disasters in Africa. They may not be on the gargantuan scale of Ethiopia, but no one should be surprised by further crises in other parts of the continent.

As so much economic power lies in Western hands, we sometimes talk as though it was entirely up to us to put things right. It is not. The development of Africa must lie in the hands of Africans themselves, their Governments and their peoples. Africans will make the choices, run the equipment, work the land, run the institutions and provide the services after the experts, the technical co-operation officers, the advisers and the volunteers have gone home. It is important to lay emphasis, as the administrator of the United Nations development programme, Mr. Bradford Morse, repeatedly does, on the importance of human development—the development of skills, expertise and administrative capacity. That is a vital long-term contribution that we can also make.

The ODA should examine its whole technical co-operation programme. I have said that before. It should be doing that in order to raise the level of our contribution to human development by the transfer of skills and expertise to African countries. We are uniquely qualified by our colonial experience to do that. We can do it supremely well both on the ground and by re-opening the doors of our higher education institutions to a much larger number of African students.

Britain can make a major contribution to technical co-operation. Our colonial experience and knowledge and expertise of tropical conditions are such that among the developed countries of the world we have a larger contribution to make than almost anyone else. That is perhaps the most valuable contribution that we can make.

Proof of that could again be seen when I visited Zimbabwe last year. The initiative of my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) when she was Minister of Overseas Development in assisting hundreds of refugees from Rhodesia to gain education in Britain was obvious when I witnessed the skill, expertise and administrative capacity that exists in Zimbabwe.

I hope that we shall take seriously that contribution which we are capable of making. I hope that the ODA will heed those words and review carefully the size of the contribution that we can make to human development by improving, extending and developing our technical co-operation programme.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) and, in particular, to be able to express my admiration and gratitude to the work of Christian Aid in the Ethiopian crisis. I am a member of the council of the Save the Children Fund and chairman of the stop polio campaign of that fund.

To give an example of what has been done by the voluntary organisations, between July 1984 and December 1985 the Save the Children Fund will have spent over £21 million in Ethiopia and Sudan in addition to all the work that it does elsewhere in Africa. That would not have been possible had it not been for the support and encouragement that we have received from my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development and the Government and from remarkable contributions made by individuals such as Bob Geldorf with his famous record and my friend Oliver Walston in his campaign to send a tonne of grain to Africa, to which the farmers of Britain, and especially East Anglia, made such a remarkable response.

As has been emphasised again and again by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), who introduced the motion and to whom we are all deeply grateful, and by others, disaster relief, although important, is not enough. If there is one criticism that I would make of the debate it is that it has been rather too general. I want briefly to draw the attention of the House to the conditions in one country—Namibia, South-West Africa, which I have just visited with the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) and the noble lord, Lord Kennet.

Namibia is one and a half times the size of France and more than twice the size of Britain with a population of 1 million, of whom 95 per cent. are black. As the House knows, that population is concentrated in the north on the Angolan border, a zone of conflict and war. I spent two and a half days there. I shall not comment on the political problems which confront that unhappy country. The British Government, rightly, strongly support Security Council resolution 435 for the independence of Namibia and the holding of free and fair elections, in which they are supported by the United States and four other western countries.

Ideally, the House would wish Namibia to proceed fairly rapidly to independence, but in reality that is unlikely. During my visit I saw no signs of any inclination by the South African authorities rapidly to withdraw. Faced with that problem and, being realists, accepting the fact that independence will not be coming swiftly, what can we do in the period up to independence? As has been frequently emphasised, independence, particularly in Africa, has proved to be a catastrophe. It has proved in so many cases to be infinitely worse than the state which preceded it.

Although South-West Africa has only briefly been Britain's responsibility, we can learn from our experience and that of other African countries. The difficulty is that we do not recognise the legality of the South African presence in Namibia. Therefore, there is no possibility, politically or otherwise, of our giving direct aid via Pretoria.

However, let me assure the House that there is a profound need in Namibia. Its needs are enormous. It needs drugs, doctors, nurses — here our expertise in tropical medicine puts us in a good position to help— teachers, agronomists to advise and assist, and technical training. But perhaps the list should come from Namibia and not from us.

Despite the political difficulties, we should seriously consider the request for the appointment of an aid co-ordinator in Windhoek who can determine the needs of that country and that any aid should be given through the churches and voluntary organisations. Eighty-five per cent. of the population of Namibia are Christians and are active members of the Christian Church. The Churches represent one of the most important organisations.

If we cannot as a country intervene in the tragedy which is now gripping Namibia, perhaps we could give a lead and assistance, not least with the West Germans with their historical involvement in that country, and, through the EC, give some practical help in the period up to independence.

When I was in South Africa and South-West Africa I could hear Radio Moscow clearly on my radio. It was difficult to hear the BBC external services. May I ask the Government once again, as I have before, why they have cut that vital voice of truth and freedom to our friends?

12.7 pm

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) gave his apologies for being absent earlier. My right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Dame Judith Hart) would have liked to be with us, but she is, unfortunately, ill, as she told me this morning. My hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) would also have liked to be with us, but he was able to initiate the Adjournment debate last night on international famine, making a direct contribution to the issues that we are considering this morning. I note that, as far as I am aware, no apologies have been given by any members of the alliance parties, none of whom is present.

I join in the congratulations to the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on tabling his motion,which is carefully and well worded to stress not only the crisis and tragedy of starvation in Africa but the contribution to be made by trade and aid. It is important that several hon. Members have been able to address themselves to both those issues today.

Clearly, public opinion has been overwhelmed by the tragedy which has unfolded in sub-Saharan Africa. It is a tragedy of truly biblical proportions, with the mass movement of population and decimation of families, peoples and regions.

The House has already given considerable time, both in debate and especially during questions on overseas development, to the specific problems of Ethiopia. I do not want to reiterate all the matters that have been stressed before, save to say that, when public opinion in Britain and elsewhere in the developed countries is so anxious to save life in that part of Africa, it is tragic that the Ethiopian Government should pursue a war, especially in Tigré and Eritrea, and appear more concerned to take life in pursuit of political interests rather than to join those who seek a safe passage agreement for food aid. I note that Conservative Members agree with me. I would focus on short-term issues, irrespective of the long-term and highly contentious political issues — for example, whether Eritrea should be part of a federal Ethiopia, autonomous or a relatively autonomous region within that country.

Both sides of the House would appeal to the Ethiopian authorities to agree in the short term to a safe passage agreement for food aid. The tragedy is that, while Eritrea and Tigré need about 20,000 tonnes of food aid a month, they are getting less than 2,000 tonnes. It is extremely disturbing to hear reports that the Addis Government may be preparing a major military initiative in southern Tigré. If they do so, the House will express its horror.

Several hon. Members have referred to the refugees in the transit camps. My latest reports from those leaving the area show that the position is worsening. The camps in Sudan lack appropriate financial and technical assistance and are becoming overwhelmed. The hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) referred to the difficulties encountered by the Sudanese in the transit camps. The camps have between 75,000 and 95,000 people but lack adequate water supplies, medicine and health care. As disease has been breaking out in the camps, the message has got back to the transit camps in Tigré and caused a greater resistance among the families against moving to the Sudan. By so doing they are overwhelming the limited facilities in the transit camps.

The water boring equipment for those camps, which could have been in use, is not available because the Ethiopian authorities intervened and impounded the materials scheduled, for example, by an Australian aid agency to Port Sudan. That is a further illustration of how the Government in Addis are not showing that they are as worried as many people in the international community, which they approach for assistance, about the fundamental problems.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) drew attention to the food aid needs of the Sudan. Literally hundreds of thousands of refugees are coming into that country. I join him in giving credit to the Sudanese authorities for maintaining an open-door policy. A cynic or critic might say that, granted the length of the border, it would be difficult to do anything else. However, it is evident from the way in which the Sudanese authorities are making efforts within their country that they do face their responsibilities, albeit with resources that are unequal to the need. Although some hon. Members gave credit to the Minister for recognising the scale of the problem, we must see a significant shift and increase of resources to assist the Sudanese in the short term while they face this terrible tragedy.

The Minister said earlier—he may return to this—that he was impressed by the fact that there is already a considerable transport fleet in the Sudan, which is mainly private, but that the problem was not essentially one of trucks. That may be his view, but there is a terrible fuel shortage problem. If we were to mobilise the scale of additional food resources needed for the Sudanese, it has been estimated that it would add 25 per cent. a year to the fuel needed within the Sudan. That is a quarter of a million tonnes, which is equivalent to a medium-sized tanker.

If we are talking about acts of imagination which the House should endorse, why are we not ensuring that we get such fuel to the Sudan? It can easily be shipped to Port Sudan. Fuel on a significant scale would assist in food distribution efforts. I make that point positively and constructively because we would be delighted if it were possible for the Government to respond. I know that the Minister will have to reflect on the matter and that he may not give an answer today, but that should be done.

Criticisms have been made of European Community food aid distribution and the considerable time that it takes by approval of multiple committees to schedule resources to drought areas. We are aware, and I believe the new commissioners are aware, that the Commission is not moving quickly enough to respond to the crisis and that further initiatives are needed. If there is the political will among some commissioners and Ministers, why cannot something be done?

In the interim we should make more fuel available to a country such as the Sudan. It is not the only place, but it is a critical case because of the numbers of refugees coming from Ethiopia. As we are a shipping and oil-producing nation, why cannot the Government show some imagination? Why do they not recognise that, unless food aid is distributed by the end of April, little will be distributed by June, and if it is not distributed by June, although the rains are not adequate, they may be sufficient to make food distribution by road virtually impossible. Why do not the Government respond by providing a tanker of fuel, challenging the European Community by showing it that this can be done, welcoming its support in principle for joint financing, if it will agree to it, and acting effectively?

Although the Minister appears to have been persuaded that there is not a shortage of transport vehicles in the Sudan or in other areas of the Sahel, I know from visiting Chad, Upper Volta, Mali, Niger and Burkino Faso 10 years ago that food distribution by medium-sized trucks is critical. We appreciate the difficulties that the Minister would face in finding enough trucks in the short term to help with food distribution in the Sahel. However, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale found that the waiting list for Leyland or Bedford trucks was so long that in a few weeks she could not possibly acquire the number required for food aid distribution in response to the drought, she took an initiative. She asked the Ministry of Defence for so many hundred vehicles and said that the Overseas Development Ministry would finance their replacement.

We appreciate the constraints under which the Minister operates in a Government who are wrongly worried, in terms of their reasons, about the restraints of public expenditure. The British public has responded to the drought with an overwhelming act of imagination. Cannot the Government find the vehicles needed to bring food into the areas where people must stay to plant the seeds which must be planted if there is to be a harvest next year? Cannot we have an act of imagination similar to that shown by my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale in 1974-75? We may be told that it takes a long time to get the trucks there. Last time we drove the trucks across the Sahara. How they get there is a secondary matter. If the Ministry of Defence would release some trucks, the British people would feel that the Government were not only talking about their concern but demonstrating it in practical ways.

One of the longer-term issues is food aid versus development. Most hon. Members who have spoken in the debate are convinced that there is no alternative to food aid in the short term. Tragically, there will probably be no alternative to food aid in the medium term in some of the Sahel countries, because of the problems that will occur if there is no planting later this year if inadequate rains fall, or if the rains fall and there are no people on farms to undertake the planting.

It is clear that the International Fund for Agricultural Development is relevant to this problem. I noted with interest that in the Adjournment debate last night, when he was pressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West on IFAD, the Minister said that he

"apparently completely satisfied the Opposition Front Bench spokesman on the subject." — [Official Report, 21 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 1089.]

That overstates the matter. As it happens, on the Floor of the House, I did not respond to his answer. But although we are glad to know that the Government's target for IFAD replenishment is about $600 million, we must stress, first, that this will be over the next three years and, secondly, that it is about half of IFAD's original request. Whereas the United States, French and Scandanivanian Governments are expected to contribute more than would be sufficient to reach that target, a British official is cited in the magazine West Africa of 11 March as saying:

"Britain is unlikely to provide extra money because a high proportion of United Kingdom aid already goes to multilateral agencies."

Hon. Members will be aware that the final replenishment of IFAD must be fixed at a meeting on 2 April. I hope that, when deciding whether the Overseas Development Agency should make a significantly greater contribution to IFAD, the Minister will take into account the unanimous view of the House that if we are not to store up future trouble in present drought areas and perpetuate a recycling of drought in the longer term, a building of the funds of IFAD is imperative.

The problem of deforestation has been referred to by several hon. Members. The position is indeed desperate. Both the Minister and I were able briefly to attend a conference given earlier this week by the International Institute for Environment and Development, in conjunction with Earthscan. Mr. Brian Walker, of the International Institute for Environment and Development cited Lestor Brown's new "State of the World" for 1985, which argued that the process of deforestation has now gone so far into decline that 70 per cent. of the rainfall over Africa as a whole, which was hitherto held by the forests and savannahs, is slowly evaporating into the skies, not to return as rain. I was especially impressed by the argument of the hon. Member for Broxtowe, although his conclusion was depressing, that even out in the Atlantic one can see the earth which should be available for planting as dust in the sky.

This is another area where hon. Members are agreed that there is a problem of dramatic proportions, but we must ask what scale of resources the Government can put into it, what can be done by the European Community, and how much progress there is likely to be in the short term. The Pisani memorandum published in 1982 made some recommendations about deforestation. They included:

"Saving firewood through the introduction of stoves . . . reforestation and desertification control through the creation of stocks of plant material in village nurseries . . . improving village water supply", and so on. But until we can make available alternative forms of fuel in those areas, it will be difficult to ask people not to use wood. The women of the region, who were criticised by an ILO report for burning too much wood in the Sahel and in sub-Saharan Africa, have very little or no alternative fuel. The Minister probably heard the interesting point made by a contributor to the Earthscan debate this week. He said that it was all very well to design a new fuel-saving stove for those areas which, according to the rationality of the technician, could save fuel, but, as most of us realise, at night the temperature in those areas drops considerably, and the open hearth is a source of both warmth and light. We have talked about intermediate technology for a long time, but we have not managed to relate the real needs of those who are trying to subsist in those areas to the environmental claims that we make upon them. I do not say that we have all the answers. Indeed, the illustration that I gave shows that technicians do not have all the answers. But if this is a major ecological problem that effects the entire planet, what priority will the Government give, jointly with others, to this matter?

I hope that the Minister will at least consider seriously providing Government time so that the House can address itself to such longer-term development issues behind the short-term drought.

Mr. Deakins: Many of the matters about which my hon. Friend is talking, especially wood burning and deforestation, affect not only the British Government and other bilateral aid donors, but the multilateral aid institutions. Since there is now a World Bank special fund, should not suggestions and criticisms be directed not just at the British Government but at the World Bank? Is it not essential to have more information, I hope from the

[Mr. Deakins]

Government, about the World Bank programme so that we can see whether our aid effort can be dovetailed in to meet the problems that my hon. Friend has mentioned?

Mr. Holland: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that suggestion. He is correct. Although many of us feel that we have to give at least qualified support to the World Bank initiative, major questions need to be posed. One is about the emphasis in the World Bank's analysis on the free workings of the market mechanism in food aid programmes.

For example, recently the bank encouraged many countries in Africa to increase the price that farmers receive for their food products as an incentive to grow more food. However, unlike export crops, which in many of these countries are bought by state agencies or directly by a multinational company, most food crops in Africa are sold in the open market by private traders to the consumer. This makes Government official prices irrelevant for the most part. How does one cope with that problem? How would one respond to a Government that said that they will be as tough on food prices, within the limits of administrative feasibility, as the French Government have been at different times since the war in setting, at least on an interim basis, price ceilings for specific products?

This may not be the kind of strategy that attracts some people. I believe that once General de Gaulle, when asked what he thought of the pricing system, said that the President of the republic concerned himself with inflation and not with the price of food. But one cannot divorce the two. In practice, the result of the World Bank's approach would be that if a Government were to try to make ceilings for food prices stick and were to try to get resources by grant transfer to agricultural producers, the World Bank would bring pressure on them to relax their programme in favour of market forces. If the World Bank were not doing so, the IMF certainly would do so.

This is another example of the double standards and hypocrisy in the policies of the fund. If we are not careful, we may find it among ourselves, for the policy of food grant to producers is the policy on which British agriculture has flourished during this century. The EEC system directly transfers resources without limits on production. The EEC system is a price support system. We have one standard for ourselves and one for Third-world countries.

One of the great problems faced by Third-world countries in agriculture is the way in which the terms of trade operate. This is directly referred to in the motion of the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford—I nearly called him the hon. Member for Hertford, Hereford, Hampshire and all points south—which has focused on the trade issue. As we know, there is extreme vulnerability in the prices that can be commanded by a few agricultural commodities. Oxfam has stressed that nine countries in Africa are dependent upon just one crop for over 70 per cent. of their income, just as 60 per cent. of Bangladesh's export earnings come from the sale of jute or jute products, and almost 90 per cent. of Burundi's come from selling coffee.

We have been aware for some time of the need for commodity stabilisation. That is why STABEX — stabilisation of exports — was introduced in the early 1970s, and why we hoped that it would assist many of the African, Caribbean and Pacific ocean countries, which are associated to the European Community. But the instability of prices and purchases is staggering. In 1975, the United States bought $100 million-worth of sugar from Brazil but the following year it bought none and instead switched its sugar purchases to the Philippines.

There are several implications of these examples. We need initiatives on commodity agreements and a STABEX-type system, perhaps starting with the European Community but not only concerning it, to be jointly taken by Governments. STABEX needs reform because in practice it has operated to stabilise prices for only a few commodities and a few countries. Among those countries, some such as Senegal, are higher-income countries.

Secondly, we need development agreements with some of the least developed countries and especially in the case of food production in Africa. This is something that we can do, without telling Third world countries how they should run their internal affairs. Transnational companies from First-world countries dominate the commodity trade of the Third world. In that trade, the decline has been dramatic in recent years. For example, the shift against Brazil has been 50 per cent. over 10 years.

Whether it is wheat, sugar, coffee, corn, rice or bananas, up to half a dozen transnational companies account for between 75 per cent. and 90 per cent. of the commodity trade of Third-world countries. Without saying that all was well with the global village until Third-world countries were trampled by multinational companies, there clearly is a problem. The share of the income from food commodities gained by Third-world countries is frequently 15 or 10 per cent. of the final value of that product as sold in First-world markets, whereas frequently the retailer in the First-world market will be getting one third of the final price. In terms of shifting resources towards the poorest people in the poorest countries, especially those who have fallen below the subsistence net and are now the victims of drought and famine, it is deplorable that only about one tenth of what accrues to the producing country accrues to the poorest people in those countries. Overall, we are talking about 1 per cent. of the value of the commodities accruing to the peasant farmers who, allegedly, in World Bank plans are most in need.

Here again something quite simple could be done. If we are to have a project which enables a resource shift towards Third-world countries to help with long-term food production, we should combine commodity agreements and development agreements in which First-world countries take their own responsibilities towards their own transnational and multinational companies for their operations in the Third-world. Alternatively, rather than simply having an aid and trade provision which is assisting investment in Third-world countries for specific companies, it would be useful if the Minister could seriously consider a trade agreement policy by which British funds, if necessary, were made available to compensate for the loss of revenue to transnational or multinational companies which would follow from their paying a higher share of the value of the commodities to Third-world producers.

A further proposal which is important has already been referred to in passing by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich. It concerns the debt of the sub-Saharan African countries. The bank and the fund are to have interim meetings shortly. If we cannot write off the debt of some £42 billion of the African countries, it is conceivable that we can write off and grant fund on a long-term basis a sizeable share of that debt. As my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich stressed, the argument advanced by President Nyerere should not be forgotten: should the Government of Tanzania really give priority to repaying debt when to do so it would starve its own people?

My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) spoke of arms and arms sales and the pre-emption of resources in Third-world countries. My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow pointed out that the trillion dollar arms budget in the global economy was equivalent to the income of the poorer half of the world. It is also equivalent to one half of the Third-world's GDP as a whole, which shows the disproportion in that kind of expenditure.

Although we may not expect such a transformation of attitudes among the super-powers we could within 10 years move to significant disarmament, and certainly progress could be made towards nuclear disarmament. There is a global challenge of drought, disease and death, and we need to move the world out of crisis and poverty. When the Prime Minister goes to the next industrial summit, will she argue that we could spend at least one tenth of the world's arms budget each year on a recovery programme? With a recovery programme of at least $100 billion a year we could make real progress towards resolving not only the debt crisis of the Third world but its income and resources crisis. Such expenditure could increase Third world trade by 4 to 5 per cent. a year. If it did, it would increase the Third world's income by more than one fifth in five years and by more than half in 10 years. In that case, instead of the talk, talk and talk again which we have seen at Williamsburg and instead of Cancuning the Brandt proposals, we might have the chance of a new development decade.

Finally, at No. 10 the Prime Minister was presented on 11 March 1985 with a petition from seven aid agencies, CAFOD, Christian Aid, Euro Action-Accord, Oxfam, Save the Children Fund, War on Want and the World Development Movement, which contained 750,000 signatures. It called on the Government to

> "1. provide appropriate emergency relief to Ethiopia and other affected areas for at least 12 months—until their next harvest is secured.
> 2. urge other governments, the EEC and UN agencies to make a similar commitment.
> 3. ensure that aid reaches hungry people in response to human need regardless of political factors.
> 4. increase the quantity and quality of long term development aid to avert future famines in Ethiopia and elsewhere."

What are the Government going to do about it?

12.40 pm

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) rightly referred in his motion to the importance of mankind working together. It is the achievement of this goal, above all others, that will alleviate poverty and starvation, but there are hurdles which ironically make it difficult, and in some cases impossible, to satisfy the objectives of the motion. Many constituents of hon. Members say that it is a sad reflection upon humanity that it is easier to put men on the moon than for mankind to work together to alleviate starvation and poverty in the Third world, and I agree with them. Therefore, I wish to comment upon some of the hurdles that confront those who seek to bring all those who are concerned with aid projects closer together, by which I mean closer to finding a solution to this problem.

Sadly, there are Governments in Africa who choose not to make their first priority the alleviation of poverty. We must constantly apply all our powers of persuasion and influence to try to change the policies of recipient Governments who are against the idea of solving indigenous problems, right down to the shortage of foodstuffs. Such shortages are often caused by national marketing boards which price local farmers out of local markets and, worst of all, out of local production and farming.

We need also to look at long-term agricultural developments in Africa, concentrate upon the needs of the recipients and recognise the constraints that are placed upon indigenous populations. Tribes are ecologically based. The most important objective for the vast majority of those involved in African agriculture, particularly in the semi-arid areas, is to have the land ready for the first rains and the oxen fit to pull the ploughs at the end of a long dry season. There is a need for development projects to challenge the problems and bring about timely land availability, timely planting and timely first weeding.

It is not, therefore, either wise or relevant always to impose high technology upon intensive subsistence systems. Instead, a combination of policies are required which reflect upwards from the needs of local communities, villages and tribes. These include the availability of water. I am glad that positive emphasis has been placed in our debate upon that vital commodity. Water is needed not only for irrigation schemes but for people and cattle. Clean water is very important in this context. We need to develop nutritional and health programmes, in particular the primary health programmes and the family planning services which have been referred to by Opposition Members—not least the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins), who referred to the problems being faced by Chad.

African systems of agriculture have been blown apart by the population explosion. Cultivation and fertilisation have disappeared in the wake of that population explosion and given way to desertification. In 1900, 40 per cent. of Ethiopia was covered by forest. Now, only 2 per cent. of Ethiopia is so covered.

Emergency aid is important, but the work of the NGOs needs to be recognised in development policies which take care of important community needs. Their work has been outstanding, particularly in the provision of family planning services and health programmes. The provision of emergency aid, however important that may be, is no long-term panacea for the problems that face Africa. Emergency aid is important, but it must not be at the expense of the development of long-term programmes for sub-Saharan Africa in particular. These programmes are just as important and must be given serious attention by the Government in the months and years to come.

More time is required for the implementation of many of the international agency lending programmes. Many of the subsistence agricultural projects in the sub-Saharan region are not going beyond five years and are being abandoned. Many of us have seen that happening in the Sudan and elsewhere. We need to consider 20-year programmes—five years for establishment, five years for operation and, most importantly, five years for handing over to the locals and local management, and five years for monitoring the performance of the indigenous management team.

When we are considering the long-term multi-million dollar projects, it is important to ensure that the World Bank and the European development fund, or DG VIII officials to be precise, monitor more closely the disbursement of funds throughout the project cycle. Of the six broad stages of identification, preparation, appraisal, negotiation, implementation and evaluation, more attention must be paid to the last two. The lessons of experience during the development of a project must be learnt and adjustments made in the final stages if the project is multifaceted. Tendering, supervision of construction and monitoring of results and final evaluation should be given more emphasis.

The work of the NGOs and the vital importance, in many large international programmes, of social schemes and sociologically important factors in those schemes can be complementary and not confrontational. In other words, I should like to see the NGOs and their work complementing the importance of large-scale projects which are—I think we would all accept—in many areas of great importance to the development of agriculture in Africa. I readily accept, however, that unfortunately there have been schemes that have not worked. I am arguing for a complementary rather than a confrontational approach by the NGOs, and for more attention to be paid to ensuring that the people to whom the aid is directed benefit most.

I shall reflect on the part of the motion relating to the importance of trade. In the current debate over the use of aid for securing commercial objectives, I favour its use in the form of mixed credit or equivalent techniques. I declare an interest, because Tate and Lyle gave me the opportunity to work closely with many of the international lending agencies. I have visited all of them, putting together project financial proposals for the development of agricultural projects around the world.

What came home to me strongly was that in the cold light of recession many valuable development schemes would never have been undertaken without mixed credit or equivalent techniques. Furthermore, our aid and trade provision has provided many companies with the opportunity to match the practice of our competitors.

Guidelines on that practice should be sought, and such finance should be confined to priority projects and programmes which are carefully appraised against the developmental standards and criteria applicable to official development assistance programmes which form part of the recipient country's development programme.

Where I might have parted company in part from what I thought was an extremely important contribution to the debate by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans (Mr. Lilley) is in the state's role in development projects. The state's role is important, but it should be within the criteria that I have outlined for developmental programmes.

I have always firmly believed that we have a commitment and duty to strive to reach the United Nations 0·7 per cent. target of GNP. Our historical ties with the developing world and the Commonwealth and our practical assistance through Lomé require us morally, and for humanitarian reasons, substantially to increase our aid programme.

Above all, we need an international strategy for tackling the problems that exist in sub-Saharan Africa. We must recognise that emergency aid is not a long-term panacea and that ad hoc donations, however important, can never be as effective as a detailed strategy to implement development projects with the countries involved. We must look primarily for irrigation for food, clean water for the indigenous population and for cattle and the effective disbursement of funds generated for those participating in what I call the development aid triangle —the bilateral and multilateral pipelines and assistance, private enterprise, which is so important in this respect, and the needs of recipient Governments and the indigenous populations.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): I join other hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on his choice of subject. I also share the concern of the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) that the Liberals and Social Democrats have not chosen to participate in the debate.

In recent months we have become more and more aware of the extent of the disaster in sub-Saharan Africa. As a country with a history of contributing to humanity, we should give as much as possible to that region. It is worth noting that in addition to the aid that has been given by the Government in recent times, there is a pledge of £125 million in development aid and a further £75 million to the World Bank. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister referred to that during Question Time on Tuesday. That money should be recognised as a substantial sum, and the Government deserve some credit for it.

Like the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins), I believe that many of the world's problems are attributable to the explosive growth of the world's population, and can be traced back to that important factor. The population growth in sub-Saharan Africa has largely contributed to the nature of the disaster. That growth has increased from 2·3 per cent. in the 1960s to 3 per cent. today. In the next two decades that region's population will double, and by the year 2000 the figure will stand at 679 million. By the year 2020, just a generation from now, the figure will stand at 1·4 billion.

We can use our experience in this country to understand the problems that can arise from population growth. For example, a small surge in our population in the late 1950s and 1960s of under 1 per cent. caused immense problems, despite all our facilities. The baby boom then became an employment boom, which has caused problems for education and housing. There will be a granny boom, and an old-age pension boom in the year 2020. But that is nothing compared to the population growth in sub-Saharan Africa. If we had that sort of population growth here, we would face very great problems indeed. As many hon. Members have pointed out, in sub-Saharan Africa, nearly 50 per cent. of the population is aged under 15. That causes pressure on agriculture, education and the economy.

I am also concerned about the level of fuel and food self-sufficiency in the area. With the demand for food up by 4 per cent. and agriculture growing only at the rate of 1·8 per cent., there has clearly been a decline in the ability to feed the population. The schools see a growth in demand for education of about 4 per cent. But if the supply of schools grows at 3 per cent., which is a particularly high growth rate, the level of education must decline. In the economy, investment will have to be maintained at 4 per cent. if the level of per capita investment is just to be retained.

There are also pressures on the land. In Ethiopia, the population explosion has led to a massive demand for fuel. That demand for fuel has resulted in deforestation, which in turn has resulted in the erosion of top soil. That goes a long way towards explaining the failure of crops there in recent years. The agricultural system in the area cannot support the population, and we are rapidly reaching the stage at which Ethiopia will be completely dependent for food on outside agencies.

The drought is getting worse. So what can be done? I share the view of Mr. Clausen, the chairman of the World Bank—who is to be commended on stimulating a debate in recent months on the topic of population—when he said:

"The existing age structure has already built in a population dynamic which will mean rapid population growth for years to come whatever steps are taken now to slow it. But action now can at least reduce the rate of increase and thus the eventual size of national population. African Governments must make a commitment to such action."

In his speech to Members of Parliament a few weeks ago, Mr. Clausen said that the World Bank was willing and able to do more in regard to population. The World Bank currently has plans to double its aid to population and related health lending policies in the next three years, with a major focus on Africa and Asia.

I am convinced that a substantial proportion of the aid currently being channelled into sub-Saharan Africa should be directed towards population control policies. I am aware that many hon. Members have reservations over the use of contraception and birth control. The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) had a commendable early-day motion earlier this year, and there was an amendment tabled to delete the reference to population. I believe that hon. Members who have such reservations are influenced by principles of morality and Christian belief. I can say to them only that it is less charitable to oppose than to support the burning need for population policies that is staring us in the face.

The estimated figures of those likely to die as a result of the terrible drought are imprecise, but it is a frightening fact, such is the population explosion in the region, that if 1 million die as a result of the drought their numbers will be replaced in a matter of months; if 10 million die they will be replaced in four years. The demand for aid in the region will continue to grow, and we shall be debating for years to come ever-increasing levels of aid unless population growth can be controlled. In the light of that, where is hon. Members' Christian charity? It cannot be un-Christian or contrary to religious belief to support population policies, as their implications are so fundamental.

As has been mentioned by other hon. Members, the Minister is to be congratulated on his recognition of population policies as a means of solving the problem in his recently announced increase in aid from £9·5 million to £11 million. I welcome that increase.

The United States does not appear to be so enlightened. Many hon. Members will have heard that aid has been withdrawn from the International Planned Parenthood Federation, which makes a major aid contribution to population policies. The aid has been withdrawn primarily because a small number of the members of the IPPF—which is, after all, an umbrella organisation—involve themselves in abortion-related activities. The United States must recognise that the IPPF is not in a position to tell some of those agencies what they should and should not do, or that they should not involve themselves in abortion-related activities. I hope that the United States will reconsider its aid to the IPPF.

It is not as if population policies cost a lot. As the chairman of the World Bank, Mr. Clausen, said, we do not need billions. It is recognised that population policies can be effective. While many may argue that economic growth will bring control of population, such a policy will result in only very slow progress in reducing population. It is not necessary to wait for economic improvement. There has been a significant increase in the use of contraceptives in Asia, and in particular in Indonesia, where a programme of information and education techniques, which has received the endorsement of village leaders and the support of the community, has resulted in a decline in and control of the growth of the population.

There are decades of experience in Asia, and that experience could easily be used in Africa. In Africa there have been very few experiments. Before 1972, there were no family planning experiments whatever. Asia could be used as a model. There is some family planning in Africa by the use of the technique of spacing. Families have children but they are spaced at about three-year intervals. As hon. Members have mentioned, many families in Africa are very large. The average is about seven children per family, and an overwhelming number of families want to have yet more children. To control the problem, we must get to grips with this aspect.

We need an intense programme of contraception and education, and the two must go together. Contraception on its own is not enough, nor is education on its own. Our duty is clear: family planning advice should be recognised as the right of every couple, and providing that advice should be the goal of every Government. Governments can encourage widespread family planning facilities with particular reference to education.

There will be many more famines like this one in sub-Saharan Africa. The famine we are witnessing could just be the tip of the iceberg. History may show that the present drought is inconsequential to the type of problems we are facing and shall face in the decades to come in sub-Saharan Africa.

I have been disturbed to hear about the attitude of the Ethiopian Government to shipping. As we all know, a large number of ships are going to Ethiopia to supply grain and other vital supplies to the area. The normal cost of discharging the contents of a ship in an authority port is usually $1 a tonne. Therefore, a cargo load of grain of 40,000 tonnes would cost about $40,000 in import charges. Reports are coming from Ethiopia that the Ethiopian ports authority is charging $7 a tonne. Therefore, an organisation, such as the World Bank, sending a shipful of grain is facing a surcharge of $250,000. That will hardly provide a suitable climate in which to encourage more aid for the region. As my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) pointed out, it will not take much to reverse the current mood that is so supportive of the aid programme.

I should like to express a word of support for the Ethiopian royal family. The present Government came to power in the early 1970s after a coup. Emperor Haile Selassie was taken away. He has never been seen since and is assumed to be dead. However, his family remains in prison. There is considerable concern throughout Ethiopia for the royal family's well-being and welfare. There is no justification for detaining the royal family any longer. I do not believe that aid should be declared to be conditional, at least not at this stage, but I invite Foreign Office Ministers to bring heavy moral pressure to bear upon the Ethiopian Government to allow the release of members of the royal family so that they can spend their remaining years in peace.

We live in troubled times and the difficulty lies in attracting worldwide attention. Progress is being made. Plenty more can be done, but the time for doing it is now.

1.2 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): I welcome the opportunity given to the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) to debate the ways in which we can alleviate poverty in the Third world. I am sorry that the Liberal party and the SDP, whose members wear compassion prominently on their sleeves, have not bothered to send a single representative to this five-hour debate. That is disapponting to the whole House.

I represent 750 square miles of probably the prime cereal more growing area in the world. This year's harvest produced up to 4 tonnes an acre. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford commended the British people for the £50 million that their generosity has provided for Ethiopia since October. Lincolnshire people, coming from a food-growing area, have responded especially generously. There has been an unparalleled response from farmers in the "Send a Tonne to Africa" campaign. The largest corn merchants in Gainsborough have offered their professional expertise to the Band Aid group in matching its charitable zeal and ensuring that the food gets to where it is needed.

My constituents believe that, if charity begins at home, it must not end at home. They believe that starvation anywhere in the world must be of concern to everyone in the world. It is right that satellite technology prevents us from ignoring starvation in Africa. There are no more faraway countries of which we know little. To that extent, the world family is at last a true family. The health of the weakest deeply concerns the strongest.

If charity begins with individual conscience, we cannot offload our individual conscience on to the state alone. Of course I welcome the contribution made by the Government of £15·5 million in the two years up to October last year and, since then, of £14 million. There has been a contribution of 82,000 tonnes of grain alone, and 65,000 tonnes to Ethiopia. In Lincolnshire, the home of the Royal Air Force, people pay tribute to the role of the RAF in the food lift.

However, people in Lincolnshire still worry. They stand, as I did some weeks ago, in the middle of a grain store, the volume of which would probably be 10 times the volume of this Chamber, literally filled to the rafters with grain. They ask themselves, and I ask the House: are not grain mountains of that magnitude in this country an insult to the starving of the world?

My constituents question why the common agricultural policy gives cereal farmers the means—rightly—by high input in fertilisers and pesticides, to produce maximum output and then ensures that grain is stored in intervention for three or four years. The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) put a figure of £50 million on the cost. The Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, reporting on 28 November 1984, drew attention to the increased costs of the CAP intervention policies. In 1974, at 1983 prices, they stood at £520 million and in 1983 they stood at £1,432 million.

I do not attack surpluses. I believe that surpluses in grain in this country are preferable to deficiencies. However, I attack what happens to those surpluses. A start has been made by the EEC in last year's farm review, and also in this year's in dropping the intervention price to the world market price. However, there is an urgent need for the Community to relax agricultural restitutions and by way of the provision of export credit guarantees to ensure that more of that grain is taken out of intervention and put on to the world market. The pattern of world trade is changing. We can export raw food at the world price. Our farmers are ready to take that opportunity.

There is a considerable amount of hypocrisy within the EEC. It expresses its concern and translates it, as the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs found, to the extent of providing £232 million in aid to the developing world in 1983. However, despite expressing that concern, it puts up barriers to imports of Third-world commodities and to exports of cheap food to the Third-world. There is a need to free the world's markets because I believe strongly that Government aid is not and cannot be the only solution. The Commission for Latin America reported that economic advance in South America before the advent of massive Government aid was in fact considerably in excess of what it has been since the advent of massive Government aid. The Pearson report concluded that there is "no correlation between Government aid and economic growth."

All the Government aid in the world will not improve living conditions in a particular country unless there are genuine opportunities for productive investment in that country. Economic and social policies of Third-world Governments are a decisive factor in achieving progress. If regimes obstruct entrepreneurial activity through repressive interference and if the developed world cuts off markets, aid will be only a short-term alleviation. Aid can be positively harmful if it props up authoritarian regimes or undercuts indigenous economic or agricultural activity.

As my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans (Mr. Lilley) said, it may also be absorbed in prestige projects. State aid can become simply regime aid. Academic studies and common sense tell us that there is a direct correlation between the opportunities given for capital and the defeat of poverty in any country. Low rates of tax and unrestricted entry into markets are a recipe for success in the Third world just as in the developed world.

I hope that we will rid ourselves of certain popular myths. One of them is that poverty is caused by the lack of indigenous capital alone. If that is so, how can one explain the industrial revolution in Britain in the 18th and 19th centuries? Another is that poverty is caused by lack of natural resources alone. If that is so, how can one explain the success of Hong Kong and Singapore? On the other hand, if poverty is caused by colonialism, how is it that, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) pointed out, Africa, since 1960, has been the only part of the world where food production has fallen? There is no more point in exporting Socialism than in practising it at home.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will explain how his aid policies abroad match Government policies at home in helping people to help themselves and creating the right conditions for international investment. Let there be no bounds to our compassion; let the Government's first priority be humanitarian support; but let us appreciate that all the aid that the Government can provide is only a grain of sand in the Sahara compared with all the opportunities for indigenous free market development that we can promote by freeing the world's markets.

Sir John Osborn (Sheffield, Hallam): This debate has been about Africa. The original intention was that it should be about the prevention of famine and the promotion of trade. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on making the debate possible.

I was the joint author, 25 years ago, of a Conservative political centre publication entitled "Trade Not Aid". We concentrated at that time on promoting development in the Third world, free enterprise and insurance against political risks.

I am mindful of the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) about exporting Socialism. What has been exported is, perhaps, a disregard for private capital and the free enterprise system. That may be why so many new Governments, especially in Africa, are almost impossible to help. That is perhaps the nature of the challenge that we should consider.

The plight of Ethiopia, the Sudan and sub-Saharan Africa, thanks to television, has been brought home to people in this country. I have been in close touch with the voluntary organisations and I think that the compassion of the people of this country, shown in their response to the pop record "Do they know it's Christmas?" and in other ways, and in raising the sum of £50 million, is to their credit.

My hon. Friend has chosen a subject that is vital to the people of this country. I congratulate him on the balance of his arguments. It is right to press the Government about emergency relief. There has been some reference to the help given by the RAF. I hope that the RAF and other air forces will continue to give an emergency lift as long as it is required. I should prefer it to be accounted for on the aid budget rather than lost in the defence budget, but that is a minor point.

My hon. Friend has chaired and assisted a number of Committees, including the United Nations parliamentary committee, in which committee members have had a chance to meet those at the front of the relief campaign.

Two aspects of the matter have come home to me. Not only at intergovernmental level, but at the level of the voluntary organisations and non-governmental organisations, there is a need to co-ordinate emergency relief and so avoid waste and duplication. Secondly, the idea of emergency relief has perhaps dominated the attitude of the people of this country to the real problems of a strategy for the Third world.

Drought can be anticipated. Reference has been made to the fact that two or three years ago it could have been anticipated that Ethiopia and Sudan would be an area of famine and starvation now. There is a growing demand for emergency stocks in those areas where famine is likely to continue. They must be organised and be present in advance of the famine, otherwise they will be too late. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will comment on that.

As has been pointed out, Mr. Bradford Morse of the United Nations development programme, has prime responsibility for co-ordination between Governments and organisations such as the Red Cross. Surely the whole question of stocks must be looked at by him and those working with him. It is wrong for me to ask that that should be one of my right hon. Friend's priorities, because the British aid programme is only part of a vast world aid programme, and what this country undertakes must fit in with that.

Having said all that, in the long term my concern is that emergency relief will discourage starving and deprived people from helping themselves. Why should farmers grow their own food when there is no market for it, or when it would be more expensive to grow it than to accept free food from a compassionate developed world? Unless we in the House are careful, emergency relief today could give rise to even more famine and starvation in the decades to come. That is a dilemma which Britain and the world must face with realism.

When I last spoke in the Chamber on the Third world some 15 months ago I was preparing, as a vice-chairman, the Lisbon conference as part of the work of the Council of Europe. In 1981 a useful summary was prepared by Mr. Olaf Grimmson, entitled "Global prospects: human needs and earth's resources". I sent that to my right hon. Friend's predecessor. Three or four years ago it looked at the impact of the population explosion, the diminishing resources to sustain that and how better the countries of the North could help the countries of the South to help themselves.

At the Lisbon conference the theme speech was given by Willy Brandt, the chairman of the Independent Commission on International Development Issues, which had produced two vital committee reports. He stressed the need for mutual interest and the theme of interdependence. I shall elaborate on those later. The Lisbon declaration has also given the political edge to the work of the main agencies. Bradford Morse spoke for the UNDP. Mr. Benjenk, who rightly referred to conditionality which was not acceptable to some present, spoke for the World Bank, and there was an excellent contribution from Sir Shridath Ramphal, the Commonwealth Secretary General.

At that gathering there were representatives from the Select Committee, the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and the IPU from this Parliament. Therefore, the views of this Parliament were mixed with those of other national Parliaments and the conference considered how Europe could look at the problem as a whole. My right hon. Friend knows that the Council of Europe had a debate last September which stressed the need for a European awareness campaign, the need for co-ordination of development and the need for closer contact with Third-world countries.

Let me mention briefly four aspects of awareness. I come back to my constituency. Sheffield has a high level of unemployment, but Sheffield's world poverty in action group, the council of churches and individuals associated with the local United Nations association tend to ask the Government and others to throw money at the Third world.

[Sir John Osborn]

When there was a threat of Foreign Office cuts, I had a spate of correspondence urging me to prevent the Foreign Secretary from cutting our aid programme, and rightly so. The new challenge of which people are unaware is the need to supervise our aid and to give value for money. I should like my right hon. Friend to touch on that.

I spoke about the awareness that relief now can be a discouragement to people in the Third world to help themselves tomorrow. That is the second aspect. I am afraid that those who back campaigns for more Government money tend to be unaware of a need to ensure that the long-term strategy is considered. The third aspect touches on Sheffield. The working committee of which I am chairman and the North-South sub-committee spoke to my right hon. Friend's opposite number in Belgium, where unemployment is high and where there has been a setback in industry. He asked why people who are unemployed in Belgium should interest themselves in the Third world. He felt that there was indifference in Belgium and that it was necessary to promote an awareness campaign to point out that helping the Third world to help itself could help the north European countries to provide employment for themselves.

I have had considerable correspondence with a constituent about a project in Senegal. It illustrates how an aid programme can bring employment to areas such as the north midlands. My constituent stated:

"You may be interested to know that our project in Senegal is now about to proceed and we will be supplying water to 18 village areas and providing each area with a borehole, diesel driven pumping equipment, water tower and between 5 and 10 kms of distribution pipework . . . This work will use materials and equipment manufactured in the United Kingdom and the fabrication and construction work in Senegal will take place with the assistance of local labour . . . The responsiblity for the collection of charges and the running and operation of the equipment in each village will be under our direction with local assistance during the whole course of construction."

He then argued with me about the commercial aspects of the project, and I must draw the attention of my right hon. Friend to his remark that "the present circumstances make such activities a substantial if not unacceptable commercial risk."

In other words, the disregard for free enterprise and respect for capital is a major anxiety.

A month ago, while in South Africa, I visited Transkei where I spoke to many black Africans. I object to apartheid as much as anyone else, but I try to look at what is positive in the relationship between the whites in South Africa and black Africans. I spoke to the National African Federation of Chambers of Commerce, which is the black Africans' chambers of commerce, and admired the growing appreciation of the criteria of economic viability and respect for private capital. That could be a strength of whites rubbing shoulders with black Africans, especially in the homelands, which I know are not recognised by Her Majesty's Government. As I looked from South Africa to Africa as a whole, I could see much constructive work arising from co-operation between white Europeans and black Africans, as I have seen for many years. These same criteria are unfortunately only too absent in central and northern African countries.

Finally, I have been trying to enlist in the work of the sub-committee the interest of the Junior Chamber of Commerce — Jcee International — the International Chamber of Commerce, the Confederation of British Industry and, through it, the Union of Industries of the European Community and the Association of British Chambers of Commerce. I hope that we can take up the challenge that Mr. Clausen gave the Institute of Directors a few weeks ago and follow up the excellent conference of my right hon. Friend with the CBI about 18 months ago. Small businesses, smallholdings and free enterprise, which the International Chamber of Commerce so ably embraces in so many countries, provide an incentive for people to help themselves.

My right hon. Friend the Minister knows that the Council of Europe is trying to co-ordinate aid programmes perhaps through DAC — the Development Aid Commission of the OECD — perhaps in consultation with the European Commission. It is also trying, as the European Parliament achieved through its Lomé contacts, to bring about better contact with Third-world countries. With the Commonwealth Secretariat in Britain, the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and a strong Inter-Parliamentary Union, we, too, have good agencies for contacting the Third world.

The debate has highlighted the causes of starvation and famine in Africa, but the challenge is to ensure that the Western world continues to consider the long-term issues. First, it must help the South, mainly the African countries, to help and provide for themselves. The top priority there is adequate agriculture and irrigation. Secondly, there must be a better appreciation in areas where unemployment is high that helping the Third world can also help badly affected areas of developed countries to help themselves. Thidly, there must be a better appreciation of the interdependence of North and South. Tragedy in Africa and the Third world is as much a concern for us in Europe and the developed countries. It is on Europe's doorstep, so Europe must do something to ameliorate it.

1.26 pm

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): I wish to support the motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells). With others, I believe that he has chosen wisely and to the great benefit of us all, in that this subject is not discussed often enough in the House, especially in these times. We have spent days discussing the distribution of Britain's national wealth and the distribution of the wealth of individual Britons. We are obsessed by details of the welfare state, by the possible contents of the Budget, and about whether pension funds will be affected. We do not consider sufficiently how lucky we are to have such problems. We do not realise often enough that it would be marvellous if the legislatures of some other countries had the opportunity to debate such matters. How lucky all of us are not to have been born the children of poor farmers in Africa, especially those who are now starving south of the Sahara.

It is necessary for our well-being and our economic requirements, as well as moral compulsion, for us to consider how we can assist those people out of their desperate poverty and famine. Therefore, I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving us the opportunity.

However, I wonder whether we are not in danger of falling into the trap that was highlighted recently by Julius Nyerere when he spoke of the genuine compassion of the people of this country for the plight of the suffering millions in Africa compared with the ritual compassion displayed in the responses of western Governments. During the debate, we have heard many well-informed speeches that accurately reflect the concern of the British people about starvation in Africa. However, the great problem is how we can assist practically. There are two aspects to the problem: first, the physical and technical side of poverty and famine; secondly, the contribution which Governments, especially bad Governments, make to the problem.

On the first side, I believe that we have reached the stage in the technological development of the Western world where it is possible to solve the problem of famine in Africa. There are means to push back the frontiers of the Sahara, and we have not only the funds — these means do not necessarily require huge extra funds—but the expertise to do so.

I have a little experience of this matter, having been an officer in the colonial regime in Nigeria for the 10 years before it obtained independence. In those days, we worked through our agricultural officers and others to preserve the cultivable land south of the Sahara and to promote measures designed to increase its productivity, and so to bear a greater population. Many a time I have taken part in a raid in the south of the Sahara on pasturists and herdsmen and their cattle to check that they were not over-grazing an area compared with the permits with which they had been issued. Such devices and practices were common under the colonial regime, as were attempts to prevent farmers from breaking the soil in those areas and cultivating land with their hoes for only one season and then leaving it to revert to the Sahara in an even worse state than they found it. We had intensive policies of this kind.

In this respect, stable government is even more important than democratic government. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans (Mr. Lilley) is not here. He was castigating Governments in Africa for adopting Socialist policies. Perhaps he does not realise how impatient the leaders of these countries are for material progress. They may be wrong in their priorities, but it is impatience which leads to the adoption of Socialism in African countries—impatience to solve the problems of poverty.

Only one Labour Member is here, so perhaps I can say with even more confidence that it is inherent in Socialism to use compulsion in the end. If people will not voluntarily do things for their own good, Socialism says that they must be forced to do them. In Africa, many people accept that philosophy and when politicians fail to carry it out, a fortiori, the military come in and force Governments to act for the people in this way.

The other aspect of this problem is, what we are going to do about bad government. We cannot do as my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans seems to think and go in and rearrange the Government and make them govern wisely. That is not possible. Very often, insisting on democratic regimes brings a deterioration in the system.

When the British left Nigeria in 1960, the country had an economy based on cash and export crops of cotton and groundnuts in the north, cocoa in the west, palm oil in the east and tin in the middle belt. It was a stable economy that was growing, although all too slowly. However, the economy is now founded almost entirely on the oil industry, and that by itself has caused near economic collapse. The democratic Government that had been installed, disintegrated under internal forces because of the excessive corruption at all levels of Government.

When a democratic Government take power in an African country, that is not a guarantee of economic stability or progress. No wonder the soldiers in Nigeria were too impatient when they saw what was happening and the politicians were not self-disciplined enough. These are problems of government that we must tackle just as much as the physical and technical problems of development in those countries.

I was fortunate to assist with a rural water supply programme in Nigeria. Water supplies are essentially based upon deep concrete-lined wells built with comparatively simple and cheap apparatus to get drinkable water in individual villages. We were doing a great deal of that in Nigeria before 1960. It is a programme that must be worth while. If we are to spend money on overseas aid to fight famine the priorities within that programme must be studied much more carefully; otherwise we shall fall into the trap illustrated by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn), because that sort of money is often wasted. If it were devoted more to practical results through comparatively elementary improvements in water supplies distributed over a wide area, we should be doing much more for suffering Africans than we could with any number of huge, dramatic development schemes.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): I want first to comment on the fact that, although we have to suffer moralist lectures from the SDP and Liberal alliance, not one member of either party has been present during this debate. It is all very well for the leader of the SDP to intervene with quick, slick, populist comments on statements after Question Time. It would be nice sometimes to see members of his party making substantive contributions to substantive debates such as today's.

I wish to make two brief points arising out of the thoughts that I have had since I and others have returned from Ethiopia.

Africa is a continent relentlessly going backwards, a continent producing less food per head of the population now than it did 10 years ago, a continent which sees food production steadily reducing, and yet a continent where there will be almost 90 million more mouths to feed in just five years and 300 million more by the year 2000. Although I am pleased that the United Nations conference on famine in Africa earlier this month in Geneva realised the target of an additional $1,500 million of help for Africa and that the immediate food needs of the Sahel seem now to be within sight of being met at least for this year, this is not the last time that we shall see famine in Africa before the year 2000.

I was first impressed in Addis Ababa by the much greater need for co-ordination amongst the various United nations agencies. Perez de Cuellar recognised that when he was in Addis Ababa for the OAU meeting because he put in Kurt Jansen, with the status of assistant secretary general to co-ordinate the United Nations programme.

The team from the Ethiopian relief and rehabilitation commission was trying to make sense of all the various pledges being offered by different nations and different bodies such as the European Community. Having a pledge was one thing. Knowing when that pledge would arrive at the port of Assab was quite another. Within days of our arrival we saw on the demonstration wall boards pictures of aeroplanes that were supposedly dedicated to the relief and rehabilitation commission, but none of those planes worked. It was only when the Royal Air Force Hercules flew into Addis Ababa airport that there was any real means of moving the grain. Therefore, I was delighted by the reply yesterday of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who said in answer to a written question that the Hercules will remain in Ethiopia for quite some time.

The relief and rehabilitation commission also showed on its wall board the number of lorries supposedly for use in relieving the famine. However, many of those lorries did not work. It was only when the international community responded by sending spare parts for the lorries that it had the kit with which to move the grain to northern Ethiopia. The hon. Members for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) and for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and I had various bizarre conversations with the members of the relief and rehabilitation commission. They said that they had received no pledges for grain and that no more grain would be available from the following Tuesday. We then spoke to members of the World Food Programme, who said that this was rubbish and that two more ships would be arriving later in the week to replenish the stocks.

There is a clear need for somebody to co-ordinate all the efforts, and I am glad to report that when Perez de Cuellar went to Addis Ababa he recognised this need. Kurt Jansson has been co-ordinating those activities ever since and it has led to a considerable improvement in the ability of the international community to contribute towards the alleviation of famine in Ethiopia. However, that co-ordination needs to be continued.

The United Nations disaster relief organisation needs to be beefed up. Whenever a disaster of the type that occurred in Ethiopia happens elsewhere an individual or an organisation ought to be able to get to grips with it right from the beginning so that there are no recriminations. We do not want there to be recriminations about such a disaster not having been foreseen and the World Food Programme not having been alerted much earlier.

Therefore, my first submission is that one of the United Nations agencies ought to be given the prime responsibility of co-ordinating the response of the international community to famine disasters of the kind that has been experienced in sub-Saharan Africa.

Since returning from Ethiopia I have come to the conclusion that there is no way in which the problems of Ethiopia and sub-Saharan Africa can be solved until we are able to stop them killing each other. Just as devastating as famine are civil war and civil disturbances in Ethiopia. A long-standing dispute is whether Eritrea should be integrated with Ethiopia. This has led Ethiopia, in prosecuting the civil war, to look for outside help. At one time it approached the United States. After the Ethiopian revolution the Soviet Union supported the Ethiopian Government.

Ethiopia is now in debt to the Soviet Union to the tune of about $3 billion, a debt that it can never hope to pay, despite the fact that most of Ethiopia's prime crop, coffee, goes to the Soviet Union. Earlier this year Pravda commented on the food prices in Africa and said that it was caused "in good measure by the legacy of colonialism and by the sophisticated neo-colonialist exploitation of this continent by monopoly capital."

I think we are all agreed that Africa would be better off if the Soviet Union stopped exploiting it as a killing ground. If various countries could be prevented from selling arms to Africa to prosecute wars against each other, there would not be vast tidal waves of refugees moving away from civil war and crossing national boundaries, thus making life even more difficult for their neighbours, as has happened with Ethiopia and the Sudan.

As I explained to the Ethiopian Foreign Minister this week when I was fortunate enough to meet him, I can see no reason why Ethiopia should not start to negotiate publicly with the Eritreans and Tigreans to find a peaceful solution to their internal problems. I am sure that the international community is prepared to respond to Africa's legitimate needs, but it will grow increasingly impatient if we are simply meeting the needs of the children in the feeding stations. They are not Ethiopian, Eritrean or Tigrean; they are just starving children. We are doing that while the Governments are prosecuting their own border disputes.

In the part of sub-Saharan Africa which faces drought, there have been 12 wars, 70 coups and the assassination of 13 Heads of State during the past 25 years. I am sure that, while the West and the international community are prepared to respond as best they can to the needs of Africa, Africa must start to learn to live peacefully and resolve its internal problems without constant recourse to the gun, civil war and civil insurrection which destroy human life and resources and combine with other problems to set Africa back into the dark ages.

1.46 pm

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): Like hon. Members on both sides of the House, I welcome the debate. I have found it interesting and constructive. I should like to thank those hon. Members on both sides who have contributed and in particular the large number of my hon. Friends who have taken part. I shall not draw further attention to the absence of the alliance.

The motion refers to "starvation in Africa and elsewhere".

We must admit, however, that "elsewhere" has been left out of our proceedings. The debate has been about Africa and the reasons for that are understandable.

I wonder whether the House will forgive me if I say one thing about Africa which is important. It does not arise directly from the debate but it has a strong indirect bearing on it. I should like to repeat a statement that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary made this morning about the shootings that have taken place in South Africa. My right hon. and learned Friend said:

"The shootings which took place in South Africa yesterday are a matter of the gravest concern. I join with others in condemning this indefensible action by the South African police, and extend to the families of the victims my deepest sympathy. Yesterday's events demonstrate yet again the evil of apartheid. It is a tragedy that the shootings are likely to reinforce existing divisions and to overshadow the more hopeful developments of recent weeks. On my instructions, the Minister of State summoned the South African Ambassador this morning and expressed the Government's views to him, covering among other things the need for the fullest possible investigation."

We all recognise that the subject of our debate is of enormous importance and difficulty. We all congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on raising it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) said in his interesting contribution, it has made an excellent interlude during the Budget debate which is occupying our time.

I accept the motion before the House. We all know that the starvation in Africa today is a terrible and pitiful sight. Several hon. Members, including me, have seen it first hand, and everyone has seen it on television. It has been movingly described, for example, by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester), who has seen it in the Sudan, and by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford. I need not perhaps take up the time of the House in describing what the House already understands so well.

I fully recognise our responsibility to act through aid, both short and long-term, and through trade. Indeed, I was interested by the recollection of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn) that 25 years ago he wrote a pamphlet called "Trade Not Aid". I also accept the need, as the motion puts it, for "mankind working together" to prevent such things from happening in the interest, above all, of those who suffer but also in the interest of us all.

I, too, congratulate our countrymen who have raised more than £50 million by their voluntary efforts, and the voluntary agencies that are handling the money. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) said, individuals can do something. Incidentally, he apologised for having to leave. My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) reminded us of the way that farmers in his county of Lincolnshire are adopting a practical and direct approach to the problem.

In response to the motion, I hope that I can say that Her Majesty's Government have been responding with generosity and perhaps—if I may say so—wisdom, too. I endorse the motion. Its value is that it gives the House a chance to look outwards and to discuss these terrible questions. Perhaps I should start by giving a short progress report on the famine and the response to it, including some reference to the recent conference in Geneva. Last week's Geneva conference called by the Secretary-General of the United Nations was of real value in assessing the scale of the current crisis. A hundred countries sent delegations. The plenary sessions were followed by working groups on certain specific famine-ridden countries.

It is too soon to sort out all that was said. The United Nations office for emergency operations in Africa—set up under Mr. Brad Morse by the Secretary-General—now has the task of putting the whole picture together. But on the basis of what we heard, this seems to be the situation. There is famine in nine African countries: Ethiopia, Mozambique, Niger, Chad, Sudan, Angola, Mauritania, Burkina Faso and Mali. Of these, the worst affected are Ethiopia, Mozambique, Niger, Chad, Sudan and Mali. Overall, there are 21 countries facing exceptional food supply problems. Their total food aid requirements for 1985-86 are estimated at a little over 7 million tonnes of grain. The total of donor firm pledges, plus a few allocations to be confirmed, amounts so far to nearly 6·5 million tonnes. So if pledges turn into reality, great progress is being made — in the short term. Moreover, that figure covers more than the really crisis-ridden six countries — on whom we have argued consistently that our food aid efforts should be primarily concentrated.

The provisional analysis for these countries shows that well over 1 million tonnes of food aid is already in sight for each of Ethiopia and the Sudan. Perhaps 300,000 tonnes is still needed for each of them, and another 300,000 for the other worst affected countries of the western Sahel. But this total of 900,000 should be reduced substantially once pledges have been allocated. Those broad figures are certainly not unimpressive—provided that the pledges are translated into reality and in time. But the House can be under no illusion about the difficulties to be faced in distribution.

In the two countries with which this country has been particularly involved, Ethiopia and the Sudan, I have seen for myself something of the scale of the difficulties—as indeed has the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. In Ethiopia the prolonged and devastating drought has been compounded by all sorts of other factors—political as well as geographical. There has been the need to put together an effective transport system, from ports to distribution points.

The civil war in Eritrea and Tigre has thrown up very great difficulties, which have already been discussed by the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland). At the United Nations conference in Geneva Mr. Goshu Wolde, the Ethiopian Foreign Minister, gave a solemn pledge that relief supplies would get through to all those in need, without discrimination and wherever they may be. Western donors and the United Nations co-ordinator must now ensure that that pledge is honoured. As my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) said, the key to the situation is quite simply that men must stop killing each other.

Mr. Stuart Holland: The Minister may already be aware that, when pressed on that point, Mr. Goshu Wolde also said that the relief supplies would be accompanied by armoured columns, which clearly does not meet the point about the safe passage of food aid. I think that there will be concern about that on each side of the House.

Mr. Raison: I have repeated the pledge of Mr. Goshu Wolde. It is essential that we make sure that his pledge is interpreted effectively.

There are also in Ethiopia, as we know, the doubts and pressures thrown up by the Government's policy of resettlement. Above all, there is the sheer poverty of so many people, for whom not only food and water but shelter have been so scarce.

In the Sudan, which was vividly described by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe, the influx over time of 1 million refugees has added to the perhaps 3 million Sudanese who face hunger—and the refugees are still coming in. There is a severe scarcity not only of food and often water but of diesel and even petrol. As in Ethiopia, in spite of valiant efforts by many people, the capacity of the Government to deal with the problem is tested to the full. Again there are political tensions.

The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) was right to pay tribute to the generosity of the people of the Sudan in the way in which they have received the refugees and migrants. There are huge difficulties but the response has been in many ways impressive. In spite of the agonies, it is inspiring to see it for oneself.

To use the words of my hon. Friend's motion, for all the civil wars and failures, mankind can be seen working together. It can be seen in the gradual build-up of the pipeline of enormous quantities of food—led by the United States but with others contributing substantially. It can be seen among the volunteers from many overseas nations who work alongside the equally dedicated doctors and other workers from the Sudan, Ethiopia and the other countries. It can be seen in the transport operations—for example, a Save the Children team distributing American-provided food in South Dafur in the Sudan. It can be seen in the machinery for co-operation now set up by the UN representative, Mr. Jansson, in Addis Ababa, who was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury. It can be seen in the aircraft operations in Ethiopia, including the unique East-West collaboration over the air drop, with the RAF, the West Germans, Poles and Russians all involved — together, of course, with the Ethiopians.

The hon. Member for Vauxhall mentioned fuel. There is a serious fuel problem in the Sudan. The world food programme is now setting up an arrangement for fuel imports specifically for food distribution. We shall be providing up to $US275,000 to meet the cost of fuel to distribute the further British food aid that I announced on my return from the Sudan. I shall certainly consider whether we can do more to help with that problem. I know from the conversation that I had in Geneva that the Saudis are intending to send a substantial quantity of oil.

What has been our part? Have we responded generously and with wisdom, as the motion requests? I have just referred to the RAF Hercules team. Everyone agrees that its work has been outstanding, in terms of spirit and of operational efficiency. We have to consider carefully how long to keep it going, and whether other partners could share the burden with us. I have undertaken to give at least a month's notice if we decide to withdraw. We have been working very amicably with the Ministry of Defence in sharing the cost of the operation. The Ministry of Defence bore the cost at first; we now pay half of it. I think that the arrangement is fair and reasonable.

But what of our contribution as a whole? In the two years to last October, the Government had committed over £15 million to help relieve the famine in Ethiopia through the various available channels. Famine relief in our financial year 1983-84 amounted altogether to about £25 million, so it is not true to say that we were doing nothing in Ethiopia until the cameras showed us the tragedy in October.

Since the full scale of the emergency in Africa became as clear as it is, we have stepped up our contribution. In the financial year just ending we have committed more than £100 million in relief funds for Africa. Since October we have provided £34 million for Ethiopia and nearly £14 million for Sudan. Those funds are committed both bilaterally and through our contributions to European Community actions, and also in response to appeals by UN and other agencies.

For the coming financial year, as I said in Geneva on 11 March, we have earmarked at least £60 million for further emergency assistance, half from our share of European Commmunity actions and half from our bilateral programme. Our efforts have covered many different activities, and much of what we have given has gone through international or voluntary agencies. I pay tribute to both groups.

In Ethiopia we have worked to strengthen the ports and distribution system. We have provided blankets, medical supplies, and so on. We have supported water projects. The position is similar in the Sudan, where the viability of Port Sudan in particular owes a good deal to earlier British aid. We have so far this year delivered bilaterally 15,000 tonnes of food to Ethiopia and 15,000 tonnes to the Sudan, with another 35,000 tonnes to be shipped next month. I have stressed the crucial importance of getting food to the Sudan before the hoped-for rainy season in June.

Altogether the European Community and its member states are committed to deliver at least 170,000 tonnes each for the Sudan and Ethiopia this year as part of the total of 1·2 million tonnes pledged at the Dublin summit in December. This food is not cheap. We have talked about food mountains, and that is understandable. One must, however, remind people of the cost of that food. The cost of buying, shipping and distributing a tonne of food in Ethiopia is about £250. We are talking about substantial sums. As I have repeatedly stressed in Brussels, the need is to get on as fast as possible with delivery. The Commission is working hard and has speeded up its procedure. Allocations are going ahead. An amount of £50 million is now in the hands of local Commission delegations or international or voluntary organisations, and they can get on with the job of distributing it. It is true that the only statistic that ultimately matters is the amount of food actually delivered to those who so desperately need it.

I turn to the problems that lie ahead, for the motion is concerned largely with the long term and not solely with the short term. What happens next year and after that? As the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) pointed out, crisis management is not enough. It is necessary but it is not enough.

The scale of the problem in Africa is daunting, but it is important to keep in our minds the distiction between drought and famine. Drought itself does not signify famine, although the presistence of drought destroys the lines of defence which the inhabitants of arid areas customarily build up to see them through the lean years. Gradually their stores of crops, livestock, jewellery and other forms of capital are used up. It is, above all, the poor who starve.

Some of the other factors leading to the famine are dramatic and obvious, such as civil disturbance; others are more gradual. They include the pressure on agricultural land caused by rapidly growing populations, the failure to conserve land and improve agriculture and the lack of adequate storage and marketing systems.

However generously the international community responds to the present crisis, those countries risk further famine in the future unless the underlying causes are tackled. The problems will require sustained efforts by the countries of Africa themselves — that has rightly been stressed — and by the international donor community. We shall play our part.

Despite substantial aid to Africa over many years, the trends over the past decade or so have been in the wrong direction. Population growth is still high and agricultural food production has failed to keep pace with it. The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) and my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) were right to say that the population issue is of great importance. I was grateful to the hon. Member for Walthamstow for saying that our increased contribution to UNFPA and the IPPF is a marvellous response.

This is, however, part of a wider picture. Economic performance generally has been disappointing. Some of this has been due to adverse external factors, such as the increase in oil prices. But it is also the case that many countries in Africa have pursued policies that contributed to poor economic performance and made it more difficult for them to cope with the external difficulties which they faced.

So in seeking long-term solutions to the problems facing those countries, including the alleviation of poverty, hunger and malnutrition, it is not enough to focus on agriculture alone. On the other hand, agricultural development is essential. Africa has become increasingly reliant on food imports over the past decade, absorbing scarce foreign exchange. Meanwhile, smallholder food production and incomes have been depressed.

Over the past two or three years, much thought has already been given to how social and economic development in sub-Saharan Africa might be restored. There is a growing recognition among the Governments of many of those countries that changes in policy are required. Making those changes will not be easy. As outsiders, we have to be sensitive to the issues at stake. We cannot just impose standard prescriptions.

It is against that background that we have strongly supported the idea of an improved dialogue between the aid donors and the Governments of the developing countries. That is a significant element in the recently negotiated Lomé III convention. Aid is an important element in the development process, but it is only one element. It can be effective if there is a partnership between donor and recipient to pursue agreed objectives. Donors can provide financial assistance, technical expertise and advice. As my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans (Mr. Lilley) said in his interesting speech, private enterprise represents a large part of what has to be offered. However, the developing countries have to put into effect the policies and programmes that will best promote and not inhibit development.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup spoke about the need for a strategic plan. I believe that in fact some sort of plan, or at least philosophy, is now emerging in which the World Bank is playing a prominent part, as is its duty, but we are all contributing to it. It is based, among other things, on a strengthening of donor co-ordination. By "donor co-ordination", I mean not only co-ordination as it were in New York, Geneva, Paris or wherever, but particularly co-ordination in the countries concerned, which is at the heart of the matter.

A number of countries have accepted that a period of structural adjustment and policy reform is essential to restore sustainable economic development. They have come to agreements with the IMF on a package of measures to improve their fiscal and balance of payments situations, and with the World Bank on measures necessary for long-term development. If they are to succeed, it is important that donors provide aid in forms, and for purposes, which will complement those programmes. That is why we have been increasingly prepared to provide aid for essential imports of spare parts and other maintenance goods for key sectors of the economy where the IMF and World Bank-led adjustment programmes are being pursued. We are spending large sums of money. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on Tuesday, we are now spending about £125 million of development aid on the 20 worst affected countries in Africa.

We fully support the World Bank's initiatives in Africa, and in January, as the House knows, we agreed to earmark £75 million of bilateral aid to be used in close assocation with the World Bank's special facility for Africa. That aid will not be tied. Its purpose is simply to encourage economic reform. In our approach to it, we may choose the countries where the aid is to be spent, but our work will be dovetailed with that of the World Bank in the operation of applying those resources. I have no doubt that the World Bank will be forthcoming about what it has to do and that we can work in effective conjunction with it.

I should like to pick out one or two other points that were made in the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe talked about the need for seeds in the countries that are suffering so badly. Ethiopia's needs for seeds are being covered by a Community project, but we have provided assistance bilaterally through Oxfam to the tune of about £150,000.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup and my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington both talked about water requirements. We have welcomed the United Nations water decade and are currently contributing, under bilateral aid arrangements, some £102 million towards the cost of 73 drinking water and sanitation schemes in 35 developing countries. We have also made a number of other contributions, including the work of our special technical units.

The debate is about trade as well as aid, as was rightly stressed by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans as well as by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford. The Government take the view that sustained economic growth by the industrial countries is a crucial factor in stimulating international trade and enabling the debtor countries to adjust their economies. We can already see the effects of this policy. International trade has expanded considerably over the past two years and commodity prices have improved. It is of course essential that this process is not jeopardised by protectionist pressures.

The European Community already provides freer access to developing countries' exports than any other industrialised country or group of countries. I fought hard, with some limited success, for further trade concessions in the latest Lomé III negotiations. We strongly support the calls that have been made for a new round of trade liberalisation negotiations in the GATT.

I cannot simply accede to the demand of my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford for the abandonment of the multi-fibre arrangement, but at least, when it is renegotiated, we will bring to it an attitude that is sympathetic towards the problems of the countries concerned.

At the same time, a great deal of nonsense has been talked about how developing countries are exploited by the West by encouraging them to grow agricultural crops for export and blaming that for the low level of food production in Africa today. The hon. Member for Walthamstow mentioned that point.

Problems can arise with the introduction of cash crops in particular circumstances, where women and children lose access to land for subsistence crops without sharing in the income derived from cash crops, but overall the main problem in Africa is surely not that cash crops have replaced food crops but that both have performed badly in recent years. There is in Africa the capacity, the potential and the fertility to produce both. Rather than thinking in terms of a limited cake, let us do all that we can to encourage the development of both aspects of agriculture.

We strongly believe that one of the key ingredients of success in agriculture must be better incentives for farmers to produce more. That is what the IMF, the World Bank and other organisations all stress at present. It is also important to improve local and national marketing and storage arrangements, and I believe the private sector can play a larger role in marketing, in place of the often all too inefficient parastatal monopolies.

Those elements are essential, but so is high quality agricultural research. This country contributes a great deal in that respect.

I should like to summarise the main elements in our policy for long-term development. First, we are providing substantial assistance in support of structural adjustment programmes, especially programmes featuring the agricultural sector. Secondly, we realise that many countries have over-extended themselves by building up new infrastructure which they cannot maintain. We are therefore focusing more upon rehabilitation and maintenance of existing infrastructure than on new big projects. Maintaining an old road is often far more important than building a new one.

There is an increased emphasis in our policy—this was another point raised by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) — on manpower assistance. There will clearly continue to be a need for manpower assistance for years to come. We provide it both by sending out experts and trainers to the countries concerned, and by welcoming a substantial number of people to this country for training.

Within that policy, agriculture and related activities receive considerable support from Britain's aid programme. In 1983 we estimate that £267 million, some 26 per cent. of the total aid programme, was spent in that way. In sub-Saharan Africa the proportion provided was higher—33 per cent. of bilateral aid and 24 per cent. of our multilateral contributions.

At the same time the international agencies that we support give great stress to agriculture. Under the third Lomé convention, which was successfully concluded in December, there is no doubt that agriculture will feature largely in the activities of the Community and the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries.

Another useful multilateral agency is the International Fund for Agricultural Development. The hon. Member for Vauxhall referred to that. I told him on Monday that we hope to see a replenishment and that it will be of the size that he mentioned when he put the question to me. We shall play our part in that.

Mr. Stuart Holland: We appreciate that, but how much will the United Kingdom contribute and how much will that be in relation to the contributions of the Scandinavian countries?

Mr. Raison: That will be decided in the usual discussions which take place among donors. The conference will be in May rather than April, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

In the time that I have been at my Department, our help for the voluntary sector has been stepped up. Over two years we have doubled the resources that will go to the joint funding scheme. That is right. The voluntary agencies do an excellent job and I am delighted that we have been able to help them in that way and to contribute substantially to the increase in the volunteer programme.

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield) rose——

Mr. Raison: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me, but I must continue my reply.

The scope of the motion is as vast as it is important. I cannot cover every aspect of it, but I have tried to show that both the Government and our partners in the international community are endeavouring to bring increasingly effective and co-ordinated resources to bear on both the immediate famine crisis and the long-term development needs. Effectiveness is crucial, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hallam stressed.

We spend over £200 million a year bilaterally on development in sub-Saharan Africa and we play our part in the multilateral effort as well. In some cases — for example, Ethiopia—our development contribution may well be largely provided through our share of Community and World Bank funds rather than bilaterally. But our bilateral commitment to Africa will have a high priority, as indeed it should.

I do not claim perfection for all that we are doing. Indeed, the more one stares the problems in the face, the humbler one becomes, but, as the hon. Member for Greenwich implied, we are learning all the time. We can, however, see emerging a clearer development strategy for Africa. I hope that time will show that our contribution has both the generosity and the wisdom for which the motion calls.

2.17 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells: I shall not attempt further to sum up the debate which has been so excellently answered by my right hon. Friend the Minister, but it is important that we record our thanks to all those who have participated in the debate and displayed such a great depth of knowledge and interest in the subject. It has been a good day for the House of Commons. We have served the prestige of the House well and the British people will know that the legislature understands and responds to the needs of Africa.

I shall have to press my right hon. Friend for additional money. Understandably, he could not immediately give me assurances that he will provide additional money, in view of the extra expenditure to which his budget has been subject. I shall also have to press him to ensure that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry phases out the MFA as soon as possible.

I shall also be asking my right hon. Friend again and again why he has adopted the curious parallel financing of World Bank initiatives by World Bank and United Nations funds. It does nothing to strengthen the World Bank or the objectives with which he has so eloquently agreed. I hope that before long he will give the House an explanation and wholeheartedly join the World Bank and the United Nations to pursue the economic objectives which both sides of the House have so well expressed today.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House recognises that death and suffering from starvation and diseases related to malnutrition of millions of

Africans are capable of being prevented by mankind working together; notes that prevention of famine also promotes international trade and thereby the reduction of unemployment in richer countries; congratulates the people of Britain on the generosity of their contributions to the voluntary relief agencies; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to respond with equal generosity and wisdom.

Employment

2.19 pm

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I beg to move,

That this House, recognising the considerable achievements of Government policies in increasing the numbers in work by 340,000 in the year to September 1984 and of the successful launch of the Youth Training Scheme, urges the Government to exploit fully the opportunities to reduce the level of unemployment by developing the Youth Training Scheme into a two year course, leading to levels of skills comparable to those obtained from a 'time served' apprenticeship, with a heavy emphasis on the new technologies, developing the re-training facilities offered by the Skillcentre Training Agency to increase the relevance and acceptability of the training offered, reducing the burden of employment bureaucracy on employers, particularly small and medium ones, encouraging wholeheartedly worksharing by abatement of income tax and national insurance contributions, both employer and employee, for part-time half-time employees earning less than half the average wage, preparing the workforce for a shorter working week and creating circumstances favourable to flexible early retirement.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for summing up his important debate with such brevity. It gives me a few moments to offer some thoughts to the House on the changing structure of employment. It must be rare for a Back-Bench Member to put down for the first time a motion on the Order Paper to be debated later in the week, but appearing for the first time on Budget day, and to have the Chancellor of the Exchequer concede almost all of his demands within eight hours. That is my happy position, and I am much encouraged by that demonstration by the Chancellor of his willingness to listen to advice from these Benches and to act so speedily.

Cynics might insinuate that I had taken many well-thumbed suggestions and cobbled them together in one of those composite motions so loved by the Trade Union Congress at its annual meeting, but they are wrong. While the youth training scheme proposal, the income tax threshold decision and even the alleviation of employment bureaucracy have been well trailed, the Chancellor appears to have added his most radical proposal—the eminently sensible reform of national insurance—at the end of his speech and without great promptings from either the press or pressure groups. I am entirely persuaded that my motion brought about those welcome reforms. Any suggestion that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) had anything to do with it, I discount entirely.

Enough of the frivolity. I tabled my motion because I am one of the few hon. Members who still run their own businesses day by day in addition to their parliamentary duties. I employ 50 people and have an active part in running my business. I am therefore familiar with the problems that confront all businesses today. I tabled my motion also because I represent a constituency in the south-east which has a high rate of unemployment—17 per cent.—much of which was caused directly by the closure of a major Government establishment — the Royal Navy base and dockyard at Chatham. I am therefore familiar with the changing structure of employment and persuaded of the need for it.

The Government have initiated many major schemes of training and community employment which are to be applauded. It is hypocritical of the Opposition to sneer at the fragility of make-work schemes and to call for the creation of real jobs, whatever that may mean. That is dishonest and disingenuous. When the Labour party was in government it was pleased enough to massage the unemployment figures with many work experience schemes which had almost no training or employment content.

The Government's youth training scheme is the most exciting new training initiative for several decades and has the potential to replace the almost defunct time-serving apprenticeships. I am delighted by the decision to extend it to two years and to introduce a recognisable qualification for those who complete their training successfully. I hope that the enormous potential of the excellent ITeCs, of which one of the best is in my constituency, can be fully exploited, with more advanced courses leading to qualification.

Time will not allow me to say a great deal about the skill training agency centres, although I also have one in my constituency, and fortunately it will survive the present rationalisation. The present steps are necessary to make the centres more relevant and to narrow what seems to be a credibility gap in relation to the training offered.

I have concentrated on training because I am convinced that the work force at all levels must become more skilled. I am reminded of a visit to a local factory where I watched in horror and fascination as a man lifted a heavy crate from a pile, turned through 90 degrees and put it on to a conveyor belt. He repeated the operation several times a minute and was due to perform that dreadful monotonous task for several hours before his break.

That factory is now closed, and even if it were to reopen I am certain that that man would be replaced by a comparatively simple machine. One can argue whether he was better off performing that mindless job than on the dole looking for a scarce new position. What is not in doubt is that we shall not create new jobs which can be performed by today's machines better, more cheaply and without industrial hassle. Our manufacturing base has been eroded, but any new manufacturing that we undertake will be much automated and we will not create the sort of jobs that that man was doing.

The other side of the equation is that new jobs will come from service industries, and we must apply our training schemes to them. A word here on training boards, which are so beloved of the Opposition. I have dealt with a training board for more than 10 years. Despite the helpful, friendly and courteous relationship with my advisers during those years, I am convinced that the impact of the training board on my trade—the licensed trade—is, at best, peripheral. Perhaps other sectors enjoy a more positive contribution from their training boards, and I can hope only that the increasing emphasis on training brings with it an increasingly relevant role for the training boards.

I come now to what I would call the employment bureaucracy that confronts employers. There are simply too many officials charged with administering a part of the employment function; and I could name all of those with whom I have had to deal, but that would take too long. One of the major problems of the employment bureaucracy is that employers view the army of officials with increasing suspicion. There is a feeling that officials are interested only in catching out employers to justify their continued existence. There is a real need for a complete change of attitude among the officials of the employment bureaucracy. They should seek to understand the problems that confront employers and help employers to overcome those problems. I mentioned earlier my enthusiasm for the raising of tax thresholds and the reduction in national insurance contributions. As one who still regularly does his company's payroll, I appreciate the nonsense of a system that allows me to pay someone £33·99 for part-time work and charge him no tax or insurance, whereas if I paid him a penny more he would lose £3·06 in national insurance contributions, and it would cost me £3·55. I welcome the Chancellor's determination to resolve that problem.

Also on national insurance, I welcome the new arrangements for the self-employed. I put down a question last year and received a slightly bland answer, but I am delighted, as I am sure the self-employed will be, by the Chancellor's determination in this matter.

My last two requests are for items which might more properly be put forward by the TUC. They are for shorter working hours and for more flexible arrangements for early retirement and retirement in general. Too often, early retirement involves substantial financial hardship, which acts as a great disincentive to those who might otherwise be interested in releasing their jobs. Both considerations demand a fundamental review by the Department of Employment.

I am certain that this year's Budget is a Budget for jobs and will make significant inroads into the unemployment figures. That will bring some scorn from those who aspire to miracles, but then miracles have a tendency to turn to ashes quickly. There are no easy panaceas. What is needed is a better-trained work force spurred to greater productive efforts by a less crushing tax regime, working for employers who are less burdened by the bureaucracy; workers who earn a good wage without synthetic overtime hours and who can look forward to sensible and flexible retirement arrangements.

I am delighted that my motion has been overtaken to such a dramatic extent by Tuesday's Budget for jobs.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) on tabling the motion in time for the Budget, and I join him in congratulating my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on putting so many of his suggestions into the Budget.

If there were more time today, we could continue the debate that we had yesterday, when the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) spoke. Perhaps I could build on an area of agreement in the last minute and say that the development of the two-year youth training scheme requires not only legislation but co-operation from both sides of industry. If we can use that as an illustration of getting greater adaptability and flexibility in matching unmet needs with enhanced resources, we shall get greater output. If we can match that with keeping costs under control, output will increase faster and productivity will increase as fast as that of our competitors. In a year's time, more people will be in work, the burdens on employment will be reduced, the opportunities for employment will increase, and perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham will put down a motion next year which will take us a step further.

An important aspect of the political process is that contributions from Back-Bench Members such as my hon.

Friend and those who spoke in the previous debate make it possible for the Government to bring forward new initiatives, many of which have all-party agreement, and some of which the Opposition cannot accept immediately. We have a common responsibility to increase opportunities for people, especially youngsters, to remove unnecessary obstacles to jobs, and to ensure that as many people as possible co-operate in providing opportunities to meet the clear needs throughout our economy——

It being half past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Monday 25th March, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 4 (Prayers against statutory instruments, &c., (negative procedure)), any Motions in the name of Mr. Neil Kinnock, relating to National Health Service or National Health Service (Scotland), may be proceeded with, though opposed, for a period of one and a half hours after the first of them has been entered upon, and at the end of that period Mr. Speaker shall put the Question already proposed from the Chair —[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Sheppey Maternity Unit

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): Last year, in June, I presented to Parliament a petition from the people of Sheppey in the name of Mrs. Rita Barton and some 7,000 petitioners calling for the retention of the Sheppey maternity unit. On 12 July last year we received a welcome assurance from the Secretary of State on the retention of the maternity unit. My right hon. Friend said:

> "I am assured by the Authority that there has been no decision to run down the maternity facilities at Sheppey General Hospital . . . The Authority does not envisage any change to present maternity facilities before the completion of the major development, expected in 1990."

Just six months later, in January, the Medway health authority produced a plan for the early closure of that unit.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, whom I am glad to see here, will understand the anger of local people at this sudden change. He may even feel that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was somewhat misled last July when he gave that assurance. If he feels that he was misled, I am sure that the misleading was inadvertent, but it is no less disturbing for all that.

I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that if it was right last July to say that the authority could plan for some years ahead to keep the maternity unit, it cannot be argued now, a few months later, that there is some overriding medical or financial reason why that unit should be closed.

Let me stress to my hon. Friend and the House an important fact. The Sheppey maternity unit is a modern, purpose-built unit built in about 1963, which currently has 25 beds. It is part of the Sheppey general hospital, which has 110 beds. It is located on the Isle of Sheppey, which, for those who are not familiar with the island, is a real island with a substantial population. It has just one road contact, with a lifting bridge. That is an important factor in considering the strong feelings of local people, who wish to defend their local hospital facilities. Most people throughout the country wish to protect their local hospital facilities, but there are arguments for Sheppey and I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary understands that fact and will bear it in mind when he comes, if it comes to him, to consider this proposition.

It is because the maternity unit has offered such a high standard of service in both medical and personal terms to the people of the island, because it is held in such high esteem and affection by everyone — by the whole population, those who have experience of it and the medical profession — and because it has such a good medical record that there is such an overwhelming reaction against the proposal.

I stress again the nature of the opposition. There has been a massive reaction against the proposal, by general practitioners, health visitors, midwives, politicians of all parties, the press, the hospital watch committee, which has been a notable opponent, and the many other groups which have been formed. It should be understood that all these people are not irresponsible. They are not clamouring to keep a facility which is in some way inferior in its medical service. These people understand the need for the highest standards of medical service. They are saying that this maternity unit is a high-quality, modern facility which should be retained.

In this brief debate I shall not try to set out the full case against closure. There will be further opportunities for that to be developed. My main object is to seek some assurances from my hon. Friend, and I hope that he will be able to help me, the people of Sheppey and the people of the whole borough of Swale, where Sheppey is located.

The proposal is still at an early stage. The Medway health authority has asked for comments by 24 April. I have every hope that the authority will rethink the proposal and that it will never reach my hon. Friend's desk. But it may well end up on his desk. If it does, I hope that he will listen carefully to all the arguments that will be deployed by my constituents.

My main reason for raising the matter today is one which I am sure my hon. Friend will understand. There is widespread cynicism among many members of the public about these processes of consultation and appeal. I mean that as a generalisation, and not specifically in this connection, although it arises in this case. There is a widespread and understandable feeling that once proposals of this kind are made they are cast in tablets of stone and are very hard to change.

I repeat that the Medway health authority has told me and many other people that it means it sincerely when it says that this is a genuine process of consultation. Having said that, I fear that it is very hard to get such proposals altered.

I should like from my hon. Friend a categorical assurance that in the event of an appeal to him it will genuinely be considered at ministerial level. I hope he can assure us that if it gets to that point he will be willing to receive further representations.

We also want an assurance that this is not a rubber-stamp procedure. When Ministers receive applications of this kind which are so close to the hearts of the people, we want to know that they give them personal attention and do not simply rubber-stamp them because they have had a weight of bureaucratic or medical advice which tends to disregard the other side of the argument. It would be most encouraging if my hon. Friend could tell us of any cases where the Secretary of State has overturned applications by health authorities and upheld the objections of community health councils against health authorities' proposals.

I am arranging with my hon. Friend's office for the presentation of a petition on behalf of thousands of islanders, and I hope that my hon. Friend will receive it in person.

It would also be helpful if, not necessarily today but at an early stage, my hon. Friend could stress again our belief as a party in the value of local community hospitals wherever they can be maintained with high medical standards against this continuing centralisation on district general hospitals. It would be encouraging to everyone to be reminded that the Conservative party's heart is still in the right place and that these matters still receive sympathetic support from a Conservative Government.

May I deal with a number of key points. First, and crucially, I have here a letter from the community health council which states:

> "A working group of the community health council has met to discuss this issue and they are recommending that the community health council should formally oppose the closure."

That is an important step and we very much welcome the support and involvement of the CHC. May I also put on record its latest statistics, which are different from other statistics which have recently been presented. They reveal a slightly better position than that reflected in the health authority's strategic plan. The bed occupancy is 40 per cent. whereas the strategic plan showed a bed occupancy of only 35 per cent. The number of births was 690, a slight increase on the figures in the strategic plan. However, this does not reflect the amount of activity in the unit. Well over 1,000 patients are treated in the maternity unit—a very important statistic to be placed on record.

As for numbers, it has been suggested on previous occasions that units of this kind are not viable unless the figures are higher than those to which I have just referred. My hon. Friend was kind enough to give me a list showing the total number of births at maternity units. There are 75 maternity units on the list but at one third of those units —25 — there were fewer births than at the Sheppey maternity unit, which proves, I believe, that the unit is viable.

There is no dispute about the need to maximise the use of resources and about the under-use of the unit. Equally, there is no shortage of proposals to make better use of the unit, together with a much higher bed occupancy.

I have received a large number of letters from knowledgeable and concerned people who live in the area, and I should like to quote just a few. First, may I refer to the excellent and constructive response of the Sheppey hospital watch committee, which has done so much valuable work over the years. It emphasises, first, that it is concerned about the way in which this procedure has evolved and says, for example:

> "It has also transpired that the gynaecological department at Sheppey was not consulted, nor were the local general practitioners. It would seem to us that it should be axiomatic that those who would be expected to operate such a plan should be consulted before"

what the authority called

> "the draft plan was published rather than afterwards."

I very much sympathise with that point of view.

In a long report, the committee suggests:

> "the plan takes no account of the projected population growth on Sheppey and in particular in the Kemsley area of Sittingbourne which is a natural catchment area for the Sheppey maternity unit."

It sets out proposals for the improvement of the maternity unit and ways in which to maximise the use of the beds in the unit.

I received a letter just this morning from a Mr. Peter Cooper. I mentioned earlier how limited is the access to the island, Mr. Cooper says:

> "it will interest you to know that due to the 'annual'"—

I think he meant that sarcastically—

> "roadworks on the A249, it took me 45 minutes this morning to travel the two miles from the roundabout at the northern end of the Sheppey Way to just past the bridge."

For most people it is a journey of 20 or 30 miles to get to the Medway district hospital or to All Saints hospital, whose maternity facilities would replace those at Sheppey. If it took Mr. Cooper 40 minutes to travel two miles, one can understand the great concern of those who know how long it will take them to get all the way to the Medway district hospital if there is a hold-up at the bridge.

I have also received letters from VOICE, one of the most effective industrial organisations in the country, which stresses its support for the campaign to keep the maternity unit open, and from Mrs. Rapley, a health visitor who works on the Isle of Sheppey. She makes plain her opposition to the planned closure and says:

"When I moved to the island 5½ years ago, local people still referred to the Unit as 'Our lovely new Maternity Unit'—How can it become obsolete in so short a time?"

I could develop the theme at much greater length, but I shall not do so.

The National Childbirth Trust emphasises how ideally equipped is the Sheppey maternity unit

"to provide maternity care for women whose pregnancies and deliveries are straightforward. It is modern and was purpose-built, and has the added bonus of an intimate and friendly atmosphere, almost impossible to create in a larger hospital."

I have a letter from Mrs. Tompsett, who sets out an excellent proposition for a combined gynaecological and maternity unit. I shall not elaborate on that except to say that I hope the health authority will consider such a proposal, and that if it rejects it the Minister will recognise it as being a valid alternative.

I wish to emphasise that there is an overwhelming case for retaining this outstandingly good maternity unit. I could quote at length, but I shall not do so.

Having stressed how strongly I and local people feel, it is right to put the proposal into perspective. I do not doubt the sincerity and genuineness of the health authority in putting forward proposals in its 10-year plan to maximise the use of resources. It has to do that, and we respect its efforts, but I regret this proposal and think that it is a misjudgment. It is wrong to suggest that such a proposal arises from cuts in Government spending. That is not the case. It is a genuine and continuing effort to realise and use resources to the best.

During the next decade the Medway health authority will have one of the biggest projects in the south-east. Some £35 million will be spent on Medway phase 3, plus another £11 million for other capital projects. We have always been one of the poorest districts in the south-east. We have been the poor relation, the Cinderella, of the south-east. That programme will bring us up to nearly 95 per cent. of our RAWP target. It is not quite enough, but it is real progress. Year on year, the Medway health district has managed to secure real growth.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I hope my hon. Friend will accept that we in the Government are doing all that we can to raise quickly the standard of health provision and investment in the Medway. That is important. We recognise that it has been a problem for a number of years. The area has been allowed to lag a long way behind, and it is due to the efforts of my hon. Friend and some of his hon. Friends that we have had this substantial increase in expenditure.

Mr. Moate: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. It is close to our hearts, and we welcome it. Inflation has played tricks with figures, but 10 years ago Medway's income was just £10 million. Next year it will be £37 million. There has been real growth and that is welcomed.

It would be much more welcome to the people of Sheppey and Swale if we could keep the maternity unit on the Isle of Sheppey and move forward to what we really want, which is a Swale district general hospital. That is not in this programme, but it has been long planned and long awaited. We want all those improvements, but we want to ensure that the local hospital services on Sheppey and in Swale are retained and improved.

Mr. John Patten: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) for raising this matter. I know that the proposal has caused strong feelings in Sheppey. I have never visited the hospital, but I have visited the island. I have been across the bridge, although I did not suffer from the annual traffic works on the road. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport, needs to have that drawn to her attention.

My hon. Friend's concern for the unit is well known in my Department and was demonstrated in June 1984 when he presented to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State a petition containing some 7,000 signatures. That is one of the more substantial petitions that we have received recently, but although 7,000 signatures are impressive the figure is nothing like as impressive as the size of my hon. Friend's majority over his alliance opponent which, at 15,252, was more than double the number of signatures on the petition.

I look forward to receiving the next petition that my hon. Friend has promised, and I shall certainly make myself available to receive it from him at the House, or at the DHSS at the Elephant and Castle, whichever is more convenient. But the petition that we have had, combined with my hon. Friend's speech, put the case most eloquently for the maintenance and improvement of maternity services at Sheppey general hospital. Local interest in the Sheppey unit certainly has not abated since last June, and was caused, of course, by the change of regional strategic plan.

I understand that there have been two well attended meetings: at Sheerness on 14 February, and at Sittingbourne on 20 February. Indeed, before the Adjournment debate, my hon. Friend let me know of the strength of feeling that resulted from those two meetings, which has been reflected by local residents and by the activities of the community health council. At those meetings, the district health authority tried to explain the thinking behind its draft strategic plan.

One feature is the proposal for the hospital's change of use. No such change was foreseen when the petition was presented last year, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health and I were not aware at that stage that any such proposals were coming forward.

However, since last year the authority has made a thorough review of its resources in the light of commitments over the 10-year period of its strategic plan. The plan has now been prepared in draft, and is presently subject to the consultation process. I shall say more about that later, as I know that my hon. Friend is rightly concerned, on behalf of his constituents, that that consultation process is genuine and not a sham. I am intent on demonstrating to him that it is certainly not a sham.

I am sure that my hon. Friend will appreciate that it is not for the Government to make absolute prescriptions for what the pattern of services should be in different localities. It would be absolutely absurd for the Government to attempt to prejudge, judge and second-guess decisions taken all over England when expenditure is about £14 billion, or about double what it was in 1979. The DHSS is a huge and integrated organisation, but decisions are best taken, and feelings about them are best expressed, at the local level, subject always to the overriding decision of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his ministerial colleagues.

There is a continuing debate about maternity services which can be summed up briefly in the big versus small argument. Many people say that we need big hospitals with substantial maternity units, as they will make an even greater contribution to the rapid fall in perinatal mortality rates in this country. Indeed, the fall in perinatal mortality rates since 1979 represents one of the most significant social trends in this Government's lifetime.

Those who say that small hospitals and small maternity units are better argue that only those who perhaps need a consultant's care need go to the big units or big district general hospitals, and that those mothers who do not need that level of care, and who have been advised by their general practitioners or consultants that their births are likely to be safe with no complications — particularly those with second or subsequent children—benefit from going to smaller units. They argue that it is there that they will get the intimate care for which I understand from my hon. Friend his hospital is renowned.

I think that that is a fair, though brisk, summing up of the arguments. However, I also think that it is possible to create a good homely atmosphere on wards in our large hospitals, provided that the staff get on and do it, and provided that the consultants and senior staff involved make the personnel perform that difficult task of making a large unit seem homely and not too much like some sort of baby factory. I can think of examples where that sort of good practice goes on. However, that is just a footnote.

Health authorities must strike a balance between the big and the small theories and the big and small practice in maternity provision. They must pursue the objective of further reducing perinatal mortality and the incidence of handicap in young babies, which gives such a tragic start to life to so many. However, I am happy to say that the incidence of handicap is declining. They must also pursue the objective of improving the safety of the service that they provide.

The essence of good maternity care is that there should be close communication and mutual support between the mother and all those looking after her. Sensitivity to the anxieties and wishes of mothers is an essential part of the professional expertise of all staff involved in maternity care.

I assure my hon. Friend that we shall bear in mind the importance, in general Government policy, of close connections between the mother and those looking after her as being the essence of good community care when we are involved in any decisions over this or any other maternity hospital. That may seem like a set of generalities, but it is not; it is the background to what I shall now say about the specific hospital.

I cannot say much about the hospital because it is not on Ministers' desks and has not been referred to us. No decisions have been taken. If I were to give as much as one slight opinion to one or the other side it might be read as some kind of prejudgment or pre-emption of a later ministerial decision, showing some sort of prejudice in favour of the plan or in favour of the protesters against the plan. I do not intend to put myself and my right hon. and learned Friend in that position this afternoon.

What I can say is that the structure plan—of which the change of use of the Sheppey maternity unit is but one proposal among many — is at present the subject of consultation with local interests, ending on 24 April. The district chairman of Medway health authority has gone on record as saying that no proposal in the strategic plan is a forgone conclusion, and that no proposal in the strategic plan—if I may lapse into French, which is generally, quite properly, forbidden in this Chamber — is a fait accompli. I am simply quoting his words.

The overriding aim of the plan is to ensure that the greatest number of people in the district have as fair a share as possible of the growing health resources available in the district, to which I am glad that my hon. Friend drew the attention of the whole House. The chairman of the district health authority is making staff resources available to examine carefully any plans that are put forward and to develop any viable alternative proposals that might emerge from the consultation process.

Even if, following the consultation procedure, the change of use proposals remain part of the strategic plan, there will still be ample opportunity for local people and representative interests to express their views and put their proposals to the health authority as the consultation process rolls on. It may not come to that; we shall have to wait and see.

We have made it clear in earlier debates—and here in my concluding remarks I shall try to answer my hon. Friend's questions—that when proposals are made to us we shall not agree to closure or change of use unless it can be clearly demonstrated—I emphasise those words—that the closure or change of use is in the best interests of local health services and the local community, or that savings will result to finance necessary developments elsewhere.

I was asked to give some examples to show that the consultation process and procedure was not some sort of formality, with rubber-stamping by Ministers. I will mention a couple of cases drawn from the South-East Thames regional health authority in which the Medway district health authority is located. In 1983 there was a proposal that the Brook hospital cardiac unit shold be closed. That was rejected because we felt that the regional health authority had not demonstrated real benefits or clinical advantages from a concentration of services.

Perhaps closer to home—if not geographically, then at least in regard to the subject of the debate, a maternity unit — at Crowborough hospital there was a proposed transfer of six maternity beds to Pembury hospital by the Tunbridge Wells health authority. We rejected that in April 1984 again because the service arguments of the district health authority were not seen as compelling. It was felt that the authority had not made out a clear case to persuade my right hon. and learned Friend and myself that the closure should go ahead.

We constantly tell district health authorities that it is up to them to demonstrate clearly to us that proposals should go ahead. If they do not, the closures do not go ahead. We take the concentration exercise seriously. My right hon. and learned Friend and I see delegations and would be happy—should it come to it—to see any delegation led by my hon. Friend at any stage to discuss the unit, after all the due processes of consultation within the district health authority and the regional health authority have been gone through.

Finally, because of what my hon. Friend has said and because of the strength of feeling that he has expressed,

I undertake that, should any closure recommendation be forwarded to us by the South-East Thames regional health authority, we shall ourselves take the final decision. I give my hon. Friend that clear undertaking this afternoon. I hope that that satisfies my hon. Friend and, through him, his constituents that the whole consultation process will be gone through very carefully indeed, and that that process will end with a decision — should it ever reach Ministers' desks—taken with the greatest care and the fullest consideration.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Farm Incomes

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether his Department follows the accounting standards in assessing incomes from farming; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the latest year the provision for depreciation on a current cost and on an historical cost basis, together with the figure for breeding livestock appreciation.

Mr. MacGregor: The income assessment in table 22 of the Annual Review White Paper (Cmnd. 9423) is based on internationally agreed standards for national accounts. The table includes information on depreciation on a current cost basis. The other information requested is not available.

Food Labelling

Mr. Warren asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why vitamin E is not scheduled to be included in the provisions of the Food Labelling Regulations 1984 (S.I. 1984, No. 1305) on 1 January 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: According to the best scientific and medical advice available to the Government, vitamin E is already present in adequate amounts in any likely diet and there is therefore no need for anyone to ingest any more. No evidence to the contrary was presented during the lengthy consultation process on the Food Labelling Regulations 1984. The omission of vitamin E from the schedule does not prevent its sale properly labelled; it only prevents claims being made about it.

Farmgate Prices

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what has been the change in farmgate prices in real terms of sugar beet since 1973;

(2) what has been the change in farmgate prices in real terms of lamb since 1973;

(3) what has been the change in farmgate prices in real terms of eggs since 1973;

(4) what has been the change in farmgate prices in real terms of poultry since 1973;

(5) what has been the change in farmgate prices in real terms of barley since 1973;

(6) what has been the change in farmgate prices in real terms of pigmeat since 1973;

(7) what has been the change in farmgate prices in real terms of beef since 1973;

(8) what has been the change in farmgate prices in real terms of milk since 1973;

(9) what has been the change in farmgate prices in real terms of wheat since 1973.

Mrs. Fenner: Percentage changes in producer prices, deflated by the retail price index, between the years 1973 and 1984 are as follows. The prices used for the calculation are annual averages derived from information collected for the agricultural producer price index.

Percentage change, 1973 to 1984 in producer prices in real terms

	Percentage
Sugar beet	− 14
Lambs; including premia	− 23
Eggs	− 48

Barley	− 33
Pigs (excluding sows)	− 32
Clean cattle	− 24
Milk	− 17
Wheat	− 38

Food Production

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what has been the increase in United Kingdom production of wheat in percentage terms since 1973;

(2) what has been the increase in United Kingdom production of barley in percentage terms since 1973;

(3) what has been the increase in United Kingdom production of beef in percentage terms since 1973;

(4) what has been the increase in United Kingdom production of sugar beet in percentage terms since 1973;

(5) what has been the increase in United Kingdom production of milk in percentage terms since 1973;

(6) what has been the increase in United Kingdom production of lamb in percentage terms since 1973;

(8) what has been the increase in United Kingdom production of poultry in percentage terms since 1973;

(9) what has been the increase in United Kingdom production of pigmeat in percentage terms since 1973.

Mrs. Fenner: The percentage increases in production between 1973 and 1984 are as follows:

Percentage change in United Kingdom production between 1973 and 1984

	Percentage
Wheat	+199
Barley	+ 22
Beef	+ 27
Sugarbeet	+ 18
Milk	+ 14
Sheepmeat	+ 30
Eggs	− 14
Poultrymeat	+ 24
Pigmeat	− 2

Agricultural Products

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if it remains his policy that price reductions are the best way of achieving cuts in output in agricultural produce.

Mr. MacGregor: It remains our policy that adjusting prices, linked to guarantee thresholds, is the preferred means of achieving a better balance between Community supply and demand of products for which surpluses exist.

Internal Drainage Boards

Dr. Cunningham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the names of those internal drainage boards which are not covered by the constitutional and electoral arrangements contained in schedule 2 to the Land Drainage Act 1976, by virtue of the fact that they were constituted before 1930; and if he will now take steps to apply the schedule 2 electoral arrangements to these authorities.

Mrs. Fenner: So far as we can ascertain, the following internal drainage boards appear not to be covered at present by the constitutional and electoral arrangements in schedule 2 to the Land Drainage Act 1976:

Othery, Middlezoy and Westonzoyland
Lower Axe
Lower Brue
Stockland
Upper Axe
Upper Brue
West Sedgemoor
Bridgewater and Pawlett
Cannington and Wembdon
King Sedgmoor and Carey Valley
Langport
Wilberfoss and Thornton Level
Sinfin Moor

Water authorities, which are responsible for promoting the necessary schemes, have been advised to seek the reconstitution of such boards under section11 of the Land Drainage Act 1976, so that the schedule 2 arrangements can apply in future.

Drainage

Dr. Cunningham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications for grant-aid for field drainage under the farm capital grant schemes were made in England and Wales; what was the total grant-aid paid towards such schemes; and what was the total expenditure by farmers on such schemes, for each of the financial years since 1979-80.

Mrs. Fenner: The information rquested is given for the calendar years 1979-83 in the following table. I regret it could be provided in financial years only at disproportionate cost.

	England			Wales
	Number of Payments	Eligible Expenditure £ million	Grant Paid £ million	Number of Payments	Eligible Expenditure £ million	Grant Paid £ million
1979	11,202	31·7	17·0	1,770	2·6	1·5
1980	12,620	51·4	27·0	1,840	4·0	2·5
1981	12,643	52·9	25·3	1,602	4·0	2·4
1982	17,011	70·0	32·3	2,627	7·0	4·3
1983	16,252	66·2	29·9	2,854	7·7	4·7

Research Budget

Mr. Proctor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current agricultural research budget within his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: Actual expenditure by my Department on internal and external research and development in agriculture in 1983-84 was £88·3 million. The comparable figure for 1984-85 is estimated to be £90·7 million.

Butter

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he is satisfied that the administration of the EEC reduced price butter scheme has been efficiently conducted in the interests of the consumer.

Mr. MacGregor: I have no reason to doubt it.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will support future proposals for selling off the butter mountain through reduced price butter sales.

Mr. MacGregor: Stocks of surplus butter have built up because the Community has set support prices at levels which encourage production and discourage consumption. The freeze in the target price for milk and the introduction of quotas agreed at the 1984 CAP price fixing were important steps towards securing a better balance in the market and so avoiding the need for special disposal measures. Given the existence of surplus stocks, reduced price sales in some form are inevitable, but we will judge particular proposals on their merits.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the tonnage and cost of new butter manufactured in Britain since January 1985 which has been bought into intervention while the EEC reduced price butter scheme has been in operation.

Mr. MacGregor: In January and February this year 33,055 tonnes of butter were offered into intervention in the United Kingdom. Not all of this will necessarily be accepted, but if all were accepted it would cost £63·8 million.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the total cost involved in making butter available in the United Kingdom under the EEC reduced price butter scheme.

Mr. MacGregor: The price reduction on butter made available in the United Kingdom under the present special scheme is worth about £36 million.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the minimum and maximum acceptable profit margins for butter under the reduced price butter scheme to the final point of retail sale; and what steps have been taken to ensure excessive profits have not been made.

Mr. MacGregor: No minimum and maximum profit margins have been fixed for butter sold under the EC special sale scheme. However, the initial purchaser of this butter is required as a condition of his contract with the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce to ensure that the reduction in selling price provided for in the EC Commission Regulation authorising the sale will be passed on for the benefit of the final consumer. This obligation must also be incorporated in the terms of sale to subsequent purchasers. Arrangements have been made for sample checks to be made to ensure compliance with these conditions. In addition a maximum retail price has been set.

Land Drainage and Coast Protection

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will publish the consultation paper on "Land Drainage and Coast Protection"; what matters will be covered therein; and what further action the Government propose to take.

Mr. Jopling: A Green Paper, entitled "The Financing and Administration of Land Drainage, Prevention of Flooding and Coast Protection in England and Wales", is being published today for public comment. The paper examines the current arrangements for financing and administering land drainage, flood prevention and coast protection, and in particular current and future financing arrangements, the structure of water authorities' land drainage committees, and the administration of internal drainage districts.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has considered the question of departmental responsibility for coast protection; responsibility for the storm tide warning service; payment of grant aid on land drainage schemes straddling the border between England and Wales; and the calling of public inquiries into land drainage matters. She has decided to transfer responsibility for coast protection in England from the Department of the Environment to my Department. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales already exercises responsibility for both land drainage and coast protection for Wales. Other changes in responsibilities, proposals for which are set out in the Green Paper, would be made at a later date.

The Government will consider, in the light of reactions to the Green Paper, what changes in the law relating to the financing and administration of land drainage and coast protection should be proposed. In this connection they will take account of the examination of the possibilities of privatisation in the water industry announced by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction during the debate on the Water Authority (Return on Assets) Orders on 7 February. Whatever the outcome of that examination, the financial and administrative issues raised in the Green Paper require consideration.

The Green Paper does not apply to Scotland where different arrangements exist.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

"Killing for Company: The Case of Dennis Nilsen"

Dr. Mawhinney asked the Attorney-General if he will prosecute the author and publishers of "Killing for Company: The Case of Dennis Nilsen", by Brian Masters (Cape) under the Obscene Publications Act 1959; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I will consider the matter and write to my hon. Friend.

CIVIL SERVICE

Ethnic Surveys

38. Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service where in the east midlands and in the west midlands, respectively, he expects ethnic surveys to begin to cover all non-industrial staff; by whom they will be carried out; how long he expects the survey and processing to take; and when he expects the results to be available.

Mr. Hayhoe: Departments represented in the east and west midlands should be covered for the most part during the early summer over a period of about four weeks. Each Department will be responsible for conducting its own surveys. It will then take about six months for the results to be brought together.

PRIME MINISTER

Glasgow

Mr. White asked the Prime Minister when she next intends to pay an official visit to Glasgow.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Mr. White asked the Prime Minister when she last paid an official visit to Glasgow; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: In January 1983, when I addressed the Glasgow chamber of commerce.

Departmental Co-ordination

Mr. Tinn asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the co-ordination between the Department of Health and Social Security and the Department of Trade and Industry on policy covering the communication needs of the elderly and the disabled.

The Prime Minister: Yes. Recent examples of close co-operation between the two Departments in this area have been over the arrangements to be made for those groups requiring specialist telecommunications equipment in the context of British Telecom's privatisation; and over the Government's information technology awareness programme as it affects disabled people.

Market and Social Research

Mr. Gregory asked the Prime Minister how much expenditure on market or social research using survey techniques the Government have undertaken in each of the last five yars and planned for the present year, broken down *(a)*by Government Department (b) whether the organisations conducting the research were (i) university-academic institutions, (ii) commercial organisations, or (iii) Government or semi-governmental organisations and (c) whether the purpose of the research was advertising-related.

The Prime Minister: The required information on survey expenditure is not held centrally. Lists of new surveys notified to the Central Statistical Office are published quarterly in Statistical News.

RAF Molesworth

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister if she will provide a breakdown by each Department of the total costs of the recent operation at RAF Molesworth.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) on Tuesday, 26 February by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence at column 156. The costs of the local civil police are a matter for the Cambridgeshire constabulary.

ENVIRONMENT

Home Insulation

39. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the amount of Government grant available for insulation in private and public housing; and what is the percentage taken up in the current financial year.

Sir George Young: £31·5 million has been made available to local authorities in England for grants under the homes insulation scheme in the current financial year. Private sector owners and tenants and public sector tenants are eligible for these grants. It is estimated that the take-up will be slightly less than 90 per cent.

Local authorities also insulate their own dwellings. No specific allocation or Government grant is made for such work. Authorities are, however, free to decide how much of their housing investment programme allocations to devote to it and the costs may be taken into account in calculating any entitlement to general housing subsidy. Some £3·8 million has been spent on such work in England in the first six months of the current financial year. This does not include insulation carried out as part of more general repair or improvement.

Intensive Livestock Buildings

Mr. Spence asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to bring intensive livestock buildings, regardless of size or location, within the control of local town planning authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Government have proposed to amend the General Development Order in this and other respects, in a paper issued for public consultation on 23 January 1984. Copies were placed in the Library. The paper includes proposals for full planning control over the development of livestock buildings in the vicinity of residential and similar property. We are currently considering the responses to the consultation exercise and their implications in detail.

Merseyside

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on recent ministerial visits to Merseyside.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I visited Merseyside on 5 March 1985 to meet members of the Merseyside chamber of commerce, Liverpool stores committee, and the rates consultation group. Following my meeting I made a speech advising local authorities to shoulder their responsibilities and make a legal rate at their rate fixing meetings on 7 March.

I again visited Merseyside on 7 and 8 March 1985.

I arrived in Merseyside on the evening of 7 March to attend a dinner held by the Wallasey Conservative Association. Before this engagement I held a press conference in Liverpool to discuss the rate fixing meetings held by certain local authorities on that day.

On 8 March I held a further press conference where I announced a new £6 million plus package to revitalise the Church street and Jersey close housing estates in Bootle, and revealed plans for a "Tate of the North" at the Albert dock. I later visited the Anglican cathedral precinct site to open the first phase of a new housing development, and then travelled to Sefton MBC where I opened the Nationwide Housing Trust development in the Edge lane housing action programme area.

Later I met representatives of the council and some of the residents of the housing estate on Church street.

I also made a short visit to Wirral to meet the directors of a successful local clothing manufacturing company before returning to Liverpool for a working lunch with the Merseyside Development Corporation. Finally, I met the Merseyside enterprise forum before returning to London.

Reema Conclad Dwellings

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for the Building Research Establishment to inspect a respresentative sample of Reema Conclad dwellings and to make its findings public.

Mr. Gow: On 23 October last, at columns 554-57 I announced that I had asked the Building Research Establishment to undertake an urgent study of large panel systems of construction. The Reema Conclad house is one such system. Dwellings of this type will be inspected and the findings published.

Prefabricated Concrete Houses

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report his estimate of the number of houses in each category of prefabricated concrete houses and identify which categories are known to have serious structural defects and which have not.

Mr. Gow: In my statement to the House on 10 November 1983 at column 422 I explained that the Building Research Establishment (BRE) had found

(a) that the reinforced concrete components in 6 of the most common types of prefabricated reinforced concrete houses were gradually deteriorating as a result of carbonation of the concrete and, in some cases, the presence of high levels of chlorides, leading to corrosion of the steel reinforcement and consequent cracking of the concrete, and

(b) that the processes of carbonation and attack by chlorides were likely to affect all prefabricated reinforced concrete houses built before 1960.

At the same time I placed in the Library a table giving figures of the number of each type of prefabricated concrete house built before 1960 in each local authority area, amounting to some 140,000 in England. These figures were based on special returns made by authorities in 1982. I told the House that the BRE's earlier findings had been confirmed by further studies when I introduced the Second Reading of the Housing Defects Bill on 26

April 1984 at column 896. I also gave the names of the 28 types which we intended to designate under the Bill at that time.

I emphasise that these findings do not apply to other types of houses or flats constructed by non-traditional methods and I have no plans to designate other such types under the Housing Defects Act. Nor does my Department have detailed information about their numbers. However we estimate that there are some 200,000 dwellings built as part of the industrialised housing drive during the 1960s and 1970s which can broadly be described as of prefabricated reinforced concrete construction. Of these some 30,000 were houses and the remainder flats. Although certain defects have been found in some buildings within this category, there is no evidence that any type suffers from a universal inherent defect. I have advised owners of Bison Wallframe and Taylor Woodrow Anglian buildings to carry out particular checks and to take action where this is appropriate.

Wembley Stadium (Takeover)

Mr. George Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding the position of the Football Association cup final and international matches at Wembley following the proposed takeover of the stadium by Gomba.

Mr. Macfarlane: The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) has written to me on this subject. I have received no other representations.

National Parks (Pre-notification System)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he plans to make to the recent recommendation of the Environment Committee in its report on the operation and effectiveness of the Wildlife and Countryside Act that the pre-notification system currently in existence for national parks be extended on a countrywide basis.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government are giving very careful consideration to all the recommendations in the Environment Committee's report on the operation and effectiveness of the Wildlife and Countryside Act and will issue their response in due course.

Smith Houses

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding the designation of Smith houses under the Housing Defects Acts 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: I have received a number of representations about the designation of Smith houses under section 1 of the Housing Defects Act. The information available is that Smith houses generally do suffer from some inherent defects, but these defects have been present in some cases for many years, have not led to serious damage, and no substantial reduction in value appears to have arisen aas a result. Some Smith houses in Birmingham are defective because of the use of the shale fill in their construction and have suffered a substantial fall in value. This problem is not inherent in the Smith system of construction and my right hon. Friend does not intend to designate Smith houses under section 1 of the Act on this basis.

Olympic Games

Mr. Dennis Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the British Olympic Association regarding London as a venue for future Olympic Games; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir. H. Monro) on Monday 25 February at column 61.

Minerals Act 1981

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which sections of the Minerals Act 1981 have not yet been implemented; and in each case why this is so.

Mr. Macfarlane: Sections 1 and 2(1) of the 1981 Act have not yet been brought into force inline with assurances given when the Bill was before Parliament that this would not be done until certain amendments had been made to the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1977. Implemention of sections 3, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 17 and part of section 15 is dependent upon parliamentary approval to Minerals Compensation Regulations which I hope will be laid before the House shortly. Section 18 applies the provisions of the Bill to the Isles of Scilly. Sections 19 to 32 of the Act apply to Scotland, and progress with implementation of these sections is therefore the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to introduce amemdments to the Minerals Act 1981 along the lines suggested by the County Planning Officers' Society following its survey of mineral planning authorities in England and Wales.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have no plans to do so.

Hatshead Quarry

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the implications for mineral planning extraction of the recent House of Lords appeal decision in the case of the Hatshead quarry.

Mr. Macfarlane: The principal implication for mineral planning authorities of the decision of the House of Lords in the Hatshead quarry case is that, where mineral working permissions do not have a definite life upon them, the right to work the minerals cannot generally be regarded as abandoned even if the quarry has not been worked for some time. By virtue of section 7 of the Town and Country Planning (Minerals) Act 1981, planning permissions at such quarries will expire in February 2042.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the timetable under which rate capped local authorities must make their budgets and fix their rates for the year 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: All authorities are required by law to fix a rate or issue a precept. Precepts must be issued at least 21 days before the beginning of the financial year. Rates are normally fixed by 1 April.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the effect of restrictions on capital spending by local authorities on their ability to obtain grants from the European regional development fund.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It is for each local authority to determine its own spending priorities within the total amount of expenditure permitted to it. In doing so, it can take account of the likely availability of receipts from the European Community, including the ERDF, for certain projects.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding the current inclusion of European Economic Community grants in the definition of perscribed expenditure for local authorities; and if he will take steps to exempt European Economic Community grants from this definition.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: We have received representations to the effect that, if a local authority is eligible for a grant from the European regional development fund, it should receive an additional capital spending allocation to enable full use to be made of such grants. It would not, however, be appropriate to make an additional allocation in these circumstances. The availability of ERDF receipts, in common with other receipts from the European Community, are taken into account when public expenditure levels are set nationally. Local authorities' capital allocations in aggregate are consequently already higher than they would be without the ERDF.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce measures to enable the progressive privatisation of the management and financing of housing currently under the control of local authorities.

Mr. Gow: Local authorities already have powers to transfer ownership of their housing to private organisations. Thousands of derelict and vacant local authority dwellings have been bought, improved, and resold, by private developers. Some councils have handed over the management of property still in their ownership to co-operatives of tenants. The Government welcome these initiatives and will encourage further schemes through the new urban housing renewal unit, announced by my right hon. Friend, in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) on 26 February, at column 99.

Housebuilding Costs

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the average cost of housing association new building in the Greater London council and metropolitan county areas of (i) two-bedroomed and (ii) three-bedroomed houses;

(2) what is the average cost of new council houses (i) two-bedroomed and (ii) three-bedroomed for each Greater London council, or metropolitan county district housing authority.

Sir George Young: In 1984, the estimated average construction costs, excluding land, site works, and ancillary buildings and fees, of four bed-space and five bed-space local authority houses in the greater London area were £21,400 and £25,500, respectively; the comparable figures for the metropolitan counties of England as a whole were £17,200 and £19,400. Houses with four bed-spaces may have two or more bedrooms, while those with five bed-spaces generally have three bedrooms. The number of contracts was too few to provide meaningful figures for individual housing authorities.

Comparable data for housing association building are not available.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total full-time equivalent number of employees and the figure as a percentage of local population in descending percentage numbers for (a) each shire county and (b) each metropolitan county.

Mr. Waldegrave: Information about the full-time equivalent number of employees is not available centrally for individual local authorities. Information relating to full-time employees is as follows:

Derelict Land Grants

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has about the amount of money allocated in the form of category A derelict land grants, category B derelict land grants and category C derelict land grants, to each of the areas designated for derelict land returns under section 94(2) of the Local Government Planning Act 1980 for each of the following years: 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84;

(2) what information he has about the amount of money allocated in the form of derelict land grants to each of the areas designated for derelict land returns under section 94(2) of the Local Government Planning Act 1980 for each of the following years: 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84.

Mr. Macfarlane: Information about the amount of money allocated to each district and borough council for derelict land grants in the form required is not immediately available; I shall write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the number of applications for derelict land grants refused, and the sums of money involved, in each of the areas designated for derelict land returns under section 94(2) of the Local Government Planning Act 1980 for each of the following years: 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84.

Mr. Macfarlane: The information on individual applications can only be obtained at unreasonable cost. However, bids from local authorities for derelict land resources have outstripped the resources made available by some 2½ times in each of the years 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84.

Acid Rain

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress there has been in identifying the extent of the damage by acid rain; and if he will make an up-to-date statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The position remains substantially as set out in the Government's reply to the fourth report from the Environment Committee (Cmnd. 9397). My Department has a substantial continuing programme of monitoring and research. I expect reports within the next 18 months from review groups studying the impact of acid rain deposition on terrestrial and aquatic systems in the United Kingdom and on materials, including ancient buildings and monuments. These reports, which will be published, should help in defining the scale of the problem and in elucidating its causes.

House Purchase

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many persons have received grants from the scheme to enable tenants of charitable housing associations to obtain discounts for house purchase under the Housing and Building Control Act 1984; and what sum has actually been provided to tenants through the scheme.

Sir George Young: The Housing Corporation had, at 31 January, approved payments of grant to 37 tenants, totalling £509,498.

Uplands (Report)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in connection with his response to the Countryside Commission's report on the uplands.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has as yet received no direct formal representations.

Sports Sponsorship

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the recommendations of the report of a committee chaired by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell), on sports sponsorship, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have asked the Sports Council for advice on the report's recommendations and I await its response.

Council of Environment Ministers

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about the outcome of the Council of Environment Ministers meeting on 7 March.

Mr. Waldegrave: I was accompanied at this meeting by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher), Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Trade and Industry.

On the most important issue before this meeting of the Council, new limits for vehicle emissions, there was no agreement despite considerable efforts by the Ministers of a number of member states, including the United Kingdom, to reach a satisfactory compromise. The Council was therefore unable to make further progress on the introduction of unleaded petrol and cars to run on it. Discussion will be resumed at a meeting of the Council to be held on 20 March.

The withdrawal of the Danish Government's reservations enabled the Council to reach agreement on the draft directive on the environmental assessment of certain public and private projects.

The Council briefly reviewed progress of the negotiations on the draft directive on the limitation of emissions from large combustion plants.

The Council again discussed the draft directive on the recycling of beverage containers. In order to make further progress it is expected that the Commission will bring forward assurances about the manner in which it would subsequently consider notifications by member states of any proposed measures in accordance with the terms of the draft directive.

The Council agreed that discussions on the draft directive on waste from the titanium dioxide industry should now take into account a proposal from the Council Presidency which includes the application of environmental quality objectives.

A proposal for a directive to impose restrictions on the marketing and use of polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) and polychlorienated terphenyls (PCTs) was considered for the first time. Good progress was reported and there is reason for confidence that the proposal can be agreed at the Environment Council in June.

In a first discussion a general welcome was given to a new proposed directive to extend the application of the existing framework Directive (76/464/EEC) concerning the discharge of dangerous substances to water to include further substances and to adopt standard articles.

The Council formally adopted a directive on air quality standards for nitrogen dioxide.

I drew the Council's attention to the importance of integrating, in the Community, environmental protection policy with agricultural policy. I am glad to be able to report that the Commission intends to report further on this subject.

Town and Country Planning (Minerals) Act 1981

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in the implementation of the Town and Country Planning (Minerals) Act 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: In part I of the Act, which applies to England and Wales, sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 12, 13 and 16 together with parts of sections 2 and 15 are in force. Part II of the Act applies to Scotland and is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Definitive Maps

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he now expects any public inquiries to be held into objections to draft revised definitive maps published under the Countryside Act 1968.

Mr. Waldegrave: There is only one inquiry still to be held into objections to a draft revised map and statement published under the Countryside Act 1968. This one, for the London borough of Richmond, is expected to be arranged this summer.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each definitive map review under the Countryside Act 1968 for which public inquiries into objections have been held but decisions not yet issued, the dates of the inquiries and the expected date of issue of the decision.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is as follows:

All the decisions currently outstanding are expected to be issued within the next six months.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in respect of paragraph 3(2) of schedule 14 to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 (a) how many representations he has received asking for a direction to be given to a surveying authority to determine an application for a modification order, (b) how many directions he has issued, with, in each case, the number of weeks which elapsed between the receipt of the representation and the issuing of the direction, and the period allowed to the surveying authority to determine the application, (c) how many representations have resulted in a decision not to direct a surveying authority to determine an application with, in each case, the number of weeks which elapsed between the receipt of the representation and the issuing of the decision and (d) how many representations are currently outstanding, with, in each case, the number of weeks which have elapsed since they were received by the Department.

Mr. Waldegrave: Two such directions have been sought, one 17 weeks ago and the other nine weeks ago. Neither application has yet been decided.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in respect of paragraph 4 of schedule 14 to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 (a) how many notices of appeal against decisions of surveying authorities not to make definitive map modification orders he has received, (b) where a decision has been made on appeal, if he will state in each case the nature of the decision, the direction, if any, given to the surveying authority, and the number of weeks which elapsed between the receipt of the appeal and the issuing of the decision, and (c) how many appeals are currently outstanding, with, in each case, the number of weeks which have currently elapsed since they were received by the Department.

Mr. Waldegrave: Twenty-six notices of appeal have been received, none of which has yet been determined. The number of weeks from receipt is as follows:

67, 60, 55, 54 (2 cases), 51, 50, 49, 47, 43, 32 (2 cases), 30, 22, 21, 19, 18 (4 cases), 17, 13, 12, 11, 6, 4.

Domestic Rates

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the average sums paid in rates by domestic ratepayers in England, gross and net of rate rebates, in each year since 1977-78.

Mr. Kenneth Baker [pursuant to his reply, 8 March 1985]: Following is the available information:

Average domestic rate bills in England (£)

	Gross of rate rebates	*Net of rate rebates
1977-78	119	111
1978-79	131	122
1979-80	155	145
1980-81	199	185
1981-82	245	225
1982-83	282	*252
1983-84	303	*242
1984-85	323	*257

* The rate rebate figures netted off include those paid in respect of supplementary benefit recipients under the housing benefit scheme, which was partially introduced in November 1982 and fully in April 1983. Equivalent sums paid to supplementary benefit recipients under the previous arrangements are not netted off. Average domestic rate bills net of rate rebates for 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 on a consistent basis with the figures given for earlier years are £258, £277 and £296 respectively.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Foulkes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will list for the duration of the miners' dispute (a) the number of people arrested and charged with an offence, (b) the number of people convicted and (c) the number of people acquitted, stating in each case the nature of the offence.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The information requested is not readily available and I will publish the information in the Official Report.

WALES

Tourism

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to improve the marketing of Wales for tourist development purposes.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: In addition to the contribution of the private sector, the marketing of Wales as a tourist destination falls mainly to the Wales tourist board and to the British tourist authority, Cadw has a specific role in the promotion of ancient monuments. I announced arrangements in November 1983 at column 529-30 for Welsh involvement in the overseas marketing of Wales and keep these under review. Most recently the British Tourist Authority has agreed to identify a budget of £100,000 in 1985-86 for joint schemes to promote Wales abroad. The Wales tourist board also promotes Wales to potential developers of tourist facilities and this work runs in parallel with the more general promotional activities of the Welsh Development Agency and the Development Board for Rural Wales.

Housing Grants

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many housing improvement grants have been paid in Wales for each year from 1982 to date.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is as follows:

	1982	1983	1984
Improvement and Conversion Grants	5,050	7,231	8,337
Repair Grants	4,703	18,403	19,001
Intermediate and Special Grants	1,236	1,689	2,640
Total	10,989	27,323	29,978

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will provide the latest estimates for spending on housing improvements grants by each district council in Wales for 1984-85 and 1985-86, indicating, in each case, the potential under or overspend on original estimates (a) in cash terms and (b) in percentage terms;

(2) what is the most recent information he has as to the amount likely to be spent on housing improvement grants in Wales and mid-Glamorgan, respectively, during 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply to him of 30 November 1984 at column 599-602.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many applications for home improvement grants are currently waiting to be processed by district councils in Wales;

(2) if he will estimate the total number of applicants waiting for housing improvement grants in mid-Glamorgan at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It is provisionally estimated that at 31 December 1984, there were 68,000 renovation grants awaiting processing, about 19,000 of which related to districts in Mid Glamorgan.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will indicate, in real and cost terms, the total estimated spending on housing improvement grants by district councils for 1984-85 and 1985-86; and how this compares with the figures for 1983-84.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is as follows:

Spending on housing renovation grants

	Cash £ million	1984-85 prices £ million
1983-84	107·5	112·6
1984-85*	81·7	81·7

Percentage	−24·0	−27·0

* Forecast.

No information is available for 1985-86.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much has been spent in each housing district in mid-Glamorgan on (a) improvement grants, (b) insulation grants, (c) repair grants and (d) intermediate grants for each year since 1979; and what is the estimate for 1984-85.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information available is given in the following table and relates to completed grants in each calendar year:

Note:
Estimates of expenditure for the first quarter of 1985 are not available in this detail.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate by what amount public demand for housing improvement grant expenditure in Wales in 1984-85 and 1985-86 will exceed the amount allocated by local authorities for such purposes.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on 8 December 1983 at column 247.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of Welsh housing district grants is discretionary; and if he will illustrate this with reference to the total spent across the whole range of housing grants by local authorities in 1983-84 and the estimate for 1984-85

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Of the housing grants paid by district councils, improvement grants, most repair grants and most special grants are discretionary. Intermediate grants, grants made under the homes insulation scheme (up to the amount specified by the Secretary of State for that purpose), and reinstatement grants paid under the Housing Defects Act 1984, are mandatory. In addition, repairs grants where notice is served under section 9 of the Housing Act 1957, and special grants where notice is served under section 15 of the Housing Act 1961 or schedule 24 of the Housing Act 1980, are also mandatory.

Payments on improvement, repairs and special grants formed 93 per cent. of total payments on grants completed in 1983-84. The corresponding percentage for the first nine months of 1984-85 was 90 per cent. Information collected by the Department does not distinguish between discretionary and mandatory repairs and special grants.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of the housing block allocation for Rhymney Valley district council for 1983-84, in cash and percentage terms, was represented by expenditure on housing improvement grants; and what are the equivalent estimates for 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply to him on 6 December 1984 at column 231 for 1983-84 and 1984-85. No later information is available for 1984-85 and no information is available for 1985-86.

Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1981

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied that local authorities in Wales are meeting their duties under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Implementation of the Act rests with local authorities in Wales which are in the best position to assess local needs and to decide the most appropriate arrangements for meeting them. We consider that local authorities in Wales fully recognise and conscientiously seek to discharge that responsibility.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

United States (Import Restrictions)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he intends to make to Trade Ministers in the United States Government about non-imposition of import restrictions on products from the United Kingdom following the current weakness of the pound sterling in the face of the United States dollar.

Mr. Fletcher: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and Ministerial colleagues will continue to use all suitable contacts with US Administration to encourage resistance to protectionism. During her visit to Washington last month my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister argued strongly against the use of protectionist measures as a way of dealing with the trade effects of the high dollar and was assured that the United States Administration were not contemplating such measures.

COCOM

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what guidelines for content and method of future work were agreed at the high-level COCOM meeting on 6 and 7 February.

Mr. Fletcher: COCOM will continue its work to ensure that the embargo arrangements cover technologies of genuine strategic significance and are effectively enforced.

Market Entry Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many small companies have received support under the market entry guarantee scheme in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: The following figures show the number of companies, by size of turnover on entry, which have been offered support under the market entry guarantee scheme:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	Totals
New companies	2	1	4	6	2	2	17

Over £10 million	3	2	1	6	5	7	24
TOTALS	28	18	36	31	33	48	194

Note: The figures include 14 cases where support has been offered but not yet claimed.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the operation of the market entry guarantee scheme.

Mr. Fletcher [pursuant to the reply, 8 March 1985]: Yes, I am satisfied that the operation of the market entry guarantee scheme is effective. It is fulfilling its main objective of helping exporters to enter new markets or substantially expand an existing presence. Between 1978 and 1984, 210 agreements were entered into with exporters, of which only 10 have so far been terminated by the exporter due to failure of the venture within the period of agreement.

British Overseas Trade Board

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the British Overseas Trade Board budget has been allocated to (a) overseas trade fairs, (b) the market entry guarantee scheme and (c) the overseas project fund in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: The information requested is as follows:

Percentage of British Overseas Trade Board net expenditure

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85*
Overseas trade fairs	57	48	57	50	49	46
Market entry guarantee scheme	3	5	6	6	6	6
Overseas projects fund	19	26	14	22	14	13

* Figures for 1984-85 are based on the presently forecast outturn for the year.
Note: For comparability the figures exclude items transferred to the BOTB budget from other budgets from 1984-85 onwards.

Gomba Incorporated

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will institute an inquiry into the conduct and management of Gomba Incorporated; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: There is no such company registered in this country. I assume the hon. Member is referring to Gomba Holdings UK Limited. I know of no reason for investigation of that company, but if the hon. Member will let me have any information he may have the matter will be considered further.

Overseas Trade Fairs

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many overseas trade fairs have been supported by the British Overseas Trade Board in (a) the European Economic Community, (b) the rest of Western Europe, (c) Eastern Europe, (d) the middle east, (e) the Far East, (f) North America, (g) South America and (h) Africa in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: The information is as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
(a) EEC	142	132	129	137	136	124

Information Technology Industry

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will publish in the Official Report the average growth rates of the information technology industry in Germany, France, Japan, the United States of America and the United Kingdom between 1979 and 1984;

(2) if he will provide an estimate of the size of the United Kingdom market for microchips for each year from 1979 to 1984, indicating in each case what proportion of the market was met by domestic production;

(3) if he will list in the Official Report all the Government financed schemes to aid the whole information technology industry since 1979-80, giving the amount spent in each scheme for each year from 1979-80 until 1984-85;

(4) if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the world market share and (b) the European market share of the whole information technology industry in office machinery, electronic data, processing equipment, telecommunications equipment, radio and electronic capital goods, electronic components and sub-assemblies and electronic consumer goods, for each year from 1979 to 1984.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

British Telecom

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who were the board members and executive directors of British Telecom immediately prior to privatisation; and if those persons are still in similar positions.

Mr. Butcher: The directors of British Telecommunications plc with, where appropriate, their executive responsibilities, were listed in part I of the company's prospectus, a copy of which is available in the Library. Current board responsibilities are a matter for the company. The two Government-appointed directors are unchanged.

Textile Industry (Aid)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the areas eligible for aid to textile firms under the measures adopted by the Council of Ministers in January 1984 and the allocation to each of these areas; and what information he has as to applications already submitted by local and public authorities in respect of this allocation.

Mr. Trippier: Aid is not available to textile firms under the measures referred to except for diversification into new products in other sectors. The provisional allocations of ERDF aid and additional central Government contributions for eligible projects in the areas concerned is as follows:

	£ million
Assisted areas in Tayside	4·2
Northern Ireland	14·9
Eligible areas in Lancashire	8·0
Eligible areas in Greater Manchester	20·2
Eligible areas in West Yorkshire	20·3
	67·6

Three applications have so far been received in my Department from local and other public authorities.

Israel

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the tariffs between the United Kingdom and Israel with regard to manufactured goods; how these tariffs have changed and are scheduled to change between 1975 and 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: Tariffs between the United Kingdom and Israel are subject to the provisions of the 1975 agreement between the European Economic Community and the state of Israel as amended by subsequent protocols. Community tariffs on imports of manufactured goods from Israel were phased out between 1975 and 1977. Israeli tariffs on imports of manufactured goods from the Community are being progressively reduced according to a timetable in the third additional protocol to the agreement. Under this timetable duty-free access will be achieved on 1 January 1989.

Copies of the agreement and related protocols are available for reference in the Library of the House.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what advantages Israel enjoys in trade in agricultural produce with the European Economic Community compared with North African countries.

Mr. Fletcher: Trade between the Community and Israel is governed by the 1975 EEC/Israel agreement. Under this agreement Israel's agricultural exports enjoy preferential access on a rather more limited scale than that accorded to the Community's other Mediterranean partners, including those in north Africa. On the other hand Israel benefits in that some 55 per cent. of her agricultural exports are of products which are not subject to the constraints of the EC reference price system.

Industrial Property Rights

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, following the discussions between the Minister of State for Information Technology and Ministers and officials of the United States Government, United Kingdom companies will be given equal treatment in the transfer of their industrial property rights from United States industrial bases compared with that available to the United States-based companies wishing to transfer their knowledge and rights to their United Kingdom bases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The discussions between my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Industry and Information Technology and officials of the United States Government during his recent visit to Washington did not address the question of transfer of industrial property rights.

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what requests he has had from companies with investments or facilities in the United States of America to assist them in effecting the transfer of their industrial property rights from the United States of America to the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I am not aware of any such requests.

House of Fraser (Bid)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will refer the offer by the Al-Fayed family for the House of Fraser to the Monopolies Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: My right hon. Friend will announce his decision as soon as possible.

Citizens Band Radio

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action his Department has taken on the complaint of interference by citizens band radio in Maryer Road, SE7, brought to his attention by the hon. Member for Woolwich on 14 January; and when he expects to be able to resolve the matter.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 8 March 1985]: I told the hon. Member in my letter of 28 January that the radio investigation service has been asked to investigate the case. It is doing so and has identified a possible source of interference. As I promised I shall write again when the RIS has completed its work on the case.

The hon. Member will appreciate that, particularly in London, the RIS has a heavy case load and has to give priority to dealing with radio interference which endangers life and the viable operation of business and essential services.

Exports

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the proportion of exports by United Kingdom manufacturing companies in percentage terms in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher [pursuant to the reply, 8 March 1985]: The specific information is not available. Exports of manufactures as a proportion of total United Kingdom exports are as follows:

Manufactures as a Percentage of Total United Kingdom Exports BOP Basis

	Per cent.
1979	76
1980	74
1981	68
1982	67
1983	66
1984	66

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what support his Department provides to small companies which want to establish export markets;

(2) what steps he is taking to encourage the export of United Kingdom manufactured products.

Mr. Fletcher [pursuant to the reply, 8 March 1985]: My Department provides a full range of export services in support of British industry and commerce including the manufacturing sector. The services are operated under the direction of the British Overseas Trade Board (BOTB), and are described in the booklet "Help for Exporters", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. Many are particularly suited to the needs of small companies, which may lack the managerial and financial resources of larger companies.

A review of BOTB services in relation to small firms was carried out by two board members last year. A copy of their report is also available in the library.

Overseas Projects Fund

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many small companies have received support from the overseas projects fund in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher [pursuant to the reply, 8 March 1985]: Statistics of the kind sought are not readily available. But many small companies and firms do receive support from the overseas projects fund both directly, and as subcontractors and suppliers to large companies which win business for which they received assistance from the fund.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Young Offenders

Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will seek to amend the legislation dealing with young offenders so that courts may have the discretion to suspend and partly suspend sentences.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend is considering this matter in the light of comments received from a number of interested bodies.

Durham Prison

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cells at Durham prison are occupied by (a) one person, (b) two persons, (c) three persons, and (d) more than three persons, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: On 10 February 1985 there were 175 cells each holding one prisoner (139 male, 36 female), 270 cells each holding two prisoners (all male) and 121 cells each holding three prisoners (all male). In addition there were 25 prisoners (24 male, 1 female) in hospital places and 30 male prisoners in multi-bedded dormitories.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners there are in Durham prison, shown by sex, length of sentence, offence and age, or other suitable bands.

Mr. Mellor: The available information is given in the following tables:

Mr. Harry Newton

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if the late Mr. Harry Newton was given any sums of public money since 1979; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether he will call for a report from (a) the Metropolitan police and (b) the West Yorkshire police forces as to whether the late Mr. Harry Newton received any payments from the police force in question; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I understand that certain allegations have been made about the existence of links between Mr. Newton, the security service and special branches. It is not the practice to comment on allegations of this nature.

Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis as to the interviewing by Metropolitan police officers of a former editor of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament over internal matters relating to the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament; why this was done; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to reports that a Mr. Stanley Bonnett, the former editor of the CND magazine Sanity, supplied certain information to special branch officers. The functions of special branches are set out in the published guidelines issued by the Home Office on 19 December 1984, and I am assured by the commissioner that no inquiries have been initiated by the Metropolitan police special branch outside the terms of those guidelines. I have made it clear on a number of occasions that peaceful political campaigning to change the mind of the Government or of people generally about the validity of nuclear disarmament does not come within the definition of subversion which is given in the guidelines.

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions during each of the last five years police investigations have commenced into the commission of drug-related offences by people known or believed to be diplomats and with what effect; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: There is no requirement for the police to report to my right hon. and learned Friend investigations covering diplomats which do not lead to the conclusion that an offence has been committed. Three cases have come to our attention during the past five years where there were strong indications of drug related offences by diplomats or persons with diplomatic immunity.

As to the action taken in these cases I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given today to his question by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Civil Defence

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much money is spent per annum on civil defence in each member country of the EEC, including the United Kingdom; and what are the respective figures for (a) 10, (b) 20 and (c) 30 years ago.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The total estimated expenditure in the United Kingdom for 1984-85 is £77 million. The other information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many volunteers each of the counties listed in the Official Report, on 6 February, column 575, have recruited; what tasks have been allocated to them; and what reimbursement has been agreed.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of civil defence volunteers by county is not recorded centrally. Guidance on the role of volunteers is in Home Office circular No. ES 2/1981 (a copy of which is in the Library of the House); the aim is the provision of humanitarian and support services within their communities. It is for local authorities to decide what specific tasks would be appropriate in their area, but the report of the working party on the standardisation of training of civil defence volunteers (a copy of which is also in the Library of the House) makes recommendations on suitable functions. The level of volunteers' expenses to be reimbursed is a matter for the discretion of each local authority, but specific grant at the rate of 100 per cent. is paid on expenses connected with training.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what applications he has had from Forest Heath district council for a grant to improve its emergency centre.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Forest Heath district council applied in August 1982 for civil defence grant and payment was authorised in February 1983.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to review formally the consolidated guidance on emergency planning.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Consultation on the draft of this guidance is almost complete. We have undertaken to review the guidance after it has been issued for a year, but we see this as part of a continuous process. Arrangements for regular discussion of the guidance with those principally concerned are in hand.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a working party on evacuation is still in existence.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No such working party exists, but the Government keep their policy on evacuation under review.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the sum of the grant given to a district council in south Norfolk to establish an emergency centre under the 1983 Civil Defence regulations.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Civil defence grant aid at the rate of 75 per cent. has been paid towards expenditure totalling £9,500 incurred by South Norfolk district council in establishing an emergency centre.

Interception of Communications

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, when authorising the interception of communications of any person resident in the United Kingdom, he has ever allowed such interception to be carried out by United States agencies.

Mr. Brittan: No. No facilities in the United Kingdom are made available to foreign Governments or their agencies to intercept United Kingdom telephone, postal or telex services.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many authorisations of interception of communications related to Wales in each year since 1979.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many warrants were issued for the interception of communications in the Houghton and Washington constituency and in the north-east between 1979 and 1984; what is the number of warrants still in operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many requests for warrants for interception of communications he rejected during each of the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Brittan: I do not intend to add to the statistics on interception given in annex 2 of the White Paper "The Interception of Communications in the United Kingdom" published on 7 February 1985 (Cmnd. 9438).

Immigration Statistics

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of persons treated as illegal entrants who were granted temporary admission and release during 1984; and how many of these subsequently absconded.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 25 February 1985, c. 29]: The available information about absconding relates to the 454 persons against whom illegal entry action commenced in the period 1 April to 30 September 1984. As at 28 February 1985, of the 194 of those who had been granted temporary release on or at some time after the commencement of illegal entry action 6 had absconded.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set up an official scheme whereby money contributed voluntarily towards famine relief in Ethiopia will attract a pound-for-pound supplement from Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Raison: I do not see the need for any new scheme. Both the public and the Government have responded generously to the needs of Ethiopia and other drought affected parts of Africa and will, I am sure, continue to do so.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Open University

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of Open University students reside in the north-east, Northern Ireland and Wales.

Sir Keith Joseph: The provisional percentages of Open University students studying in the northern region of England, Northern Ireland and Wales in 1984 were as follows:

	Percentage
North*	5
Northern Ireland	2
Wales	4

* Includes counties of Cumbria, Durham, Cleveland, Tyne and Wear and Northumberland.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his response to the report recently submitted to him by the Open University visiting committee; and what conclusions he has drawn from it.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have accepted the advice of the Open University visiting committee that the university should have more time to adjust to the reduced grant levels announced in December 1983, have revised the grant previously indicated for 1985 and 1986, and have indicated a new grant for 1987, in line with the committee's specific recommendations. The report makes clear that the university has scope to operate more economically; the Government conclude that the university should now be able to do so effectively within the funds available to it.

Nursery Nurses

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average cost of training a nursery nurse in a college of further education.

Mr. Brooke: Costs of non-advanced courses are available only in terms of the average cost for practical subjects (group 1) and for classroom-based subjects (group 2). The NNEB certificate course, which is of two years' duration, falls within group 1. The average annual cost per full-time equivalent student of a group 1 course was £2,340 in 1982-83, the latest period for which figures are available.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Pym) of 4 March, Official Report, column 377, about the assisted places scheme, if he will place in the Library the evidence upon which his reply was based.

Mr. Dunn: The evidence can be succinctly stated: 40 per cent. of assisted pupils are from families whose relevant incomes (based on gross income) are below £6,000, and in all about 80 per cent. are from families whose relevant incomes are below £10,000.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Pym) on 4 March, Official Report, column 376, whether he will now give the number of schools participating in the assisted places scheme for which the requirement concerning the percentage of aided pupils entering the scheme who formerly attended maintained schools has been relaxed.

Mr. Dunn: Twenty-two schools have been granted dispensation from the 60 per cent. rule for the current school year; 89 schools have received one or more such dispensation since the scheme began.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to decrease the proportion of pupils taking up an assisted place who do not attend a maintained school at the time of selection.

Mr. Dunn: None.

AS Levels

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the effect that the introduction of AS levels will have on school sixth forms.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend hopes to announce the Government's decision about AS levels before Easter. The objectives of the proposed new examinations and the implications for schools and colleges were discussed in the consultative paper of May 1984.

Higher Education

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the proportion of students entering higher education who can be classified as non-standard entrants in each year since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: The proportions of home students entering university undergraduate courses in Great Britain and CNAA first degree courses in England who did not have two or more A level passes or Scottish highers were as follows:

	Percentage
1979	17
1980	17
1981	17
1982	19
1983	18

School Halls

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will issue guidance to local education authorities about the maximum capacity of school halls.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has no present plans to do so.

Assistant Teachers

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average number of hours worked during each week of term time by assistant teachers in maintained (a) primary and (b) secondary schools; if he will give figures for 1974, 1979 and 1984; and how many weeks constitute the working year.

Mr. Dunn: The length of the time-tabled school week is not prescribed, nor is detailed information on practice collected by the Department. A typical primary timetable might involve 25 hours, excluding midday and other breaks and after-school activities. A typical secondary week would be a little longer, perhaps 27 hours. Primary school teachers (including head teachers) teach on average for some 90 per cent. of the time-tabled week, for secondary the figure is about 80 per cent. Schools are required to open for a minimum of 190 days (38 weeks) a year.

The Department does not have similar information about the non-teaching work load of teachers. Nor does it have evidence on changes in work load or practice since 1974.

Local Authority Employers (Meeting)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place in the Library copies of the minutes of the meeting he had with representatives of the local authority employers' association on 14 November at his Department.

Sir Keith Joseph: No.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the average salary of full-time primary and secondary school teachers, excluding heads and deputy heads, in maintained schools in England and Wales for each year since 1973, in current prices and constant 1983-84 prices.

Sir Keith Joseph [pursuant to his reply, 1 March 1985, c. 309]: Based on information contained in the Department's records of teachers it is estimated that the average salaries (including allowances) paid to full-time teachers excluding heads and deputies in maintained primary and secondary schools in England and Wales were as follows:

Average salaries including allowances

	*At current prices £	At constant (April 1983) prices† £
1973	2,100	7,400
1974	2,900	9,200
1975	3,900	10,000
1976	4,000	8,700
1977	4,200	7,800
1978	4,700	8,100
1979	5,200	8,100
1980	7,200	9,100
1981	7,800	8,800
1982	8,400	8,700
1983	8,900	8,900
1984	9,300	8,900

Notes:

* Salaries are given at 1 April but take account of pay increases awarded subsequent to 1 April but within the same calendar year.

† Constant price figures are derived using the retail price index and taking April 1983 as the baseline.

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

6. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will now estimate the cost to date of the miners' strike.

Mr. David Hunt: To the beginning of this year the strike was estimated to have added about £1½ billion to the public sector borrowing requirement in 1984-85. When the Chancellor comes to present his Budget he will be in a position to give a more up-to-date estimate.

14. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Energy when next he plans to meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss the mining dispute.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have frequent meetings with the chairman of the National Coal Board.

22. Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many miners are now working; and what percentage of the total manpower of the National Coal Board this figure represents.

23. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the coal mining dispute.

24. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the latest position in the coal industry dispute.

25. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the dispute in the coal industry.

27. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the number of striking miners resuming work since the end of the Trades Union Congress initiative on 20 February.

28. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will report on the number of mines now operating and the number of miners now working.

29. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the situation in the coal industry.

30. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the dispute in the mining industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: I refer to the reply given earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor).

Gas Pipelines (United Kingdom—Europe)

9. Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans to approve the construction of a gas pipeline between the United Kingdom and Europe.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Any commercial proposal would be considered on its merits.

Fast Breeder Reactors

21. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give his latest assessment of progress on the European collaborative project for the development of commercial fast breeder reactors.

Mr. Goodlad: Good progress is being made.

Tidal Barrages

26. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Energy what consideration he has given to tidal barrage projects, especially on the river Mersey.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department is supporting a jointly funded study by the Severn tidal power group to assess the feasibility of a Severn barrage built and operated by the private sector.

As far as Merseyside is concerned, a pre-feasibility study on a Mersey barrage has now been carried out. It is now proposed to extend this to refine cost and engineering estimates. My Department has been approached for financial support and I have agreed in principle to make a contribution towards funding a £40,000 study.

Energy Efficiency

31. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Energy what evidence he has that the United Kingdom is now beginning to move up the league table of energy efficiency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Preliminary analysis indicates that the United Kingdom's energy efficiency in 1984 improved at a higher rate than the annual average of the OECD countries during 1973-83. My campaign is resulting in a further upsurge of interest and activity in energy efficiency measures which should lead to greater improvements later.

20. Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will consider designating 1986 as energy efficiency year.

Mr. Peter Walker: I shall consider this proposal further.

Homes Insulation Scheme

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what measure his Department takes to publicise the availability of grants to improve energy efficiency of dwellings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The Energy Efficiency Office will continue to publicise the homes insulation scheme in its advertisements, publications, travelling displays and by other means.

North Sea Oil

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the amount of United Kingdom North sea oil exported in 1984-85, the amount imported, in million barrels a day and the value of such exports and imports; and what estimates he has made of future exports and imports until 1990.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Overseas trade statistics for February 1985 and March 1985 are not yet available. In the 10 months from April 1984 to January 1985 imports of crude oil were at the rate of 0·5 million barrels a day, and exports were at the rate 1·5 million barrels a day. The value of the imports was £3·5 billion, and the value of the exports was £10·6 billion. Future exports and imports of oil cannot be forecast reliably.

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many barrels of oil were sold by the British National Oil Corporation in January and February 1985; and how much was sold on the spot market, and how much under term price contracts.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The information requested about sales by the British National Oil Corporation is commercially confidential.

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of oil production in million barrels a day from the North sea in 1984-85 and for each financial year until 1990.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I expect to be able to announce updated forecasts shortly.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Joyriders

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many joyriders have been (a) killed and (b) injured in (i) accidents and (ii) confrontations with the security forces in Northern Ireland in each of the last four years.

Mr. Scott: Statistics are not maintained in a way which would enable figures to be given in the forms requested, but in incidents where the security forces opened fire on vehicles taken without their owners' consent (a broader category than 'joyriding' incidents), the civilian casualties were as follows:

Year	Deaths	Injuries
1981	2	6
1982	1	4
1983	—	1

Conveyancing

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he proposes to remove the monopoly of conveyancing from solicitors; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: I am monitoring recent developments in respect of conveyancing for reward in England and Wales, notably the report of the Farrand committee, the Administration of Justice Bill and the Lord Chancellor's Department's consultation paper on conveyancing by employed solicitors, and will be considering whether changes are necessary in Northern Ireland.

Fair Employment Agency

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons are now employed by the Fair Employment Agency.

Dr. Boyson: The Fair Employment Agency has a full-time chairman and 15 members of staff.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what are the criteria and procedures involved in the selection of employees by the Fair Employment Agency;

(2) how many employees of the Fair Employment Agency are (a) male and (b) female;

(3) how many employees of the Fair Employment Agency had their primary school education at (a) maintained schools, (b) controlled schools and (c) other schools.

Dr. Boyson: These are matters for the Fair Employment Agency, which is an independent statutory body.

District Rate

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the new district rate struck by each of the 26 district councils; and what was the district rate five years ago in each of the 26 district council areas.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is as follows:

Housing Executive (Painting Contracts)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why the Northern Ireland Housing Executive is restricting tender documents for painting contracts to those painting firms which have previously carried out contracts to a value of £100,000 or over; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available; I shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Oxygen Concentrators

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to complete his considerations of the provision of oxygen concentrators for patients requiring large quantities of oxygen.

Mr. Chris Patten: I expect to be able to make an announcement within the next few months.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what studies have been made in Northern Ireland of the potential for supplying oxygen concentrators through private health care organisations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: None; consideration is being given to the supply of oxygen concentrators through the family practitioner services.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received from members of the medical and nursing professions about the domiciliary oxygen service in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: Two doctors have asked the Department of Health and Social Services (Northern Ireland) for oxygen concentrators to be provided for patients needing high dose therapy.

Oxygen Supplies

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 20 February, Official Report, column 503, how many patients referred to in that answer fit into the occasional use category.

Mr. Chris Patten: No definition of occasional use exists in relation to oxygen therapy, and no information is available on the frequency of use by individual patients. However, in November 1984, 298 patients were supplied with five cylinders of oxygen or less.

Sinn Fein Incident Centres

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money was spent by Her Majesty's Government in establishing and equipping Sinn Fein incident centres in Northern Ireland during the last 10 years; and how much of this money or equipment has since been recovered.

Mr. Scott: No such money was spent.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Energy Conservation

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what provision is made by him for direct funding of energy conservation schemes for Governmental and non-governmental organisations administered by his Department.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 8 March 1985]: In the public sector direct funds for energy efficiency measures are not separately identified. In new capital works energy conservation is a feature in the design of buildings and associated services and substantial sums are expended on roof and wall insulation and energy control equipment.

In addition, where it is cost effective to do so, measures are taken within planned maintenance expenditure programmes to upgrade heating controls and to improve insulation standards of existing public sector buildings.

Under the energy conservation scheme administered by the Department of Economic Development cash grants of up to 30 per cent., (50 per cent. in relation to technical advice) are available to industry and commerce in Northern Ireland towards a wide range of energy efficiency projects.

Central Medical Advisory Committee

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what criteria were used in drawing up the list of organisations which will be represented on the Central Medical Advisory Committee for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 8 March 1985]: The committee does not claim to be representative of medical organisations in Northern Ireland, for its members are appointed in a personal, as opposed to a representative, capacity. Members are expected by virtue of their qualifications and experience to provide resolved advice to the Department across the spectrum of medical services.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will provide places on the Central Medical Advisory Committee for representatives of junior doctors in Northern Ireland, in the same way as for the equivalent medical advisory machinery in England and Scotland.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 8 March 1985]: The representation of junior doctors on the committee is due to be discussed at its next meeting which is to be held later this month. A decision on the provision of the places will be taken immediately thereafter. The medical advisory machinery in Northern Ireland differs from that in Great Britain, making comparisons difficult. Junior doctors are, however, already represented on the two subcommittees of the Central Medical Advisory Committee covering hospital services and general medical care services.

SCOTLAND

Legal Aid

Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many requests for legal aid have been (a) applied for and (b) refused in Kilmarnock sheriff court since 1 January 1984.

Mr. Ancram: Up to 28 February 1985, of 3,472 applications for criminal legal aid received 997 were refused, 34 withdrawn and no decision had been taken in 36.

Rates

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give a table showing for each district, regional and islands authority in Scotland the rates poundages for 1984-85 and as declared for 1985-86 on a comparable basis, the percentage increases in rates in 1985-86 for domestic, non-domestic and all ratepayers, respectively, and showing also the similar percentage increase figures for Scotland as a whole.

Mr. Younger: The information requested is set out in the table. Rate poundages for each local authority in 1984-85 and 1985-86 are shown in columns 1 and 2. Changes between the two years are accounted for by a number of factors, principally revaluation, but also changes in the level and distribution of Government grants, expenditure decisions of authorities and use of balances. The effect of revaluation can be broadly allowed for by dividing the 1984-85 column by 2·33. Percentage increases in rates at ratepayer level are shown in columns 3 to 5.

Notes:

The figures in columns 3 to 5 are the estimated percentage movements in total rate payments by sector. They exclude water rate and do not represent movements in average rate bills. Where there have been large increases in the rateable value of one sector, for example Fife, or significant changes in the relativities between ratepaying sectors, for example Orkney and Shetland, the figures shown are significantly different from movements in average rate bills.

The method used in the calculation is as follows:

(a) Each regional council's rateborne expenditure as estimated for 1984-85 and 1985-86 has been allocated among the districts in the region in proportion to rateable value of each district as estimated at 1 April 1984 and 1985 respectively. The amount calculated for each district has been added to that district's estimated rateborne expenditure and the total amount for each district and islands area apportioned among domestic and non-domestic ratepayers in proportion to estimated rateable value.

(b) The aggregate amount of the domestic element for 1984-85 and 1985-86 has been apportioned among districts and islands in proportion to estimated domestic rateable value and deducted from the estimated rateborne expenditure borne by domestic ratepayers in each district and islands area.

(c) The cash differences between the amounts estimated for 1984-85 and 1985-86 have been expressed as percentages of the 1984-85 amounts.

Scottish Development Agency (Staff)

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons were employed by the Scottish Development Agency in January 1976, 1977, 1978, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively; and if he will make a statement on any plans to take on further staff as from the current month, regarding functions, numbers and extra cost.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The number of persons employed by the Scottish Development Agency on the dates in question were as follows:

January	Permanent full-time staff	Temporary Staff and Secondees	Part-Time
1976	481	—	—
1977	553	—	—
1978	599	16	—
1979	687	29	—
1980	700	49	25
1981	713	41	26
1982	724	50	27
1983	736	53	24
1984	719	52	13

The agency is subject to a staff limit of 750 which, in keeping with general public sector practice, has since 1984 been applied to all employees other than short-term temporary staff. In January 1985 the agency had 642 staff in post and 36 short-term temporary staff. Some 58 staff posts are currently under recruitment. The cost will be accommodated within the Agency's budgetary provision for salaries. Recruitment needs within the staff limit and budgetary provision are a matter for the agency. If the hon. Member wishes further details he should approach the chairman of the agency.

Doctors

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many doctors there are in Scotland; and how this compares with 1970, 1975, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. John MacKay: The number of doctors (expressed as whole-time equivalents for hospital doctors and including general practitioners as at 30 September in each year) engaged in the National Health Service in Scotland for the years requested are set out in the table. No figure for 1985 is available:

	Number
1970	6594·7
1975	8039·5
1979	8616·4
1980	8697·2
1981	8783·4
1982	8937·6
1983	9043·1
1984	9188·7

Notes:
(a) Total for 1970 excludes community service doctors.
(b) Maximum part-time staff are counted 1·0 WTE.
(c) 1984 figure is provisional.

Mental Deficiency Nurse Staffing Project

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will report on progress towards implementation of the findings of the mental deficiency nurse staffing project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: A pilot study to test the feasibility of proposals for assessing nurse requirements emanating from the project has recently been completed at Strathmartine and Merchiston hospitals. The information from the study is now being analysed.

Interception of Communications

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many requests for warrants for interception of communications he rejected during each of the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, and 1984.

Mr. Younger: I do not intend to add to the statistics given at annex 2 to the White Paper "The Interception of Communications in the United Kingdom" dated February 1985 (Cmnd 9438).

Blind and Partially Sighted Persons

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will seek to amend the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 to provide for a statutory definition of blindness and partial blindness.

Mr. John MacKay: No. The Act does not single out all the needs for which services require to be provided but contains general provisions applicable to a wide range of needs. My right hon. Friend is not aware of any specific difficulties having arisen for blind or partially blind persons because their disability is not defined in the Act.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to which regions keep a register of the blind and partially sighted; and if he has any proposals to seek to extend the keeping of such registers.

Mr. John MacKay: Records of blind and partially sighted persons are kept in each of the local authority regions and islands council areas either by the local authorities themselves, or on their behalf by voluntary organisations. My right hon. Friend sees no case for altering these arrangements meanwhile.

Health Boards

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what financial allocations he has made to health boards for 1985-86.

Mr. Younger: I have allocated £1,353 million to health boards to meet their gross recurrent expenditure commitments on hospitals and community health services in 1985-86, and £36·5 million for their ordinary capital programmes. After expected income is taken into account, the net cash limited allocations to individual health boards are as follows:

Health Board	Recurrent Expenditure (net)	Ordinary Capital Programme	£ million Total
Argyll and Clyde	97·737	2·970	100·707
Ayrshire and Arran	69·569	2·430	71·999

Severe Disablement Allowance

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements are being made for immediate payment of the severe disablement allowance to those in Scotland suffering from blindness or partial blindness.

Mr. Newton: I have been asked to reply.

I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EMPLOYMENT

Dieldrin

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether the advice given by an official in his Department to Ms. Barbara Kearns who believed her child to have been affected by wood treatment pesticides, that the general use of dieldrin is being discouraged and by the end of the year, 1984, less reliable substitutes will have to be used, represents the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Government policy continues to be to phase out the use of pesticides such as dieldrin when safer alternatives become available. The supply of dieldrin in wood preservatives was phased out by December 1984, apart from use in a factory context for the pre-treatment of timber. Wood preservative formulators are now encouraged to use alternative pesticide active ingredients.

West Midlands (Clothing Manufacturers)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will ensure that all those employees who were underpaid by west midlands clothing manufacturers are informed of their right to claim back payment themselves.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The majority of employers pay the arrears assessed and in these cases the question of informing workers of their right to claim arrears themselves does not arise. Where the wages inspectorate comes to the view that the employer is unlikely to pay all or part of the arrears, the workers are informed of their right to pursue payment themselves, including pursuance through the Courts, if they wish. This does not rule out further action by the inspectorate.

Noise Awareness Campaign

Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the cost to date of the noise awareness campaign.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The cost of the Health and Safety Executives noise awareness campaign was £42,000 in 1983-84; and £41,000 in 1984-85 so far.

Truck Acts

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has plans to seek to amend the Truck Acts to allow employers to insist on cashless pay.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: As the then Secretary of State for Employment announced on 21 July 1983 at column 214, the Government propose in due course to invite Parliament to repeal the Truck Acts and associated legislation and to replace them with up-to-date provisions concerning deducations from wages.

The method of payment of wages will then be a matter for agreement between the employer and employee.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report at the latest available date male unemployment by region, as a percentage of the national average.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information is contained in my Department's press notice of 7 March 1985, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the proportion of married males and females unemployed for a year or more aged under 25 years, 25 to 44 years and 45-plus years, respectively, who were unskilled or semi-skilled, had dependent children aged under 16 years, and had an unemployed or economically inactive spouse.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide, for the four quarters of January 1985, the average unemployment off-flow data according to the under 18, 18 to 24, 24 to 44 and 45 plus years age groups, by the under 26, 26 to 52, 52 to 104, 104 to 156, 156 to 208, 208 to 260 and 260-plus weeks duration of unemployment groupings as a total, and by sex, for the south-west and nationally.

Mr. Alan Clark: I am sending a copy of a computer print giving information on outflows from unemployment between January 1984 and January 1985. This information is also available from the Library. The information provided relates only to people ceasing to be unemployed whose claims were dealt with by computer.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide the latest quarterly unemployment figures broken down according to the under 18, 18 to 24, 24 to 44, and 45 plus years age grouping, by the under 26, 26 to 52, 52 to 104, 104 to 156, 156 to 208, 208 to 260 and 260-plus weeks' duration of unemployment groupings as a total and by sex for the south-west, and nationally.

Mr. Alan Clark: Following is the information, which is available in the Library, at 10 January 1985, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age and duration is available.

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what have been the percentage increases in unemployment of the quartiles of male earners.

Mr. Alan Clark: Unemployment data are not available analysed by previous earnings.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his latest estimate of the number of unemployed construction and building workers.

Mr. Alan Clark: Results of the 1983 labour force survey indicate that in Great Britain in the second quarter of 1983 there were 257,000 people without a job and looking for work, who had been employed at some time during the previous three years, with their last job in the construction industry.

Skillcentres

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide, for the last two years, a breakdown of entrants into skillcentres according to marital status by the under 24, 25 to 44, and 45 plus years age groups for (a) the south-west and (b) Great Britain; and if he will further give for each grouping the further breakdown according to the to-open and to-close status of the centres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I regret that detailed information on the characteristics of entrants to skillcentres in the form requested is not available. However, there were 2,608 entrants to skillcentres in the south-west in 1982-83, and 2,503 entrants in 1983-84. In Great Britain the corresponding figures were 29,237 and 29,202 respectively.

Earnings

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list at the latest available date average full-time earnings, per region, as a percentage of national average male full-time earnings.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The following table relates to April 1984 and is based on the average gross weekly earnings of full-time adult male employees working a full week.

Differences in average earnings will reflect differences in the industrial and occupational structure of employment in differnet regions and do not necessarily imply similar differences in rates of pay for comparable jobs.

Adult Training Strategy

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the adult training strategy.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 28 February 1985, c. 224.]: The Government's adult training strategy encompasses a number of initiatives to stimulate adult training.

The national adult training campaign, launched in November with the aim of raising awareness about the importance of adult training, is now underway. Action in support of the campaign is being developed at both national and local level.

The Commission is working jointly with the Education Departments to promote effective collaboration and acting on training at local level. Encouraging progress is being made and 116 individual projects have been approved to date. We are developing new methods of delivering training by extending the best practices in the use of open learning, supporting the development of new training technologies and encouraging work on the training needs of trainers.

Our own adult training programmes are being redirected from 1985-86 to make them more responsive to employers' needs, to stimulate employers' own training efforts and to provide further help for unemployed people who need training at a more basic level.

These changes will enable the Manpower Services Commission to support the training of 250,000 adults a year by 1986-87—more than double the number helped in 1983-84.

Youth Training Scheme (Accidents)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish, for the Bradford area of the Manpower Services Commission, accident figures for the youth training scheme in the following form: (a) for the area, for each of the last three available months, (b) by travel-to-work area, for the last available month if possible, (c) by parliamentary constituency, for the last available month if possible and (d) by local authority, for the last available month if possible.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 25 February 1985, c. 18-19]: Youth training scheme accident statistics are collected quarterly for each Manpower Services Commission training division area office area. The Bradford area covers the local authority districts of Bradford, Calderdale and Kirklees and the latest figures for each of these districts are provided in the table.

Local Authority District	*Accidents 1 October 1984—31 December 1984 Fatalities	Injuries		Total
		Major†	Minor
Bradford	Nil	Nil	2	2
Calderdale	Nil	Nil	2	2
Kirklees	Nil	1	1	2
Area Office Area Total	Nil	1	5	6

Comprehensive information is not readily available for parliamentary constituencies or for travel to work areas and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

* Manpower Services Commission accident figures for the youth training scheme are compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive on employed persons. However, commission figures will include a number of accidents, in particular road traffic accidents during scheme time and accidents to trainees in educational establishments, which may not have been reportable to the executive had the individuals been employed.

† Major injuries are classified according to the severity criteria laid down in the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1980.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether, in circumstances where the Manpower Services Commission's area manpower boards are given details of particular accidents to youth training scheme trainees, it is the practice of commission staff to remind board members of the possibility of criminal or civil proceedings arising from the accident; whether he will advise the Manpower Services Commission that discussion of the details of accidents by boards is inappropriate in such circumstances; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1985, c. 481]: I have placed in the Library a copy of the Manpower Services Commission's memorandum to its local staff on the disclosure of information on accidents to area manpower boards. This makes it clear that commission staff should remind members of area manpower boards that criminal or civil proceedings may arise out of particular accidents and that it would be inappropriate to discuss anything other than the broad details of what occurred. I understand that these instructions are being carried out.

TRANSPORT

Missing Vessels

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the report of his inquiry into the circumstances of the loss of the Mhairih; and if he will make it public.

Mr. David Mitchell: The inspector will, of course, submit his report as soon as he can complete his inquiries. This is bound to take some little time if he is to make a thorough investigation. It is not the practice to publish reports of this kind, but the facts are always made available to interested parties. That will be the time to decide whether or not to order a public Formal Investigation.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his reply of 5 March to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, he will give the last known or reported location of each missing vessel; and whether activity of submarines of any nationality was reported to the inquiry in each case.

Mr. David Mitchell: I shall answer this question shortly.

Roads (Improvement)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will amend the criteria for eligibility for transport supplementary grant so as to include small low-cost engineering schemes on local roads, with the aim of giving encouragement to local authorities to carry out cost-effective improvement schemes for accident reduction.

Mrs. Chalker: The criteria already provide for expenditure to be eligible for TSG for such schemes on roads of more than local importance. I regard road safety as an important consideration in deciding how much of an authority's estimated expenditure to accept.

A12 (Crash Barriers)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will arrange for crash barriers to be erected on the A12 throughout the whole of its length through the Brentwood district council area.

Mrs. Chalker: Following a review at the end of last year of safety measures on the A12, we are to install central reserve safety fencing on the section between Hall lane, Shenfield, and Fryerning lane, Ingatestone. We hope to start work within the next few months. Conditions on the remaining sections of the trunk road within the Brentwood district do not at present satisfy the criteria for safety fencing, but I have undertaken to keep the matter under close review.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Decade for Women

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what brief will be given to the United Kingdom delegation to the United Nations end of decade for women conference in Nairobi; and against what criteria the suecess of the conference will be judged.

Mr. Renton: Our delegation will be briefed to make a constructive contribution to the review of the progress made in attaining the goals and objectives of the decade, and to the formulation of strategies for the advancement of women in the period up to the year 2000. We shall evaluate the conference by its ability to produce practical proposals for the advancement of women, particularly in eliminating discrimination.

Non-Boarding Schools

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is the policy of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to discourage attendance at non-boarding schools in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Renton: No.

Anatoly Shcharansky

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report as much information as is in his possession about the health of Anatoly Shcharansky; when was the last time he raised this matter with the Soviet Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Mr. Shcharansky remains in Perm "35" labour camp where he is serving a 10-year sentence. He suffers from a heart condition which has been exacerbated by numerous periods of solitary confinement and several hunger strikes since his imprisonment in 1977. According to his mother, who visited him in January, he has just spent nine weeks in hospital and his general health remained poor.

My right hon. and learned Friend last raised Mr. Shcharansky's case with Mr. Gromyko during his visit to Moscow in July 1984. More recently my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister raised the case with Mr. Gorbachev when he visited Britain in December.

Interception of Communications

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he issued warrants for the interception of communications in Wales in the years 1979 to 1984; what was the number of such warrants in force on 1 January; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many warrants he issued for the interception of communications in the Houghton and Washington constituency and in the north east between 1979 and 1984; how many warrants are still in operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many requests for warrants for interception of communications he rejected during each of the years 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not propose to add to the statistics on interception given in annex 2 of the White Paper "The Interception of Communications in the United Kingdom" (Cmnd. 9438).

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what circumstances during each of the last five years he has made requests to foreign heads of mission or Governments for diplomatic immunity to be waived when there is evidence of drug-related criminal offences having been committed by diplomatic personnel; whether he is satisfied with the responses to each and every such request; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Since 1980 we have only once, in 1985, requested a waiver of the immunity of a diplomat alleged to have committed a drug-related offence. The waiver was promptly granted by the Zambian Government, to whom we expressed our satisfaction with their helpful response.

In the same period there were only two other cases of alleged drug offences by persons entitled to immunity, both involving cannabis. In the first case, in 1980, where the alleged offender was the son of a diplomat, we made strong representations. In the second case, in 1981, the diplomat was withdrawn before representations could be made.

Agreement for Co-operation on the Safety of Atomic Energy

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is the purpose and significance of the amendments made to the United States-United Kingdom mutual defence agreement for co-operation on the safety of atomic energy as presented to Parliament in September 1984, Cmnd. 9336;

(2) if he will explain why the amendment, Cmnd. 9336, to the United States-United Kingdom mutual defence agreement for co-operation on the uses of atomic energy was presented to Parliament in September 1984.

Mr. Renton: The amendment to the agreement for co-operation on the uses of atomic energy for mutual defence purposes extended the agreement, which was signed in 1958, from 1 January 1985 until 31 December 1994. It incorporated a number of changes which had become necessary since the last amendment, Cmnd. 7976. The amendment was presented to Parliament in accordance with normal practice.

Trident

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will explain the relationship between Cmnd. 9336 (1984) and the purchase of Trident from the United States of America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The mutual defence agreement covers many aspects of co-operation in the uses of atomic energy for defence purposes, including the exchange of information, materials and equipment. The United Kingdom is acquiring the Trident II weapons system under the provisions of the Polaris sales agreement, as set out in Cmnd. 8821 of 19 October 1982.

Lebanon

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on United Kingdom policy with regard to the conflict between the United Nations intervention force in Lebanon and the Israeli defence force in Southern Lebanon.

Mr. Rifkind: We have noted with concern reports of recent incidents between the French contingent of the United Nations intervention force in Lebanon and Israeli forces. We value and admire the United Nations intervention force in Lebanon's efforts to prevent violence in difficult circumstances. The civilian population in Lebanon have suffered grievously from many years of conflict. During the process of Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon it is essential that Israel and all others concerned should work with the United Nations intervention force in Lebanon to restore peace and normality.

WPC Yvonne Fletcher

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the family of the late WPC Fletcher were consulted prior to the claim for compensation by Her Majesty's Government from the Government of Libya.

Mr. Renton: No claim has yet been presented.

El Salvador

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to ensure that officers of the El Salvadorean army receiving training in Britain have not been involved in human rights violations in their own country.

Mr. Renton: The Salvadorean Government are aware of our concern about human rights. Candidates for training should be both professionally and personally suitable.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is considering further military assistance to El Salvador.

Mr. Renton: Not at the present time.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's policy regarding military assistance to El Salvador.

Mr. Renton: As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) on 7 November 1984, at column 4, we have offered places for one or two suitably qualified Salvadorean officers to attend Staff college courses in Britain. No other offer of military assistance has been made.

DEFENCE

Stornoway Airport

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many air misses were recorded in the vicinity of Stornoway airport in each of the past 15 years; and if he will provide a breakdown of these figures into misses between: (a) two civil aircraft, (b) two military aircraft and (c) a civil and a military aircraft.

Mr. Lee: There has been a total of three each involving one civil and one military aircraft. They occurred in the years 1973, 1974 and 1976. Vicinity has been defined as within 10 miles.

Nuclear-powered Submarines

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any decision has been taken on the means of disposal of the hulls and reactors of Royal Navy nuclear-powered submarines after their retirement from service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: HMS Dreadnought is the only nuclear-powered submarine to have been de-commissioned so far. She is currently laid up at a secure berth at Rosyth. No other nuclear-powered submarines are expected to go out of service before the 1990s. Plans for their permanent disposal have not yet been drawn up.

South Georgia

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the proposals to construct a military airfield at Hestertettan Flats, Cumberland East Bay, South Georgia.

Mr. Lee: I have nothing to add to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) on 29 November 1983 at column 474 by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces.

Trident

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what estimates have been made of the running costs of servicing British Trident missiles at Kings Bay over and above the capital cost during the lifetime of Trident's operation; and if this has been included in the total cost estimate of Trident.

Mr. Butler: The current Trident estimate of £9,285 million represents the forecast capital cost of acquiring Trident and excludes running costs. Trident is not due to enter service until the mid-1990s, and, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told the House on 24 July 1984 at column 807 the running costs of the Trident force must remain to some extent speculative, although they are expected to account for about 1½ per cent. of the defence budget each year. Of this sum, the cost of processing missiles at Kings Bay is expected to represent a very small proportion. The United Kingdom capital contribution to facilities at Kings Bay, as I told the hon. Member on 13 February 1985 at column 199, is $70 million in fiscal year 1983 dollars.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what monitoring has been conducted in the vicinity of the disposal sites for British chemical weapons stocks in the 1950s; and what results there have been.

Mr. Butler: I shall reply shortly.

United States Marine Corps

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations have taken place between the British and United States Governments on the provision, basing support or training facilities in Britain for the United States Marine Corps: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: There are no permanent United States Marine Corps facilities in the United Kingdom in peacetime, although a number of United States Marine Corps personnel serve here at existing United States facilities. United States Marine Corps personnel occasionally participate with the United Kingdom services in training excercises. As to wartime reinforcement planning, it has never been our practice to give details of the arrangements.

Rapier Missile

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has reached a decision on a full-sized pilotless aircraft for use as a target drone in practice firings of the Rapier missile; and whether such aircraft will be used on the Royal Artillery guided weapons range, Outer Hebrides.

Mr. Butler: There are no plans to use full-sized pilotless target aircraft for in-service practice firings of Rapier. Full-sized targets may be used in development trials, but no such trials are planned to take place at the Royal Artillery range Hebrides.

Radar

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what discussions have taken between the United Kingdom and United States Governments concerning the identification of possible sites in the United Kingdom for deployment of the United States navy's relocatable over-the-horizon radar; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what plans exist for the deployment by the Royal Air Force of surface-wave over-the-horizon radars in the United Kingdom; and whether any sites for deployment have been identified;

(3) what is the status of the Marconi SHAPE Royal Air Force programme to develop an over-the-horizon radar system; and what rôle is envisaged for this system.

Mr. Butler: As I advised the hon. Member on 21 December 1984 at column 378, the United Kingdom and the United States are collaborating in a joint programme of studies aimed at testing the feasibility of siting an over-the-horizon radar system in the United Kingdom. These studies are at a very early stage and there are at present no firm plans for implementation. I have nothing further to add to that statement.

United States National Guard

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what aspects of the role of United States National Guardsmen will be enhanced by them undertaking training in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: United States National Guardsmen undertake routine military training in the United Kingdom in order to practise their war roles in support of NATO.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence why it was necessary for his officials to receive a special briefing at the United States embassy before answering questions on the presence of United States National Guardsmen in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: Contrary to allegations in the press, no such briefing took place.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether United States National Guardsmen have been or will be involved in exercises in the United Kingdom which included the control of civilians during strikes and demonstrations.

Mr. Lee: No.

Siam-Burma Railway (Ex-prisoners of War)

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements have been made for former far east prisoners of war and their families to visit the Siam-Burma railway at public expense.

Mr. Lee: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced on 14 February at column 230 that the Government would arrange for a party of widows and veterans to make a visit to the far east in remembrance of husbands and comrades who died there. Planning for the visit is still at a very early stage and the itinerary and criteria governing eligibility have yet to be finalised. A further announcement will be made in due course.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Exchange Rate

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the exchange rate of the pound sterling has fallen against the Japanese yen.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The following table gives percentage movements in the nominal and real yen/£ exchange rate from 1980:

Period averages	*Percentage changes on previous year
	Nominal	Real†
1980	+13	+30½
1981	−15	−8½
1982	−2½	+1½
1983	−17½	−13
1984	−18	−15
February 1985	−3½	—

* Denotes sterling appreciation.

† Calculated by deflating the nominal yen/£ rate by the ratio of United Kingdom to Japanese price movements (using GDP deflators).

The movements in the nominal rate reflected a wide range of factors, including oil prices, whose sharp rise between 1979 and 1980 and steady decline since 1981 (in dollar terms) were broadly reflected in sterling's overall strength and weakness during those periods. Another influence was the faster rate of price and cost inflation in the United Kingdom than Japan over the period. Thus the real yen/£ rate (ie the nominal rate adjusted for inflation)† fell by about 10½ per cent. between 1979 and 1984, far less than the nominal rate.

Wages and Unemployment

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the relationship between the movement of wages and the level of unemployment in the United Kingdom and other developed countries in each year since 1970.

Mr. Peter Rees: Information on the movement of wages and the level of unemployment in the United Kingdom and other OECD countries in each year since 1970 can be found in the OECD publication Main Economic Indicators Historical Statistics 1964-1983. This publication gives data for the OECD countries for hourly earnings in manufacturing and total unemployment. More recent data are available in the monthly edition of Main Economic Indicators.

Agriculture and Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the expenditure of public funds in 1983-84, directly and indirectly on the support of (i) agriculture and (ii) manufacturing industry.

Mr. Peter Rees: The main elements of public expenditure on agriculture and industry in 1983-84 are set out in tables 3.3 and 3.4 in volume II of the Public Expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428). Further information can be found in the Annual Review of Agriculture 1985 (Cmnd. 9423) and the Annual Report under the Industrial Development Act 1982 (H.C. 604).

Public Expenditure

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average amount by which public expenditure has exceeded the amount spent in 1978-79, in each year from 1979-80, in actual and real terms and as a percentage of 1978-79 figures.

Mr. Peter Rees: The outturn figures for the public expenditure planning total for 1978-79 given in last year's Public Expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9143) was £65·8 billion. The recently published 1985 White Paper (Cmnd. 9428) shows an estimated outturn for 1984-85 of £128·1 billion. The average annual difference from the 1978-79 planning total over the period 1979-80 to 1984-85 was £40·3 billion, which is equivalent to 61·3 per cent. of the 1978-79 planning total. In real terms, the planning total has increased from £111·7 billion in 1978-79 to £122·3 billion in 1984-85 (at 1983-84 prices), with an average annual difference from 1978-79 of £5·5 billion, equivalent to 4·9 per cent. of the 1978-79 planning total in real terms.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Conway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the business expansion and start-up schemes available in non-assisted areas;

(2) if he will list every business expansion scheme which his Department operates;

(3) if he will list each business start-up scheme operated by his Department.

Mr. Moore: The business expansion scheme, which succeeded the earlier business start-up scheme in 1983, is administered by the Board of Inland Revenue. Under this scheme individuals may obtain relief for new equity investment in qualifying companies. Relief is available alike, whether the company is located in an assisted or a non-assisted area.

It would not be practicable to list all the companies —there were over 400 last year alone—and in many cases to do so would breach the normal rules of confidentiality which surround the tax affairs of individuals and companies.

Privatisation (Profits)

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why Her Majesty's Treasury presents the profits from privatisation and the sale of council houses as negative spending rather than asset sales.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Johnson Matthey

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent discussions he has had with the Bank of England concerning the Johnson Matthey Bankers group; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: None. The statement to the House on 17 December by my right hon. Friend announced a full review of the present arrangements for banking supervision in the light of the Johnson Matthey Bankers affair. That review is still in progress and a further announcement at this stage would therefore not be appropriate.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from Gomba Group Incorporated about payments due from that group to Johnson Matthey; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend has received no representations from the Gomba Group International about payments due from that group to Johnson Matthey Bankers Ltd.

Value Added Tax (Football League)

Mr. Boyes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much value added tax is paid by football league clubs each year in total.

Mr. Hayhoe: On the basis of information provided by the Football League, it is estimated that the yield from admissions to football matches is of the order of £6 million a year.

Base Rate

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average base rate for each quarter from 1979 onwards; what real rate of interest this represented in each case; and how these figures compare with those for the United States, Japan, Germany and Australia.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many occasions during each of the last five years customs investigations have commenced into the commission of drug-related offences by people who have at the time of apprehension or theft claimed diplomatic immunity; what effect these claims of immunity have had on the seizure of drugs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Departmental Salaries

Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each of the years 1974 to 1984 (a) the salary in real terms of (i) principals and (ii) assistant secretaries in his Department, expressed as a percentage of the 1974 base salary level and (b) the number of voluntary resignations.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Value Added Tax (Take-away Food)

Mr. Waller asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimate of the tax revenue obtained from value added tax on hot take-away food.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to make relief arrangements for payment of value added tax for suppliers whose customers abscond without paying for the goods or services supplied; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I cannot anticipate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget Statement.

Pound Sterling

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the pound sterling exchange rate with the European currency unit for the first day in every month since June 1983.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is as follows:

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect a change in the exchange rate between the pound sterling and the European currency unit has on financial transactions between the United Kingdom and the EEC.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EC Budget

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing for each year since 1972 (a) net payments to the European Community budget excluding overseas aid, (b) receipts from the agricultural guarantee and guidance fund, (c) receipts from the social fund and (d) receipts from the regional development funds.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Wigley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing, for the latest year for which information is available, the gross domestic product per capita at factor cost and current prices, by county, in groups indicating those counties which, excluding the continental shelf, are (a) 20 per cent. or more below the United Kingdom average, (b) between 10 per cent. and 20 per cent. below the United Kingdom average, (c) between 0 per cent. and 10 per cent. below the United Kingdom average, (d) between 0 per cent. and 10 per cent. above the United Kingdom average, (e) between 10 per cent. and 20 per cent. above the United Kingdom average and (f) which are over 20 per cent. above the United Kingdom average, including the pound per capita for each county.

Mr. Peter Rees: The latest available estimates of county GDP per head were published in table 7 (page 108) of the appendix to the article "Regional Accounts 1982", in the June 1984 issue of Economic Trends (No. 368). Any groupings of counties can be derived easily from the data in the table.

Capital Outflows

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the inward and outward capital flows for the United Kingdom in the years 1979 to 1984; and what information he has as to how these compare with the figures for the United States of America, Japan, Germany and Australia, respectively.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 8 March 1985.]: Total capital movements into or out of the United Kingdom are available only on a net basis. They are identical in size to the total balance on the current account of the balance of payments but are recorded in the accounts with the reverse sign. The latest figures for 1982-4 were published on 7 March in the United Kingdom balance of payments press notice. Comparable figures for earlier years will be published in the March issue of Economic Trends; an advance copy of the relevant tables is available in the Library. Table 1 shows the summary account; tables 9 and 10 show, respectively, net investment flows into and out of the United Kingdom, which are included within the total of investment and other capital transactions (other than official financing) in the summary table.

Balance of payments figures for other countries and for the United Kingdom on a consistent basis as far as possible are published in the IMF's balance of payments publications. The latest available issue is the 1984 yearbook which contains annual figures up to end-1983 only. It is available in the Library.

Pay-as-you-earn

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a list showing, by Inland Revenue region (a) the number of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers, (b) the number of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers, on the latest quarterly figures, not yet assessed or otherwise cleared for the last tax year and (c) figures comparable to (b) for the position of this assessing work in each of the last three years.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 8 March 1985]:

Workplace Nurseries

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received concerning tax incentives to provide workplace nurseries.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 8 March 1985]: Since the beginning of this year Treasury Ministers have received 26 letters on this subject.

Value Added Tax (Italy)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action Her Majesty's Government intend taking to secure the refund of value added tax payments due to British firms by the Italian Government; if Italy has accepted the indebtedness; what is the length of the delay; if he will take action on the correspondence he has received on this subject from the hon. Member for Eccles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I have been asked to reply.

We share the concern of the hon. Member at delays in VAT repayments due to British firms under the EC's eighth VAT Directive. Her Majesty's embassy in Rome is currently pursuing outstanding claims with the Italian authorities, including that about which I am writing to the hon. Member.

Child Benefit

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the effect would be, excluding those on higher rates of tax, on (a) the numbers of working families with overall marginal tax rates of 50 per cent. or more and (b) the numbers of working families with marginal tax rates of 75 per cent. or more, of (i) raising child benefit over and above indexation, whilst keeping personal allowances in line with indexation, (ii) raising personal allowances over and above indexation with child benefit being increased in line with indexation only and (iii) raising both child benefit and personal allowances by the same percentage increase, assuming in all three cases a fixed adjustment of £1·5 billion; and what would be the amounts in increases in allowances and child benefit that would occur under each of these cases.

Mr. Whitney: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) on 7 March.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Supplementary Benefit

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what special provisions he intends to make to enable claimants of supplementary benefit who need essential household furniture and who receive and subsequently submit his Department's Girocheques made payable to a particular furniture shop to be aided in purchasing furniture elsewhere in the event of the business to whom the Girocheque is originally made payable either going bankrupt or closing down.

Mr. Whitney: We have no plans to introduce special provisions to deal with the situation described by the hon. Member. To our knowledge we are aware of only one case where the supplier closed down after receiving from the claimant a Girocheque issued by the Department but before supplying all the items for which payment had been awarded; a further payment has since been made in that case.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will update the information given in the answer of 31 January, Official Report, column 304, to the hon. Member for Walsall, North and in the same format, on supplementary benefit claimants and for the latest dates for which figures are now available.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that more up-to-date information is not yet available.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why the ambulance service is not officially recognised as an emergency service in the same way as police and fire services are so recognised; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The ambulance service is an integral part of the National Health Service. On many occasions we have paid tribute to the vital role performed by ambulance staff in dealing with emergencies, often in very difficult circumstances. The duties and responsibilities of the various emergency services however differ and emergency work forms only a part, and by no means the most time-consuming part, of the overall work of the ambulance service. The other aspects which vary greatly cannot be left aside in determining pay and conditions of service.

Speech Therapists

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current staff/studio ratio recommended by his Department for courses leading to a certificate to practise as a speech therapist.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have made no recommendation on staff/student ratios for speech therapy degrees or courses. This is a matter for the individual colleges.

Dr. Jean Lawrie (Correspondence)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library a copy of the letter which has been sent by his Department on behalf of the Prime Minister to Dr. Jean Lawrie about the South London hospital for women and the Elizabeth Garrett Anderson hospital in response to a letter Dr. Lawrie sent to the Prime Minister on 11 February.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have arranged for a copy of our Department's reply to be sent to the hon. Member. A copy has also been placed in the Library.

Private Medicine

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services under what conditions National Health Service ambulances transport patients to private hospitals; how many such journeys were made in the last year for which figures are available; what was the total mileage travelled; how much income was generated by these journeys; and what was the average income per mile travelled by the ambulances.

Mr. John Patten: Suitable transport, usually to the nearest National Health Service hospital, treatment centre or convalescent home, is provided by the ambulance service for any patient considered by a doctor, dentist or midwife to be medically unfit to travel by other means. On the same terms, the ambulance service is also available to transport patients to and from private nursing homes and hospitals as long as the distance involved is not materially greater than would be the case in travelling to or from the nearest appropriate NHS hospital. Subject to there being no detriment to NHS patients, a private patient who wishes to attend a more distant centre may be transported on condition that the actual cost of the additional mileage involved is met by the patient.

Information in the form requested is not collected centrally. Following are the data available for 1983 in relation to ambulance service journeys carrying non-NHS patients (ie, to both NHS hospital premises as private patients and to non-NHS establishments).

Ambulance services—Non-NHS patients 1983—England

*Number of patient journeys	Thousand Mileage
141	1,157

* A 'patient journey' is the carriage of one patient in one direction.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, when district health authorities enter into contractual arrangements so that National Health Service patients are treated in private clinics by consultants who normally work in the districts' own hospitals, those consultants are (a) expected to carry out the operations as part of their contractual obligations, (b) paid private fees by the health authority, (c) paid by the clinics or (d) donate their services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The nature of the contractual arrangement between the health authority and the private clinic determines the method of payment for medical services.

a. If the agreement with the private establishment provides for the National Health Service to supply medical services, then it is for the health authority to arrange for consultants to carry out the work as part of their duties.
b. There is no arrangement whereby fees can be paid by health authorities for consultants to work in private institutions over and above their normal salaries.
c. Where the agreement with the private institution leaves it to that institution to supply the medical services, then it is for the private institution to recruit and pay the medical staff. NHS consultants may undertake this work and be paid accordingly, subject to the limitations on private practice in their NHS contracts, and providing priority is given to NHS work.

d. It is open to NHS consultants to donate their services as they wish, provided they first meet their contractual obligations to the NHS.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether consultants are entitled to participate in discussions concerning the possibility of district health authorities entering into contracts with private clinics for the treatment of National Health Service patients when the consultants (a) practise at or (b) hold shares in those clinics.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Standing orders of health authorities provide for the declaration of interests by members and staff. They are required to notify the health authority of any financial interest they may have or relationship with a manufacturer, supplier, or contractor with whom the authority is, or is likely, to enter into a contractual relationship, and of any financial or other interest which may affect the authority's planning or policy decisions. This includes individuals holding posts as consultants to firms. Any individual whose advice is specifically sought by the authority in relation to any commercial transaction where such an interest arises is required to declare that interest.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether health authorities are entitled to enter into contractual arrangements so that National Health Service patients are treated in private clinics by consultants who hold shares in those clinics yet who normally work in the districts' own hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. Provision for the use of non-National Health Service facilities to provide, or assist in providing, NHS services is contained in section 23 of the National Health Service Act 1977. There is no statutory limit to the extent to which this power can be exercised, and health authorities are free to negotiate contractual arrangements with any type of independent establishment.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library documents setting out the formulae and figures used to calculate the present charges to private non-resident patients under section 66 of the National Health Service Act 1977.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I will arrange for a suitable note to be prepared and placed in the Library.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of the weighted unit cost per inpatient day as used in the calculation of pay bed charges to patients not paying consultants' fees separately is attributable to medical pay.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: 5·2 per cent. in classes A-C2, and 6·6 per cent. in classes D-G.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost to his Department of the audit inquiries into the handling of private patient fees.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The cost of staff time devoted by our Department's auditors to the special review of the handling of private patient charges in England is estimated at £130,000. The effect was to delay completion of the annual audit of health authorities' accounts for 1983-84 by about two weeks which will be recouped during the current year.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in how many years since 1970 the expected cost movements used in the calculation of pay bed charges were (a) above, (b) below and (c) equal to the actual cost movements.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This information is not readily available and could be assembled only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why no allowance is made for the costs of his own Department in calculating pay bed charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have included such an element in the calculation of private patient charges for 1985-86.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why pay bed charges are weighted to reflect private patient occupancy rates; and what effect this has on the charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hospitals making up the different classes have different unit costs. The average cost per bed day is weighted to reflect the pattern of bed use by private patients within each class. Thus, if private patients occupy more beds in higher costing hospitals, this will be reflected in the charge for that class of hospital. The reverse also applies. The effect will be to raise or lower charges accordingly.

When weighting was introduced in 1982 it was estimated that the effect on charges would be to increase them on average by about 5 per cent.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give separately for the latest available year the total income from charges made under section 65(1) and under section 65(2), respectively, of the National Health Service Act 1977.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This information is not recorded separately.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate the extent to which the calculation of the 3 per cent. addition to the weighted unit cost per inpatient day in the determination of pay bed charges takes account of the 4·44 per cent. proportion of health authorities' turnover in 1982-83 which was accounted for by administrative costs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The 3 per cent. addition in the calculation of pay bed charges for 1984-85 covers health authority administration costs, hospital management costs having already been included in the basic cost per patient day. The management costs identified as 4·44 per cent. of turnover in 1982-83 included health authority and hospital management costs.

Mobility Information Service

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the mobility information service based at Copthorne community hall; if he will include this service in his consideration of a national mobility centre; if he will consider giving further financial aid and support to the service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have received a letter from the mobility information service. An official will shortly visit the service to assess its work and needs.

Resettlement Units

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services following his announcement 5 February, Official Report, columns 548-9, about resettlement units, what evidence he has collected to show that voluntary organisations are more successful than resettlement units in the process of resettlement; what steps he will take to ensure that standards of provision are maintained and improved; and if he intends to set and enforce standards.

Mr. Whitney: It is now generally accepted that the resettlement process is more likely to succeed in smaller informally run hostels than in large institutions such as resettlement units. Smaller hostels managed by voluntary organisations have the flexibility to meet the needs of individuals as they arise. Such hostels are usually well-embedded within the community and are seen as part of the local professional network with access to the necessary services and agencies.

Resettlement units are often in remote locations and this, allied with their size, can exacerbate the difficulties experienced by the homeless, re-inforcing their isolation from the rest of the community. We have over a number of years monitored those voluntary projects in receipt of funding under Schedule 5 of the Supplementary Benefits Act and have concluded that they offer a more effective resettlement service than is possible in resettlement units.

The voluntary organisations, to whom grants are made, are registered charities experienced in dealing with the homeless. They have a common goal of resettlement with in the community and offer a wide variety of regimes to achieve this end. We will continue to monitor their standards in relation to their stated aims and objectives and any new grant made will be subject to annual review in the same way.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what saving will be made in London or the provinces by closing his Department's resettlement units.

Mr. Whitney: None. Until the Camberwell replacement scheme is further advanced, no action will be taken on the other seven London resettlement units and their future will be reviewed later. The resources released by the closure of units in the provinces will be used to finance alternative resettlement provision.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated capital expenditure required for each provincial resettlement unit if its present role were to continue and if equivalent sums will be allocated to those making alternative provision.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that precise estimates are not available. Because of the age and condition of several of the units their continued existence on an indefinite basis is not feasible. The cost of rebuilding the units would obviously be considerable but has not been calculated precisely as it is not an option under consideration. The money at present available for capital expenditure—£1·407 million for 1986-87—will be available to fund alternative provision.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he intends to guarantee revenue support for alternative provision to resettlement units beyond the initial three year period;

(2) if revenue made available to the voluntary sector for provision of resettlement services will be maintained on a permanent basis and increased in line with the cost of living;

(3) if he will guarantee there will be no increased cost to local authorities by the change of responsibility from his Department's resettlement units to alternative provision;

(4) if financial provision for resettlement will increase in line with the increase in the number of single homeless people without means.

Mr. Whitney: The resources which will be made available for alternative resettlement provision in the voluntary sector include those freed by the closure of re-establishment centres as well as resettlement units. As a result, when the closure programme has been completed some £2 million a year more than was previously planned will become available for resettlement provision. Our intention is that the funding of voluntary agencies will normally be given on a continuing basis subject to regular review and there is provision for funding to be increased in line with the public sector pay factor.

It would not be appropriate to link funding arrangements to changes in the numbers of single homeless people without means since such people will generally be entitled to supplementary benefit and only a small proportion would require help to resettle. As we are increasing the resources available for resettlement provision and are looking also to achieve better value for money we would not expect this initiative to result in increased costs to local authorities.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the alternative provision arising from the closure of his Department's resettlement units will provide emergency, direct access accommodation to single homeless people, regardless of means or circumstance.

Mr. Whitney: My right hon. Friend has a specific duty to provide for persons without a settled way of life under schedule 5 of the Supplementary Benefits Act 1976, as amended by the Social Security Act 1980. The process of consultation just beginning will be aimed at making alternative provision within the terms of that responsibility.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the sale proceeds, or in the case of transfer to another Department or conversion of use within his Department, an amount equal to a commercial valuation, of resettlement and re-establishment premises will be used to finance alternative provision in the voluntary sector.

Mr. Whitney: No. There are 26 sites occupied by resettlement units and re-establishment centres, all of them leased. Five of these are leased privately, and the remainder are freehold properties of the Property Services Agency, which will decide on the disposal of the sites when the units and centres are closed. The amount paid in rents will become available to finance alternative provision.

Food and Benefits (Stamps)

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has for the introduction of stamps for food and other social security benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: As explained by my right hon. Friend in her reply to the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman) on 7 March, at column 1163, we have no intention of substituting vouchers for supplementary benefit.

Road Users (Education)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the recommendations made by the World Health Organisation on the need for an intersectoral approach by health and road safety educationists to the education of the road user; and whether any initiatives are planned.

Mr. John Patten: The interdepartmental working group on road safety set up by the Department of Transport is considering the question of the education of the road user.

Welfare State (Poll)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place a copy in the Library of the results of the Gallup poll he recently commissioned into public attitudes towards the welfare state.

Mr. Newton: The final report has not yet been received. Results from the survey will be made available when the Government's conclusions and proposals for change arising from the social security review are published.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library a list indicating each of the drugs and other substances proposed not to be available on prescription on the National Health Service as from 1 April; and what is the alternative drug or drugs, or generic substitute available on the National Health Service limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The selected list of drugs to remain available on NHS prescription after 1 April provides an adequate range of medicines in each therapeutic category covered by the new arrangements. Doctors will decide which drugs to prescribe on the basis of the clinical needs of individual patients. They are regularly sent comprehensive information about drugs, such as the British National Formulary, which will help them to make those decisions. A list of all possible alternative drugs could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to inform the public with regard to the new National Health Service list of drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) on 8 March.

Pensioners (Canada)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether pensions payable to British pensioners in Canada are frozen at the rate of pension which applied on the date when they left the United Kingdom.

Mr. Whitney: Retirement and widows pensions are payable to British pensioners in Canada at the rates which were current when they left the United Kingdom, or when they first became entitled if they were living abroad at that time.

NHS (Spectacles)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the proposed arrangements for the charging of National Health Service spectacles take account of the position of the visually handicapped and those requiring complex lenses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The visually handicapped and others who require complex lenses and who do not qualify for full or partial remission of charges will be able, if they wish, to obtain their spectacles through the general ophthalmic service at charges which reflect the full economic cost of supply.

We consulted very widely on our proposals for regulations to give effect to this arrangement. We have responded to the representations we received and, as a result, the National Health Service (General Ophthalmic Services) Amendment Regulations 1985 (SI 1985 No 298) contain a much wider definition of a complex lens than we originally proposed.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the difference between technical non-tolerance, as allowed for after a cataract operation in the new arrangements for National Health Service spectacles, and non-tolerance generally; and what are the time limits imposed on applications for a second pair of spectacles.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hospital eye service statement of fees and charges makes clear that where the ophthalmologist is satisfied that a patient is genuinely unable to use lenses which have been prescribed and supplied and that lenses to a new prescription are necessary, the total National Health Service charges payable by a patient are those for the lenses finally in the patient's possession. This is referred to as a case of non-tolerance. I understand that many health authorities make use of this provision to ensure that, while the condition of a patient's eye settles, for instance after a cataract operation, the patient does not have to pay charges for each of a series of glasses provided. Since this results from the changing condition of the eye, it is often referred to as "technical" non-tolerance. It would be up to the authority to determine how long in a particular case or cases to apply this provision. The practice will not be altered by the new arrangements for dispensing in the General Ophthalmic Services.

Dicyclomine Drugs

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the letter sent to doctors and pharmacists by the Committee on Safety of Medicines warning them of the risk to babies under six months arising from the use of the dicyclomine drugs, Merbentyl and Ovol; and what action he has taken to warn mothers of the risks related to these drugs available without prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The letters to doctors and pharmacists advising them that Merbentyl Syrup (dicyclomine hydrochloride) is contra-indicated in infants under six months of age were issued by the licence holder for Merbentyl Syrup and not by the Committee on Safety of Medicines. I have arranged for copies of these letters to be placed in the Library. The only other dicyclomine product for infants on the market, Ovol Colic Drops, is no longer indicated for infants under three months and may be dispensed only under the supervision of a pharmacist, who is well placed to explain the licensed indications to purchasers.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence for the safety of Merbentyl was provided for the Committee on Safety of Medicines by Merrell Pharmaceuticals when it sought a product licence for the drug.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Data in support of an application for a product licence are presented to the licensing authority in confidence. However, the licence-holder has agreed to the disclosure of data presented in support of their application for a licence for the use of Merbentyl Syrup in the treatment of infant colic. Their data, which are all available in published form, showed the safety record of the product in a total of 1,000 patients including 261 babies with infant colic. The studies are by Illingworth published in the Lancet on 19 December 1959, by Grunseit published in Current Medical Research and Opinion in 1977, by Ribero published in Folha Medicine in 1973, by Nobre published in Hospital (Rio) volume 67 1965, by Guerro published in the Phillipines Journal of Paediatrics in 1953 and by Pakula published in Post Graduate Medicine in 1952.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set up an inquiry into the possibility of an association between cot deaths and the use of drugs containing dicyclomine.

Mr. John Patten: No. There is no prima facie evidence of a causal link to warrant such an inquiry.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when drugs containing dicyclomine first appeared on the British market; which ones were given product licences of right, and which were fully tested; how many have been withdrawn since the licensing system began; and how many were still on the market when the Committee on Safety of Medicines issued its recent warning of risks for babies of under six months.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I understand that products containing dicyclomine were first marketed in the United Kingdom in the early 1950s but we do not have detailed information about this marketing. The table shows products containing dicyclomine which were granted product licences of right as well as those which have been granted full product licences. The table also shows that the licences for six products have been allowed to lapse, another six are on the market and a further three products have licences but are not currently on the United Kingdom market. Only two products on the market are indicated for babies.

* Indicated for treatment of babies.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will detail the evidence considered by the Committee on Safety of Medicines which led it to warn of the risks to babies under six months arising from the use of the drug dicyclomine; when the committee issued its warning; how many adverse reaction reports it had received and when it received them; on how many previous occasions the committee has assessed the safety of dicyclomine; and with what result.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Committee on Safety of Medicines has not issued such a warning as explained in my other reply to the right hon. Member today. The committee has received 36 reports of adverse reactions associated with products containing dicyclomine for use in babies, as follows:

Year	Number of reports
1969	1
1973	1
1976	1
1977	1
1978	1

Year	Number of reports
1980	1
1981	1
1982	1
1983	10
1984	17
1985	1

The committee has considered the safety of products containing dicyclomine on many occasions including for the treatment of infant colic on two occasions. In May 1983 the committee advised the licensing authority that Merbentyl Syrup should be granted a product licence for use in the treatment of irritable colon and infant colic. In July 1984 the committee considered adverse reaction reports relating to apnoeic attacks in babies associated with the use of dicyclomine products. Although the committee noted that no evidence had been identified which established a casual link between dicyclomine and apnoeic attacks it asked its secretariat to pursue the matter. This was done and after discussions with the manufacturer of Merbentyl Syrup the company agreed to delete the indications of the product for the treatment of infant colic.

Following discussions with the manufacturer of Ovol Colic Drops, the only other product currently on the market containing dicyclomine hydrochloride which is indicated for infants, the company agreed to delete the indication for the treatment of colic in infants under three months.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is able to estimate the annual use of drugs containing dicyclomine, and the likely number of times it has been given to babies during the years it has been on the British market.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The manufacturers estimate that in the United Kingdom around 74 million doses of liquid products containing dicyclomine were sold in 1984, of which some 12 million doses were for babies. We do not have enough information to make an estimate for the 30-year period since the product became available here.

Mortality Statistics

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women under the age of (a) 25 years and (b) 20 years have died as a result of pulmonary embolism or deep vein thrombosis in each of the years since 1965.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available figures are shown in the table. It is not possible to distinguish deep vein thrombosis as a separate entity in the International Classification of Diseases before 1979.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has concerning the numbers of women aged (a) under 16, (b) under 20, (c) under 25 years and (d) in total who have died in each of the years since 1965 through conditions attributed to the use of the contraceptive pill.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Medical Manpower Planning

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he established the advisory committee on medical manpower planning; when he received that committee's report; and when he intends to make the report publicly available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The committee was set up in August 1982 and its report was presented to us in January 1984. We envisage publication in the near future.

Industrial Injuries

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are currently receiving benefit under the Workmen's Compensation (Supplementation) Scheme 1982 on account of industrial injuries incurred before 1 January 1924; what is the average weekly payment in each case; and what is the total annual expenditure.

Mr. Newton: There are currently 123 beneficiaries receiving benefit under the Workmen's Compensation (Supplementation) Scheme as a result of injuries at work before 1 January 1924. The annual cost of the benefits payable is £152,115 and the average weekly payment is £23·78.

Youth Training Schemes

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of young people on youth training schemes receive (a) class one national insurance credit, (b) class two national insurance credit, (c) class three national insurance credit and (d) no national insurance credit, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: Those on youth training schemes (YTS) are not separately identifiable within the statistics on credits, since participation in YTS is not a requirement for the award of credits.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services under what conditions young people on youth training schemes receive (a) class one national insurance credit, (b) class two national insurance credit, (c) class three national insurance credit and (d) no national insurance credit, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: Those on youth training schemes receive credits through the arrangements applicable to young people generally, which are as follows:

1. Class 1 credits are available for any tax year up to and including that in which a young person reaches age 17 (or for someone not insured under the National Insurance Act 1965, a later year) and continue to the end of the first year in which class 1 or 2 contributions are first paid or treated as paid. If a claim to benefit is made by a young person who is undergoing a course of full-time education, approved training or apprenticeship that started before he or she was aged 21 and has ended, class 1 credits are made available for the relevant tax year;
2. Class 2 credits have not been awarded since 1975;
3. Class 3 credits are available for the tax year in which a young person becomes 16, and for the following two tax years.

If the hon. Member has a particular case in mind, perhaps he would write to me with the details.

Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that local authorities are meeting their duties under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

Mr. Newton: Implementation of the Act rests with local authorities, which are in the best position to assess local needs and to decide the most appropriate arrangements for meeting them. We are satisfied that local authorities fully recognise and seek to discharge that responsibility.

Disabled Persons (Grant Aid)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to how many people registered as disabled are presently awaiting grant aid from local authorities in England; and if he will compare this figure with the situation a year ago.

Mr. Newton: This information is not available centrally.

Riverside Health Authority

Mr. Tracey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide details of progress made towards creating a new Riverside health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have today laid before the House orders designed to abolish the existing Victoria and Hammersmith and Fulham health authorities and to create a new Riverside authority. The new Riverside district will cover the same areas of London as the current Victoria and Hammersmith and Fulham districts combined.

In November last we approved in principle the proposal by the North-West Thames regional health authority to create Riverside. In deciding upon the constitution of the new authority we have given careful and detailed consideration to the responses to the consultation recently undertaken. We recognise that the constitution of the new authority should reflect the need for strong and effective joint planning between the local authorities involved in the delivery of health care. We have also sought to secure effective liaison between the new authority and the newly created Charing Cross and Westminster medical school. And we have recognised the crucial role that will be played by locally resident generalist lay members.

Subject to the reaction of right hon. and hon. Members, the orders will come into force on 1 April 1985.

NHS Charges

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement about charges in the National Health Service.

Mr. Fowler: I refer my hon. Friend to my statement in the House earlier today.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Personal Assistants

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal how many British or foreign nationals are engaged as research assistants in the House of Commons and operate from right hon. and hon. Members' offices in Upper Committee Corridor North; and, of this number, how many receive salaries from the Fees Office.

Mr. Biffen: A total of 444 photo-identity passes are currently on issue to Members' research assistants in the House of Commons. Twenty-three Members with offices in Upper Committee Corridor North have research assistants, of whom five are foreign nationals; but no information is available to indicate how many operate from those offices.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal how many foreign nationals are engaged in research assistant duties for right hon. and hon. Members in the House of Commons; and how many are paid salaries by the Fees Office.

Mr. Biffen: A total of 109 photo-identity passes are currently on issue to foreign nationals who are engaged as research assistants to Members. Of these five are paid a salary and one fees by the Fees Office.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal what control at present exists in the issue of House of Commons access passes to foreign nationals who are engaged by right hon. and hon. Members as research assistants.

Mr. Biffen: I refer my hon. Friend to the recently published Second Report from the House of Commons (Services) Committee, Session 1984-85, "Members' Staff: Pressure on Accommodation and Facilities" which describes the existing arrangements and also recommends the introduction of certain additional controls.

Photocopying

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal what steps are being taken regarding the improper use of the photocopying machine in Upper Committee Corridor North by hon. Members' research assistants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend's previous complaints on this matter have been drawn to the attention of the Serjeant at Arms. The Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee of the Services Committee is currently reviewing the provision of photocopiers for hon. Members and the rules for their use. I welcome the co-operation of hon. Members in ensuring compliance with the existing rules on the part of all users.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal how many right hon. or hon. Members have paid the Fees Office for printing more than 12 copies of any single paper on one of the photocopying machines provided for use in the House of Commons, in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984 and to the latest available date in 1985.

Mr. Biffen: The only payments recorded by the Fees Office were made through the Sale Office and relate to the photocopying machines provided for Hon. Members' use on the Lower Ground Floor of the Main Building. The number of Members making such payments were as follows:

	Number
1982	7
1983	14
1984	2
*1985	Nil

* To 7 March.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will issue instructions on the number of copies which can be made without charge on the photocopying machines provided for the use of right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Biffen: Notices are already displayed by each such machine, which state, in particular, that 12 copies of a single paper are allowed free but that payment at the rate of 2p must be made for each copy in excess of this number.

Members' Stationery

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will investigate the circumstances in which unauthorised persons are entering hon. Members' offices in Upper Committee Corridor North and removing from the desks the two larger sizes of the brown franked pre-paid envelopes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: If my hon. Friend will write to me setting out details of the allegations which he has made, I will see that the circumstances are investigated by the authorities of the House.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food Labelling

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has yet completed consideration of those recommendations in the Report of the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy on Diet and Cardiovascular Disease which are of concern to his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I have examined carefully the recommendations in the COMA report on diet and cardiovascular disease in consultation with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Social Services, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. Since the report was published in July last year officials have also held preliminary discussions with representatives of food and drink manufacturers, distributors, retailers, consumers, and local authority organisations. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has invited the British Nutrition Foundation and the Health Education Council to ask their joint advisory committee on nutritional education to produce practical guidance for families based on the recommendations. We are therefore working towards implementing all the COMA recommendations to the Government. Much remains to be done but I can now announce the Government's general proposals on those recommendations which affect agricultural and food policy.

COMA made important proposals for the labelling of the fat content of food. The Government intend to introduce statutory requirements concerning foods which make a significant contribution to the fat intake in the diet. Such foods should be labelled with their total fat content and their saturated fatty acid content. In the important cases of butter, margarine, table spreads, cooking fat and other edible oils, the saturated fatty acid content would be shown with the trans fatty acid content as a combined figure. The new requirements would cover not only packaged food but also foods sold loose, although the detailed labelling requirements would need to be varied to allow for the particular circumstances of different parts of the food industry and there will therefore be further consultations on some of the more difficult problems. Labelling of individual portions is clearly not practical in the case of catering establishments. However, the Government will discuss with the trades covering all such cases how to ensure in a practical way that they can play their part in providing consumers with information about the fat in the foods they serve. Foods which do not make a significant contribution to fat intake would be outside the new labelling requirements: they include such items as most fruit and vegetables, cereals and bread and flour.

Representatives of the food industry have asked the Government to consider full nutrition labelling of all foods covering such things as energy, protein, and carbohydrate content as well as fat content. We do not propose to introduce compulsory full nutrition labelling but will prepare draft guidelines and will circulate them for comment to all the interests concerned. While full nutrition labelling would therefore remain voluntary, the Government will consider whether to prescribe a standard format by regulation, in order to avoid the confusion among consumers that differing formats might cause.

The Government, the Consumers Association and the National Consumers Council are collaborating in a survey of consumer understanding of, and requirements for, fat content and nutrition labelling. The results are expected in May and will be taken into account in reaching the Government's final conclusion.

COMA recommended that all alcoholic drinks should be labelled with the percentage of alcohol by volume. Similar proposals for Community regulations have been made by the European Commission and are to be debated by Parliament. The Government will take careful account of the views of Parliament and of the Commission's proposals before reaching a decision, but believe that regulations should be introduced in line with the COMA recommendations.

COMA recommended that alternative preparations of food should be made available with lower saturated fat or lower salt contents. The Government will continue their discussions with the industry on this matter and note that there are already a number of alternative lower fat products on the market, such as low fat dairy products, table spreads and sausages.

I have considered the recommendation for the production of leaner carcases of cattle, sheep and pigs. So far as cattle and sheep are concerned, I have concluded that it would be appropriate to adjust the certification standards applying under the respective variable premium schemes so as to exclude from eligibility the fatter animals (that is in the case of cattle those falling into fat class 5; and those covered by the fatter end of the MLC's fat class 4 in the case of sheep). I believe that, given reasonable notice, beef and sheep producers should be able to make the necessary adjustments to their husbandry and breeding practices. I accordingly have it in mind that these changes should be effective from the beginning of the 1986 marketing years. Meanwhile, my officials and MLC staff will be collaborating in a suitable programme of advisory events. There are no corresponding arrangements for pigs, but the trend there continues to be towards the production of leaner animals.

I have carefully noted the recommemdations to consider ways of removing from the common agricultural policy those elements which might dicourage dietary change. The Government believe that production should be geared to consumer demand as expressed in the market place. In general the commodity regimes of the CAP do not discourage individuals from implementing the COMA dietary recommendations if they wish to do so. The Government will however in future take this recommendation fully into account, with other relevant considerations, in determining the United Kingdom position in negotiations on the CAP. The European Commission has proposed that the general consumer butter subsidy should lapse at the end of 1984-85 and the Government intend to accept this provided other relevant decisions are satisfactory.

In carrying out their proposals the Government must bear in mind their responsibilities as a member of the EEC, where food labelling law is already harmonised. We will therefore remain in close touch with the European Commission.

The Government recognise that some parts of the industry face genuine practical problems which will have to be resolved in further discussion; but I am confident that all those involved will continue to adopt the same constructive and co-operative approach as they had done hitherto. I intend to issue proposals for regulations later this year.

In the meantime, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services expects that the guidance being sought from the joint advisory committee on nutritional education will be published in the early summer. In addition, the catering guidance provided by his Department for use by hospitals, local authorities and many private catering establishments is being revised to reflect COMA advice. Finally, work is going forward to assess the possibilities for better and more cost effective ways of identifying people at high risk of coronary heart disease, including research into the means of facilitating measurement of blood lipids.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Open University

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his policy for the Open University following the report of the visiting committee.

Sir Keith Joseph: It is the Government's policy that the Open University should continue to fulfil its role within the higher education sector by providing opportunities for degree level study to those who missed, or did not have, those opportunities earlier in life; and by providing opportunities for continuing education, particularly in the area of professional, industrial and commercial updating. The report of the visiting committee indicated that the university should be able to fulfil its role more economically, but that the Government were expecting it to adjust to lower funding levels too quickly. I have accepted the committee's advice that some alleviation should be offered to previously indicated funding levels, and this is reflected in the grant letter issued to the university on 22 February, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

The alleviations provided are in 1985: £1·6 million for restructuring, £0·36 million for promoting a shift to science and technology and £0·039 million to fund additional posts in relation to the new blood and information technology initiatives; and in 1986: £1·2 million for new computing facilities, and £0·8 million to allow for a more gradual approach to reduced grant levels, the switch to science and technology, and the new blood-information technology posts. In aggregate the alleviations amount to about £2 million in each of the years 1985 and 1986.

Religious Education

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidelines are issued by his Department for the provision of and instruction in religious education in all schools.

Mr. Dunn: The place and nature of religious education in the curriculum of maintained schools are governed by the relevant provisions of the Education Act 1944. "The School Curriculum", published in 1981 by the Department of Education and Science and the Welsh Office, set out the Government's views in these terms:

"The place of religious education in the curriculum and its unique statutory position accord with a widely shared view that the subject has a distinctive contribution to make to a pupil's school education. It provides an introduction to the religious and spiritual areas of experience and particularly to the Christian tradition which has profoundly affected our culture. It forms part of the curriculum's concern with personal and social values, and can help pupils to understand the religious and cultural diversity of contemporary society. The Secretaries of State consider that local education authorities should keep under review the provision made for religious education, bearing in mind the requirements of the Education Act 1944 as regards collective acts of worship and religious instruction; and that they should also reconsider from time to time the appropriateness of the Agreed Syllabus for their area in the light of the needs of particular groups of pupils and changes in the society in which the pupils are growing up."

ENERGY

Standing Charges

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to whether some gas boards have abandoned or have plans to abandon the standing charge concession on small usage of fuel by domestic consumers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I understand that the British Gas Corporation is keeping under review its standing charge rebate scheme for small users.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to whether some electricity boards have abandoned or have plans to abandon the standing charge concession on small usage of fuel by domestic consumers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The industry is considering the future of the standing charge rebate scheme. Area boards will make their own announcement of any tariff changes in the usual way.

National Coal Board (Subsidence Damage)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the provisions for subsidence damage in the National Coal Board accounts for 1983-84.

Mr. Peter Walker: The chairman of the NCB has assured me that following a further review he is satisfied that the provision for subsidence damage in the board's 1983-84 accounts is adequate, and that the board is doing everything possible to prevent a recurrence of the situation which made the large additional provision for subsidence damage necessary. I have asked to be kept in close touch with the implementation of the board's plans to improve financial control in this area and have emphasised to the board the importance I attach to a policy directed at repairing subsidence damaged properties rather than paying cash compensation to claimants. I have now paid to the board deficit grant in respect of the additional subsidence provisions, which I had withheld until I was satisfied regarding them.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will give, for each year from 1973 to the latest date for which figures are available, the numbers of (a) entry clearance appeals lost by appellants at adjudicator level but where the appellant sought leave to the tribunal, the numbers where leave was granted and the numbers won, (b) entry clearance appeals lost by his Department or the entry clearance officer where leave to the tribunal was sought, the numbers where leave was granted and the numbers won, (c) cases of any description where his Department or the entry clearance officer lost at the tribunal and sought leave to go to the High Court and (d) fiancés refused entry clearance on grounds of primary intent;

(2) if he will give for the national immigration figures for each year between 1973 and the latest date for which figures are available the numbers of (a) applications for entry clearance refused, broken down into the country of origin and category of persons, (b) appeals to adjudicators against refusal of entry clearance and numbers won and (c) the number of appeals, broken down into each appellate area;

(3) if he will give for each year between 1973 and the latest date for which figures are available the numbers of (a) people who came with prior entry clearance who appealed in the United Kingdom and the numbers who were successful either before an adjudicator or tribunal, (b) people who came without prior entry clearance who were refused entry who appealed from their country of origin and the numbers who were successful and (c) applications for entry clearance, including visas, broken down into country of origin and into the categories of (i) children, (ii) parents, (iii) husbands, (iv) wives, (v) fiancés, (vi) fiancées, (vii) visitors, (viii) students, (ix) asylum seekers and (x) others;

(4) if he will give the national immigration figures for each year between 1973 and the latest date for which figures are available for the numbers of (a) appeals in respect of variation of leave and deportation notices lost by his Department where leave to appeal to the tribunal was sought by his Department, the numbers allowed leave and the numbers successful before the tribunal, (b) people refused entry at air or sea ports, broken down by port and country of origin and (c) people refused at air or sea ports who came with prior entry clearance, broken down by ports and country of origin;

Mr. Waddington: I shall write to the hon. Member giving such information as is available.

Polish Nationals

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Polish nationals have been given permission to stay on a temporary basis in the United Kingdom since the imposition of martial law in Poland; and if he will make a statement on their future.

Mr. Waddington: The numbers of Polish nationals admitted to the United Kingdom for a limited period in 1982, 1983 and 1984, including those who came as visitors, were 14,600, 23,900 and 33,800 respectively. Comprehensive information on applications to remain in the United Kingdom is available only for 1984, when about 4,100 Polish nationals were granted extensions of stay for a limited period. Since the imposition of martial law in Poland, about 1,000 Polish nationals have been granted an exceptional leave to remain in the United Kingdom in accordance with my right hon. Friend's announcement on 9 March 1983.

Independent Broadcasting Authority (Powers)

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to amend the Broadcasting Act 1981 to ensure that the Independent Broadcasting Authority shall not be competent to ban the broadcasting of a television programme on the grounds that it may infringe the Official Secrets Act 1911.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We believe that the Independent Broadcasting Authority should continue to have the right to decide not to transmit any programme which could put it in breach of the criminal law or of its statutory obligations.

Channel Islands

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent represenations he has received about the legal and judicial system in the Channel Islands.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Letters are received each year from a few individuals in the Channel Islands who are dissatisfied with some aspect of the criminal law or judicial system in the island in question or a court's decision in a particular case. No central record is kept of such letters, but the number of complainants is very small.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe the assistance given by his Department to the data protection registrar in the performance of his duties.

Mr. Waddington: The data protection registrar is independent of any Government Department in the performance of his duties. Officials of the Home Office have, however, given him, and will continue to give him, as much advice and assistance in setting up his office as he requests.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to announce the appointed day required by the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Waddington: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a similar question from my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) on 4 December 1984, at column 132.

Concessionary Television Licence Scheme

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if flats and bungalows built specifically for the elderly, and which are connected to a central alarm system for mobile wardens, are eligible for the 5p television licence scheme.

Mr. Giles Shaw: To qualify for the concessionary accommodation for residential care television licence elderly persons' dwellings must be provided specially for retired persons of pensionable age by a local authority under part V of the Housing Act 1957 or by a housing association and must have some communal accommodation or facility provided in association with them. A warden service can generally be accepted as a communal facility for qualifying purposes, but each application for the concessionary licence must be dealt with on its merits, taking account of all relevant factors. There is no precise definition of what constitutes a warden service for the purpose of the regulations governing entitlement to the concessionary licence, but to be acceptable a warden would be expected to make regular visits to the people under his or her care and to provide appropriate services in response to their needs. A warden service under which a mobile warden responded only to emergency calls from elderly residents over a central alarm system would not fulfil these criteria.

British Nationality (Falkland Islands) Act 1983

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people have acquired British citizenship as a result of the British Nationality (Falkland Islands) Act 1983; and what percentage of the total population of the Falkland Islands this represents;

(2) how many applications are still pending for British citizenship under the British Nationality (Falkland Islands) Act 1983.

Mr. Waddington: We have no record of the number of persons who acquired British citizenship automatically under section 1 of the Act. No application under section 2 of the Act for registration as a British citizen has been received.

Fire Service (London)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a further statement on the fire service in London after the proposed abolition of the Greater London council.

Mr. Brittan: There is no truth in the Greater London Council's assertion published in "The Londoner" for February 1985 that its abolition will result in large reductions in the numbers of firemen, appliances and stations in London. As I have repeatedly explained, under the law no reductions whatsoever may occur except with my consent and I remain committed to the maintenance of the nationally recommended minimum standards of fire cover. There can therefore be no question of arbitrary cuts arising from abolition or any other current Government initiative. Nor do I intend to approve any proposal to "break up" the London Fire Brigade.

This is just one example of the vast publicity campaign the GLC is running to frighten and mislead Londoners into supporting it. It is Londoners who are paying for this campaign. They will be better off when the GLC is abolished.

PRIME MINISTER

Tourism

Q10. Mr. Gregory asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement about Government support for the United Kingdom tourism industry.

The Prime Minister: We shall endeavour to maintain an adequate level of funding consistent with the aim of reducing public expenditure. The bulk of tourism investment must continue to be funded by the private sector which we hope will increasingly recognise the growth potential of tourism and leisure.

Solihull

Q14. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Solihull.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

European Community (Budgetary Discipline)

Q88. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the progress made by the European Economic Community in fulfilling the conditions on budgetary discipline which were agreed at the Fontainebleau summit as a precondition to any increase in resources.

The Prime Minister: The Council's conclusions on budget discipline first apply to decisions in 1985 affecting expenditure in 1986. In accordance with these conclusions, the Commission has made proposals on agricultural prices which it states are consistent with the financial guideline for agricultural spending in 1986 and Finance Ministers agreed yesterday to a new five-year limit for expenditure on agricultural structures.

Coal Industry

Q110. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the future of the coal mining industry.

The Prime Minister: This Government remain committed to securing a healthy future for the coal industry. It is now vital that the industry swiftly and safely returns to normal working and recovers from the damage of the past twelve months. An industry which provides a secure supply of coal at a competitive price should be able to take full advantage of existing market opportunities.

Engagements

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 March.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 March.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. After my duties in the House I shall be leaving to attend the funeral of the late President Chernenko.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Shrewsbury and Atcham (Grants)

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many applications his Department has received for new technology grants in the Shrewsbury and Atcham area;

(2) how many applications his Department has received for innovation grants from the Shrewsbury and Atcham area.

Mr. Trippier: Over the last 10 years, 29 applications for support have been received from the Shrewsbury and Atcham area. The details are as follows:

Type of Grant	Number of Applications	Number of Offers made	Assistance Offered £000
Innovation Grants
SFI general facility	25	22	3,701·0
New Technology Schemes
Microelectronics Application Project	2	2	27·4
Industrial Energy Thrift	2	2	434·9

Industry and Commerce (West Midlands)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance has been contributed by the central fund of the European Community towards the regeneration of industry and commerce in the West Midlands county in each year since 1973; and which sectors have chiefly benefited as a result.

Mr. Trippier: I assume that the hon. Lady is referring to assistance from the European regional development fund, for which my Department is responsible. ERDF grants are paid in respect of such projects only if they receive United Kingdom regional aid. Since no part of the West Midlands county became an assisted area until November 1984, there have as yet been no ERDF grants in respect of qualifying industrial projects in the county. Such grants are, of course, retained by the Government as a partial reimbursement of their own aid, as provided for in the ERDF regulation.

Prohibited Exports

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to publish the new list of prohibited exports to update the 1981 list of the Export Goods (Control) Order.

Mr. Fletcher: As my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade told the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) on 8 February, he expects to make a new Export of Goods (Control) Order later this month, which will come into force some weeks later.

COCOM Agreement

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has made to the United States Government in the past 12 months concerning that Government's monitoring of the COCOM agreement.

Mr. Fletcher: My Department is frequently in touch with the United States Administration on a wide range of issues concerning COCOM, including the enforcement of the embargo.

Market Entry Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies have received support under the market entry guarantee scheme in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: The figures are as follows:

Usage of the market entry guarantee scheme: 1979-84
Number of companies in receipt of financial support

Year	Number
1979	25
1980	17
1981	33
1982	28
1983	31
1984	46
Total	180

Notes:
(i) A further 14 companies which have entered into agreements for support have not yet claimed assistance.
(ii) The figures given are for the number of companies receiving support in their first year of entry to the scheme only.

Overseas Projects Fund

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies have received support from the overseas projects fund in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: The number of offers of support from the overseas projects fund in each financial year from 1979-80 is as follows:

	Number
1979-80	137
1980-81	118
1981-82	82
1982-83	107
1983-84	36
1984-85*	24

* First six months only.

In many cases a single offer represents support for a grouping of companies and firms; subcontractors and suppliers of those companies and firms do, in turn, also benefit from the support offered.

Fireworks (Injuries)

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the figures of injuries caused by fireworks in 1984.

Mr. Fletcher: According to reports from hospitals in England, Wales and Scotland, 778 people required treatment for injuries caused by fireworks during a four-week period in October and November 1984. The figures for 1984 and the preceding four years are as follows:

Information Technology

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will provide an estimate of the size of the United Kingdom market for microchips for each year from 1979 to 1984 indicating in each case what proportion of the market was met by domestic production.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1985, c. 23]: The size of the United Kingdom market for and production of integrated circuits over thelast six years is estimated to have been:

£ million

	United Kingdom Market	United Kingdom Production
1979	190	130
1980	230	160
1981	250	170
1982	320	210
1983	460	270
1984	650	390

The market for these products is characterised by a high level of international trade, and United Kingdom manufacturers export strongly. The proportion of the United Kingdom market met from United Kingdom production is around 25 per cent.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report all the Government financed schemes to aid the whole information technology industry since 1979-80, giving the amount spent in each scheme for each year from 1979-80 until 1984-85.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1985, c. 23]: The amounts spent by the Department of Trade and Industry within its support for innovation programme on schemes which aid the information technology industry over the six financial years from 1979-80 to 1984-85 (to date) are as follows:

SFI Scheme

UNESCO

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made, in the review of the United Kingdom's membership of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: We shall review our policy towards the end of 1985 after the next UNESCO general conference. If we were satisfied that substantial progress had by then been made in carrying through the reform programme set out in my letters of 2 April and 4 July 1984 and that of my right hon. and learned Friend of 5 December 1984 to the director general of UNESCO, we would be willing to reconsider our decision to withdraw.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the approximate cost of providing a unit of family housing in the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Raison: The main housing project since 1982 has been the provision of 54 prefabricated houses as part of the rehabilitation effort. The final cost of this project is not yet known and, in any case, would not be a reliable guide on which to estimate the costs of construction locally. I regret, therefore, that because of the lack of recent experience in local construction of domestic accommodation, the information which would enable such an estimate to be prepareda is not readily available.

Pre-investment Studies (Funding)

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any decision has been taken on the future of the scheme which uses aid programme funds to help finance pre-investment studies by British private sector businesses considering overseas investments.

Mr. Raison: It has been decided to discontinue this scheme—known as the pre-investment studies scheme—which we do not believe to be effective. It has been very little used in recent years. The Commonwealth Development Corporation continues to seek British private sector partners for its investment overseas and is a more effective instrument for using aid programme funds to help stimulate private sector investment in developing countries.

European Investment Bank (Loan Guarantees)

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the British guarantee on loans from the European Investment Bank provided under the Lomé conventions has ever been called.

Mr. Raison: Yes. The European Investment Bank made a loan from its own resources provided under the first Lomé convention to the Liberian Electricity Corporation. During 1984 the Liberian Electricity Corporation failed to repay two instalments of the loan totalling 706,772 ecu (about £444,000) and the Government of Liberia failed to meet the bank's call on its guarantee. The loan is also guaranteed by the member states of the Community. Her Majesty's Government therefore paid 157,474,33 ecu (approximately £99,000) to the bank in two instalments which was drawn from the accumulated British share of repayments by African, Caribbean and Pacific states on loans made from the European development fund, which are lodged in a special account at the European Investment Bank. We were informed on 27 February that the Liberian authorities have now paid the instalment originally due on 30 April 1984; the British share of this was 77,524,80 ecu (approximately £49,000), which is being refunded by the European Investment Bank. The bank, with support from the Community is continuing its efforts to obtain complete settlement from the Liberian authorities.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what distinction is made in the figures for the number of people in employment between full and part-time workers.

Mr. Alan Clark: Part-time workers are defined in the Department's employment estimates as those who normally work for not more than 30 hours a week excluding main meal breaks and overtime.

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment, further to his reply of 4 March, Official Report, column 360, why separate estimates of full-time and part-time males are not available.

Mr. Alan Clark: The censuses of employment separately identify full and part-time workers among male employees, but the quarterly series of estimates of employees in employment for non-census dates does not. The latest available census of employment results are for September 1981 and therefore could not be used in the reply of 4 March, which referred to changes between 1983 and 1984. The 1981 census identified 11,511,200 full-time and 718,100 part-time male employees employed in Great Britain.

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many appeals were made to industrial tribunals in each of the districts of Glasgow and Scotland as a whole in each of the last 10 years; what were the causes of complaint; and in how many cases the appeals were upheld.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number of applications registered by the industrial tribunals in Scotland since 1976 is as follows:

	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984

TOTAL	4,607	4,966	4,720	4,768	5,174	4,810	4,587	4,069	4,179

I regret that information on the number of applications made in each of the districts in Glasgow is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. Information on the causes of complaint is not available in the form requested for the years prior to 1976.

Figures on the number of complaints in all jurisdictions which were upheld by the industrial tribunals over the last 10 years are also not readily available. However, the number of unfair dismissal complaints upheld during the four years 1980 to 1983 is as follows:

	1980	1981	1982	1983
Number of cases heard by industrial tribunals	1,183	1,421	1,433	1,357
Complaints upheld	305	340	364	396

Football League

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received from the Football League concerning the implications of the level of pool betting duty for the extension of jobs under the youth training scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have received a letter from Mr. Jack Dunnett, the president of the Football League, supporting the case for a reduction in the level of pool betting duty.

The Football League is participating in the youth training scheme. I am most encouraged by its support during the second year of the scheme.

Area Manpower Boards

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what is the constitutional position of area manpower boards; and to what extent their constitutions or guides to practice permit co-opted members to vote;

(2) which area manpower boards have no members who are from ethnic minorities; and what is the proportion of ethnic minorities in the general population in the area they serve;

(3) how many members of area manpower boards are (a) black/other ethnic minority, (b) women and (c) young people under 25 years; and, in each case, how many are full members, co-opted members with voting rights, and co-opted members without voting rights; and what proportion these represent of total membership.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Dockyard Training Centres

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he has considered the role that Devonport and Rosyth dockyard training centres might play in the adult training strategy;

(2) what investigations are planned into the potential for alternative uses of dockyard training centres having regard to the skills training needs in their localities.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Training is currently provided at the dockyard training centres to meet the dockyards' own requirements for skilled labour. At present my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and I envisage no wider role for the dockyard training centres.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of skills training in the locality of Devonport and Rosyth is conducted by the dockyard training centres in these areas.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on the extent and manner in which local industry has benefited from the skills training of dockyard training centres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have no precise information on the extent and manner in which local industry has benefited from the training given at the dockyard centres. However, local employers no doubt benefit from the recruitment of former dockyard employees.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list his own and local employers' expressed estimates of employers' skills training needs in the Devonport and Rosyth areas.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall write to the hon. Member giving further information.

Redundancy Fund

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of the additional cost to employers of the reduction in the level of rebate from the redundancy fund from 41 per cent. to 35 per cent.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The reduction was included in the Chancellor's outline public expenditure plans announced on 12 November 1984. The estimated saving (that is the cost to employers) was £37 million in a full year.

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he has taken to publicise to employers the reduction to 35 per cent. in the level of rebate from the redundancy fund which comes into operation on 1 April.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend announced this reduction in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on 12 November 1984, at column 100. It has been reported in the business press. We have also corresponded with the CBI and other employers' bodies about the change. The order was debated in both Houses last month. A press notice will be issued when the new rate comes into effect on 1 April.

TRANSPORT

Local Government Reform

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the effects of the Government's proposals for local government reform on bus services in the metropolitan areas.

Mr. David Mitchell: Under the Local Government Bill the public transport responsibilities of the metropolitan county councils will be transferred to joint passenger transport authorities formed from elected representatives appointed by the constituent district councils. I have no doubt that bus services in those areas as elsewhere will benefit considerably from the removal of restrictions under the provisions of the Transport Bill now before the House.

Cyclists (Accident Statistics)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many users of bicycles have been either killed or injured on roads in each single year since 1979.

Mrs. Chalker: The figures are given in table 4 on page 53 of "Road Accidents Great Britain 1983", a copy of which is in the Library.

Motorways (Travel News Broadcasts)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what opportunity he is giving to British Broadcasting Corporation local radio to put up travel news signs similar to those erected for the Independent Broadcasting Authority on the M1.

Mrs. Chalker: Signs giving the wavelength of BBC Radio Sheffield have been erected on the northbound carriageways of the M1 and M18.

M1 (Signs)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much rent is charged to Radio Hallam for its advertising signs on the M1 north and south of Sheffield.

Mrs. Chalker: No rent is being charged for these signs whose purpose is to evaluate the role of the local radio station as a means of providing drivers with up-to-date travel information. The broadcasting authorities are, however, contributing to the costs of the experiments.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport why travel news and Radio Hallam signs are erected in immediate proximity to each other on the M1 with the same wavelengths; how many have been erected; and what is the cost of erection and maintenance.

Mrs. Chalker: The local radio signs on the M1 and M18 are part of an experiment to see how many drivers tune in to local stations for travel news and how useful they find the information.

The signs are erected in pairs to make it easier for drivers to absorb the information.

Eighteen Radio Hallam signs have been erected on the southbound carriageways of M1 and M18. The cost of their installation is estimated at £16,900. No costs are expected for the duration of the experiment.

In addition, 16 BBC Radio Sheffield signs have been erected on the northbound carriageways of M1 and M18 at a cost of £15,100.

Motorways (Advertising)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy on advertising hoardings on the motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: Advertisement hoardings are not permitted on motorways as they would be a distraction for drivers, and a potential road safety hazard.

Greenock Container Terminal

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the future of the container terminal at Greenock and the north Atlantic service which operates from there.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. These are matters respectively for the Clyde Port Authority, which operates the terminal, and the shipping company Hapag Lloyd, which operates the service.

Royal Train Fleet

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has approved proposals to refurbish the royal train fleet; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Most of the existing fleet is old and several vehicles contain asbestos. I have accordingly approved British Rail's proposal for a programme of modernisation. Eight vehicles will be converted from new or surplus rolling stock for use in the fleet and two new vehicles will be built from scratch. Four vehicles in the existing fleet will remain in service. The cost of about £7·5 million, spread over four years, will be met by a grant from my Department. The resulting royal train fleet will have a service life of at least 30 years.

Roads (Wiltshire)

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve the north-south traffic routes in Wiltshire.

Mr. Michael Spicer: There are two trunk roads running roughly north-south through Wiltshire. We have a number of planned improvements on them both and these are listed below.

On the A36 trunk road—
- Warminster bypass—main programme 1985-87.
- Heytesbury bypass—reserve list 1985-87.
- Codford bypass—resrve list 1985-87.
- Steeple Langford bypass—reserve list 1985-87.
- Stapleford-South Newton bypass—reserve list 1985-87.

On the A419 trunk road—
- Blunsdon-Cricklade dualling — main programme 1985-87.

A scheme for a bypass of Salisbury on the A36 trunk road was added to the trunk road programme last year.

Beyond these all other north-south routes are the responsibility of Wiltshire county council.

WALES

Cormorants

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of cormorants in Wales; and if their number is declining.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: 1,400 pairs. There has been no measurable change in recent years.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales in respect of paragraph 3(2) of Schedule 14 to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 (a) how many representations he has received asking for a direction to be given to a surveying authority to determine an application for a modification order, (b) how many directions he has issued, with, in each case, the number of weeks which elapsed between the receipt of the representation and the issuing of the direction, and the period allowed to the surveying authority to determine the application, (c) how many representations have resulted in a decision not to direct a surveying authority to determine an application, with, in each case, the number of weeks which elapsed between the receipt of the representation and the issuing of the decision and (d) how many representations are currently outstanding, with, in each case, the number of weeks which have elapsed since they were received by the Department.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: None.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales in respect of paragraph 4 of schedule 14 to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981: (a) how many notices of appeal against decisions of surveying authorities not to make definitive map modification orders he has received, (b) where a decision has been made on appeal, if he will state in each case the nature of the decision, the direction, if any, given to the surveying authority, the number of weeks which elapsed between the receipt of the appeal and the issuing of the decision, and (c) how many appeals are currently outstanding, with, in each case, the number of weeks which have elapsed since they were received by the Department.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Three notices of appeal have been received. They have been with my Department for 66 weeks, 19 weeks and nine weeks, respectively. In the first of these cases all the necessary background information was not received until January this year. In the other cases such information is outstanding. No decisions have been issued to date.

Clwyd (Map)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to complete the holding of inquiries into objections to the draft revised definitive map for Clwyd and the subsequent issue decisions.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: All nine inquiries have been held and final decisions have been issued in respect of one. Proposed decision letters have been issued in respect of six of the others and the remaining two are expected to issue during the summer. If hearings for persons who consider they may be adversely affected by the proposed decisions are required in every case, the process may not be completed until the latter half of 1986.

SCOTLAND

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements are in hand to ensure that his Department complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

Mr. Younger: Existing joint management and trade union machinery is being used in my Department to take forward the recommendations in the programme of action on such matters as promotion, training and part-time working.

Minister's Correspondence

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a copy of his reply to the letter from the secretary of the Electricity Consultative Council for the south of Scotland district dated 25 February 1985.

Mr. Younger: My Department replied on 11 March as follows:

"Thank you for your letter of 25 February conveying your Council's views on the Government's proposals for Nationalised Industries Legislation. I have noted the Council's views, and they will be taken into account in the Government's consideration of the results of the consultation exercise. You mentioned in particular the possibility of further proposals about the operation of Nationalised Industry Consumer Councils and, as you are aware, a further consultation document has now been issued on that subject."

Sentencing Policy (Statistics)

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) of all prisoners sentenced to the short sharp shock treatment, how many have subsequently been given other custodial sentences and how many have not;

(2) how many prisoners have undergone sentences involving the short sharp shock treatment by institution, year and length of sentence since its inception;

(3) how many prisoners sentenced to the short sharp shock treatment have previously been detained in other institutions by year and type of institution;

(4) how many prisoners have been sentenced to the short sharp shock treatment on more than one occasion by year and institution.

Mr. Ancram: The "short sharp shock treatment" is the colloquial phrase for the sentence of young offenders to detention in a detention centre, which was introduced by the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1949. The numbers of receptions to detention centres in Scotland since the first one opened in 1960 are as follows:

Year	Receptions
1960	175
1961	311
1962	317
1963	477
1964	613

1981	729
1982	862
1983	889
*1984	1,070

*January to August.

Under the terms of the 1949 Act, the term of detention during the years 1960-63 could not exceed three months. A breakdown of receptions by sentence length is available in the Scottish Home and Health Department's annual reports "Prisons in Scotland" published by HMSO for these years. Under the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1963—implemented on 1 November 1963—the sentence became a fixed term of three months. Since section 45 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980 was implemented on 15 November 1963 sentences may vary, generally between 28 days and four months. For the period January to August 1984 the breakdown was as follows:

Length	Number
Under 28 days	*8
28 days	15
30 days	103
1 month	13
30-60 days	15
60 days	188

60-90 days	3
90 days	23
3 months	549
90-120 days	2
120 days	5
4 months	108
Over 4 months	†2

*These would be additional warrants served on an inmate already subject to a detention centre sentence.

†This is possible under the terms of section 207(7) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975.

Information on the previous custodial sentences served by inmates received at detention centres is available in "Prisons in Scotland" until 1982. This information has not been published since 1982 as it is based on the recollection of inmates on admission. The relevant figures since 1982 are as follows:

Year	DC receptions	Previous sentence(s) in DC	Borstal	YOI
1983	889	62	45	117
1984*	1,070	286	177	290

DC—Detention Centre.
YOI—Young Offenders Institution.
* January to August.

Breakdowns of this and the other information by institution are not available except at disproportionate cost. There are no official figures available on how many inmates released from detention centres have subsequently been given other custodial sentences.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs in the public sector have been lost (a) in Scotland and (b) in the United Kingdom over the last 12 months as a result of the sale of Forestry Commission land.

Mr. John MacKay: The sale of land has not been a major factor in the reduction in the Forestry Commission's work force in recent years. Furthermore, no job losses in the last 12 months can be directly and solely attributed to such sales.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current total acreage of forest estates held throughout Great Britain by the Forestry Commission; and what is the estimated value of these estates.

Mr. John MacKay: The area of woodland managed by the Forestry Commission at 31 March 1984—the latest date for which figures are available—was 909,959 hectares, valued at £1,220 million.

Conservation

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures he is taking to ensure that sites of exceptional scenic or scientific interest that are on Forestry Commission land which has been sold or will be sold will be maintained.

Mr. John MacKay: When the Forestry Commission sells land which is covered by a statutory designation, such as a site of special scientific interest, the features of the land, including its trees, continue to enjoy the degree of protection afforded by such designation.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures he is taking to ensure public access to sites of exceptional scenic interest that are on Forestry Commission land which has been sold or is planned to be sold.

Mr. John MacKay: The extent to which the public visit a Forestry Commission site because of its scenic interest is taken into full account by the commission in selecting properties for sale. Public rights of way are not, of course, affected by a change of ownership. I am not aware of any site of exceptional scenic interest to which the public have been denied access following sale by the commission.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Charges

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the proposed water charges for unmeasured water supply for 1985-86 for each water authority in England and Wales, and the percentage increase this represents against the 1984-85 level of charges.

Mr. Macfarlane: Full details of the average increase in bills for water services provided by Water authorities in 1985-86 are not yet available. However, the following table compares the unmeasured water supply charges for 1984-85 with those for 1985-86.

Olympic Games

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which body should represent London in consultations about the possible holding of the Olympic Games there if Parliament agrees to the Government's proposals to abolish the Greater London council.

Mr. Macfarlane: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) on 25 February.

Education (Rate Expenditure)

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of rates set for the current year will be accounted for by expenditure on education.

Mr. Waldegrave: Local authorities in England have budgeted to spend £10·1 billion on education in 1984-85. This represents 47 per cent. of all local authority net current expenditure. Rate income (net of domestic rate relief grant and rate rebates for the year) is estimated to be £11·1 billion.

Tobacco Companies (Sponsorship)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the British Medical Association; if the sponsorship of sporting events by tobacco companies was discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: I last met the British Medical Association on 7 February. We discussed sports sponsorship by tobacco companies and the voluntary agreement between the industry and the Government which restricts it. I shall, of course, take the BMA's views into account in considering the voluntary agreement, which runs until at least 31 December 1985.

Nature Conservancy Council (Compensation Payments)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make available sufficient resources to meet the obligations of compensation payments paid by the Nature Conservancy Council under management agreements in sites of special scientific interest in relation to past and future agreements.

Mr. Waldegrave: The provision for the Nature Conservancy Council grant-in-aid for 1985-86 will be increased to £22·7 million, subject to the approval of Parliament. It is for the Nature Conservancy Council to decide how precisely to allocate the resources available to it, but adequate provision has been made for payments under management agreements. Requirements for future years will be considered in the light of the NCC's corporate plan.

Mortgage Defaults

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number of mortgage defaults in 1983 and the first half of 1984.

Sir George Young: On the basis of English local authorities' returns, it is estimated that during the financial year 1983-84 the authorities repossessed about 840 dwellings which had been mortgaged to them, and at the end of the year about 14,500 mortgagors were in arrears for six months or more, including 4,600 who had bought council houses. Corresponding estimates of building societies for 1983 and the first half of 1984 appear in the Building Societies Association publication "Mortgage Repayment Difficulties", which is available in the Library.

Information on county court action for mortgage possessions in England and Wales in 1983, is contained in table 11.10 of "Housing and Construction Statistics 1973-1983", which is also available in the Library.

Pool Betting Duty

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the Football League concerning the implications of the level of pool betting duty for expenditure on crowd safety improvements at football grounds.

Mr. Macfarlane: None, save that the president of the Football League has copied to me his letter to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in support of a reduction in pools betting duty, but that letter does not examine the implications for expenditure on crowd safety improvements at football grounds.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Free Prescriptions

4. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now take steps to ensure that all those in receipt of invalidity benefit qualify for free prescriptions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. Over 20 per cent. of invalidity benefit recipients are already automatically exempt; and all the remainder can seek exemption, for example, on low income grounds. Those who do not qualify can purchase prepayment certificates if they need frequent or regular prescriptions .

With over 72 per cent. of prescribed items going to those who are exempt and about 6 per cent. to holders of prepayment certificates, there is no need to add to the exempt categories.

Management Costs

12. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the steps his Department is taking to reduce management costs.

Mr. Fowler: Departmental running costs have been falling in real terms for several years. despite a substantial increase in work load, particularly in social security operations. In the Health Service, between 1980 and 1984, regional health authorities reduced percentage of their resources they spent on management by over 14 per cent.

Benefit (Study Courses)

14. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has for easing the rule whereby persons pursuing a course of study for more than 21 hours a week are ineligible for benefit.

Mr. Whitney: None.

Privatisation

16. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what current plans he has for privatising services controlled by his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are continuing to seek ways of extending competitive tendering in the Health Service and in our Department itself.

Funeral Costs

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consider changing the single payment regulations to allow payments to be made to offset funeral costs.

Mr. Whitney: We have no plans to amend the regulations which already provide for payments to be made to those receiving supplementary benefit for essential funeral expenses.

Limited List Prescribing

18. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details of the publicity campaign to advise doctors and their patients on the operation of the limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A leaflet is being prepared for issue to patients through general practitioners and pharmacists. We will be issuing a circular giving details of the implementation of the selected list to all doctors and pharmacists.

22. Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to announce the procedure and criteria for new drugs and existing drugs with new indications to be added to his limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: As soon as possible.

38. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to extend the limited list for prescribing to other categories of drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no present plans to do so.

44. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what reaction he has received so far from interested parties concerning his announcement of the limited National Health Service drugs list.

46. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement on the response from the medical profession to his revised limited list proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Most patients, doctors and pharmacists have welcomed the expansion of the number of drugs on the selected list which was announced on 21 February. The British Medical Association and the pharmaceutical industry, however, continue to oppose the selected list as a policy.

63. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further discussions he has had with the medical profession about arrangements to revise his proposed limited list of drugs, prescribable under the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have already announced that we intend to set up a professional committee to advise us on a continuing basis on the contents of the list. We hope to consult the medical and pharmaceutical professions about membership of this committee as soon as possible.

Elderly Persons

19. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he is proposing in relation to the inspection and registration of homes for the elderly.

Mr. John Patten: Regulations to improve and strengthen the powers of local authorities in carrying out their responsibilities for the registration and inspection of these homes were brought into force on 1 January 1985. The Department's social work service is carrying out a study which initially is designed to establish the cost to authorities of doing this work effectively.

29. Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning the withdrawal of local authority sponsorship from elderly people already living in residential accommodation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have received a few representations through the National Council for Voluntary Organisations and direct from organisations running homes. There is no legal obligation on local authorities to provide residential care for every person who needs it; in deciding priorities for available resources, they take account of other sources of funding, including supplementary benefit, available to those in need of such care. The desirability of sponsorship is a matter for the particular local authority to decide in an individual case.

48. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the increase in demand for personal social services by the increasing number of very old people.

Mr. John Patten: The Government have recognised that demographic changes nationally are placing pressures upon personal social services and have made allowance for this in the indicative expenditure figures for their service published in the 1985 public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428).

Portable Pensions

20. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to make a statement on his proposals for legislation to introduce personal portable pensions.

Mr. Newton: Our personal pensions proposals are being developed in the context of the social security review. We hope to announce proposals for change following the review in the course of the next few months.

Social Security Review

21. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many staff of his Department are currently engaged in the social security review.

Mr. Newton: Many staff in the Department are engaged, directly or indirectly, in the work of the review. No central record is kept of the total number who are involved.

45. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultations he has had with the private sector pensions and insurance industry as part of the review of social security.

Mr. Whitney: All the major representative bodies in the pensions and insurance industries were specifically invited to submit written evidence to the inquiry into provision for retirement. Most did so, as did many individual companies and people working in those industries. In addition, five representative bodies gave oral evidence at two public sessions each, and two individual companies each took part in one public session.

61. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the further progress of his social security review.

Mr. Whitney: We are currently considering our conclusions and will announce our proposals as soon as possible.

Griffiths Report

23. Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the implementation of the Griffiths report.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am pleased to report that health authorities are making good progress in making the changes envisaged in the Griffiths report, including the appointment of general managers.

Within our Department the health services supervisory board has been set up and the chairman of the NHS management board, Mr. Victor Paige, has recently been appointed. I am considering with Mr. Paige what further changes are required.

Ancillary Workers (Pay Claim)

24. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions are currently taking place on the National Health Service ancillary workers' pay claim.

Mr. John Patten: A pay claim on behalf of NHS ancillary staff for 1985-86 was submitted at a meeting of the ancillary staffs Whitley Council on 13 February and confirmed in writing on 27 February. The claim is now being considered by the management side of the Whitley Council.

Severe Disablement Allowance

25. Mrs. Roe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the introduction of severe disablement allowance will be completed.

Mr. Newton: The remaining age group will be brought into the new benefit from 28 November this year.

Mental Health Act Commission (Report)

26. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive the first annual report of the Mental Health Act Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The Mental Health Act Commission is required, by section 121(10) of the Mental Health Act 1983, to produce a report on its activities in the second year after its establishment and subsequently every second year. We expect to receive the first such report in August this year and we shall lay a copy before both Houses.

National Health Service Commissioner

27. Mrs. Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will seek to amend section 119 of the National Health Service Act 1977 so as to enable hon. Members who submit cases to the National Health Service Commissioner to be informed of the outcome of those cases.

Mr. John Patten: We will consider this when there is a suitable opportunity for legislation.

Resettlement Unit and Re-establishment Centre, Field Lane, Liverpool

28. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received respecting his intention to close the resettlement unit and re-establishment centre in Field lane, Liverpool; what his response has been; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We have received a number of representations concerning the future of Fazakerley resettlement unit and re-establishment centre that have expressed concern at the possibility of its closure. Our response has reflected my hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) on 5 February, at column 548.

Departmental Staffing, Leicester

30. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the ratio of his Department's staff to supplementary benefit claimants at the Lower Hill street, Leicester office of his Department in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively; and what it is now.

Mr. Whitney: The departmental local office complementing system—a guide to which is in the Library—provides for the determination of local office complements, that is, the number of staff required to deal with the estimated continuing work load, and their adjustment as work load levels change.

The average number of supplementary benefit claimants in April each year and the staff allocated to supplementary benefit work under the complementing system are as follows:

Year	Number of claimants	Staff
1979-80	8,547	69
1980-81	8,231	74
1981-82	8,546	79
1982-83	9,806	77
1983-84	11,180	74
1984-85	12,560	77

I must stress that direct comparisons between numbers of staff and claimants are misleading as work loads vary considerably by type and duration of claim and the action that has to be taken. All these factors vary over time as a result of legislative, policy and procedural changes. Examples of such changes are the introduction of postal claim forms for the unemployed and housing benefit.

Disablement Survey

31. Mr. Silvester asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when his survey on the extent of disablement will be completed.

Mr. Newton: The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys will carry out interviews in relation to disabled adults and children in the community from July to November this year, and in relation to disabled people in institutions next year. This is a very substantial research project and it is too early to say when first results will be available.

Patients (Nursing Care)

32. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will encourage regional health authorities to review their policy with respect to the long term use of hospital beds by patients whose predominant need is nursing care.

Mr. John Patten: Our aim is for patients whose predominant need is for nursing care to be looked after in small, homely units, close to their families and friends. This policy is well known to health authorities and many are developing innovative approaches to care away from a hospital setting. We ourselves have introduced the concept of nurse managed homes for such patients within the National Health Service and three experimental homes have been opened in the last two years.

NHS (Privatisation)

33. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the implementation of the privatisation plans within the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I assume the hon. Member is referring to competitive tendering for support services, and I refer him to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) on 26 February at columns 143-46.

Solihull (Hearing Centres)

34. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement regarding the availability of hearing centres within reasonable travelling distance of Solihull.

Mr. Newton: The availability of hearing aid centres is a matter for the regional health authority. I understand, however, that there are a number of such centres which are readily accessible to residents in Solihull.

Departmental Staff

35. Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Social Services by how much staffing levels in his Department's headquarters have declined since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: The number of staff employed in the headquarters unit of the Department was reduced by 19 per cent. between 1979 and 1984 from 6,675 on 1 April 1979 to 5,384 on 1 April 1984. This compares with an overall reduction of 14 per cent. in Civil Service manpower during the same period.

NHS (Management)

36. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many outsiders have been appointed to management positions in the National Health Service following the Griffiths recommendations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Of the 155 general managers so far appointed, 21 are from outside the National Health Service.

Surrogate Motherhood

37. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to outlaw surrogate motherhood.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke : I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend's statement to the House on 7 March at column 1188.

Supplementary Benefit (Board and Lodging)

39. Mr. John Townend asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what amount has been paid out in board and lodging benefits for the years 1979-80 to 1983-84; and what is the estimated expenditure for 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Whitney: Annual spending on supplementary benefit for people in all forms of board and lodging accommodation, based on the annual statistical inquiry showing the position at December of each year, is given in the table. 1983 figures are provisional. Estimates are not yet available for December 1985, although on the basis of present trends we have indicated there would be a further dramatic increase if no action were taken to curb expenditure.

	£ million
1979	62
1980	94
1981	138
1982	205
1983	372
1984*	570

* Estimate.

41. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from Scotland concerning proposed changes in his Department's board and lodgings allowances.

Mr. Whitney: A list of all those organisations and individuals who made represenations to the Social Security Advisory Committee about the proposals on board and lodging payments has been placed in the Library.

NHS Hospital Beds (Women)

40. Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many beds reserved for women are available in National Health Service hospitals run by women.

Mr. John Patten: The requested information is not available centrally.

Mentally Handicapped People

42. Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about his plans to improve social service provision for the mentally handicapped.

Mr. John Patten: Joint planning and collaboration between the statutory authorities is crucial for the improvement of mental handicap services. The overall aims are to develop co-ordinated health and social services in each locality, and to achieve a major shift from institutional care for mentally handicapped people to a range of community care.

We scrutinise health authorities' plans as to the extent to which local authorities have been involved in planning services and are involved in operations. District health authorities have been enabled to make continuing annual payments for as long as necessary to local authorities and voluntary organisations for people out of hospital moving into community care. Joint finance allocations, which will amount to about £100 million this year, are available to pump-prime social services and housing and education for mentally handicapped people among other vulnerable groups, and we shall spend £16 million up to March 1988 on our care in the community pilot projects, including some £7 million on 11 projects for mentally handicapped people.

The Department's plans for improving services include continuation of an extensive programme of research; the administration and assessment of projects approved under the children's initiative for getting mentally handicapped children out of hospital; grants to voluntary organisations; and encouragement of the development of joint in-service training of staff.

The national development team for mentally handicapped people will continue to advise health and local authorities, on request, on the implementation of mental handicap policies and its reports of visits after 1984 will be published.

Careful consideration is being given to the detailed recommendations of the recent report of the Social Services Committee* and we welcome its wholehearted endorsement of a policy of community care for mentally disordered people.

State Earnings-Related Pension

43. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest forecast for the cost of the state earnings-related pension scheme in 1990 and 2000.

Mr. Whitney: The latest estimate is that made by the Government Actuary in his 1982 quinquennial review. On the assumption that earnings and earnings limits increased at 8 per cent. a year from 1985-86 and that earnings-related pensions increased at 6 per cent. a year from the date of award, the cost of earnings-related additional component for retirement pensioners would be £479 million in 1990-91 and £1,787 million in 2000-01 at 1981-82 earnings levels.

(Source: National Insurance Fund Long Term Financial Estimates, HMSO 1982, Appendix H).

Pensioners (Canada)

47. Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress is being made on a reciprocal agreement with Canada to enable United Kingdom pensioners living there to benefit from uprating.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply on 28 February, at column 267, to my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn).

Rehabilitation Centres

49. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the criteria governing his decision to close rehabilitation centres.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to my hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) on 5 February at column 548.

NHS Administration (Savings)

50. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what annual revenue savings have been made as a result of the recent removal of one tier of National Health Service administration.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not have information in the precise form requested. But the management cost data we collect indicate that our policies reduced the cost of managing the National Health Service by some £64 million in 1982-83 and by some £85 million in 1983-84. A large part of this reduction can be attributed to the restructuring of the National Health Service in April 1982.

Retirement Pensioners

51. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many retirement pensioners in receipt of a pension were over 85 years of age at the latest available date.

Mr. Whitney: The latest available figures are for September 1983. At that time there were 641,000 retirement pensioners — including 26,000 non-contributory pensioners — aged 85 and over in Great Britain. These figures do not include pensioners wholly dependent on supplementary benefit.

Prescriptions

52. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will bring in measures to limit the quantity of drugs prescribed on each doctor's prescription.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We already advise doctors to prescribe drugs in adequate but not excessive quantities. There could be disadvantages in specifying a maximum quantity of drugs prescribable on each FP10 prescription form, since the quantity needed depends on the form of a patient's treatment. For example, patients on long-term therapy have very different requirements from those suffering from acute, short-term, conditions. However, this is a point we are very willing to discuss with the medical profession.

Ambulance Service (Newcastle upon Tyne)

53. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had with the hospital administration in the city of Newcastle upon Tyne regarding the reorganisation of the ambulance service.

Mr. John Patten: We have had no direct discussions with the Newcastle health authority. The Northern regional health authority consulted widely on its proposals and received comments from the Newcastle health authority and the Newcastle community health council. These comments were fully considered by the Regional health authority.

Hypothermia

54. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people have died from hypothermia in 1984 and 1985 to the latest available date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The provisional number of deaths registered between 1 January and 30 November 1984 with mention of hypothermia on the death certificate is 502. Information from death registrations is usually available some three to four months after the event.

Claimants (Information)

55. Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures his Department takes to ensure that information on claimants is treated confidentially.

Mr. Whitney: Staff are provided with instructions about disclosure of information and are reminded regularly of their obligations under the Official Secrets Act not to disclose official information to unauthorised persons.

Claims (Processing)

56. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will review the staffing at local offices of his Department in order to speed up the processing of clients' claims.

Mr. Whitney: The departmental local office complementing system — a guide to which is in the Library — provides for the determination of local office complements. The number of staff needed to do the work required is calculated and allocated on the basis of comprehensive and detailed statistical analyses and forecasts of the work load. One of the elements of the system is a quarterly review of staffing levels, designed to maintain the match between the number of staff and the work load.

Personal Social Services

57. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the effect of rate capping and penalties on personal social services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Only 10 high spending local authorities with responsibilities for personal social services have been designated for rates limitation in 1985-86. These authorities are all spending relatively more than other authorities providing a good standard of service, and they have scope for making the economies required of them without putting essential services at risk.

Abatement of block grant is applied only when authorities exceed the expenditure guidance set them. Many authorities have shown that it is possible to meet, or come very close to, that expenditure guidance while maintaining essential social services.

The controls are on total spending by each authority, and the authorities themselves will continue to decide relative priorities between their various services.

60. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has estimated the increase in demand for personal social services caused by increasing unemployment.

Mr. John Patten: It is for individual local authorities to make their own assessments of the demands for personal social services and to determine their priorities accordingly.

Rehabilitation (Psychiatric Patients)

58. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that adequate arrangements exist for handling the problems of neighbours during the rehabilitation of ex-patients of psychiatric institutions.

Mr. John Patten: The great majority of people discharged from mental illness hospitals return to their former homes and present no particular problems for their neighbours. The comparatively few who are discharged to a new life, and who may still be undergoing rehabilitation, need all the help and understanding they can get. If discharge is properly planned and carried out, problems with neighbours need not arise.

Where problems do arise we expect them to be settled as between citizens of equal rights. But our experience is that actual problems, as distinct from forebodings, are infrequent, and it should be remembered that people who have been in mental illness hospitals have a right to confidentiality.

Housing Benefit

59. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the domestic ratepayers receive housing benefit in the metropolitan areas of (a) Liverpool, (b) Sheffield, (c) Stockport and (d) Solihull.

Mr. Whitney: We estimate from authorities' subsidy returns that the proportion of domestic ratepayers currently receiving housing benefit in the areas requested is as follows:

(a) 50 per cent.
(b) 42 per cent.
(c) 28 per cent.
(d) 36 per cent.

Unemployment Benefits

62. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide his estimate of the total expenditure incurred by his Department in providing income and allowances for those under the age of 65 years who are dependent on state benefit because of unemployment.

Mr. Whitney: The total cost of unemployment benefit, supplementary benefit, rent rebates and allowances and rate rebates paid because the recipient was unemployed is estimated as £6·2 billion in 1984-85.

Donor Cards

64. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what increase there has been in the number of donor cards held by the public since the publicity campaign on organ transplantation launched in February 1984.

Mr. John Patten: During 1983 just under 2 million organ donor cards were issued by the Department's leaflets unit at Stanmore. During 1984 the number rose to 12·5 million, most of them issued after the launch of our campaign to increase public awareness of the benefits of transplantation and to promote the organ donor card scheme. It is impossible to estimate precisely how many of these cards have been signed and are now being carried by people willing to donate their organs.

Death Grant

65. Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, before he completes his review of the present death grant, he will cause a survey to be made of cost of funerals in various parts of the United Kingdom; and if he will publish his findings in the Official Report.

Mr. Whitney: No. The cost of a funeral varies widely for several reasons including the wishes of those responsible for the funeral. I understand that the National Association of Funeral Directors puts the cost of an average funeral, without a headstone, at £350 to £650.

NHS (Pay)

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement about health service workers' pay.

Mr. John Patten: Pay negotiations for staff groups not covered by review body recommendations are conducted in the National Health Service Whitley Councils. I understand that claims have recently been submitted on behalf of some of these groups, and are under consideration. Other claims are expected.

Limited List Prescribing

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service prescriptions were written in 1983 for preparations ranging from tablets to formula A10 to tablets to formula B100 as listed on pages 25 to 28 of his proposed list of drugs and other substances not to be available at the expense of the National Health Service from 1 April 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our one in 200 sample records no prescriptions for these preparations in 1983. However, they are all prescribable products falling within the therapeutic categories covered by the selected list. They have been included in the list of products not to be available at National Health Service expense from 1 April so that savings are not eroded by prescriptions for these products as replacements for others to be removed from NHS supply.

Surgical Wards (Manchester)

Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why surgical wards are closed at weekends in the north, central and south area health authorities of Manchester; and what is the impact on patients requiring treatment.

Mr. John Patten: Health authorities are responsible for the provision and management of health services locally. The hon. Member may therefore wish to contact the chairmen of the three district health authorities concerned for the information he seeks.

Statutory Sick Pay

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the powers of his Department to monitor and enforce the payment of statutory sick pay.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Department's inspectors monitor payment of statutory sick pay by visiting employers and inspecting the relevant records. Authority for such inspections is contained in section 19 of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982. The powers relating to the failure to pay statutory sick pay are contained in regulations 9 and 22 of the Statutory Sick Pay (General) Regulations 1982 and section 16 of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982.

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he has taken recently to ensure that payments of statutory sick pay are paid by employers.

Mr. Whitney: The Department's inspectors visit employers to establish that the statutory sick pay scheme is being operated correctly. Following introduction of the new scheme, in April 1983, the aim was to visit as many employers as possible to help with any initial difficulties. More recently the Department has concentrated on visiting employers who have requested help and those whom there is reason to believe are likely to have made mistakes in operating the scheme. Starting this month visits will also be made to a proportion of employers selected randomly.

Factor VIII

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications for product licences in respect of imported heat-treated factor VIII have been received by his Department; and how many were granted in 1984 and in 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Further to my reply on 20 February at columns 498-500, to my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), all the seven applications made since November 1984 for product licences under the Medicines Act for heat-treated factor VIII were granted earlier this year. All of these were for imported products.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if exactly similar tests are applied to imported factor VIII products as to Blood Products Laboratory products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Central Blood Laboratories Authority, which is a special health authority, ensures the safety and quality of products made at its blood products laboratory. Imported, commercially manufactured factor VIII is subject to the formal licensing arrangements under the Medicines Act 1968.

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library a copy of his Department's studies of the economics of self-sufficiency against the continued importation of factor VIII products.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) on 19 February at columns 446-47.

Haemophilia Society

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the possibility of additional core funding for the Haemophilia Society.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) on 7 March.

AIDS

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps have been taken to ensure adequate staffing at haemophilia treatment centres during the acquired immune deficiency syndrome crisis both in terms of treatment and counselling.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) on 19 February at column 446.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what resources he intends to allocate to scientists presently working on devising tests to screen blood for the purpose of detecting acquired immune deficiency syndrome symptoms.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are giving financial support to scientists working on the development of a British screening test. We are also providing funds for the evaluation of screening tests, as they become available, to assess which will be most suitable for the National Health Service.

Hospital Kitchens (Hygiene)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what assistance he intends to give to district and regional health authorities to enable them to upgrade hygiene standards in kitchens in National Health Service hospitals;

(2) what guidelines he intends to issue to staff of the National Health Service hospitals about the storage and preservation of fresh frozen foods in kitchens with a view to preventing further outbreaks of salmonella food poisoning.

Mr. John Patten: We have no reason to believe that the general standards of hygiene and food preparation in National Health Service hospitals are unsatisfactory. The Department has issued comprehensive guidance on the storage and preservation of fresh and frozen foods. We shall consider whether further action is required when the report of the inquiry into the outbreak of food poisoning at the Stanley Royd hospital, Wakefield, is received.

Benefits

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the increase in real terms in expenditure on social security benefits between 1978-79 and 1983-84 is the result of (a) increases in the number of recipients, (b) increases in the value of the benefits and (c) the introduction of new benefits.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 22 October 1984, at column 512, to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short.)

Kidney and Liver Transplants

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make an assessment of the latest convenient figures of the shortage of facilities for patients waiting for kidney and liver transplants.

Mr. John Patten: The only information available centrally on need for kidney and liver transplants is the number of patients registered with the United Kingdom transplant service. On 18 February, 2,626 patients were registered as waiting for kidney transplants and nine for liver transplants. The factor that has been limiting the expansion of kidney transplantation has only been the availability of donor kidneys, although that has increased significantly since our donor card campaign began in February 1984. In the nine months immediately following the campaign, 35 per cent. more kidneys were transplanted than in the same period in 1983.

Liver transplantation is a more recently established service and its designation as a supra regional service was announced in January. In 1985-86 £2·3 million will be set aside for this service, £884,000 of it additional central funds to enable the level of provision to be expanded. Forty-nine liver transplants were performed in 1984 and we expect the 1985 total to show a significant increase.

Disabled and Elderly Persons

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to which local authorities have established central control warden call and alarm systems for disabled and elderly people.

Mr. Newton: Alarm systems for elderly and disabled people may be provided by local social services or housing departments or privately. Information is not held centrally about their installation.

Non-ambulance Transport Services

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish his Department's assessment of the plans submitted by regional health authorities concerning non-ambulance transport services.

Mr. John Patten: The plans submitted by the regional health authorities are very detailed documents and it will take some time to carry out the assessment and decide on any further action which may be required.

Head Injuries

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information is available to him on (a) the number of people who receive hospital treatment for head injuries each year, (b) the number of people who need rehabilitation after head injuries each year and (c) the number of people who receive rehabilitation after head injuries each year.

Mr. John Patten: The estimated number of inpatients treated in National Health Service hospitals in England in 1982 for skull fractures and intracranial injuries was 128,230. Information is not available about how many of these patients needed or received rehabilitation after treatment during the acute phase.

Supplementary Benefit (Board and Lodging)

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the total weekly amount paid in board and lodgings allowances in the city of Portsmouth, during the month of January;

(2) how many people received board and lodgings allowances in the city of Portsmouth during January.

Mr. Whitney: Separate figures are not available for Portsmouth and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he proposes to extend the temporary regulations on payment for board and lodging; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We do not intend to extend the temporary regulations. We shall be laying further regulations shortly.

Severe Disablement Allowance

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance has been given to local Department of Health and Social Security's offices in Scotland on the payment of severe disablement allowance in relation to those registered as blind or partially sighted; and what representations he has had on this matter.

Mr. Newton: The guidance to our local offices in Scotland reflects the position that a claim for severe disablement allowance from a visually handicapped person who first became incapable of work after his 20th birthday, and who is not in receipt of a passport benefit, should be referred to the adjudicating medical authorities to determine the disablement question. Registration as a blind or partially sighted person with a local authority in Scotland is on a non-statutory basis and, unlike in England and Wales therefore, a person so registered cannot automatically be accepted as satisfying the 80 per cent. disablement condition. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security has recently replied to a letter on this matter from the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) on behalf of the Northern Counties Institute for the Blind.

NHS Vehicle Scheme

Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will allow drivers to buy cars which they have under the National Health Service vehicle scheme; what is the future of the scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Entry to the National Health Service vehicle scheme ceased with the introduction of the mobility allowance on 1 January 1976, and the number of drivers in the scheme has declined steadily. Some 1,000 still retain cars, but only about 650 are eligible to have them replaced when they wear out. All have the right to switch to the mobility allowance, without a medical examination or age conditions, as an alternative to a car. Where a car is given up by two people to whom it was issued on a shared basis, each is entitled to receive a mobility allowance.

The Department will shortly be inviting organisations representing disabled drivers to discuss proposals for arrangements, parallel to those already applying to the war pensioners' vehicle scheme, to enable drivers who choose to switch to the mobility allowance to buy their cars on favourable terms. It is envisaged that as part of these arrangements a date should be set after which drivers whose cars wear out will switch automatically to the mobility allowance.

The proposal will not affect drivers of departmental three-wheelers, but we shall welcome the organisations' views on whether such drivers should also be given the opportunity to buy cars released from the war pensioners' and National Health Service vehicle schemes.

Supplementary Pensions

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioners would cease to be entitled to supplementary pensions if (a) additional requirements for heating and (b) other additional requirements were abolished.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 16 November 1984; c. 386]: Provisional estimates indicate that if heating additions were abolished and no other compensating changes were made, about 300,000 supplementary pensioners would cease to be entitled to supplementary benefit. If other additional requirements were abolished and no other changes were made, somewhat under 50,000 would cease to be entitled to supplementary benefit.

Fluoride

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies Her Majesty's Government have made, or are aware of, as to the extent of ingestion of fluoride by the population as a result of eating food such as vegetables grown on land irrigated with fluoride-containing water or processed in water containing fluoride; what conclusions have been drawn;; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 26 Februray, c. 140]: There is a great deal of research which indicates that there is no significant increase in the uptake of fluoride by vegetables grown on land irrigated with fluoridated water. The studies are reviewed by Davison in "Proceedings of the International Fluoride Symposium", Utah 1982.

Studies of the fluoride content of processed foods and beverages prepared with water containing fluoride at a concentration of 1 mg/litre indicate that such products may contain up to 0·5mg/kg more fluoride than those prepared with water containing almost no fluoride—Marier and Rose, "Journal of Food Science," 31, 941-946; Auermann, Fluoride, 6 78-83; Bocker and Bruce Var Föda 33 198-261. This would be true whether this concentration of fluoride in the water was natually occurring or brought about by artificial addition of fluoride. In a study undertaken by the food science division of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, carbonated beverages made with non-fluoridated water had a mean fluoride concentration of 0·12 mg/kg, while carbonated beverages made with fluoridated water had a mean fluoride concentration of 0·41 mg/kg, a difference of 0·29 mg/kg —Sherlock, J. Roy—Society Health 1 34-36 (1984). Since processed foods and beverages are not the major part of the diet, the increase in ingestion of fluoride as a consequence of the use of fluoridated water in processing is small.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make fluoride tablets available on prescription to those persons who are medically advised that they should take fluoride as a prophylactic, in areas where fluoride is not present in the water supplies at a level of one milligram per litre; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 4 March, c. 419-20]: No. Studies have shown that it is in practice difficult for many parents to maintain the necessary daily regime of administration of fluoride tablets over the many years of tooth formation. We therefore do not consider that it would be cost effective to provide this particular form of supplementation for prophylaxis.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Turks and Caicos Islands

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government are taking following the arrest of the Prime Minister of the Turks and Caicos Islands and other members of the Administration in Miami on drugs charges; whether the Government had any warning that this was to happen; and if he will make a statement on the implications of this incident for the protection of British citizens of a British colony provided by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Renton: We have been in close touch with the Governor about the arrest of Mr. Saunders, the Chief Minister of the Turks and Caicos Islands, Mr. Missick, one of his Ministers, and Mr. Smith, an elected member of the islands' Legislative Council. Court proceedings could take some time and no doubt Mr. Saunders will be reconsidering his position as Chief Minister in view of the need for good government of the territory. The Governor is in close touch with other leading politicians in the territory about this.

The United States Drug Enforcement Administration authorities have been working in close co-operation with the Turks and Caicos Islands police force, which is responsible directly to the Governor, on the prevention of the illegal importation of narcotics into the United States mainland through the islands from South America. The decision to make the arrests was taken by the United States authorities and we were kept informed throughout.

Narcotics are a recognised area for international co-operation. This exists between officials responsible for policy on drug matters both in the context of the United Nations (United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse and Control), the multilateral Single Narcotics Convention (Cmnd. 7466) and generally. Also there is close co-operation on operational matters between law enforcement officers on a day-to-day basis; this is not confined to the United States.

Mr. Saunders and his colleagues are British Dependent Territories citizens and therefore are entitled to United Kingdom consular protection. A consular official attended the initial court hearings and has visited the detainees.

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implications for the Government of the Turks and Caicos Islands on the arrest of the Prime Minister and other members of the Administration in Miami on drugs charges.

Mr. Renton: The Government of the Turks and Caicos Islands are continuing under the Governor and the acting Chief Minister, Mr. Francis. There is no reason why this unfortunate episode should have any lasting effect on the good government of the islands.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what form of military and technical aid has been given during the last 12 months to the Government of Sri Lanka; what discussions have taken place with the Government of Sri Lanka on the question of military assistance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The military and related assistance we provide to Sri Lanka is confined to the provision of training in the United Kingdom for individual members of the Sri Lankan armed services and police on the same basis as for other Commonwealth and friendly countries. Details were given in my answers to the hon. Member on 7 February at columns 659-60, and those given to him by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement on 14 February at column 286. It is not the practice to reveal the contents of confidential discussions with other Governments. The Sri Lankan Government are well aware that we have no intention of becoming involved in their internal affairs.

El Salvador

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria will be used in the selection of El Salvadorean army officers for training in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Renton: I have nothing further to add to the reply I gave to the hon. Member on 11 March.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there have been further developments since the drafts of the new constitution for the Falkland Islands and the Falkland Islands Dependencies were placed in the Libraries of both Houses on 24 January.

Mr. Renton: When they approved the draft constitutions on 15-16 January the Falkland Islands Councillors made a number of comments on the texts. These have been the subject of further consultation. Revised drafts, reflecting the outcome of that consultation, were placed in the Libraries of both Houses on 11 March. The most significant amendments reflect the Government's decision, taken in the light of strong views expressed by the Councillors, to revert to the normal title of "Governor" of the Falkland Islands, in place of "Civil Commissioner."

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how many Pershing II and cruise missiles have been deployed in Western Europe since the cessation of the intermediate nuclear forces talks in Geneva, giving the number in each country;

(2) if he will give the current balance of intermediate nuclear forces in Europe.

Mr. Stanley: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to figure 11 "The Balance of Nuclear Forces" on page 43 of the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984 (Cmnd. 9227, Vol I). I also refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) on 27 November 1984 at column 416. This data will be revised in the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985.

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reductions in tactical nuclear weapons in Europe have been made by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the Warsaw pact.

Mr. Stanley: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to page 6, paragraph 123 of the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984 — (Cmnd. 9227, Vol. I).

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will estimate how many Soviet SS20 missiles are targeted against western European countries, giving the number targeted against each country;

(2) if he will estimate the current number of Soviet SS20 missiles deployed in eastern Europe and the rate of deployment since the cessation of the intermediate nuclear forces talks in Geneva.

Mr. Stanley: I have been asked to reply.

I cannot at present add to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on 13 November 1984 at columns 523-24.

The number of SS20 missile warheads facing west in November 1983 when the Soviet Union withdrew from the INF negotiations was 729. Since then the Soviet Union has started more than 10 new SS20 bases, facing both east and west. This is the largest number of SS20 bases begun in any one year since this missile was first deployed in 1977.

It is not possible to say how many SS20s are targeted against each individual Western European country, and in any case the targeting could be altered rapidly. The SS20s range enables it to cover targets throughout the European NATO area from bases inside the Soviet Union. There are no SS20s deployed outside the Soviet Union.

CIVIL SERVICE

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Civil Service what arangements are in hand to ensure that the Management and Personnel Office complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the Programme of Action on Women in the Civil Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: Existing joint management and trade union machinery is being used at departmental and national level to review such matters as promotion, selection for training and opportunities for part-time working. Women are being encouraged to attend courses —particularly developmental courses—and to make the maximum use of the training opportunities available, including the Civil Service college course in middle management for women only.

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Lord Privy Seal how many people are authorised to use the photo-copying machine in Upper Committee Corridor North; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: As the notice posted adjacent to the photo-copying machine states, the machine can be used only by hon. Members or by secretaries or research assistants acting on Members' behalf with their specific authorisation.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Horse Breeding and Racing

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action has been taken in connecton with the development of horse breeding and racing in Northern Ireland since the publication in May 1984 of the Department of Agriculture's consultation paper on the subject.

Dr. Boyson: Decisions on the options outlined in the consultation paper have been deferred pending completion of an economic study to provide more comprehensive data on the value of the equine industry. This study, which is being carried out by the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland in conjunction with the Queen's University of Belfast, is partly financed by the industry and by the Industrial Development Board; it is expected to take at least a year to complete.

Rape

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many incidences of rape were reported to the Royal Ulster Constabulary in each of the last five years; how many of these resulted in prosecution; and what was the outcome of these prosecutions.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows:

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Incidents of rape reported	48	48	58	52	75
Persons proceeded against (for rape)	13	10	12	14	16
Persons found guilty	12	8	9	13	14

Note: The figures in relation to the persons proceeded against and those found guilty do not relate directly to the reported incidents in each year. Such a correlation could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Transport Costs

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will investigate with leaders of business, commerce and the transport industry ways in which they may be able to overcome the high costs of transporting goods to and from Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Tourism

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures the Government are preparing to help the tourist industry in Northern Ireland, following the publication of the discussion paper on tourism prepared by the Northern Ireland Tourist Board and the Department of Economic Development.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Manufacturing Companies (Railway Sidings)

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to introduce a scheme akin to British Rail's Speedlink system, whereby manufacturing companies are encouraged to build a railway siding adjacent to their premises in conjunction with Northern Ireland railways; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give a breakdown of (a) the current complement of the Royal Ulster Constabulary as of 3 March 1985, in terms of stated religion and at the same date in 1984 and (b) the stated religion of Royal Ulster Constabulary casualties caused by direct terrorist attacks on individual Royal Ulster Constabulary personnel, during the period 4 March 1984 to 3 March 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 7 March 1985]: Figures are not available for 3 March 1984 and 3 March 1985, but the complement of the regular Royal Ulster Constabulary on 28 February 1984 was 8,000 and was 8,142 on 28 February 1985. I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 14 December 1984 at column 610, about the religious affiliations of members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

During the year ended 3 March 1985, terrorists killed 17 members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Royal Ulster Constabulary reserve. Four of those killed are understood to have been Roman Catholics. The circumstances in which three of these four policemen were murdered were such that it is unlikely that the terrorists would have been aware of their religious persuasion.

NATIONAL FINANCE

PAYE

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will identify the period of time during which Inland Revenue staff should undertake and complete annual assessing reviews of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers; and if he will estimate the proportion of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers to whom a repayment of tax is found to be due in the course of such work.

Mr. Moore: Inland Revenue staff begin an annual assessing review of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers as soon after 5 April as information regarding pay and tax becomes available from employers. The aim is to complete the review as soon as practicable and the bulk of the work is usually completed over the following few months. No records are maintained of repayments of tax arising specifically out of the review, but based on the latest available figures it is estimated that the proportion of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers to whom a repayment of tax is found to be due would not exceed one in twenty.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether Inland Revenue instructions provide for the records of all pay-as-you-earn taxpayers to be reviewed annually for assessment or non-assessment; and what categories of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers are excluded from this process.

Mr. Moore: Inland Revenue instructions provide for the records of all pay-as-you-earn taxpayers who were in employment at 5 April or in receipt of unemployment benefit or occupational pension at that date to be reviewed annually for assessment or non-assessment.

Taxpayers who ceased employment during the tax year without subsequently receiving either unemployment benefit or an occupational pension are normally excluded from this review: separate in-year procedures exist for the handling of final cessations of employment.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers for whom the last tax year will not have been assessed or otherwise cleared by Inland Revenue staff by 5 April; and if he will list, by Inland Revenue region, the number of pay-as-you-earn taxpayers not so assessed or cleared after 12 months in each of the last three years.

Mr. Moore: The Inland Revenue estimates that the number of pay-as-you-earn cases* which will not have been assessed or otherwise cleared for the year ended 5 April 1984 by 12 April 1985—when national figures are next collated—will be approximately 2·9 million (10 per cent. of the total).

The following table shows the comparative figures, by Inland Revenue region, for the three previous years:

Guardianship Allowances

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to the reply of 10 January, Official Report, column 528, concerning departmental expenditure on boarding school allowances, whether he will provide similar information on guardianship allowances for children who remain at day schools in the United Kingdom together with the amount of that allowance compared with the boarding school allowance.

Mr. Hayhoe: The numbers of children for whom a guardian allowance is payable and the costs of such payments to public funds in 1983-84 are as follows. Estimates have been made where precise details are not readily available.

	Number of Children	Cost (£ pa)
Armed Forces	222	83,000
Diplomatic Service	8	1,760
British Council	Nil	Nil
Overseas Development Administration	3	1,100
Ministry of Defence (Civilians)	11	4,070
Other Departments	10	3,680
Total	254	93,610

In addition, there were guardian allowance payments totalling £7,700 from the overseas aid programme for 21 children of British supplemented staff employed by overseas Governments and organisations.

The amounts of the guardian allowance and boarding school allowance and the circumstances in which they are paid may be found in the following documents which are available in the Library of the House. For members of the armed forces, the basic relevent information is set out in paragraph 2796 to 2799 of "Queen's Regulations for the Royal Air Force." For Home civil servants, the details are in paragraphs 7701 to 7734 of the Civil Service Pay and conditions of Service Code." For members of the Diplomatic Service, comparable payments are made under sections 31 and 35 of "Diplomatic Service Regulations" The Diplomatic Service boarding school allowance maxima are:

	Boys	Girls
Senior school	£4,266 pa	£4,096 pa
Junior school	£3,840 pa	£3,686 pa

The Diplomatic Service child elsewhere allowance—equivalent to guardian allowance—is £75 per annum for the first and £370 per annum for subsequent children.

Boarding School Allowances

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to the reply of 10 January, Official Report, column 528, concerning costs incurred by departments on boarding school allowances, whether he will give the number of children concerned in each case and any additional costs such as transportation home for school holidays.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information related to 1983-84 is as follows:

	Number of Children	Additional Costs £M (estimates)
Armed Forces	* 21,500	*
Diplomatic Service	1,375	1·2
British Council	238	0·2
Overseas Development Administration	315	0·6
Ministry of Defence (Civilians)	133	*
Other Departments	70	*

* In the case of armed forces personnel, Ministry of Defence civilians and the staff of some other Departments, seats are made available wherever possible on service flights for children to join their parents for school holidays. The cost of this facility is not separately identifiable.

The number of children of British supplemented staff employed by overseas Governments and organisations for whom boarding school allowances were paid from the overseas aid programme in 1983-84 was 750 and the additional costs were about £1·4 million.

Vermouth

Mr. Murphy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the consequences of the House of Lords judgment regarding taxation on vermouth.

Mr. Hayhoe: The House of Lords has not yet delivered its judgment in the case between Cinzano (UK) Limited and the Commissioners of Customs and Excise.

Indirect Taxes

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in real terms since 1978-79 in the amount of indirect taxation paid by individuals.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to table 2 of "The Next Ten Years: Public Expenditure and Taxation in the 1990s," Cmnd. 9189, published by HMSO in March 1984.

Customs Services (Belfast)

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will ensure that customs services at Belfast harbour are adequately staffed and that the processing of container traffic is completed as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Customs staffing at Belfast harbour is reviewed regularly to ensure that it is adequate to facilitate traffic while having due regard to the economic use of resources.

Nationalised Industries (Legislation)

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his reply of 11 February, Official Report, column 62, if he will place in the Library copies of comments received on his consultation paper on nationalised industries legislation.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Financial Management Initiative

Mr. Wainwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is done under the financial management initiative to ensure that line managers are fully informed of all the capital assets under their management; and what is the system of reporting on the condition of these assets.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 8 March 1985]: One of the key objectives of the financial management initiative is to give line managers better information about the costs of all of their resources, including the costs of capital assets, and how they are used. Departments are developing their management accounts and information systems to this end. These arrangements, and those for monitoring the condition of assets, may take various forms depending on the Department's functions and the nature of its assets.

Hot Take-away Food (VAT)

Mr. Waller asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimate of the tax revenue obtained from value added tax on hot take-away food.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1985]: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer on 12 November to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) at column 89.

Pool Betting Duty

Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the Football League for a reduction in pool betting duty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The president of the Football League has written to urge a reduction in pool betting duty. This representation will be carefully considered.

DEFENCE

Dockyard Training Centres

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Defence what security there is for new apprentices being taken on at the Rosyth and Devonport dockyard training centres that they will be able to complete their skills training.

Mr. Lee: Their security lies in the fact that past generations of MOD apprentices have all, subject to satisfactory individual performance, received a full course of training. New apprentices at Rosyth and Devonport dockyards will be similarly treated.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the quantities and types of skills training conducted by the training centres in the Devonport and Rosyth dockyards in the past five years.

Mr. Lee: In Devonport and Rosyth dockyards in the period 1979-80 to 1983-84 some 630,274 trainee days of apprentice training were given: 32,941 trainee days of vocational training; 17,695 trainee days of management training; and 3,283 trainee days of induction training. The skills covered by apprentice and vocational training were mainly electrical, mechanical and shipwright, with a lesser amount of training for other trades such as coppersmith, boilermaker, founder, plumber, joiner, sailmaker, pattern maker, blacksmith and welder.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many accidents, classified by severity and cost, there have been involving his Department's vehicles in each of the past five years.

Mr. Lee: Information on accidents is as follows. There is no system for clarifying severity as such.

Year	*Total No. of Road Traffic Accidents	RTA Rate†	Vehicle Repair cost‡ £M	Casualties
				Killed	Injured
1979-80	11,157	7·2	2·73	14	864
1980-81	10,475	7·4	2·945	21	850
1981-82	10,050	6·7	2·745	22	896
1982-83	10,524	6·4	3·425	20	885
1983-84	10,092	7·0	3·084	19	1,034

* Figures cover the RN/RM, Army, RAF but not the PE for which no centralised statistics were kept prior to the current financial year.
† Road Traffic Accident rate = number of accidents per 100,000 vehicle miles.
‡ Vehicle Repair Cost for Service vehicles only. It would be impossible to attribute third party or employee disability costs to individual accidents without dispoportionate effort.

Service Drivers

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the types of vehicle of heavy goods vehicle classification used by the armed forces and the number of qualified drivers needed each year both for these types of vehicle and for other purposes.

Mr. Lee: There are well in excess of 1,000 types of vehicles of heavy goods vehicle classification used by the armed forces. The number of qualified service drivers needed each year for these types and for other purposes is 16,874. There are in addition a number of other drivers trained in individual units for which no central records are kept.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to reach a decision on the future of driver training for the armed services.

Mr. Lee: We are currently engaged in a major review of driver training. It is too early to say when we will be in a position to make any decisions.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the minimum qualifications and experience necessary for driving instructors instructing heavy goods vehicle trainees in the armed services.

Mr. Lee: The armed services comply with the civilian law for driving instructors in that they must hold the appropriate licence. In addition, driving instructors usually have at least two years' experience in driving heavy goods vehicles and have passed an instructors' course or are deemed to be competent to instruct by their commanding officer.

Devonport and Rosyth Dockyards

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to reach a decision on the Devonport and Rosyth dockyards.

Mr. Lee: We wish to complete our present deliberations as soon as possible. There will be a period of consultation before a decision is taken on future arrangements for the royal dockyards.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 13 March 1985

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Clergy Marriages

Mr. Cormack asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what evidence the Church Commissioners have submitted to the House of Bishops' working party on the breakdown of clergy marriages.

Sir William van Straubenzee: Representatives of the commissioners have attended all the meetings of the working party and have offered information and advice as and when requested.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Council of Agriculture Ministers' meeting on 11 to 12 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend the Minister of State and I represented the United Kingdom.

There was a first exchange of views on the Commission's price proposals.

I emphasised the need for realism, restraint and effective administration and indicated that I would support the Commission in continuing to put the common agriculture policy on a sounder and more realistic footing.

I stressed the importance of consolidating the decisions taken by the Council last year, particularly in relation to milk quotas where the Council needs to ensure that those decisions are effectively implemented throughout the Community.

I also stressed that the guarantee thresholds which have been agreed for cereals and rape seed and other products should be implemented fully and pointed to the need to exercise restraint on Mediterranean products where costs of disposal are mounting rapidly.

While supporting the Commission's proposals on a price freeze for beef, I pointed out that it was certainly not the time to abolish the beef variable premium as its abolition would lead to extra costs to the Community budget.

I made clear my opposition to any measures on sheepmeat that might discriminate against the United Kingdom, but indicated willingness to discuss constructively changes in certain aspects of the regime.

I am glad to say that after a long period of negotiation and discussion decisions were reached on a package of measures under the guidance section of the agricultural fund.

The new Community system of investment aids will be simpler to administer, focus on the smaller farmer and take account of the market situation. Member states will be able to operate national systems of aid for farmers not eligible for improvement plans, but at lower rates of grant.

I am pleased that the support for less favoured areas, which is so important to our upland farmers, will remain essentially unchanged. In particular, there will be no limit per farm on the number of livestock qualifying for headage payments. In order to encourage diversification of farming businesses, increased levels of assistance will be available for investments for tourism and crafts purposes and we intend to make use of them. The regulations will also include a new provision for assisting the planting and improvement of farm woodlands. For young farmers, national Governments will be able to aid installation costs and also pay grant on improvement plans at 25 per cent. above the normal rate.

I was particularly gratified that the Council was able to agree a text on the basis of which member states would be permitted to introduce schemes to encourage, in environmentally sensitive areas, farming methods and practices which were beneficial to conservation.

This is an imaginative development which I have been urging on my colleagues for some time. At our request the Commission agreed to bring forward proposals before the end of this year for similar measures on a Community basis.

Assistance for marketing and processing projects has been renewed for a further five-year period. The Council also agreed that the Commission should bring forward urgently proposals for continuing aid for feedmills in Northern Ireland.

The Council agreed that all these measures could be accommodated with the total figure of 5·25 becu suggested by the ECOFIN Council. This represents a significant reduction on the Commission's original estimate of 8·3 becu, thus securing one of our major objectives in the negotiations. I made it clear that our agreement to this package was without prejudice to decisions that have yet to be taken on integrated Mediterranean programmes.

Finally, we raised again the problem of low price imports of semi-processed soft fruit from the Eastern bloc. The Commission agreed to pursue the question with the countries concerned.

Spain

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether Spain is in surplus or deficit production in milk, beef, sheepmeat and grain.

Mr. MacGregor: Information available for recent years indicates that Spain has been a net importer of some of the main dairy products but broadly self sufficient in others. Production of beef and, to a greater degree, grains has fallen short of domestic requirements. Production and consumption of sheepmeat as been broadly in balance.

Portugal

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether Portugal is in surplus or deficit in milk, beef, sheepmeat and grain.

Mr. MacGregor: Information available for recent years indicates that Portugal as been a net importer of the main milk products. There have been small net imports of beef but consumption and production of sheepmeat has been broadly in balance. There has been a substantial shortfall of grain production in relation to consumption.

Warble Fly

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of cattle infested with warble fly were notified to his Department in each year since the beginning of the warble fly eradication campaign.

Mrs. Fenner: Surveys show that infestation in cattle has dropped from over 30 per cent. in 1978, at the start of the campaign, to 0·01 per cent. in 1984. In 1982, when warble fly became notifiable, owners of 623 herds where disease was suspected were served notices to treat their cattle; in 1983 the figure was 518 and in 1984, 500.

Agricultural Holdings

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report his estimate of the contribution to agricultural production of each of the four categories of holding, by size of business, given in table 4 of the annual review White Paper, Cmnd. 9423.

Mr. MacGregor: Figures are available for England and Wales only, as set out below:

Percentage Contribution to Total Output
(Size of business based on standard man-day (smd) values)

	per cent.
On holdings under 250 smd	8·0
On holdings 250—499 smd	13·0
On holdings 500—999 smd	24·5
On holdings 1,000 smd and over	54·6
All holdings	*100

* allowing for rounding.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has concerning multiple holdings in agriculture; and if he will publish in the Official Report any information available on (i) multiple holdings in medium and large farms, (ii) the number of corporate enterprises, (iii) the number of holdings owned by corporate enterprises and (iv) the proportion of output represented by corporate enterprises.

Mr. MacGregor: This information is not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the percentage of the total area of crops and grass accounted for by holdings with 100 hectares or more of crops and grass in 1984, 1972, 1976 and 1960.

Mr. MacGregor: Information is not available for all the years quoted on holdings with 100 hectares or more of crops and grass for the United Kingdom. Figures are available, however, for holdings with 300 acres (about 120 hectares) or more of crops and grass in England and Wales. This is given in the table below, which shows the percentage of the total crops and grass accounted for by holdings of 300 acres or more of crops and grass.

Sugar Beet

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average sugar content of sugar beet in the United Kingdom in each of the years 1980 to 1984; and what was the corresponding European Economic Community figure.

Mr. MacGregor: The average sugar content of sugar beet in the United Kingdom for the years requested is as follows. The corresponding figures for the European Community are not available.

Year	Average Sugar Content per cent.
1980-81	16·96
1981-82	16·49

European Community (Exports)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report figures for exports of surplus European Economic Community commodities to third countries in 1983 and to the latest possible date in 1984 on the same basis as in the answer of 20 December 1983, Official Report, columns 162-64.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is provided in the following tables:

Hill Farmers

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his reply of 19 December, Official Report, column 200, concerning support to hill farmers, and so on whether the figure of 70 per cent. includes the cost of deficiency payments on sheepmeat; and what is the percentage contribution of these payments in both cases.

Mr. MacGregor: Variable premium payments are generally consolidated within the price received by farmers for fat lambs sold on a deadweight basis but for lambs sold on a liveweight basis through auctions variable premiums are paid direct to the farmers. For the farm management survey in England direct receipts of these premiums are conbined with all revenue from sales of fat lambs, including any consolidated premiums, to give a total revenue figure. It is therefore not possible to distinguish the proportion of net farm income accounted for by variable premiums, either in isolation or in combination with other grants and subsidies. The percentage figures given in the reply of 19 December 1984 at column 200 therefore do not include variable premium payments.

Dried Peas and Beans

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing how much was spent by the EEC on providing support in 1984 for dried peas and beans together with particulars of the expenditure; how much was for human and how much for other consumption; what percentage of the ex-farm price was accounted for by the subsidy directly or indirectly; and if he will provide corresponding figures for the past five years.

Mr. MacGregor: The information available for peas and beans is as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984*
Gross EC expenditure (MECU)	15	27	31	41	85	139
Rate of aid range during the marketing year as percentage of the minimum producer price
(a) Animal feed	27-40	24-45	28-38	39-44	25-44	†44-48
(b) Human consumption‡				22	19-32	†19-28

Note:
Separate information for animal feed and human consumption aid expenditure is not available.
* Provisional.
† 1984-85 marketing year to date.
‡ This scheme was introduced in 1982.

Sheepmeat

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the differences between the support price and the market price for sheepmeat in 1983-84, 1984-85 to date and in 1969.

Mr. MacGregor: The following table gives the information requested. However, the mechanisms of the fat sheep guarantee scheme which applied in 1969 differed from those of the Community sheepmeat regime which replaced it in 1980.

	1969-70	1983-84	1984-85
Fat Sheep Guarantee Scheme
Guaranteed price £/100kg	40·04
Community Sheepmeat Regime
Basic price £/100kg		257·40	264·81
Average guide price £/100kg		227·30	225·09
Market Price
Annual Average Market Price p/kg	38·94	147·90	*165·23

* Due to the seasonality of market prices, this figure based on the marketing year to date is not comparable with other figures in the table.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the allowances of all kinds paid for rearing hill sheep have exceeded the difference between the market price and the guaranteed price of sheepmeat derived from an average hill sheep.

Mr. MacGregor: I regret that the analysis requested is not possible because the guaranteed price for sheepmeat relates to the price of finished slaughter lambs of certifiable quality, whereas most hill sheep are sold as stores or for breeding or as cull ewes.

Horticultural Land

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the distribution of horticultural land by broad sub-division of product in 1955, 1965, 1970, 1979 and at the latest available date.

Mr. MacGregor: The information is as follows:

	Hectares
	1955	1965	1970	1979	1984
Vegetables grown in the open	177,600	142,100	198,400	193,600	139,600
Orchard fruit	102,800	78,400	63,200	46,300	37,100
Small fruit	16,600	15,000	13,000	13,800	12,900
Hardy nursery stock, bulbs and flowers	10,900	13,300	14,300	11,600	11,400
Area under glass or plastic covered structures	1,800	2,000	1,800	2,100	2,100

Agricultural Investment

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what grants are payable for investment in agriculture; and how much grant-aided investment has taken place in each of the past five years.

Mrs. Fenner: A wide range of investments may be grant-aided under various schemes, not all of which apply throughout the United Kingdom. The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Drainage

Mr. Freeman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he plans to reduce land drainage grants below the present 15 per cent. level.

Mrs. Fenner: We have no such plans.

TRANSPORT

British Rail (Investment)

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss long term investment plans.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of British Rail regularly to discuss matters of mutual interest, including investment. We are next due to meet him on 2 April.

"Marine Pilotage"

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received in response to the consultative document, "Marine Pilotage"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Over 300 organisations and individuals have commented on the consultative document. The proposal to transfer pilotage responsibilities to the ports has been welcomed by almost all parties except the pilots. The latter have expressed concern about various matters, including naturally the terms of compensation for pilots who would be made surplus and the basis on which those who would remain would be employed.

I shall consider very carefully all the comments which have been made before deciding how to carry matters forward and what proposals to bring before Parliament.

Airports

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement regarding the likely future administrative arrangements for those airports currently operated by the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Local Government Bill provides that metropolitan county council interests in airports will pass to the constituent districts or, failing agreement between the districts, to the appropriate passenger transport authority. The administrative arrangements for these airports will then be a matter for their owners, including those districts or counties already having an interest in these airports. The Government are also considering whether legislation should be brought forward to require that the larger local authority airports should be run through plcs.

Buses

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has recently received from pensioners and pensioner organisations regarding the privatisation of buses.

Mr. David Mitchell: Since the publication of the Transport Bill we have received a number of representations from pensioners and their organisations, many of them worried by the mistaken belief that the bus legislation takes away concessionary fares for the elderly. We have explained that this is untrue. Similarly I explained this to a delegation of pensioners I met in Birmingham.

A303 (Road Schemes)

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to speed up progress on road schemes along the A303.

Mr. Michael Spicer [pursuant to the reply, 22 February 1985, c. 630]: There are in all eight schemes in the White Paper "Policy for Roads in England: 1983" main trunk road programme and reserve list. On one of these schemes, Andover to Thruxton, construction work began in April last year. The other seven schemes are progressing on target for work to start in the periods indicated in the White Paper. It is not practicable to advance these start dates which take into account the time required to carry out the statutory and other procedures.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the latest figures for the number of employees in employment and the number of self-employed, respectively; on what basis these figures are calculated; and what were the comparable figures five years ago.

Mr. Alan Clark: In September 1984, the latest date for which figures are available, it was estimated that there were 20,780,000 employeees in employment and 2,465,000 self-employed persons. The corresponding figures for September 1979 were 22,728,000 and 1,869,000, respectively.

These estimates are based on data from the census of employment, sample surveys of employers, the census of population, and the labour force survey. The use of these data sources was described in an article on page 319 of the July 1984 edition of Employment Gazette, a copy of which is in the Library. The edition of Employment Gazette to be published on 28 March will include an updated article describing the use made of revised and 1984 results now available from the labour force survey.

Unionised Labour

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of (a) male manual workers and (b) male non-manual workers is unionised.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The available information on trade union membership does not distinguish between manual and non-manual workers. (See analyses in the January 1985 issue of Employment Gazette, pages 28-30).

Growth Rate

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment how the growth rate of population in Britain of working age compares with that of other Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development countries.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is given for major Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries in the following table, for the population aged 15-64 over the most recent available common period.

Population aged 15-64 average annual rate of growth (per cent.), 1979-80

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what arrangements are in hand to ensure that his Department complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984, the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A Departmental joint management and trade union review group was set up in 1983 specifically to review policy on matters concerning the employment of women in the Department of Employment group, and will shortly be considering proposals to extend monitoring. New guidance has been issued to help managers avoid discrimination in recruitment and promotion, to encourage more opportunities for part-time work and to provide preferential reinstatement terms for staff who resign for domestic reasons. All staff are encouraged to attend developmental courses and to make the maximum use of the training opportunities available: use is being made of the Civil Service college course in middle management for women.

Community Programme

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment what number and percentage of people currently on the community programme have refused training.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No information on this is collected.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Employment how the cost per person per week of the community programme compares with the cost of the community enterprise programme at constant prices.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to her on 7 March 1985 at columns 589-90.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on discussions between Ministers in his Department and the chairman of the Equal Opportunities Commission concerning changes in the eligibility criteria for the community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on 18 December 1984 at column 106. I subsequently wrote to Baroness Platt on 15 January.

Humberside

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Employment which are the 10 largest employers in the county of Humberside; and how many persons are employed by these employers on the youth training programme, community programme and young workers' scheme, respectively.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Department's employment statistics are collected under the Statistics of Trade Act (1947) which specifically prohibits disclosure of any details of individual firms.

Available information which relates to the largest 10 employers in the county of Humberside at the time of the 1981 census is set out below:

	Number
Numbers in training on the Youth Training Scheme at 11.3.85	458
Numbers supported under the Community Programme at 31.1.85	720
Number currently supported under the Young Workers Scheme at 11.3.85	0

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people are employed on the youth training scheme and young workers' scheme by Humberside county council.

Mr. Peter Morrison: 32 young people (some of whom may have employee status) are currently in training on a mode A youth training scheme with Humberside county council. In addition, the Council has 1,319 young people in training on college-based mode B2 provision and 75 youngsters in training on a mode B1 training workshop.

Local authorities are not eligible for support under the young workers scheme.

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many long-term unemployed people are employed on the community programme by Humberside county council.

Mr. Peter Morrison: On 31 January 1985, the latest date for which figures are available, 132 long term unemployed people were employed by Humberside county council on community programme projects.

ENVIRONMENT

Heating Charges

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to issue regulations giving public sector tenants the right to information about their heating charges as provided for in section 29 of the Housing and Building Control Act 1984.

Sir George Young: Within the next 12 months.

Liverpool

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to sanction the use of commissioners in the administration of the city of Liverpool's affairs.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have no powers to appoint commissioners.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) why he overruled the recommendation of his inspector following a public inquiry into the Clayton square and Cases street development in Liverpool.

(2) what criteria he used in arriving at his Cases street and Clayton square development decision in Liverpool.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I would refer the hon. Member to my decision letter.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied that the issues involved in the Cases street and Clayton square development were fully examined in the public inquiry.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Yes.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the sums of money already spent by George Wimpy and Co. on the proposed development of Cases street and Clayton square in Liverpool, were taken into account in his decision to allow the development to proceed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The sums of money in question were not a material consideration in my decision.

Public Inquiries

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many public inquiries have been held since May 1979; how many have taken place since he became Secretary of State; how many recommendations of inspectors have been upheld by him or his predecessors; and how many he has rejected.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Figures for inquiries on appeals made under section 36 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 are given in the following table. Details of other inquiries held by my predecessors and myself are not readily available.

	(a) All section 36 inquiries decided	(b) Secretary of State section 36 inquiries decided	(c) Section 36 inquiries where inspector's report not upheld
1979	*2,599	861	17
1980	2,786	845	15
1981	2,913	919	34
1982	2,723	596	20
1983	†2,257	370	13
1984	1,551	253	16

* 1,578 of these inquiries were held in May-December 1979.
† 1,184 of these inquiries were held in June-December 1983.
Analyses within years are not readily available for figures in columns (b) and (c).

Sabarr Collective, Brixton

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when and in what circumstances inner city partnership funds ceased to be paid to Sabarr collective, Brixton; and what lessons have been learned from the project.

Sir George Young: Payment of urban programme grant to the Sabarr collective was suspended by Lambeth council from January 1984 because of accounting difficulties which I understand have still to be resolved.

The course of this project demonstrates the need for effective financial management of individual urban programme projects.

Rates Act 1984

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes announcing further designations under the Rates Act 1984 in respect of 1986-87.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have yet to consider designations for 1986-87.

Rent Acts

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he now expects to bring forward proposals for reforming the Rent Acts.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friend is examining the legislation relating to the private rented sector. This is a complex subject which requires careful consideration. The review will be completed as soon as possible.

Empty Properties (London)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last discussed with the London Boroughs Association the number of empty council properties in the Greater London council area.

Sir George Young: The London Boroughs Association was represented at the meeting of the Housing consultative Council on 30 November 1984 at which my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction discussed the Department's report of its meetings with 30 local authorities, 13 of them in London, about their empty dwellings. The Department is now consulting the association about our draft circular on local authority empty dwellings.

High Rise Blocks

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the number of children living above the second floor in high rise blocks.

Sir George Young: Between 130,000 and 170,000 children are estimated to have been living above the second floor in England in 1982. Separate figures for high rise blocks are not available.

Greater London Enterprise Board

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will meet directors of the Greater London Enterprise Board to discuss the levels of investment it will be able to make in job creation and job preservation projects within the grant limits totalling £4·9 million which he recently approved.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government met representatives of the Greater London council and the Greater London Enterprise Board last month to discuss the council's proposals for providing funding for the board under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972. It is understood that the sum of £4·896 million approved by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the purposes of section 7 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984 following that meeting will enable the board to discharge contractual liabilities arising throughout 1985-86, to meet its staffing and overheads costs in the first quarter of the year, and otherwise provide finance for a measure of continuity for such other investment activities as the board wishes to undertake.

In considering any applications for consent to further expenditure under section 137 by the GLC for funding of the Greater London Enterprise Board in 1985-86 my right hon. Friend will wish to take into account, inter alia, the extent to which the liabilities of the GLC will survive abolition of the council and also whether adequate arrangements exist for ensuring, after abolition of the GLC, that the board will be accountable to ratepayers for the application of funds provided by the council.

Children's Play Facilities

Mr. Garrett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the provision of facilities for children's play out of school.

Mr. Macfarlane: Out of school facilities are essentially a matter for local decision and provision by local authorities and the voluntary sector. The Government provide grant support, both through the urban programme and to the National Out of School Alliance (which in 1984-85 received £47,000 towards its development of community schemes). Additionally, we are funding Play Board the voluntary agency recently established to promote opportunities for children's play.

Nature Conservancy Council

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the maximum, minimum, average and weighted mean levels per acre of compensation paid by the Nature Conservancy Council under management agreements in sites of special scientific interest, signed in the last three years for which figures are available, for both upland and lowland sites.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is not readily available in the form requested. However, since the enactment of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, 130 management agreements have been entered into by the Nature Conservancy Council. Payments under these range from agreements concluded at negligible cost to £219 per acre at the upper end. The average payment is around £12 per acre.

Council House Sales

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many purchasers of former council houses under the right-to-buy legislation have applied to sell their home back to the local authority; and on how many others the local authority is taking action to repossess.

Sir George Young: In 1983-84 local authorities repossessed about 840 properties mortgaged to them. This figure represented 0·13 per cent. of outstanding loans on former council and private dwellings. Local authorities do not need my right hon. Friend's consent to repurchase dwellings mortgaged to them if the borrower is in default, and the number of such purchases is not known.

Football Matches (Spectator Violence)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress of his consultations with the relevant parties following the publication of the interdepartmental working group's report in football spectator violence.

Mr. Macfarlane: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson), on 21 January 1985, at column 263. I have not yet received the written responses of all the 17 organisations consulted. When these have been submitted and properly considered, the Government will make a further statement.

Planning Applications

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many planning applications have been submitted to him on appeal, or called in by him for determination, in each designated green belt area, respectively, in the last year for which figures are available; and how many were upheld;

(2) how many planning applications have been submitted to him on appeal, or called in by him for determination, relating to land in the designated green belts in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively; and how many were upheld.

Mr. Macfarlane: The information is not yet available in the form requested. The number of planning appeals in designated green belts recorded as having been decided by inspectors since 1981 is as follows:

	Appeals Decided	Number Upheld (per cent.)
1981	857	206 (24)
1982	722	127 (18)
1983	472	113 (24)
1984	588	126 (21)

Listed Buildings

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many buildings were newly listed in the latest 12-month period for which figures are available;

(2) how many listed buildings were demolished in the latest 12-month period for which figures are available;

(3) what is the total number of listed buildings currently in each grade, respectively.

Mr. Macfarlane: The numbers of listed buildings and their grading at 31 December 1983 and at 31 December 1984 (the latest date for which figures are available) are as follows:

Grade	31 December 1983	31 December 1984
I	5,517	5,625
II	303,340	332,454
TOTAL	308,857	338,079

* Grade II* buildings are not separately identified in these figures, but included in the numbers given for grade II buildings.

The increase in the total number of listed buildings between 31 December 1983 and 31 December 1984 was thus 29,222.

In the 12-month period to 31 December 1984, consent was given for the total or partial demolition of the following numbers of listed buildings:

Grade	Total demolition	Partial demolition
I	nil	94
II	3	155
II	185	1,836
TOTAL	188	2,085

Green Belt

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the approximate area of each designated and confirmed green belt area in England.

Mr. Macfarlane: The latest available information was supplied to the Select Committee on the Environment for its report on "Green Belt and Land for Housing". The broad areas of green belt approved in structure plans are as follows:

	Acres (approximate)
Metropolitan Green Belt	1,200,000
Burton-Swadlincote Green Belt	2,000
West Midlands Green Belt	650,000
Greater Manchester, Central Lancashire, Merseyside/ Wirral Green Belts	750,000
Northumberland and Tyne and Wear Green Belts	200,000
Nottinghamshire/Derby Green Belt	200,000
York Green Belt	50,000
South and West Yorkshire Green Belt	800,000
Oxford Green Belt	100,000
Gloucester/Cheltenham Green Belt	20,000
Stoke on Trent Green Belt	125,000
Cambridge Green Belt	26,550
South West Hampshire/South East Dorset Green Belt	220,000

Since the Committee reported, an alteration to Hertfordshire structure plan has been approved including a small extension to green belt to the east of Luton. The structure plan for Avon, which includes a proposal for a green belt of approximately 150,000 acres, is still being considered.

Local Authority Expenditure

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will specify for local authorities in England the totals for each service block and for non-prescribed expenditure for each year since 1981-82 as follows: (a) gross capital spending, (b) total capital receipts, (c) net capital spending, (d) the cash limit and (e) the sum of allocations to individual authorities, differentiating where necessary between the Greater London council and other local authorities.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The following table gives the information requested for capital expenditure against the DOE/LA1 cash limit.

* Including the capital value of leased assets.

† In 1981-82, 1982-83, and 1983-84 urban programme provision and allocations are included in the other services block but expenditure is included under the relevant service blocks. The urban programme allocations in the three years were £83 million, £174 million and £179 million respectively.

‡ The figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86 exclude local authority capital expenditure on urban programme and derelict land, which is now included in the DOE UA1 cash limit and for which provision in 1984-85 and 1985-86 is £296 million and £279 million respectively.

Allocations in 1985-86 will be increased by 5 per cent. across all service blocks for authorities complying with my request for restraint in 1984-85.

The Government do not collect complete information on non-prescribed expenditure. The above figures include some non-prescribed expenditure, but it is not possible to identify this separately by service block.

Rent Arrears

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of local authority rent arrears; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: Figures collected by my Department indicate that on 31 March 1984 gross rent arrears due to local authorities in England and Wales totalled £188 million, of which £47 million were arrears of former tenants. The total represented 5·4 per cent. of the rent collectable and compares with arrears of £176 million or 5 per cent. of the rent collectable a year earlier.

Although the increase was less than in previous years, rent arrears remain far too high, particularly in London and in metropolitan areas.

Tenants who fail to pay their rent promptly place a heavy and unnecessary burden on other members of the community.

My Department and the Audit Commission have issued comprehensive advice on good management practice to reduce rent arrears. Landlords should study and take heed of that advice.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Coal Industry

Mr. John Morris asked the Attorney-General whether, in view of the rate of acquittal for less serious offences which were alleged to have taken place in the course of the mining dispute, he will ask the Director of Public Prosecutions to consult and advise chief constables as regards the handling of the less serious offences still to be determined.

The Attorney-General: It is not the practice of the Director of Public Prosecutions to give to chief constables policy advice of the nature suggested.

Admiral of the Fleet, Lord Lewin

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General if he is now in a position to state whether it is proposed to prosecute Admiral of the Fleet, Lord Lewin, for offences under the Official Secrets Act.

The Attorney-General: I have received a report from the Director of Public Prosecutions in the light of investigations made by the Metropolitan police. No evidence has been forthcoming that Lord Lewin has committed any offence and I therefore propose to take no further action in this matter.

Northern Ireland (Supergrass Evidence)

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Attorney-General how many people charged with offences on the evidence of converted terrorists have had the charges withdrawn as a result of the evidence being withdrawn.

The Attorney-General [pursuant to his reply, 5 March 1985, c. 442]: The information is as follows: 143 since 1980.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Aerospace

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met British Aerospace representatives to discuss the future of the company.

Mr. Pattie [pursuant to his reply, 27 February 1985, c. 322]: I most recently met the chairman of BAe last week and I am now in a position to make a statement about progress on the proposed sale of the Government shareholding in the company.

I announced on 15 January that, subject to the approval, as necessary, of the company's shareholders, it is intended that the offer for sale should take the form of a simultaneous offering of the Government's existing shares and new shares issued by the company. Subject to satisfactory market conditions and the completion of all necessary arrangements, it is intended that the offer will take place early in May. It is intended that application moneys in respect of the shares to be offered should be payable in two instalments.

Existing shareholders, subject to any legal restrictions overseas, will have preferential entitlements to acquire, pro rata to their existing shareholdings, the new shares to be issued by the company. The Government do not intend to take up their preferential entitlement to the new shares. The new shares to which the Government would have been entitled, together with any others which are not taken up by shareholders and the Government's existing shares, will be made available under the public offer and marketed to financial institutions, employees, existing shareholders and the wider public. In the event of an over-subscription, up to 5 million of the shares being sold by the Government will be reserved for preferential allocation to employees.

Selling commissions will be payable to stockbrokers, licensed dealers, members of the National Association of Securities Dealers and Investment Managers and exempted dealers at the rate of 1¼ per cent. on allotments of shares to a fully-paid value of £10,000 or less in respect of applications submitted by them on behalf of others; and on larger allotments at the rate of ½ per cent. subject to a minimum of £125. Reallowance of part of these commissions will be permitted to certain specified financial intermediaries.

The expenses of the offer will in general be shared between the company and the Government in the same ratio as the proceeds of issue of new shares by the company bear to the proceeds of the sale of the Government's shareholding. However, certain expenses relating to advice which is relevant specifically to only one of the two parties will be borne separately by the party concerned.

Scrap Metal and Castings

Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list the annual levels of exports and imports of (a) scrap metal as a raw material and (b) castings, for each of the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. Butcher: The information distinguishable in the United Kingdom Overseas Trade Statistics is as follows:

	Value £ millions
	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
(a) Scrap and waste metal

(b) SITC/R2 Sub-group 679.4 (castings or iron and steel)
Notes:
(i) 1980* trade in waste and scrap of certain metals cannot be separately identified.
(ii) 1984 figures are provisional
(iii) the only castings separately identified in the UK Overseas Trade Statistics are those of iron and steel.

United States (Export Restraints)

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has made to the Government of the United States of America concerning attempts to restrain legal exports of goods from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fletcher: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade have emphasised their continuing rejection of the extra-territorial application of US export controls in a number of contacts with senior members of the US Administration in the last year. The Minister of State for Industry and Information Technology reiterated the Government's views during his visit to Washington in January.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements are in hand to ensure that his Department complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the "Programme of Action on Women in the Civil Service".

Mr. Butcher: Existing joint management and trade union machinery is being used to review such matters as promotion, selection for training and the incidence of part-time working. Women are being encouraged to attend courses (particularly development courses) and to make the maximum use of the training opportunities available. Use is being made of the Civil Service college course in middle management for women only and arrangements are well in hand to run a management course this year in the Department for women only.

Rolls-Royce (South Africa)

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what licensing arrangements exist for the construction of Rolls-Royce aircraft engines in South Africa.

Mr. Butcher: The Italian firm Piaggio has a licence to manufacture the Rolls-Royce Viper engine. Under the terms of this licence, sub-licences may be granted to third parties. Piaggio granted sub-licences for the manufacture of Viper 11 and Viper 540 engines in South Africa in 1964 and 1971 respectively.

Cassette Tapes (Levy)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from organisations representing disabled people about the impact on the disabled of a levy on blank cassette tapes; what response he is making; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The Green Paper "The Recording and Rental of Audio and Video Copyright Material" (Cmnd. 9445) published on 19 February took account of previous representations on the effect of a tape levy from organisations representing disabled people. Thus, while the paper contains proposals to introduce a levy on blank recording tape as a way of remunerating copyright owners for the use made of their works by those who tape them at home, it envisages rebates or exemptions for blind and other seriously handicapped people who use audio tape on a large scale without infringing copyright. A number of organisations representing disabled people have already commented on the Green Paper proposals and more are expected to do so before the end of the consultation period. We shall decide whether to introduce a levy only after full consideration of all the comments received.

Overseas Projects Fund

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the operation of the overseas projects fund.

Mr. Fletcher: Yes.

British Overseas Trade Board

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of the British Overseas Trade

Board budget is planned to be allocated to (a) overseas trade fairs, (b) the market entry guarantee scheme and (c) the overseas project fund in 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88.

Mr. Fletcher: The information requested is as follows:

	Percentage of BOTB Net Expenditure
	1985-86 (Note 1)	1986-87 (Note 1)
Overseas Trade Fairs	45	41
Market Entry Guarantee Scheme	8	8
Overseas Projects Fund	16	18

Notes:

1. Figures for 1985-86 and 1986-87 are proposals which are subject to final decision by the BOTB in the light of response to its consultation document, a copy of which is in the Library.
2. The BOTB has not yet produced proposals for the allocation of funds between services within its budget for 1987-88.

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the proportion of small companies among first time exhibitors at British Overseas Trade Board supported trade fairs in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: Annual details of the size of companies which have used the British Overseas Trade Board's schemes of support at overseas trade fairs are not known. But an independent consultant's survey in 1983 established that overall about 60 per cent. of the exhibitors who have used these schemes have fewer than 100 employees. An internal study in 1984 showed that about 70 per cent. have 200 employees or less.

Statistics about the number of occasions on which particular companies have exhibited at each particular trade fair where there is a BOTB group have been kept only since 1981. The pattern of first time exhibitors has been:

	Number
1981	3,350
1982	3,737
1983	3,335
1984	3,193

There is no reason to suppose that the pattern was different before 1981 or that the proportion of small companies among the newcomers is less than the overall proportion of small companies in BOTB assisted groups of exhibitors.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what arrangements are in hand to ensure that his Department complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the "Programme of Action on Women in the Civil Service."

Sir Keith Joseph: Existing joint management and trade union machinery is being used at departmental and national level to review such matters as promotion, selection for training and the incidence of part-time working. Women are being encouraged to attend courses (particularly developmental courses) and to make the maximum use of the training opportunities available. Use is being made of the Civil Service college course in the middle management for women only, and consideration is being given to whether a joint training course for women can be introduced into our departmental training programme, in co-operation with other small, local departments.

Manchester (Capital Education Expenditure)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the level of prescribed capital expenditure for the city of Manchester for education for 1983-84, 1984-85, and 1985-86 at constant prices; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: The prescribed capital expenditure allocations for education announced for the city of Manchester for the years in question at 1983-84 constant prices are as follows:

1983-84	4,349,000
1984-85	6,679,700
1985-86	6,805,900

1983-84 constant prices have been obtained by adjusting cash figures by the latest forecast for GDP deflator at market prices.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mr. Tracey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to pupil-teacher ratios at primary and secondary level in each of the European Economic Community nations.

Mr. Dunn: The available information is shown in the following table, but it is not possible to provide data on a strictly comparable basis for each country. In particular, figures for the United Kingdom and Germany are based on full-time equivalent pupils divided by full-time equivalent teachers, while for other countries the figures are simply total pupils divided by total teachers. Moreover the definition of "teacher" can vary between countries and may include staff not engaged in teaching. Reference is made to further differences in the footnotes to the table.

Manchester (High Schools and Sixth Form Colleges)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if, in the light of his rejection of the draft articles of government for county high schools and sixth form colleges as submitted by the city of Manchester on 7 September 1982, he plans to invite the city to submit revised proposals; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is his reason for not approving the draft articles of government for county high schools and sixth form colleges as submitted by the city of Manchester on 7 September 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: In September 1982 the authority asked the Department informally whether proposed revisions to articles of government were such as would receive the necessary approval. The proposals could be seen as giving the authority power to override the responsibilities allocated in the articles, contrary to my right hon. Friend's policy for clarity in such matters. The Department's view that the amendments would thus be unacceptable have been the subject of various exchanges with the authority, with which the matter currently rests: it needs no invitation to make a fresh approach.

Higher Education

Mr. Tony Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is able to announce his decisions on local authority higher education provision in 1985-86 and on the distribution of the advanced further education pool for 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph [pursuant to his reply, 18 December 1984, c. 141-43]: I have today written to the chairman of the committee of the National Advisory Body (NAB) accepting the NAB's advice on the distribution of the sum of £2·5 million which was set aside from the advanced futher education quantum of £620 million for 1985-86 for the selective support of research in a number of major institutions as I announced in the House on 18 December.

The NAB's advice is based on very careful consideration of requests from institutions for funding totalling £14 million. NAB recommends that financial allocations between £75,000 and £150,000 be made to 21 institutions (including 20 polytechnics), the funds to support scientific and technological work, as follows:

	£'000s
Central London Polytechnic	150
Coventry Polytechnic	150
Hatfield Polytechnic	150
Kingston Polytechnic	150
Leicester Polytechnic	150
Liverpool Polytechnic	150
Newcastle Polytechnic	150
Plymouth Polytechnic	150
Portsmouth Polytechnic	150
South Bank Polytechnic	150
Trent Polytechnic	150
Brighton Polytechnic	100
Camborne School of Mines	100
Manchester Polytechnic	100
Sheffield City Polytechnic	100
Bristol Polytechnic	75
City of London Polytechnic	75
Lancashire Polytechnic	75
Teesside Polytechnic	75
Thames Polytechnic	75
Wolverhampton Polytechnic	75
Total	2,500

I welcome the selectivity which underpins these allocations, since I am convinced that, particularly when resources are limited, a selective approach towards allocations enables the funds available to be deployed with maximum effectiveness.

Letters are today being sent to local education authorities and institutions notifying them of my decisions regarding the research initiative. Copies of my letter to the NAB committee chairman have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Family Law

45. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will make a statement on the Law Commission and the Scottish Law Commission report on Family Law, Custody of Children — Jurisdiction and Enforcement within the United Kingdom, Cmnd. 9419.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The two Law Commissions have been working on this matter since 1972. Their report draws attention to the complexity of the present rules of custody jurisdiction within the three separate legal systems involved and was published only two months ago. The commissions' recommendations are likely to be generally acceptable and the Government are considering when it may be possible to introduce legislation on the lines of the recommendations. There is no prospect of introducing such legislation during the current parliamentary Session.

Venison

46. Sir Hector Monro asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions took place for the illegal sale of venison in 1984 or the latest convenient year.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: A person who sells venison illegally commits an offence under the Sale of Venison (Scotland) Act 1968 or section 25D of the Deer (Scotland) Act 1959. No separate statistics are kept and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Architects Registration Act 1938 (Contravention)

Mr. Chapman asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will make a statement explaining why the procurator fiscal's office did not take proceedings in a case brought to his attention by the Architects Registration Council of the United Kingdom concerning an alleged contravention of section 1 of the Architects Registration Act 1938 in respect of an incident on 7 September 1983.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: An alleged breach of sections 1 and 3 of the Architects Registration Act 1938 was reported to the procurator fiscal at Edinburgh on 7 November 1983. The procurator fiscal instructed the police to make inquiries and to report the results of their investigation to him. Investigation was made by them and when the police report was received by the procurator fiscal it was considered and marked "no proceedings".

WALES

Welsh Water Authority

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to make any changes to the Welsh water authority's external financing limit and his other cash limits for 1984-85.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Welsh water authority estimates that it will exceed the 1984-85 external financing limit of £19·6 million by about £3 million. This has arisen because of the additional costs incurred in last year's drought and severance payments following the major reorganisation undertaken by the authority in the autumn of 1984 and despite the authority achieving considerable offsetting savings in revenue and capital expenditure. In these exceptional circumstances I have increased the water authority's external financing limit for 1984-85 by £3 million from £19·6 million to £22·6 million. Offsetting savings have been found from the cash limit on Class XVI, 1, which has been reduced by £3 million from £741,490,000 to £738,490,000.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Misuse of Drugs Tribunals

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many sittings there have been in each year since 1971 of misuse of drugs tribunals; and how many doctors have been prohibited from prescribing controlled drugs as a result of tribunal hearings.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is as follows:

	Number of tribunal sittings	Number of doctors prohibited from prescribing some or all controlled drugs
1971	—	—
1972	—	—
1973	—	—
1974	1	—
1975	—	—
1976	1	1
1977	2	1
1978	4	3
1979	1	1
1980	—	—
1981	—	—
1982	—	—
1983	3	3
1984	3	3

Notes

(1) A direction given under section 13 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 must specify the controlled drugs to which it relates. Some directions have specified only a limited range of controlled drugs, taking into account the circumstances in those cases.

(2) Some directions have not taken effect until the year following the tribunal sitting; but the figures in column 2 relate to the year in which the tribunal heard the case.

(3) Temporary directions, given in accordance with section 15 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, are not included in the table; there was one such direction in 1978 and three in 1984.

Drugs Inspectorate

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff are employed within his Department's drugs inspectorate; and with what qualifications.

Mr. Mellor: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) on 22 February at column 622.

Animal Experimentation

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the River Way holding and training centre, Greenwich, London, is licensed for animal experimentation.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the training that is given at the River Way holding and training centre, Greenwich, London; who uses the centre; and for what purpose;

(2) what is the number of animals being kept at the River Way holding and training centre, Greenwich, London; and for what purpose they are used;

(3) what type of animal accommodation is provided at the River Way holding and training centre, Greenwich; when the centre was last visited and by whom; and if there was a report published.

Mr. Mellor: We have no information about this establishment.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements are in hand to ensure that his Department complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the Programme of Action on Women in the Civil Service.

Mr. Brittan: Existing joint management and trade union machinery is being used at departmental and national level to review such matters as promotion, selection for training and the incidence of part-time working. Women are being encouraged to attend courses —particularly developmental courses—and to make the maximum use of the training opportunities available, and use is also being made of the Civil Service college course in middle management for women.

Citizenship

Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will designate service with the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development as a form of service under the British Citizenship (Designated Service) Order 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: We have no plans to do so.

Metropolitan Police (Early Retirement)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many serving officers in the Metropolitan police have applied for early retirement, by month, from August 1984 to the present.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the number of Metropolitan police officers who have retired in each month since August 1984 before reaching the normal retirement age is as follows:

	Number
August 1984	43
September 1984	64
October 1984	46
November 1984	51
December 1984	66
January 1985	53
February 1985	52

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the amount of mutual aid sent by the metropolitan police to other forces by month during the course of the miners' strike.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

DEFENCE

Pembroke National Park

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of land in the Pembroke national park has been released by his Department, since the publication of the Nugent committee's report; and if he will list those areas which have been released in whole or in part.

Mr. Lee: The following areas have been sold since the publication of the report of the defence lands committee:

	acres
St. David's airfield (part)	43
Castlemartin range (part)	2
East Moor Cliff (whole)	43
Penally Proud Giltar training area (whole)	9
Manorbier range (part)	184

Disposals amount to some 4 per cent. of Ministry of Defence landholdings in the park in 1973.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence what new acquisitions have been made of land in the Pembroke national park by his Department since the publication of the Nugent committee's report; and what is the total percentage of land in the Pembroke national park which is currently owned or occupied by his Department.

Mr. Lee: The Ministry of Defence has not purchased any land in the Pembrokeshire coast national park since the publication of the report of the defence lands committee in 1973. Less than 5 per cent. of the land in the park is owned by the Ministry of Defence.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the total cost of the defence of the Falkland Islands since the end of the conflict; and what percentage of the expenditure involved represents payments to United Kingdom-based contractors in respect of construction works, and so on.

Mr. Stanley: For total costs, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) on 29 January at columns 155-56. For the costs of construction and works, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my hon. Friend the under-Secretary of State for the Environment to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 30 January at column 181. All payments have been made to United Kingdom based contractors, although in a few cases material and equipment have been procured by the main contractors from non-United Kingdom-based suppliers.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Botswana

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government's Ministers have discussed with the Botswana Government recent threats of aggression by the Republic of South Africa.

Mr. Renton: My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) was in Botswana in February and discussed with the Botswana Government recent problems in their relations with South Africa. I understand that talks to resolve these have now taken place between the two countries.

South Africa

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the meeting of his Department's officials with the South African ambassador on 25 February.

Mr. Renton: My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) met the South African ambassador on 25 February to discuss recent developments in South Africa. He explained that we welcomed some positive developments—such as the announcement of 99-year leasehold rights for Cape Flats townships—but were concerned at others, including the arrest of the United Democratic Front leaders and in particular the detention of four without charge.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in relation to the aide memoire of Her Majesty's Government dated 15 February 1965 to the South African Government setting out categories of military equipment which Her Majesty's Government were prepared in principle to supply to South Africa, if any equipment is now supplied; and if the supply of items for any particular category has been terminated.

Mr. Renton: Any arrangements between the United Kingdom and South Africa for the supply of military equipment prior to 1977 were overtaken by the obligations incurred as a result of the adoption in that year of United Nations Security Council resolution 418.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will require the British military attaché in South Africa to establish whether the Plessey AR3D radar system delivered to South Africa in 1981 and the Marconi system updating the S247 radar system which was delivered in 1983-84 are being used for the purposes for which the export licences were granted.

Mr. Renton: No. At the time of granting the export licences we were fully satisfied that the equipment was intended for use in air traffic control, having a civil application. I know of nothing to indicate that it is not being used for the purpose for which it was supplied.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he intends to discuss with the Italian Government the termination of the licensing agreement under which Rolls-Royce Viper engines are manufactured for Impala aircraft in South Africa.

Mr. Renton: No. The Italian Government have already made their position clear. In a letter to the Security Council Committee established by resolution 421 (1977) the Italian Government confirmed that in the case of South Africa they had not issued licences since 1972 for component parts of the Viper engine, as reported in the Committee's report adopted on 19 September 1980 (S/14179).

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the South African Government Ministers and the South African Government officials who have been received by Her Majesty's Government during the years 1979 to 1984, giving the names and dates of those meetings.

Mr. Renton: There are no centrally kept records covering such a list. The information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what instructions have been given to the United Kingdom delegation regarding Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the inclusion of the phrase "and related material of all types" in operative paragraph 2 of the draft United Nations Security Council Resolution 558 (1984).

Mr. Renton: There were discussions at the United Nations on several draft texts before the final version was tabled by the sponsor and adopted as Security Council resolution 558. Instructions given to the United Kingdom delegation in these, and in other negotiations, remain confidential, but they reflected our concern to find a practicable solution which would command the support of all members.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report the explanation of vote made by the United Kingdom representative at the United Nations Security Council when it adopted Security Council Resolution 558 (1984).

Mr. Renton: Yes. The text of the Explanation of Vote delivered by the United Kingdom representative is reproduced as follows:

"The recent turmoil in South Africa has claimed many lives. The situation there continues to be tense and highly charged. It is not a situation to which this Council can remain indifferent. The continuing tragedy of South Africa remains a source of grave concern to us all.

It has been the constant view of successive British Governments that apartheid is unacceptable morally and was bound to prove unworkable in practice. We accordingly believe that it is right to maintain strong pressure on the South African Government both bilaterally and through the United Nations to abandon and dismantle apartheid. The Arms Embargo adopted under Security Council Resolution 418 has been an appropriate instrument of such pressure and has been implemented strictly in British legislation and by British courts.

The most recent events in South Africa have caused great distress to the British Government, in Parliament and among the British public, as they have to many other countries, and particularly to our friends and partners in Africa. It is right that the Security Council should now consider whether there are additional ways of influencing the South African Government to turn away from apartheid and respect the civil and political rights of all the people of South Africa.

At the same time, the Council must consider most carefully and responsibly the consequences of its actions. The Council must not abdicate its responsibilities by pursuing measures—whatever their popular appeal—which would in practice be counter-productive. Certain suggestions which are frequently aired in our view would exacerbate the situation in South and Southern Africa, and could cause grave damage to states neighbouring South Africa. The Security Council must pay scrupulous attention to the Charter, and must not lightly enter into areas such as Chapter VII measures.

We are, in principle, opposed to trade sanctions. Wide economic sanctions are difficult to enforce, lead to a hardening of views and tend to harm those who are poorest and most vulnerable. Trade, on the other hand, is a channel for widening mutual understanding and for exercising a moderating influence.

By adopting a non-mandatory resolution, directed against importers, the Council has pursued a realistic course. Let me stress that my own Government does not import arms from South Africa. I trust that the same is true for other members of the Security Council. Our message, as a Council, to states outside this organ is that they should follow suit.

My delegation has co-operated closely with the Permanent Representative of the Netherlands over this Resolution. We expressed to him the hope that he could find a text which would command unanimous support, and we made specific suggestions to this effect. We are glad that he has succeeded and I would like to pay tribute to him for the thoroughness and the skill with which he has consulted members of the Council and embodied the consensus of their views.

It is against this background that my delegation has supported the present Resolution. In so doing we are also reflecting both our ineradicable opposition to apartheid and our specific disapproval of the actions of the South African Government in a recent and relevant case."

Falkland Islands

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether South Africa is still being used as a staging post for personnel involved in the construction of the airport on the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Renton: The management of the Mount Pleasant project is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I understand that the contractors continue to use Cape Town as a staging post; this is a purely commercial arrangement.

FIDA '84 International Air Show, Chile

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government were represented at the FIDA '84 international air show in Santiago, Chile, in March 1984.

Mr. Renton: In response to a request from the Society of British Aerospace Companies, we helped sponsor through the British Overseas Trade Board's joint venture scheme, 12 British firms which participated in the Santiago international air show (FIDA) in March 1984. As part of thier normal commercial duties in support of British exports, Her Majesty's ambassador Santiago and members of his staff visited the air show and toured the British stands.

Embassy (Santo Domingo)

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what revenue he expects to accrue to Her Majesty's Government as a result of the disposal of the Government's interest in the building housing Her Majesty's embassy, Santo Domingo, and other properties retained for the use of the ambassador and his staff.

Mr. Renton: We own no property in Santo Domingo. There will therefore be no sale receipts as a result of the closure of Her Majesty's embassy there.

United Nations (Security Council Committee Report)

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will instruct the United Kingdom delegation to the United Nations to support the proposal made in the Security Council on 13 December 1984 by the then Chairman of the Security Council Committee established under Resolution 421 (1977) that the United Nations Security Council considers the Committee's report (S-14179); and if he will instruct the United Kingdom delegation to support the recommendations contained in paragraph 81 of this report.

Mr. Renton: As is recorded in paragraph 82 of the report to which the hon. Member refers, the United Kingdom delegation placed a general reservation on the recommendation in paragraph 81 of the report. Our position is thus already on record.

EC (Dooge Committee)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many members there are on the Dooge Committee for EEC Institutions; who they are; by whom each was appointed; and whom each member represents.

Mr. Renton: The 11 members of the Dooge Committee are:

Belgium: — Mr. Fernand Herman (Member of European Parliament).

Denmark: — Mr. Otto Moller (Secretary-General, Ministry of Foreign Affairs).

Federal Republic of Germany: — Mr. Jürgen Rühfus (State Secretary, Ministry of Foreign Affairs).

Greece: — Mr. Ioannis Papantoniou (Former Member of European Parliament and Special Advisor to Prime Minister).

France: — Mr. Maurice Faure (Former Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs).

Ireland: — Professor James Dooge (Senator).

Italy: — Mr. Mauro Ferri (Former Member of European Parliament).

Luxembourg: — Mr. Jean Dondelinger (Secretary-General, Ministery of Foreign Affairs).

Netherlands: — Mr. Willem Van Eekelen (State Secretary, Ministry of Foreign Affairs).

United Kingdom: — Mr. Malcolm Rifkind (Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office).

Commission: — Mr. Carlo Ripa di Meana.

They are the personal representatives of the Heads of State or of Government by whom they are appointed. The Commission representative was appointed by the President of the Commission.

Libya

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what evidence he has that the President of Libya is offering support to Irish Republican Army terrorists and self-styled urban guerilla groups in other European Economic Community countries; and what steps the Government are taking to safeguard the United Kingdom against such threats.

Mr. Renton: We have seen reports of Colonel Gadhafi's recent speech threatening support for European terrorist movements. We view such statements with concern and have made this clear to the Libyans. We remain constantly on the lookout for evidence of terrorist threats from whatever quarter.

Arms Control

Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements exist for ensuring that the United States Administration are made aware of Her Majesty's Government's views on arms control and disarmament issues.

Mr. Luce: We keep in close and regular touch with the United States, as with other allies, at a variety of levels. Our discussions cover the whole range of arms control and disarmament issues. Such issues were discussed in depth during the recent visit to Washington of my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for Defence and the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary. They feature prominently on the agenda for talks at ministerial level. In parallel with these exchanges, Foreign and Commonwealth Office and Ministry of Defence officials responsible for these questions hold frequent bilateral discussions with their American counterparts.

Arms control issues are also the subject of regular consultation within the North Atlantic Alliance and in a variety of other fora. In particular, the North Atlantic Council is employed frequently for this purpose; there is also detailed consideration of intermediate-range nuclear force (INF) issues in NATO's Special Consultative Group. In addition, United Kingdom representatives to the conference on disarmament in Geneva, to the conference on disarmament in Europe in Stockholm, and at the multilateral and balanced force reductions talks in Vienna, consult extensively with United States and other Western delegates to those negotiations.

British Embassy School, Bonn

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 4 March, Official Report, column 368, how the pay and conditions of teaching staff in the British embassy school in Bonn, who are currently paid under the Burnham scale appropriate to teachers working in England and Wales, will be affected by the change in the constitution of the School Committee.

Mr. Renton: As I said in my answer to the hon. Member on 4 March, the British embassy school in Bonn is not the direct responsibility of Her Majesty's Government. I am told that pay and conditions are at present being discussed by the management committee with the teachers and that the prospect is that pay and conditions will remain very considerably above Burnham levels.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Family Incomes

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the net weekly spending power of a man and a wife, with two children aged 11 and 15 years, whose income is £120 per week, whose rent and rates are £20 and £7 per week, respectively, and who are receiving all state benefits to which they are entitled (a) when he is working and (b) if he were unemployed and assuming that both husband and wife were earning the £4 disregarded income.

Mr. Whitney: The net weekly spending power of a man with a wife and two children aged 11 and 15 would be £83·65 if the man's gross earnings were £120 a week, and the family has no other income apart from benefits.

If the family's only income, apart from benefits, was from part-time earnings and both the man and his wife and £4 of their earnings disregarded for supplementary benefit purpose, the net weekly spending power would be £87·45.

The calculations assume "£7 rates" are £5·50 general rate and £1·50 water rate. Other unspecified assumptions are as in the November 1984 edition of the DHSS tax/benefit model tables.

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the net weekly spending power of a man with a wife and two children aged eight and 11 years whose income is £100 per week and whose rent and rates are £20 and £7, respectively (a) when he is working and (b) if he were unemployed and assuming that he and his wife were both earning the £4 disregarded income and in each case were receiving all the benefits to which they were entitled.

Mr. Whitney: The net weekly spending power of a man with a wife and two children aged eight and 11 would be £79·05 if the man's gross earnings were £100 a week, and the family had no other income apart from benefits.

If the family's only other income, apart from benefits, was from part-time earnings and both the man and his wife had £4 of their earnings disregarded for supplementary benefit purposes, the net weekly spending power would be £82·70.

The calculations assume "£7 rates" are £5·50 general rate and £1·50 water rate. Other unspecified assumptions are as in the November 1984 edition of the DHSS tax/benefit model tables.

Armed Forces (Disablement Benefits)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of disabled service men and service women who receive state benefits as a result of their disablement due to service in the armed forces.

Mr. Newton: At 31 December 1984, 227,500 ex-service men and women were receiving disablement pensions under the war pensions scheme administered by the Department or, for disablement resulting from service between 30 September 1921 and 2 September 1939, under a corresponding scheme administered by the Ministry of Defence.

Dependency Allowance

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to uprate the dependency allowance paid with war disablement pension.

Mr. Newton: No.

Tobacco (Health Warnings)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many meetings officials in his Department have had with the tobacco industry in connection with the renewal of the present agreement concerning health warnings on cigarette advertisements; if he has had representations on this matter from the British Medical Association; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Discussions with the tobacco industry about replacing the present voluntary advertising agreement, which runs until at least 31 March 1986, have not yet commenced. We have invited representatives of the industry to meet us in the early summer to start the process. We have received representations from the British Medical Association about the voluntary agreements, including the matter of health warnings on cigarette advertisements.

Therapists

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the editor of Remedial Therapist about the shortage of therapists; what reply he is sending; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have received a letter from the editor of Remedial Therapist, which we are considering and will reply shortly.

Reye's Syndrome (Aspirin)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what American and British evidence was considered by the Committee on Safety of Medicines when it looked at the possibility of an association between

Reye's syndrome and the taking of aspirin by children; at how many meetings the possible association was discussed; if the opinions of the American Food and Drugs Administration were sought; what are the conclusions of the Committee; and if they differed from those of the Food and Drugs Administration;

(2) if the Committee on Safety of Medicines has considered the possibility of an association between Reye's syndrome and the taking of aspirin by children in the light of the pilot epidemiological study on Reye's syndrome, published in December 1984 by the Centre for Disease Control in Atlanta, United States of America; and if he will make a statement on the advisability of children taking aspirin.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Committee on Safety of Medicines considered the possibility of an association between Reye's syndrome and aspirin ingestion at its September 1982 meeting. They considered all the available evidence, in particular the reports of three epidemiological studies in the United States of America and reviews of this work by the United States Food and Drugs Administration and other bodies in the United States; and articles in the USA publication "Paediatrics".

The committee also looked at two investigations in the United Kingdom into Reye's syndrome; a national childhood encephalopathy study and a continuing surveillance scheme set up jointly by the British Paediatrics Association and the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre. At that time the committee had received no reports through its adverse reactions reporting system suggesting an association between Reye's syndrome and aspirin ingestion. It has since received one such report.

The committee concluded that, on the available evidence, a causal link between aspirin and Reye's syndrome had not been established. The committee noted that the United States Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, on the basis of the US evidence, but decided that it did not wish to recommend such action in the United Kingdom. It further decided to keep the issue of Reye's syndrome and aspirin under review.

"intended to advise that children with influenza or chicken pox should not be given salicylates and salicylate-containing medications"

The committee is currently considering a summary of preliminary findings of a pilot study by a United States Public Health Service task force, which included members of the Centre for Disease Control, Atlanta. A report of the pilot study has not so far been published. When we have considered the committee's advice on the up-to-date evidence, we shall decide whether any statement is needed on the position in the United Kingdom.

Retirement Pensions

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average time taken to process an application for a retirement pension at the Newcastle computer centre; what steps are to be taken to improve this; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Claims to retirement pension are normally invited four months before a person reaches minimum pension age. Initial action is taken in the local office, which usually forwards the claim to Newcastle following the adjudication officer's decision. The average time taken to process the claim from the local office is normally five working days.

As a result of the recent industrial action, double the normal intake of new claims is currently being received in Newcastle each week so the processing time may be longer than usual. However, local offices make emergency payments of retirement pension if an award is delayed at any stage. The position is expected to be back to normal by mid-June.

If the hon. Member has a particular case in mind in which the processing time has given rise to difficulty perhaps he would write to me and I will look into it.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to reply to the question from the hon. Member for Walsall, North about state retirement pensions which was tabled for answer on 25 February.

Mr. Whitney: I have today answered the hon. Member's question.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state the likely sum that would be paid to (a) those on average income, (b) those on three quarters average income and (c) those on half average income, assuming the current level of annual increases in earnings and prices as the state earnings-related pension scheme to those who have remained contracted-in since the scheme started in 1985, 1990, 1995, 2000 and 2010, respectively.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 25 February 1985, c. 72]: The table shows the amount of additional component which would be payable in addition to the basic pension (currently £35·80 per week) to a person contracted-in to the state earnings-related pension scheme since its inception in 1978. The figures are expressed in constant 1984-85 earnings levels.

Year	Average Male Earnings £	¾ Average Male Earnings £	½ Average Male Earnings £
1985	12·80	8·80	4·90
1990	21·90	15·20	8·40
1995	31·00	21·50	11·90
2000	36·50	25·20	14·00
2010	36·50	25·20	14·00

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much has been budgeted for the national publicity campaign which his Department intends to run to advise patients of the introduction of limited list prescribing; and whether this expenditure will be offset against the £75 million savings which he is seeking to make in the National Health Service drugs bill in the coming financial year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No national advertising is planned, but approximately £30,000 has been budgeted for printing leaflets for patients explaining selected list prescribing. This money will be found from savings on centrally funded services during 1984-85 and will not, therefore, be offset against anticipated savings on the National Health Service drugs bill during 1985-86.

Health Certificates

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assistance is given to unemployed persons who are required to pay a fee to a doctor in order to obtain a health certificate in the course of an application for a job.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Where the cost is not provided or met by the prospective employer, single payments can be made to those entitled to supplementary benefit, including members of the assessment unit, for the cost of a doctor's medical examination fee where the person would otherwise be unable either to take up employment which has been offered to him or to continue in employment which has been taken up during the 14 days immediately preceding the claim.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will take steps to introduce a system for the provision of certificates of health within the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is already part of a general medical practitioner's terms of service to issue free of charge a certificate stating that in his opinion a patient is fit for work after a period of sickness.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current fee payable under the National Health Service for a doctor's certificate of health provided as part of an application for employment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No such fee is payable under the National Health Service.

SCOTLAND

Rating System

8. Mr. Hugh Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has for reforming the rating system.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend and I have implemented a number of reforms already, in the Rating and Valuation (Amendment) (Scotland) Act 1984. Subsequently, as announced last October, I have been studying, along with Ministerial colleagues south of the border, various aspects of the local government finance system, but it is still too early to say anything about these studies.

33. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether, in the light of his policy towards revaluation, he will now give urgent consideration to a fundamental reform of the rating system.

Mr. George Younger: I am already studying, along with Ministerial colleagues south of the border, various aspects of the local government finance system, but it is still too early to say anything about these studies.

Local Authorities (Meetings)

9. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many local government authorities he and his Ministers met in deputations accompanied by the local hon. Member in January or February.

Mr. Younger: Three.

Fish Processing

10. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has had for Government aid to fish processing in north-east Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: In recent representations to my right hon. and noble Friend, the Minister of State, Grampian regional council called for special Government aid for fish processors in their region. Similar representations have also been made by the Federation of North East of Scotland Fish Merchants' Associations.

Forestry Commission ("Broadleaves Review")

12. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the Forestry Commission will consult fully private nature conservation bodies on its "Broadleaves Review".

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission published its consultative paper on broadleaves in May last year and received views from a wide range of private nature conservation bodies. The Commission has been taking these views into account in developing policy proposals for discussion at a seminar to be held in May, to which a balanced cross-section of conservation bodies has been invited.

Primary Schools (Pupil Costs)

15. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much was spent per pupil in primary schools in Scotland in the most recent year for which figures are available; and how this compares with the figure for 1978-79, at constant prices.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In 1983-84 net expenditure per pupil in primary schools in Scotland at out-turn prices was £882. This represents an increase of 14 per cent. at constant prices over the figure for 1978-79 which was £410.

Rating Revaluation

16. Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received on the rating revaluation in Scotland.

Mr. George Younger: I have received about 3,800 representations of various kinds. In response to these, and in particular a representation from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, I announced last Thursday an extra increase of £38·5 million in the domestic element of the rate support grant, which will go a long way toward easing the burden revaluation will shift on to the domestic ratepayer.

23. Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will postpone revaluation in Scotland for rating purposes.

Mr. Younger: No. This is not practicable. I have announced that there will be an extra increase of £38·5 million in the domestic element of the rate support grant, which will go a long way toward easing the burden revaluation will shift on to the domestic ratepayer.

40. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the burden of rates on domestic ratepayers in Scotland.

26. Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has undertaken a study of the impact of the rates revaluation on domestic properties in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: I understand that in Scotland as a whole the average revaluation multiplier for domestic property is 2·7, somewhat higher than the average for all property of 2·33. The recently announced extra increase of £38·5 million in the domestic element of the rate support grant will moderate the effect of this on householders' rate bills.

North Lanarkshire (Unemployment)

17. Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the increase in unemployment in North Lanarkshire since May 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart: On 10 January 1985, the latest date for which information is available, the number of unemployed persons claiming benefit in the former North Lanarkshire travel-to-work area totalled 32,635 while at 10 May 1979 there were 15,531 unemployed people in the same area registered for employment. The increase in unemployment cannot be calculated as the unemployment figures are not directly comparable because of the change in October 1982 to a claimant based count.

East Fife Regional Road

18. Mr. Gourlay asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the estimated completion date of phase 1 of the East Fife regional road and the projected completion date of phase 2.

Mr. Ancram: The estimated date of completion of phase 1 is August of this year. A 104-week contract has now been awarded for phase 2, and work is expected to start this month or next.

Deaconess and Bruntsfield Hospitals

19. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will consult Lothian regional council before taking a decision on the Lothian health board's proposals for the closure of the Deaconess and Bruntsfield hospitals.

Mr. John MacKay: The regional council was consulted by Lothian health board on the board's statement of intent about the future of Bruntsfield, the Deaconess and the Royal Victoria hospitals. The range of views expressed during these consultations will be taken into account by my right hon. Friend in reaching a decision on the health board's proposals.

Hypothermia

20. Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many deaths from hypothermia have been recorded in Scottish hospitals during the current year to the last available date.

Mr. Younger: In the first seven weeks of 1985, 70 death certificates gave hypothermia as one of the causes of death in Scottish hospitals.

Livestock and Dairy Farming

21. Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last discussed the problems of the livestock and dairy sectors with the National Farmers Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: My right hon. and noble Friend attended the union's annual general meeting last week and had wide ranging discussions relating to these and other sectors of the industry.

Educational Provision

22. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Educational Institute of Scotland and parent-teachers associations about the standard of educational provision in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I have received a number of representations from parent teacher associations about various questions of educational provision and about the effects of the current teachers' pay dispute in particular. I have had no direct representations from the Educational Institute of Scotland in recent months but the institute has of course made public reference to its views on the question of standards of provision.

Glasgow (Unemployment)

24. Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his latest estimate of the number of adult males unemployed in the Glasgow eastern area renewal area of Glasgow; and what percentage this represents.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Unemployment figures for the GEAR area of Glasgow are not available. However, at 10 January 1985, the latest date for which information is available, the estimated number of males claiming unemployment benefit in the post-code sectors wholly or partly contained within the GEAR area of Glasgow was 4,140.

Unemployment percentage rates are not calculated for areas smaller than travel-to-work areas. The GEAR area forms only a part of the wider Glasgow travel-to-work area where the unemployment rate at the same date was 17·7 per cent.

Education Expenditure

25. Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total expenditure per head of population on education in Scotland in the year 1984.

Mr. Allan Stewart: On educational services for which my right hon. Friend is responsible the provisional figure for 1983-84 was £306.

Science Parks

27. Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the role of science parks in Scotland in promoting the industries of the future; and what environment and management back-up he considers essential to their development.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Science parks are intended to facilitate the development and commercial exploitation of research carried out in universities. Their environment and management should be consistent with this objective.

Lothian Region (Unemployment)

28. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many young people under the age of 25 years are presently without jobs in Lothian region.

Mr. Younger: On 10 January, the latest date for which information is available, there were 19,795 unemployed persons under the age of 25 years claiming benefit in Lothian region.

Teachers (Pay)

29. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress he has made in discussions with the teachers' unions to resolve the current dispute on teachers' pay.

30. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a further statement on the dispute within Scottish schools.

39. Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a further statement on teachers' pay in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer to the reply which my right hon. Friend gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley).

Scottish Newspapers

31. Mr. Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet editors of Scottish newspapers.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend meets editors of Scottish newspapers, either individually or collectively, from time to time, in the course of business, but he has at present no formal plans for future meetings.

36. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on the future of the newspaper industry in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: No representations have been received on the future of the newspaper industry in general, but concern has been expressed about the possible imposition of value added tax on newspapers in Scotland. This is, of course, a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and we have drawn these representations to his attention.

Public Inquiries

32. Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will review the rules for the conduct of public inquiries in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: The rules for the conduct of public inquiries in Scotland are kept under review as a matter of routine and consideration is given to the need for amendments to them as and when experience of their operation suggests that this is required. We have no immediate plans for changes to the rules.

National Health Service (Expenditure)

34. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total spending on the National Health Service in Scotland in the current year, both in money terms and per head of population; and what change in real terms there has been in spending since 1979.

Mr. John MacKay: Gross expenditure on the National Health Service in Scotland in 1984-85 is expected to be £1,901 million. This represents some £369 per head of population. Detailed records of programme expenditure in volume terms are no longer maintained. The resources provided to the National Health Service in Scotland since 1979 have, however, been sufficient to enable services to expand by about 7 per cent. overall.

Liquor Licensing Laws

35. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will complete and publish his review of the liquor licensing laws introduced in 1976.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend's review of Scottish licensing law depends upon the result of the survey by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys of public attitudes, for which the fieldwork has now been completed. We hope to publish preliminary key findings of that survey in June 1985. My right hon. Friend will make a statement on the outcome of the subsequent review once the necessary consideration and consultations have been undertaken, probably in the spring of 1986.

Manufacturing Industry

37. Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the latest figure for the number of jobs lost in manufacturing industry since June 1979.

Mr. Younger: The number of employees in employment in manufacturing in Scotland is provisionally estimated to have fallen by 172,000 on a seasonally adjusted basis between June 1979 and September 1984.

Educational Institutes

38. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the Educational Institutes of Scottish Teachers; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which my right hon. Friend gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook). On both occasions the teaching unions' demand for an independent pay review and the Government's proposal of a review of pay and conditions of service within the existing negotiating machinery were discussed.

Domestic Rates

41. Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what the percentage increase in domestic rates in Scotland is now likely to be in 1985-86.

Mr. Younger: Around 17 per cent.

Farm Wardens

42. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many farm wardens would need to be appointed in Scotland during a period of tension to meet his Department's food control plans.

Mr. John MacKay: About 900.

Local Authority Manpower

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 31 March of each of the years 1974 to 1984 together with the latest figures the number of local authority employees in Scotland, analysed by part-time/full-time within sex, covered by each of the items (i) to (v) in part III of his consultation document "Competition in the Provision of Local Authority Services"; and if he will reconcile these numbers with the published Joint Manpower Watch.

Mr. Younger: The detailed information requested is not held centrally.

North Sea Oil and Gas

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make an estimate of jobs created in Scotland as a direct or indirect result of work done in the North sea oil and gas fields.

Mr. Younger: It is estimated that at mid-1984 between 91,000 and 107,000 jobs in Scotland were due directly or indirectly to North sea oil and gas activity.

Small Firms

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will write to the chief executives of all nationalised industries for which he is responsible asking them to pay their accounts to small firms more promptly.

Mr. Younger: I shall consider this in the light of the examination of possible ways of encouraging the prompt payment of bills, including a code of practice, being carried out by representatives of industry at the request of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps Her Majesty's Government takes to seek to encourage corporations in Scotland to pay their accounts to small firms more promptly.

Mr. Younger: The Government have published a booklet entitled "Delivering the Goods" which seeks to encourage better communications between large purchasers, including corporations, and their suppliers. The booklet highlights the problems faced by small firms when long credit periods are demanded of them.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry, has invited representatives of industry to examine possible ways of further encouraging prompt payment of bills, including a code of practice. I shall follow their deliberations with interest.

Motorail Depot, Glasgow

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, when he next meets the Chairman of British Rail (Scotland), he will raise the siting of a motorail depot in Glasgow or the surrounding district.

Mr. Younger: This is entirely a matter for the commercial judgment of British Rail which will, I am sure, take note of the right hon. Member's views.

Doctors

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of general practitioners per 1,000 population in the Glasgow region and the remaining health areas of Great Britain for the last 10 years.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers of general medical practitioners, including assistants and trainees, per 1,000 population for Greater Glasgow health board and for the other health boards in Scotland for each year for the period requested are shown in the table. Farms

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of farms in Scotland is in the ownership of conglomerates or finance houses as opposed to individual farmers or farming families.

Mr. John MacKay: Latest estimates incorporating returns made to the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland by December 1984 suggest a total area owned by financial institutions of about 90,000 hectares, or 1½ per cent. of the total agricultural area. I regret that no information on the number of farms involved, or on ownership by other companies and institutions is available.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many private woodlands foresters were employed by the Forestry Commission at district level in (a) April 1980 and (b) June 1984, after forest and district reorganisation; and how many will be employed in June 1985 after conservancy reorganisation.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1985, c. 404]: Private woodlands work is carried out by the commission's forest district managers and their supporting staff. The allocation of staff resources at any time depends on the level of private woodlands activity. Some officers have been engaged full-time on this duty, but most have undertaken it as part of their overall duties. For this reason it is not possible to give a precise answer to the question. However, the commission's commitment in terms of man years to private woodlands work at forest district level has been assessed as follows:

Year to 31 March	Man years

ENERGY

Fast Breeder Reactor

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether negotiations are taking place with France to consider investment by Her Majesty's Government or the Central Electricity Generating Board in the construction of a European fast breeder reactor in France.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's replies of 16 January 1984, at column 47, to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) and of 22 February 1984, at column 552, to my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell).

As envisaged in the intergovernmental memorandum of understanding on fast reactor collaboration, the CEGB is currently negotiating with its partner utilities in Europe a general agreement setting out the principles of their future co-operation.

It is expected that these will include the possibility of cross-investment between the utilities in any demonstration fast reactors which may in due course be built under the collaboration in France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom or Italy. Any definite proposal for such investment would be subject to a specific agreement, requiring the approval of respective Governments.

Electricity Imports (France)

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what would be the maximum amount of electricity that could be imported into the United Kingdom from France in a 24 hour period, using the cross-Channel electricity link, in volume and cash terms, at current prices;

(2) if he will list his powers to regulate the import of electricity from France;

(3) if it remains his policy that the intention of the cross-Channel electricity link is simply to iron out daily fluctuations in electricity demand in France and the United Kingdom;

(4) on what date the cross-Channel electricity link between the United Kingdom and France will come into operation.

Mr. Goodlad: I have no specific powers to regulate the import of electricity from France. The Central Electricity Generating Board and Electricité de France are responsible for the commercial operation of the link. I expect these bodies to make commercial agreements to obtain maximum benefit for both countries, taking account of prevailing circumstances. Once the Link is fully commissioned, the maximum amount of electricity that could be imported to the United Kingdom via the link is 48 Gigawatt hours in any 24-hour period. The cost of any imported energy is a commercial matter for the electricity utilities, but in terms of CEGB sales the current value of 48 GWh of imported energy would vary between £1 million and £1·2 million per day, depending on the time of year. The first part of the link is expected to become operational in the autumn of this year and the second half a year later.

Petroleum Production

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the Government's latest forecasts of the level of United Kingdom petroleum production.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The latest forecasts for United Kingdom petroleum production in the year 1985 to 1989 are as follows:

	million tonnes
1985	120-135
1986	110-130
1987	95-125
1988	85-120
1989	80-115

As in previous years, these forecasts represent a range of levels of possible petroleum production for each year. The ranges make allowance for the considerable technical and geological uncertainties which influence the rate of oil production from both mature and recently developed fields.

The figures comprise stabilised crude oil and natural gas liquids (NGLs). Production of the latter has built up rapidly in the last few years as follows:

	million tonnes of NGLs
1981	1·5
1982	2·9
1983	4·1
1984	*4·8

* (provisional).

NGLs are expected to account for some 5 million tonnes annually of total petroleum production in 1985 to 1989.

Total production in 1984 of stabilised crude and NGLs is estimated to have been 125·9 million tonnes.

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many occasions in the last financial year the extra-statutory concession was exercised on stamp duty on documents which assure group life and pension policies.

Mr. Moore: I regret that data are not available centrally on which to base reliable estimates.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent research he has conducted on the effect of charges in the rate and scope of value added tax on demand in the economy.

Mr. Hayhoe: The evolution of money demand in the economy is essentially determined by the Government's macro-economic policies and the effects on demand of changing VAT within this framework will be temporary.

Customs Duties

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will provide particulars of the collection of customs duties for the years 1981 to 1984, distinguishing between food, beverages, manufactures and other goods; and if he will add for 1984 the amounts collected in agricultural levies, sugar and isoglucose levies, value added tax contributions to the European Economic Community budget and any other levies.

Mr. Hayhoe: For customs duties, the information grouped by the standard international trade classification (rev. 2) is as follows:

PAYE

Mr. Wainwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what degree of change in the personal income tax structure can now be assimilated by the pay-as-you-earn computers; and when computerisation of pay-as-you-earn will be substantially complete.

Mr. Moore: The pay-as-you-earn computer system was designed so that it could be adapted to changes in the personal income tax structure. It is planned to complete the transfer of work to this system across the country three years from now.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what arrangements are in hand to ensure that his Department complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984, of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: Existing joint management and trade union machinery is to be used to monitor such matters as promotion, selection for training and the incidence of part-time working. Positive action includes encouraging women to pursue training through the use of the Civil Service college course in middle management for women only, as well as non-residential management courses.

House of Commons (Printing and Distribution Costs)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the costs for 1983-84, and the estimated costs for 1984-85 and 1985-86, for printing for the House, including the production and distribution costs of parliamentary debates.

Mr. Hayhoe: Her Majesty's Stationery Office distribution costs are not directly attributable to particular publications, except for the cost of the special arrangements for early morning postal deliveries of parliamentary debates to Members' private addresses in London. Subject to that, the information is as follows:

	1983-84 Actual £000	1984-85 Estimated £000	1985-86 Estimated £000
Reports of Debates	5,574	4,956	5,162
Other HMSO Publications for Parliament	5,038	7,035	6,800
General Printing	1,180	1,324	1,450
Total	11,792	13,315	13,412

With the exception of general printing, these costs are partly offset by revenue from sales by Her Majesty's Stationery Office to customers other than Parliament. The production costs of reports of debates are also partly met by a subsidy paid to the Controller of Her Majesty's Stationery Office from class XIII, vote 21.

Exchange Rate

Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received on his exchange rate policy.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I have received several such communications.

Money Supply

Mr Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the rates of growth in the United Kingdom money supply, as measured by MO, M1, M3 and £M3, in the years 1979 to 1984; and what information he has as to the equivalent or nearest equivalent figures for the United States of America, Japan, Germany and Australia, respectively.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 8 March 1985, c. 641]: The information requested for the UK appears in "Financial Statistics." Monetary data for other countries are published in the IMF's "International Financial Statistics." For the narrow aggregates the IMF series nearest in concept to those of the UK are "Reserve Money" (for MO) and "Money" (for M1). For broad money the sum of the IMF's series for "Money" and "Quasi-Money" —which includes residents' foreign currency deposits— can be regarded as an approximation for M3. For other countries there is no readily available equivalent to £M3.

Government Borrowing and Expenditure

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total Government borrowing requirement and the total of central Government spending for each year since 1979; what proportion this represented of gross domestic product; and what information he has as to how these figures compare with those for the United States of America, Japan, Germany and Australia, respectively.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 8 March 1985, c. 640]: The general Government borrowing requirement in cash and as a percentage of GDP are for the UK in financial years from 1979:

	Cash GGBR (£ million)	Ratio GGBR/ GDP per cent.
1979-80	10,436	5·04
1980-81	13,586	5·76
1981-82	8,585	3·31
1982-83	10,104	3·56
1983-84	10,086	3·30

Owing to differences in structure and definition of Government accounts, international comparisons of borrowing requirements are not easily made. Comparisons of general Government financial balances are less problematic but should still be made with caution. The table shows the latest outturns for these balances as a percentage of GDP published by the OECD.

General Government Financial Balance as a percentage of GDP

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983

Central Government expenditure in cash and as a percentage of GDP for financial years from 1979 are:

	Expenditure (£ million)	As a percentage of GDP
1979-80	52,429	25·3
1980-81	63,652	27·0
1981-82	73,233	28·2
1982-83	81,497	28·7
1983-84	85,389	27·9

The expenditure figures are from the recent expenditure White Paper (Cmnd 9428 Table 2.3) and they exclude finance for nationalised industries and public corporations. The following table gives a comparison of central Government expenditure as a percentage of GDP on internationally standardised definitions. Nevertheless, the figures should be treated with caution since differences in national accounting systems make it difficult to calculate exactly comparable statistics.

The major reason that the UK percentages are higher than the percentages given in the above table is that OECD definition includes debt interest. The proportion of general Government (central and local) expenditure borne by central Government is much higher in the UK than in countries with a federal structure (eg USA, Germany).

Departmental Salaries

Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each of the years 1974 to 1984 (a) the salary in real terms of (i) principals and (ii) assistant secretaries in his Department, expressed as a percentage of the 1974 base salary level and (b) the number of voluntary resignations.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1985, c. 60]: For the principal and assistant secretary grades, salaries in real terms expressed as percentages of 1974 salaries for each of the years 1974 to 1984 are shown in the following table. The salaries used correspond to the maxima of the respective pay scales and in 1984 these were, in actual terms, £17,489 for the principal grade and £24,317 for the assistant secretary grade. The final two columns of the table list the numbers of resignations from these grades in Her Majesty's Treasury since 1975.

Base Rate

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average base rate for each quarter from 1979 onwards; and what real rate of interest this represented in each case; and how these figures compare with those for the United States, Japan, Germany and Australia.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1985, c. 60]: Quarterly data for average United Kingdom base rates appear in "Financial Statistics." Interest rates relevant to bank lending in other countries are published in the OECD's "Financial Statistics Monthly." Since the structure of bank lending varies between countries, there is no guarantee that these interest rates are comparable with United Kingdom base rates.

For Australia and Germany the rates published by the OECD are average rates on particular categories of bank lending. For the United States and Japan they are reference rates similar in concept to United Kingdom bank rate, that is rates which serve as the basis for the pricing structure of bank loans in that country. Even among the latter group, comparison may be complicated by significant differences with regard to both the average maturity of bank lending and the size of the mark-up over the reference rate on the average loan.

Many problems arise in converting data for nominal interest rates into a measure of real interest rates. Some of the issues involved were discussed in an article in the December 1983 Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin, which also presented estimates for a number of countries.

Nationalised Industries (Legislation)

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his reply of 11 February, Official Report, column 62, if he will place in the Library copies of comments received on his consultation paper on nationalised industries legislation.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 12 March 1985, c. 129]: In line with usual practice, I do not consider it appropriate to place these comments in the Library.

NORTHERN IRELAND

H. J. McDonald

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many (a) repair grants and (b) improvement grants have been paid by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to H. J. McDonald at the latest available date;

(2) how many (a) repair grant applications and (b) improvement grant applications have been received by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive from H. J. McDonald at the latest date.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. I understand from the chairman that up to 28 February 1985 240 improvement grant applications have been made to the Northern Ireland Housing Executive by Mr. McDonald, of which 137 have been completed and paid. No applications for repair grants have been made.

Mr. Peter Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much has been paid in (a) repair grants and (b) improvement grants to H. J. McDonald by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive at the latest available date.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive but I understand from the Chairman that the amounts paid out to Mr. McDonald up to 28 February 1985 are:

Repairs Grants	Nil
Improvement Grants	1,171,977
Total	1,171,977

Ards (Roads and Footways)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will introduce legislation to empower Ards borough council to repair pot-holes on public roads and footways within the Ards district area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No. The Local Government Act (Northern Ireland) 1972 already empowers district councils to carry out functions on an agency basis. If there were general support for developments along these lines I would be prepared to give consideration to them.

Container Facilities

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps his Department proposes to take to enable the improvement of container facilities for exporters of goods manufactured in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: Responsibility for the provision of facilities for the handling of containerised goods traffic through Northern Ireland commercial ports rests with the individual port authorities and the stevedoring companies. Grant assistance towards the provision of such facilities is available under the Department of Economic Development's port modernisation grant scheme.

Exporters (Assistance)

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assistance he gives to facilitate the activities of exporters in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: The industrial Development Board provides a wide range of assistance to exporting companies in Northern Ireland. This includes the provision of market intelligence, the organisation and sponsorship of trade missions, the organisation and sponsorship of Northern Ireland participation at trade fairs, and the provision of specialist marketing advice. The market research grant scheme provides generous financial support to encourage local companies to investigate export potential overseas. Additionally the export services of the British Overseas Trade Board are available to Northern Ireland companies through the Industrial Development Board which functions as a regional office of BOTB.

Manufacturing Companies (Railway Sidings)

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to introduce a scheme akin to British Rail's speed-link system, whereby manufacturing companies are encouraged to build a railway siding adjacent to their premises in conjunction with Northern Ireland Railways; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 12 March 1985, c. 125]: I have no such plans.

THE ARTS

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what arrangements are in hand to ensure that the Office of Arts and Libraries complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984, the "Programme of Action on Women in the Civil Service".

Mr. Waldegrave: Equal opportunities policy within the Office of Arts and Libraries follows that for the Cabinet Office (Management and Personnel Office) and so I refer the Hon. Member to the answer given on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Civil Service on 12 March at column 124.

Mr. Biffen: In the course of this Session the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee of the Services Committee will be reviewing the arrangements for Members' parties visiting the Palace of Westminster. I shall draw the hon. Member's question to the attention of the Sub-Committee.

Computerised Tomography Scanning

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the provision of computerised tomography scanning in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It is my intention to make CT scanning readily accessible to patients in Wales. The Department is currently considering a strategy for the phasing of CT scanners to district in Wales which have suitable general hospital accommodation and for making financial assistance available from central sources.

Endoscopy Equipment

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the provision of endoscopy equipment for diagnosing cancer in patients in Wales.

Prisoners

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the treatment of psychological or physiological imbalances as an alternative to prison sentence or as a means of securing early release from prison for convicted sex offenders.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is the practice for prison staff to examine and read letters which prisoners have sent to, or received from (a) hon. Members of Parliament, (b) solicitors, (c) probation officers and (d) social workers.

Mr. Mellor: Correspondence between prisoners and Members of Parliament, probation officers and social workers is examined and read by staff in accordance with Standing Order 5, which is published and a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Correspondence with solicitors is examined and read unless it is about legal proceedings to which the prisoner is a party, in which case, in accordance with prison rule 37A(1), it may be examined but may not be read, unless the governor has reason to suppose that it contains matter not related to the proceedings.

Motorway Speeding

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further modern technology resources he intends to allocate to police departments to enable them to detect more motorway speeding offences.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is for chief officers of police and their police authorities to decide what resources they should allocate to motorway policing. Advice to police forces on speed detection technology is available from scientists in the Department.

Coroners

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to introduce legislation to reform the coroners service in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: We have no immediate plans for legislation to reform the coroners' service, but we will keep the matter under review.

Firearms

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list, by police authority area, the number of current firearms certificates with territorial conditions applicable;

(2) if he will list, by police authority area, the number of current open firearms certificates.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disporportionate cost.

Prisoners (Release on Licence)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners serving life sentences for (a) murder of police or prison officers, (b) murders by shooting in the furtherance of theft, (c) sexual or sadistic murders of children and (d) terrorist murders, were considered for release on licence between January to June 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The information is as follows:

	1983	1984
(a)	Nil	Nil
(b)	Nil	Nil
(c)	8	3
(d)	Nil	Nil

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners serving life sentences for (a) murder of police or prison officers, (b) murders by shooting in the furtherance of theft, (c) sexual or sadistic murders of children and (d) terrorist murders, were granted release on licence between January to June 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The information is as follows:

	1983	1984
(a)	Nil	Nil
(b)	1	Nil
(c)	Nil	Nil
(d)	Nil	Nil

Because of the need for life sentence prisoners to spend a period on the pre-release employment scheme and possibly also at an open prison before release, their cases will normally have been considered by the Parole Board at least 12 months before their release dates.

Manchester University (Incident)

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set up an independent inquiry into the actions of the police in connection with the meeting addressed by himself at Manchester university on 1 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The chief constable of the Greater Manchester police has sent my right hon. and learned Friend a preliminary report on the incident at Manchester university on 1 March and has asked the deputy chief constable of the Avon and Somerset constabulary to review the policing arrangements made for his visit and to investigate and report on any complaints against any police officer arising from police action during the visit. All complaints received in connection with the incident will be recorded and investigated in accordance with section 49 of the Police Act 1964, and will be referred in due course to the Director of Public Prosecutions — where appropriate—and to the Police Complaints Board.

We are satisfied that there is no need for any further form of inquiry.

Winson Green Prison

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of his hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), of 11 February, Official Report, column 14, whether the register of applications to the board of visitors at Winson Green prison contains a reference to his noble Friend Lord Elton in relation to an application from an unsentenced prisoner who had been segregated from other prisoners in November 1984; and why his hon. Friend had previously stated that there was no reference to his noble Friend in any of the records pertaining to the segregation of any unsentenced prisoners at Winson Green prison.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend wrote to the hon. Member on 7 March.

Interception of Communications

Mr. Robin Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to figures published in annexe 2 to Cmnd. 9438 on the number of warrants issued to intercept telecommunications and letters, which Secretaries of State, other than those referred to in paragraph 10 of Cmnd. 9438, are authorised to sign such warrants; and for each year since 1980, how many such warrants have been authorised by individual Departments.

Mr. Brittan: No Secretaries of State other than those referred to in paragraph 10 of Cmnd. 9438 are responsible for the issue of warrants, though it remains the case, as was stated in paragraph 2 of Cmnd. 7873 of April 1980, that if the regular Secretary of State is ill or absent, the power may be exercised on his behalf by another Secretary of State, but this happens comparatively seldom. I do not intend to add to the figures given in annexe 2 to Cmnd. 9438.

PRIME MINISTER

Civil Service Manpower

Q42. Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister if she will compare the reduction in Civil Service manpower with that achieved in local authorities since 1979 in percentage terms.

The Prime Minister: Between mid-1979 and mid-1984, in terms of full-time equivalent staff, employment by local authorities fell by 4 per cent. and employment in the Civil Service (excluding the Northern Ireland Civil Service) fell by 14 per cent.

Coal Industry

Q61. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister what is the latest estimate of the cost of the coal mining dispute over the past 12 months.

The Prime Minister: To the beginning of this year the strike was estimated to have added about £1½ billion to the public sector borrowing requirement in 1984-85. When the Chancellor presents his Budget he will be in a position to give a more up-to-date estimate.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Q64. Mr. Sayeed asked the Prime Minister what information Her Majesty's Government have concerning the rationale behind the United States Government's strategic defence initiative.

The Prime Minister: The present position is set out in the four points President Reagan and I agreed at Camp David in December and reaffirmed in Washington last month. The US strategic defence initiative, which is a research programme permitted under existing US-Soviet agreements, is clearly necessary in order to balance Soviet efforts.

Job Opportunities (Travel Assistance)

Q99. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement about the action the Government are taking to help and encourage people taking up job opportunities in locations which are a considerable distance from their home.

The Prime Minister: The Government have taken action in a number of areas. In the case of housing a number of changes have been made designed wholly or in part to promote mobility. For example we have extended the right to buy and have eased restrictions on private lettings. We have also introduced low cost home ownership initiatives which assist mobility by enabling public sector tenants to buy a home in a new area and by helping owner occupiers to overcome differences in house prices between regions. In the public sector the Government have set up the national mobility scheme and has given secure tenants a statutory right to exchange homes. These measures have made it easier for council tenants to move from one area to another.

The Government have also maintained arrangements, through the Manpower Services Commission's employment transfer and job search schemes, to help fill vacancies for which employers cannot find suitable workers locally, by providing grants to unemployed people to move home to take such jobs or to look for work in other areas. Similar help is also available in certain circumstances to recipients of supplementary benefit from the Department of Health and Social Security.

Through the increasing use of modern technology, the public employment service is becoming better able to circulate details of job opportunities, and particularly vacancies which are hard to fill locally, to jobcentres in other parts of the country.

Engagements

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 March.

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether she will list her official engagements for 14 March.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 March.

Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 March.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 March.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 March.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 14 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I will be having further meetings later today including one with President Mubarak of Egypt.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

RAF Molesworth (CND Campaign)

Mr. Leigh asked the Attorney-General if he will take steps to prosecute the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament for conspiracy to trespass on Ministry of Defence land at RAF Molesworth in connection with the operation of its pledge scheme.

The Attorney-General: The Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament cannot itself be the subject of criminal proceedings although the conduct of individual members may render them liable to prosecution. Trespass on Ministry of Defence land at RAF Molesworth per se does not at present constitute a criminal offence but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has advertised his intention to exercise his powers under part II of the Military Lands Act 1892 and other powers to make bye-laws covering such conduct. By virtue of section 1 of the Criminal Law Act 1977 an agreement between two or more persons to pursue a course of conduct which would necessarily amount to or involve the commission of any offence or offences against those bye-laws could constitute a criminal conspiracy. However, support for the objects of CND by participation in the pledge scheme does not necessarily imply such an agreement and accordingly I do not intend to institute criminal proceedings in respect of its operation.

ENERGY

United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the implications for its relationship with the Department of placing the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority on a trading fund basis from 1 April 1986.

Mr. Goodlad: The authority's work for the Department will be put on a customer-contractor basis. But the nature of the contractual relationship will vary from area to area and the authority will remain an important source of advice on the programmes it executes for the Department, as well as being one of a number of sources of advice available to the Government on nuclear issues generally. No unnecessary apparatus will be built up in the Department to duplicate the resources of the authority.

Cross-Channel Electricity Link

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects the cross-Channel electricity link between France and Britain to come into operation; how much it will cost; what was the British share; what will be the estimated maintenance costs and how they will be divided; what are the main points of the agreement made on its use by the two national generating boards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The first half of the link is expected to be commissioned in autumn this year followed by the second half one year later. The cost of the link is being shared in broadly equal proportions by the Central Electricity Generating Board and by Electricité de France. The CEGB's share is estimated at £330 million. Each utility will be responsible for the maintenance of its own terminal equipment and cable. The costs, which are expected to be low, will be divided accordingly.

The use of the link is governed by a protocol agreement signed by the two utilities in June 1981 which provides for the drawing up of specific commercial agreements from time to time.

Coal Industry

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has about the miners dismissed by the Coal Board in (a) Scotland and (b) the rest of Britain; what is the alleged misconduct for which they have been dismissed, listing in each case the criminal offence of which the miner has been found guilty and the fine imposed by the courts; whether it is a first offence; how many years of service each employee dismissed has given to the coal industry; and what redundancy payment he might have expected if he had applied for redundancy and not been dismissed.

Mr. David Hunt: The dismissal and re-employment of their employees are matters for the National Coal Board. The Board have made it clear that all cases will be considered on their merits. If any person considers that he has been unfairly dismissed he has the right to take his case to an industrial tribunal.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Student Grants

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the total cost to the Exchequer of student maintenance grants in each year since 1970 expressed in the following ways (a) cost terms, (b) indexed, using 1979 as 100 (real terms), (c) including fees and (d) real terms (cash).

Mr. Brooke: The total cost to the Exchequer of student maintenance grants and fees since the 1976-77 financial year expressed in cash terms, cost terms and indexed using 1979 as 100 is as follows:

(£m Financial years)

Pupils (Statistics)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list for each of the last four years (a) the average cost of education per pupil, (b) the percentage of school leavers with two or more A-levels, (c) the percentage of school leavers with five or more O-levels for (i) the Inner London education authority, (ii) the metropolitan districts, (iii) the shire counties and (iv) England.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is as follows:

General Certificate of Secondary Education

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish the national criteria for the General Certificate of Secondary Education; what steps he is taking to ensure that teachers and others directly concerned are fully informed about the new system of examinations; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Department of Education and Science and the Welsh Office are today publishing the first edition of the national criteria for the general certificate of secondary education, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have approved.

The national criteria provide a nationally agreed framework for the GCSE. All GCSE syllabuses and examinations will be based on these criteria, and the Secondary Examinations Council will use them as a basis for monitoring the new examination syllabuses. They consist of general criteria and subject-specific criteria. The general criteria set out the main principles which are to govern all GCSE syllabuses and examinations together with ground rules for the conduct of the examinations. The 20 subject-specific criteria statements will provide the basis for all GCSE syllabuses and examinations in the subject areas concerned, which between them account for the great majority of subject entries in the existing examinations.

My right hon. Friend and I see publication of the national criteria as an historic step. For the first time, the partners in the education service have pooled their wisdom and experience in order to produce nationally agreed statements on course objectives, content and assessment methods for all the subject areas most commonly examined in the final years of compulsory schooling.

The national criteria have been prepared in draft by the Joint Council of GCE and CSE Boards. The texts incorporate many points made, during extended consultations, by schools and colleges, teachers' associations, subject associations, higher education, employers' organisations, the local authority associations, the Secondary Examinations Council and others, including ourselves, and accepted by the Joint Council. We are most grateful to the Joint Council, the Secondary Examinations Council and all the others who have contributed to preparation of the criteria.

The national criteria as now published do not make provision for criteria-related grading. The Secondary Examinations Council has however already embarked on the preparation of grade criteria for this purpose. These will be circulated in draft for consultation and then added to the national criteria, subject by subject, as soon as practicable. The national criteria will also be reviewed and updated regularly, as provided in the general criteria.

The Department and the Welsh Office are also publishing today a general introduction to the GCSE. This describes the main features of the new examination system, the underlying objectives and the policy context. It brings together in one consolidated statement the substance of all previous Government announcements on the GCSE. It is intended as a convenient source of reference for all who are professionally concerned with the new examinations, including the GCSE examining groups, teachers, local education authorities and employers.

Copies of both the national criteria and the general introduction are being placed in the Library. Copies are also being sent to all secondary schools and colleges, local education authorities, examining boards, employers' organisations and others concerned.

DEFENCE

Crown Proceedings Act 1947

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he hopes to complete his review of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947

Mr. Lee: The review of section 10 is continuing but I am as yet unable to say when it will be completed.

County Regiments of Infantry

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to revise the present system of county regiments of infantry with local recruitment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: There are no plans to revise the present system of recruitment to county infantry regiments. Applicants to the infantry are allowed to apply for three regiments and are counselled by recruiting staff when making their choice. Final acceptance to a regiment is dependent upon a number of factors including: the candidate's abilities; the vacancy state in the regiment of the candidate's choice; the needs of the service.

Schools

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many private schools and how many state schools receive grants from his Department for the purchase of military equipment; if he will itemise the equipment and name the schools; and whether his Department also pays travelling allowances to pupils at these schools taking part in training exercises and camps both in the United Kingdom and overseas.

Mr. Lee: I shall answer shortly.

St. Patrick's Barracks, Ballymena

Sir Antony Buck asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is now in a position to make a statement on the future of St. Patrick's barracks at Ballymena.

Mr. Lee: Yes. Following the review of army training carried out by General Groom we have decided that adult training for the Royal Irish Rangers, together with certain Territorial Army and other reserve activities will continue at St. Patrick's barracks, Ballymena. However, junior soldiers of the regiment will in future be trained at Ouston, Northumberland with their junior leaders and the juniors of certain other Regiments. We are also examining ways in which the accommodation at St. Patrick's released by the move of the juniors might be utilised for other military purposes, possibly by the TA. Overall, the reorganisation of junior training is expected to achieve civilian manpower savings of about 100, release significant numbers of military personnel to more operational duties and produce capital savings of about £8 million.

TRANSPORT

Motorways (Speed Limits)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to increase speed limits from 70 to 80 miles per hour.

Mrs. Chalker: The Transport Committee in its report on road safety recommended that the motorway speed limit should be raised to 80 mph for a trial period. I shall give my views on this particular recommendation, when I respond to its report as a whole, which I shall be doing as soon as possible.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements are in hand to ensure that his Department complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the "Programme of Action on Women in the Civil Service".

Mr. Ridley: Existing joint management and trade union machinery is being used at departmental and national level to review such matters as promotion, selection for training and the incidence of part-time working. Women are being encouraged to attend courses (particularly developmental courses) and to make the maximum use of the training opportunities available. Use is being made of the Civil Service college course in middle management for women only and we are considering how best to incorporate such courses into our own Departmental training programme.

Road Accident Statistics

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the number of accidents involving death or serious injury on each motorway, expressed as a percentage of the length of the motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: The information is as follows:

Roads

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has concerning the comparative levels of expenditure upon new road construction in the United Kingdom, in each of the other member countries of the European Economic Community, the United States of America and Canada, both as a total sterling equivalent and a percentage of gross national product; and what total new mileage of roads this figure represented in each of those countries in the latest year for which figures are available both in absolute terms and as a percentage of existing road mileage.

Mrs. Chalker: I regret that the information requested is not available. Accurate figures for the size of the road network and details of road mileages completed annually are available only for the United Kingdom national road system. The Department does not keep any information on other countries' road programmes. If my hon. Friend wishes to raise a particular point, perhaps he would write to me.

Missing Vessels

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his reply of 5 March to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, he will give details of compensation paid to the owners of the ships and relatives of men missing in each case.

Mr. David Mitchell: No details are available to my Department since it does not pay compensation in such cases and there is no requirement for it to do so.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Overseas Trade Board

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the number of small companies who participated in British Overseas Trade Board overseas trade fairs in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: Annual details of the size of companies which have used the British Overseas Trade Board's schemes of support at overseas trade fairs are not known. But an independent consultants's survey in 1983 established that overall about 60 per cent. of the exhibitors who have used these schemes have less than 100 employees. An internal study in 1984 showed that about 70 per cent. have 200 employees or less.

Statistics about the number of occasions on which particular companies have exhibited at each particular trade fair where there is a BOTB group have been kept only since 1981. The pattern of first-time exhibitors has been as follows:

	Number
1981	3,350
1982	3,737
1983	3,335
1984	3,193

There is no reason to suppose that the pattern was different before 1981 or that the proportion of small companies among the newcomers is less than the overall proportion of small companies in BOTB assisted groups of exhibitors.

Scrap Metal

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received concerning the increase in the price of scrap; if he has made any estimate of or has any information about the impact of this on the United Kingdom foundry industry; by how much the price has risen in each quarter since 1982; and what powers he has to introduce a system of export licences.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Textiles and Clothing

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the full figures for the United Kingdom's exports and imports of textile and clothing products for 1984 and the figures indicating the utilisation of multi-fibre arrangement quotas in 1984 will be available.

Mr. Channon: Detailed trade figures for 1984 have been published in the December 1984 issue of the "Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom", which is available in the House of Commons Library. It is expected that 1984 figures for "Overseas trade analysed in terms of industries" will be published in the "Business Monitor MQ10", which is also received by the Library, by the end of April. This gives an analysis of exports and imports classified according to the industries of which they are principal products — and is used, for example, to measure import penetration. Final licensing statistics relating to the utilisation of multi-fibre arrangement quotas for 1984 will also be known at the end of April.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which multi-fibre arrangement quotas for the United Kingdom in 1983 met the conditions laid down in paragraph 2 of article 5 of the European Community Council Regulation No.3 589/82 of 23 December 1982, which govern the use of the anti-surge mechanism.

Mr. Channon The MFA quotas — within MFA Group 1, to which Article 5 applies — which in 1983 represented more than 2·5 per cent. of total Community imports in 1980 for that category — more than 1 per cent. in the case of Hong Kong, Macao and South Korea —and in which imports in 1983 represented more than 50 per cent. of the quota in question, were as follows:

Political Donations

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the Government have imposed any conditions in relation to donations to political parties on those companies which have been sold from the public sector since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: No. These companies are subject to the same requirements as any other companies registered under the Companies Acts.

Trade (Departmental Promotion)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the successes of his Department in stimulating increased trade and, in particular, exports in the north-west of England during 1984.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Business Start-ups (Statistics)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make it his practice to compile statistical records of business start-ups based upon income tax and corporation tax returns rather than value added tax returns; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I shall have to consult the appropriate authorities, the Inland Revenue, about the practicability of my hon. Friend's suggestion and will write to him in due course.

United States (High Technology Exports)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will obtain and place in the Library a copy of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development report prepared for that organisation by Dr.

Stuart Macdonald entitled "The Sisyphus Syndrome — Implications of US Controls of High Technology Exports"; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the complete range of tourism services provided within the countries of the European Economic Community which attract value added tax together with the individual percentage rates curently being levied.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have been asked to reply.

The percentage rates of value added tax applying to the main areas of tourist expenditure in EC member states are understood to be as set out in the following table. Greece has not yet introduced a value added tax.

EMPLOYMENT

Pay Increases

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the percentage increase in pay since 1979 to the latest available date of (a) male manual workers and (b) male non-manual workers, and the same for females.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: According to the "New Earnings Survey", the percentage increases in average gross weekly earnings of full-time adult employees working a full week between April 1979 and April 1984 have been as follows:

	Percentage
Males
Manual occupations	66·5
Non-manual occupations	87·9
Females
Manual occupations	69·0
Non-manual occupations	86·7

Changes in average earnings will reflect changes in the composition of employment and do not necessarily imply corresponding changes in rates of pay for comparable jobs.

Earnings

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the movement of the percentage of the median of the top decile and top quartile of male earnings since 1979 and the bottom decile and quartile.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The requested details, in terms of gross weekly earnings of full-time adult employees working a full week, are published in table 30 of "New Earnings Survey 1984", part B, a copy of which is in the Library.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will list the number of people in part-time employment in the month of January for the years 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1985;

(2) if he will list the number of people in full-time employment in the month of January for the years 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1985.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) on 18 February 1985 at column 348.

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of people known to be self-employed in the month of January for the years 1960, 1965, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1985.

Mr. Alan Clark: Estimates of the number of self-employed people in Great Britain are only available quarterly from March 1965. The following table gives the information for March 1965, March 1970, March 1975, March 1980 and September 1984, the latest available date.

Self-employed persons—Great Britain

	Number
March 1965	1,620,000
March 1970	1,820,000
March 1975	1,934,000

September 1984	2,465,000

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current percentage of unemployment in Cambridgeshire; and how this figure compares with (a) Northern Ireland, (b) development areas, (c) intermediate areas and (d) non-assisted areas.

Mr. Alan Clark: Following is the information, which is available in the Library, for 10 January 1985.

	Unemployment rate

Cambridgeshire	10·2
Northern Ireland	21·2
Development Areas (Great Britain)	20·2

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the numbers in the following age categories (a) 16 to 18-year-olds, (b) 18 to 25-year-olds, (c) 25 to 50-year-olds and (d) those over 50 years of age who were: (i) registered as unemployed and (ii) on a government training scheme in (1) Scotland and (2) the United Kingdom at the latest available date and on the equivalent date in each of the last six years.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1985, c. 362]: The available information on unemployment is shown in the following table. Separate information for those aged under 50 or 50 or over is not available for all the dates shown. I regret that, with the exception of the youth training scheme, the information as requested by age group is not available for Government training schemes.

At the end of January 1985, 34,117 young people were on the youth training scheme in Scotland who had entered the scheme when aged under 18 and the comparable figure for Great Britain was 292,342. The equivalent figure at the end of January 1984 were: Scotland—29,078 and Great Britain—256,470.

Note:

The basis of the unemployment count changed in October 1982 with the introduction of voluntary registration at Jobcentres.

Comparisons are also affected by the provisions of the 1983 Budget which means that some men, mainly aged 60 years and over, no longer need to sign on in order to receive supplementary benefits or national insurance credits. It is estimated that some 162,000 men in the United Kingdom (of whom 11,000 were in Scotland) were affected.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the proportion of married males and females unemployed for a year or more aged under 25 years, 25 to 44 years and 45-plus years, respectively, who were unskilled or semi-skilled, had dependent children aged under 16 years, and had an unemployed or economically inactive spouse.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1985, c. 47]: The following table gives the available information for Great Britain using revised results of the 1983 Labour Force Survey.

North-West

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment, if he will list the successes of his Department in reducing unemployment in the north-west of England in 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: Details of the number of people in the north-west who benefited from my Department's employment and training measures in 1984 are as follows:

- there were 24,474 entrants to the community programme, which provides temporary employment for long-term unemployed adults;
- there were 13,974 successful applications for support under the young workers scheme, which is designed to help young people into jobs;
- 8,363 people started up their own businesses under the enterprise allowance scheme;
- 3,718 older workers gave up work early and released their jobs to unemployed people under the job release scheme;
- there were 1,471 entrants to the community industry scheme, which provides temporary jobs for personally and socially disadvantaged young people;
- employers split 38 jobs, involving 76 employees, under the job splitting scheme which encourages employers to open up more part-time opportunities for unemployed people.

In addition, there were 57,222 entrants to the youth training scheme, which provides up to a year's high quality training to enable young people to compete more effectively in the labour market.

But the only way to achieve a substantial impact on unemployment in the north-west and elsewhere is for the Government to maintain their economic policies while encouraging greater enterprise, flexibility and competitiveness in industry and the labour market.

ENVIRONMENT

Hospitals (Drainage and Sewerage Systems)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will allocate additional resources to water authorities to enable them to undertake thorough inspections of drainage and sewerage systems in the vicinity of hospitals for detecting rat or cockroach populations with contagious diseases.

Mr. Macfarlane: If the hon. Member is aware of a specific case, she should refer it to the regional water authority which has both the powers and the resources to deal with infestation in sewers.

Local Government Bill

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give a breakdown of the items mentioned in the financial memorandum of the Local Government Bill, stating that the Bill will save £100 million of council expenditure and cut 7,100 jobs.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have nothing to add to the information given in my right hon. Friend's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) on 30 November, at column 611.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 31 March of each of the years 1974 to 1984 together with the latest figures the number of local authority employees in England, analysed by part-time/full-time status within sex, covered by each of the items (i) to (v) in Part III of his consultation document "Competition in the Provision of Local Authority Services"; and if he will reconcile these numbers with the published Joint Manpower Watch.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information requested is not available centrally. The Joint Manpower Watch does not collect information for this detailed level of service, nor does it collect information about the sex of employees.

Acid Deposition

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the instances known to his Department of damage caused by acid deposition.

Mr. Waldegrave: Acid deposition can damage both the natural and the urban environment, but it is not the sole cause of environmental acidification and the damage it causes cannot readily be distinguished from other forms of damage. It is therefore difficult to establish the extent to which deposition at current concentrations contribute to damage. As I said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) on 11 March, at column 13 my Department has a substantial programme of monitoring and research and I expect reports within the next 18 months which should help in defining the scale of the problem and in elucidating its causes.

Litter Act 1983

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the cost of implementing section 4 of the Litter Act 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The cost of implementation of this section was last estimated in 1978 when the cost of drawing up litter plans was put at £0·25 million and the cost of implementing them was estimated as £1·25 million per annum.

In view of the financial implications and the continued need for restraint in public expenditure we have no plans at the moment to reconsider our decision to defer implementation.

Gipsies

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what steps he takes to satisfy himself of the adequacy of the provision of facilities for gipsies under the Caravan Sites Act 1968, and of the criteria applied in choosing designated gipsy sites; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether he will review the criteria laid down by his Department for the selection and designation of gipsy sites by local authorities.

Mr. Macfarlane: My Department monitors progress on the provision of authorised sites through periodic returns from local authorities, summaries of which are placed in the Library. The arrangements for approval of Exchequer capital grant for local authorities' gipsy site proposals ensure, so far as possible, that the facilities to be provided on such sites are both adequate for their purpose and reflect a due regard for economy. I am satisfied that local authorities already have sufficient guidance in departmental circulars and other supplementary advice issued from time to time to enable them to carry out their statutory functions of selecting and designating sites.

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies he has made of social, environmental and, where appropriate, permanent housing provision for gipsy caravan dwellers both outside and within the Romany category in continental categories; and if he will publish the findings.

Mr. Macfarlane: No such studies have been made. The arrangements in present UK legislation are sufficient to enable authorities to make adequate provision for gipsies (as defined in the 1968 Act) including the provision of housing accommodation where this is appropriate.

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what review he has made of improved housing provision for gipsy caravan dwellers not within the Romany category; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: It is not practicable to distinguish between Romanies and other gipsies. I understand, from recent inquiries made by my Department, that a number of authorities have positively encouraged gipsy caravan dwellers to move into permanent housing where this has seemed appropriate and likely to be successful.

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what steps he plans to take to protect the gipsy community and designated gipsy sites from incursions by non-gipsy itinerants;

(2) what estimate or survey has been undertaken by his Department to establish how many people who are not gipsies are benefiting from the Caravan Sites Act 1968.

Mr. Macfarlane: As with the initial provision of sites, their subsequent management is the responsibility of the local authorities, part of whose task will be to ensure as far as possible that the sites are not used or invaded by other than the gipsies for whom they are provided.

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of gipsies, or gipsy families, as defined under the Caravan Sites Act 1968, for whom sites have been found since the Act came into operation; and what are the approximate numbers for whom designated sites have still to be found.

Mr. Macfarlane: The available information relates to caravans rather than families. In July 1984 there were 3,913 caravans on council sites, 1,748 on authorised private sites and 3,930 on unauthorised sites.

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of sites which have been designated by local authorities for gipsies since the introduction of the Caravan Sites Act 1968; and how many further sites are currently under examination.

Mr. Macfarlane: There are at present some 230 official gipsy sites in England compared with about 20 when the Act came into force in 1970. The number of potential sites under examination is a matter for the local authorities in whose areas gipsies are as yet without adequate accommodation.

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the implications for the total number of gipsies covered by the Caravan Sites Act 1968 of the adoption of a more restrictive definition of gipsy status; if he will list the alternative definitions which he has considered and the impact each would have on the number of gipsies covered by the Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: I refer my right hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) on 20 February at column 482. My Department's research, while re-affirming the appropriateness of the present definition, had examined the possibilities and problems involved in attempting to restrict the definition.

Merseyside

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Merseyside.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him on Monday 11 March at column 708

Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Structures

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the significance of the limitation given in his Department's circular 28/84 to the eligibility of owners of prefabricated reinforced concrete houses designed before 1960; and whether dwellings designed after 1960 are not expected to be liable to cracking and concrete spalling to a significant extent as a result of corrosion of the embedded steel reinforcement.

Mr. Gow: There are two distinct types of prefabricated concrete dwellings in this country. Those designed before the wars and immediately after the last war were designed to provide, in the main, two-storey houses and to be assembled by hand. That meant that the prefabricated sections had to be very light and slender. Because they are slender there is little protection for the steel reinforcement and the Building Research Establishment has found that all prefabricated reinforced concrete houses built before 1960 are likely to be affected by the processes of carbonation and attack of chlorides which will lead to corrosion of the reinforcement and consequent cracking of the concrete.

Prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings designed after 1960 were generally made by casting whole walls and floors as single components. These are massive and robust and were used to build not only houses but flats up to 20 or more storeys high. Because of differences in design and improvements in the quality of reinforced concrete, the steel reinforcement in these components is better protected. There is no evidence that the main load-bearing components of these buildings generally are liable to the rapid deterioration and consequent cracking and spalling found in prefabricated reinforced concrete houses of the previous generation.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will assess the extent to which all buildings designed after 1960 and using reinforced concrete structures are likely to be affected by the processes of carbonation and attack by chlorides.

Mr. Gow: The study of the effect of carbonation and attack by chlorides on reinforced concrete structures generally has been a main part of the Building Research Establishment's research programme since 1975. The general principles have been established and published in 1982 in BRE digests 263, 264 and 265, copies of which are in the Library. The processes are complex and the way in which a particular building or class of buildings may be affected is not easily established without testing. It is for individual owners to inspect their buildings as necessary but, as I announced on 23 October last at columns 554-55, the Building Research Establishment is now giving special and urgent attention to the study of large panel system dwellings designed after 1960, which will include investigation of the effect of carbonation and attack by chlorides.

Infrastructure Construction

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning the comparative levels of expenditure upon infrastructure construction in the United Kingdom, in each of the other member countries of the European Economic Community, the United States of America and Canada as a total figure in sterling equivalent and as a percentage of gross national product.

Mr. Gow: I regret that reliable data concerning the levels of expenditure upon infrastructure are not readily available for international comparisons.

North-West (Construction Industry)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to encourage the construction industry in the north-west of England during 1984.

Mr. Gow: Total output of the construction industry in the north-west grew by 9 per cent. in 1984, reflecting the success of the Government's economic policies. New orders grew by 4 per cent. My hon. Friend will be familiar with the work of the Merseyside task force; and with the substantial roads programme described by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport to the Building Employers Confederation at its regional meeting on 1 February.

Housing Construction

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning the comparative levels of expenditure upon housing construction in the United Kingdom, in each of the other member countries of the European Economic Community, the United States of America and Canada as a total figure in sterling equivalent and as a percentage of gross national product.

Mr. Gow: International differences in house building costs, population growth and internal migration affect comparisons of this kind.

The available information is given in the table.

Residential construction as a percentage of GDP in 1982

Country	Percentage
Belgium	3·5
Denmark	3·5
France	5·3
Germany (Federal Republic)	6·1
Greece	5·3
Ireland	5·4
Italy	5·3
Luxembourg	4·9
Netherlands	5·2
United Kingdom	*3·4
Canada	3·5
United States	3·0

* Including expenditure on major improvements for residential properties.

In 1983 expenditure in the United Kingdom on residential construction as a percentage of GDP increased to 3·6 per cent.

Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 (Land Sales)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if any of the land that was the subject of directions made under section 98 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 has been sold by the landowning local authorities concerned.

Mr. Macfarlane: I understand that Oldham and Darlington borough councils decided on 7 March to accept tenders for their sites. There is little doubt that the sales will be completed in due course. The Government is determined that where public bodies own land which is unused or underused they should take early action to bring it into use or dispose of it. The directions that have been made are evidence of our resolve.

Rate Capped Local Authorities

Mr. Watson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to enter into negotiations with any of the rate capped local authorities.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: On 7 March, or shortly after, the four precepting rate limited authorities set precepts within the precept limits approved by Parliament. Portsmouth, Basildon and Brent have set rates within their rate limits. However, many of the rate limited rating authorities and some other high spending Labour-controlled councils, have claimed that they have taken a principled stand against the provisions of the Rates Act 1984, by refusing to fix a rate. In fact they have done nothing of the sort. Each council knew quite well that it did not have to fix a rate on 7 March, and that a decision could be postponed without immediate legal consequences. The terms of the resolutions they have passed clearly demonstrate this.

These authorities have repeatedly said that they intend to "negotiate" with Government to seek the withdrawal of the Rates Act, the rewriting of the rate support grant settlement and the payment of substantial sums in additional grant to support higher levels of spending. Their spokesman, Councillor Blunkett, has written to me asking to bring a group of councils to engage in such "negotiations".

I wish to make two things clear. First, there is no question of the Government reconsidering the rate limits or the precept limits or the rate support grant settlement for 1985-86, all of which Parliament has approved. There will be no "negotiations". Secondly, while I am prepared to meet the local authority associations to discuss issues of general concern, or to meet individual authorities where they have genuine local issues to raise with me, I see no purpose in a further meeting with the ad hoc and unrepresentative group led by Councillor Blunkett. Nearly half of that group have now complied with the law and set rates or precepts. I look to the remainder to follow this example.

No rating authority can now have any excuse for delay in carrying out its duty to make a lawful rate. But if any authorities are still considering delay they should be clear about the consequences.

In addition to covering their own expenditure, rating authorities must rate to cover precepts issued to them by county councils and other bodies. In London the first payments in respect of the Metropolitan police precept and the London Regional Transport levy fall due on 12 April. Where rating authorities fail to pay over an instalment by the due date, it is open to the precepting authority to charge interest on the amount outstanding.

For block grant purposes, where an authority fails to provide an estimate of its spending for the forthcoming year, I must make my own best estimate of their expenditure to calculate their grant entitlement.

The Government have carefully considered their liability to make certain payments to rating authorities where no rate has been made. I am advised that in these circumstances the following payments should not be made —because the rates to which they relate are not being paid—rate rebate subsidy; grants towards rate relief for disabled persons and institutions; compensation to local authorities for loss of rate income in enterprise zones; and contributions in lieu of rates on Crown and diplomatic properties. Authorities will not therefore begin to receive these payments until they fix their rates.

Finally, I should remind all councillors that if a failure to rate leads to a loss or deficiency and the auditor considers that this results from wilful misconduct, then those responsible may be surcharged. If the total loss amounts to more than £2,000, disqualification follows automatically. In the light of the statements that have been made by certain councillors about their intention to break the law, I have no doubt that auditors will be watching developments very closely.

CIVIL SERVICE

Civil Servants (Courses)

Mr. Eggar asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will list the names, grades, present and future jobs, if known, of all the civil servants who are currently attending the course described in the document "Top Management".

Mr. Hayhoe: The names, grades and present jobs of the civil servants concerned are as follows:

Their future employment is a matter for their Departments to decide. Copies of the "Top Management Programme" booklet are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Outgoers Scheme

44. Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in the operation of the outgoers scheme in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: One hundred and ninety five producers have ceased production under the terms of the Milk Supplementary Levy (Outgoers) Scheme, releasing approximately 12·5 million litres of quota in a full year. Only two applications remain to be finalised.

Gas Industry (Newry and Belfast)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the latest estimated cost of the closure of the gas industry in Newry and Belfast.

Dr. Boyson: The cost of the closure of the gas industry in Newry and the greater Belfast area (that is the Belfast, Bangor and Newtownards undertakings) has been estimated at some £80 million. This figure includes deficit support for 1984-85.

Kilroot Power Station

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made, in considering whether to approve the conversion of Kilroot power station from oil to coal or lignite-firing, of the current capacity of the heavy engineering and plant fabrication industries in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson: Following any decision to convert Kilroot power station from oil to solid fuel firing, the placing of contracts for the work would be a matter for the Northern Ireland Electricity Service. The service is very conscious of the importance of using local sources where appropriate.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he is yet in a position to make an announcement on his decision on the conversion of Kilroot power station from oil to coal or lignite firing.

Dr. Boyson: No; but I hope to make an announcement soon.

Lignite

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the latest estimated tonnage of lignite reserves in the Ballymoney area of North Antrim; what evaluation his Department has made of their potential for commercial development; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: The results of an exploratory shallow drilling programme, commissioned by the Department of Economic Development, were made available in November 1984 for purchase by the mining industry so that it can apply for prospecting licences by 28 June 1985 and undertake the detailed investigation and further exploration that will be necessary to evaluate the precise size of deposits and their economic and commercial potential. Until this work has been done, it will not be possible to provide a precise estimate of lignite deposits in the Ballymoney area.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether his Department's programme of research into the use of Crumlin lignite for fuelling power stations has been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: Studies commissioned by the Department of Economic Development, to establish the uses to which Northern Ireland's indigenous lignite might be put, highlighted the potential benefit to be derived from using lignite as a fuel source for the generation of electricity. A detailed test programme is also necessary to establish the technical and economic criteria for using lignite in electricity generation. This test programme, which is the responsibility of the Northern Ireland Electricity Service, is currently under way and will continue for some time.

SCOTLAND

Woodlands and Conifer Forests

45. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government regarding the development of (a) farm woodlands and (b) upland conifer forests.

Mr. John MacKay: It is the policy of the Government to encourage the development of both farm woodlands and upland conifer forests.

Fishing Industry

46. Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received from the Scottish Fishermen's Federation regarding the implications for the fishing industry of the proposed accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend has received no recent representations from the Scottish Fishermen's Federation on this subject. Officials of my right hon. Friend's Department have kept the federation informed of developments in the negotiations.

Cormorants

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of cormorants in Scotland; and if their number is declining.

Mr. Ancram: I understand from the Nature Conservancy Council that the last survey of cormorants was carried out in 1969-70 when it was established that there were 3,671 breeding pairs in Scotland. There is no evidence to show that their number is declining, but I understand that a pilot study is being undertaken by the British Trust for Ornithology later this year which will seek to determine the present number of cormorants.

Sickness and Absenteeism

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of days lost through sickness and absenteeism by employees in each of the health board areas in Scotland for the latest convenient year; and if he will make a statement on how this rate compares with rates of sickness and absenteeism both in previous years for health board employees and in other sectors of employment.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available from the statistics held centrally.

Housing Defects Act 1984

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will arrange for the booklet on the Housing Defects Act 1984 to be issued to all relevant local authorities, as a matter of urgency.

Mr. Ancram: Work on the preparation of the booklet is almost complete and copies will be sent to local authorities as soon as possible.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what sum was allocated in the housing capital allocation to cover remedial work for local authority houses covered by the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Ancram: The Housing Defects Act 1984 does not apply to local authority houses. In determining local authorities' housing capital allocations we pay close attention to their planned expenditure on remedial work to structurally defective houses of all types, as set out in their forward capital programmes, although we have not earmarked specific sums within the allocations for this purpose.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make it his policy for semi-detached houses joined together to be treated together if one is privately-owned and one tenanted for the purposes of the Housing Defects Act.

Mr. Ancram: No. The private owner whose house is to be reinstated under the Housing Defects Act should be able to have repairs carried out to his property without simultaneous action being taken by the local authority on the adjoining house. If the local authority is taking action to deal with its half of a semi-detached block and no action has been taken by the adjoining private owner, then it would be possible for that owner, assuming his eligibility for assistance by way of reinstatement grant, to ask the authority to do the work on his house at the same time. But the authority would have to satisfy itself that the method of repair would be likely to make the house suitable security for a loan in the private sector.

Pesticides

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland by what form of monitoring the Forestry Commission ascertains that aerial pesticide spraying carried out on its behalf has been carried out effectively on, and only on, the areas prescribed for spraying.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission monitors aerial applications of insecticides by making it a requirement for the contractors to have an electronic track guidance system and to provide a print out of the track flown. Contractors are also required to use a droplet size which maximises deposition on the target foliage and the larvae feeding on it. Advice on the latter is obtained from the Cranfield Institute of Technology. Assessments of the target pest population shortly before and after spraying are made to determine the effectiveness of application.

The effectiveness of herbicide spraying is assessed by plotting the resultant kill of herbage. This has shown application to be very precise.

Forestry (Felling Licences)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) whether there are any cases in the last three years when applications for felling licences for conversion of woodlands to agriculture were refused by the Forestry Commission, even though the agriculture department concerned had confirmed that the proposed conversion would make a significant contribution to the viability and economy of the remainder of the agricultural holding, and there were no other objections to the proposed felling from any other authorities consulted;

(2) on how many occasions in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1985-86 to date the Forestry Commission consulted the agriculture departments over applications for felling licences to clear woodland for agricultural purposes.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, pursuant to his answer of 22 February 1985, Official Report, column 619, the consultation procedures between the Forestry Commission and agriculture departments outline on page 4 of the Commission's booklet, Consultation Procedures for Forestry Grants and Felling Permissions, are currently carried out.

Mr. John MacKay: These procedures are carried out in all cases. If I may expand on my reply given to the hon. Member on 22 February 1985, at column 619, the Agriculture Departments do not normally give the Forestry Commission advice, such, on whether felling licence applications should be granted for the conversion of woodland to agricultural use. What they do provide is an assessment of the impact that any such conversion would have on the viability of the agricultural holding. This assessment is taken into account by the Commission in deciding whether there are grounds for making an exception to its general policy of a presumption against conversion.

Auchincruive College and Hannah Research Institute

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what financial allocation has been made to Auchincruive college and to the Hannah research institute for 1985-86; how this compares in real terms with allocations over the past five years; and what are the manpower implications in both cases.

Mr. John MacKay: No financial allocations for 1985-86 have yet been made to these bodies. Allocations will follow the publication of Supply Estimates later this month. My right hon. and noble Friend will write to the hon. Member in due course providing the information he has requested.

NHS Charges

Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much estimated extra income will be raised in Scotland by increased National Health Service charges; and what proportion of expenditure on the National Health Service in Scotland is represented by the new charges.

Mr. John MacKay: It is estimated that the increases in NHS charges to be introduced from 1 April 1985 will provide £6·9 million additional income for the NHS in Scotland in 1985-86. Total income from charges in the year is expected to amount to 2·0 per cent. of estimated total gross expenditure on the NHS.

Severe Disablement Allowance

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements are being made for immediate payment of the severe disablement allowance to those in Scotland suffering from blindness or partial blindness.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1985, c. 46.]: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) on 12 March at columns 119-20. Payment of severe disablement allowance is made as soon as the adjudicating authorities have decided that the statutory conditions are satisfied.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Graduated Pension Fund

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what changes have occurred recently in the valuation of the graduated pension fund;

(2) how large is the graduated pension fund;

(3) by how much the graduated pension fund has increased in each year since its inception.

Mr. Whitney: Contributions in respect of the graduated pension scheme which ran from 1961 to 1975 were paid into the national insurance fund. Graduated benefit continues to be paid from the main NI fund. The current (November 1984) value of one unit of graduated pension is £4·67 and the maximum amount of graduated benefit payable is currently £4·02 per week for a man and £3·36 for a woman. Every £7·50 (£9 for women) paid is graduated contributions earned one unit of graduated pensions.

Drug Addiction

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he proposes to take to improve services for those addicted to tranquillisers and sedatives; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: General hospital and community health and family practitioner services are available to those addicted to tranquillisers and sedatives. In addition, funds have been allocated under the drugs initiative to three local voluntary organisations providing services specifically for those addicted to tranquillisers and many other projects offer services to this group as well as to those misusing other drugs. Guidelines on good clinical practice in the treatment of drug misuse have been issued to all doctors. They contain sdvice on the addictive potential of benzodiazepines and on withdrawal procedures. Barbiturates have from the beginning of this year been included within the scope of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those voluntary organisations concerned with those who have become addicted to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives; which of them have applied to his Department for grant; what sum was applied for in each case; for what purpose; and what has been the result.

Mr. John Patten: We are only aware of voluntary organisations concerned with those who have become addicted to prescribed tranquillisers and sedatives which have applied for grants under the drugs initiative. These are:

Voluntary Organisation	Amount Applied for	Description of project	Result of Application
TRANX	£123,683	Self-help group for tranquilliser users (Harrow)	£89,183 approved
Tranx Release (Northampton)	£29,892	Advisory and Self-help service for tranquilliser users	£29,892 approved
West Cumbria MIND (Copeland)	£85,442	Advisory and Self-help service for tranquilliser users	£85,442 approved
Newcastle Association for Mental Health	£99,300	Tranquilliser withdrawal support project	Under consideration
North Staffs Depressives Advisory Service	£200,000	Tranquilliser advisory/ counselling service	Under consideration
Haringey Women and Health Centre	£210,075	Service for tranquilliser users	Under consideration

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which parts of the United Kingdom have been selected as areas of priority for receiving initial sets of the leaflets to be sent out by his Department to parents about teenage drug addiction.

Mr. John Patten: Initial sets of the Department's leaflets for parents about drug misuse are now being distributed as quickly as possible to all health authorities, social services departments, family practitioner committees, general medical practitioners, local authorities, community health councils and appropriate voluntary organisations throughout England.

I understand my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, is undertaking a similar exercise throughout Wales.

In addition, the leaflets will be offered direct to parents through national press advertising starting in the next few days.

Retirement Pensioners

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of retirement pensioners in Scotland with increments, analysed by category, age and proportion of all retirement pensioners, together with the average amount of increment.

Mr. Newton: The information requested is in the table:

† Includes wives whose pension, based on own insurance, is "topped up" under Section 10 of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975
‡ Average amount of graduated pension relates only to those pensioners with entitlement to graduated pension and not to all pensioners

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of retirement pensioners in Scotland in receipt of additional component and guaranteed minimum pension entitlement; and what is the average amount.

Mr. Newton: At 30 September 1983 there were, in Scotland, 86,170 recipients of additional component and 49,300 recipients of guaranteed minimum pension. The average amounts in payment were £2·49 and £2·34 respectively.

Waiting Lists (Cornwall)

Mr. Harris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current waiting list for hip replacement operations in Cornwall; and what steps are being taken to reduce the list.

Mr. John Patten: Waiting list information is available centrally by the specialty of treatment and not by operation. My hon. Friend may wish to write to the chairman of the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly health authority which may be able to let him have the required information.

Mr. Harris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current waiting list for rheumatology treatment in Cornwall; and what steps are being taken to reduce the list.

Mr. John Patten: The number of persons on National Health Service inpatient waiting lists for admission to rheumatology departments in the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly district health authority on 30 September 1984, the latest date for which information is available centrally, was 59 (provisional).

For the second part of his question I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. and learned Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 7 February at column 683.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to revise the capital disregard level set out in part III of schedule 1 to the Supplementary Benefit Act 1976.

Mr. John Patten: A consultative document on a possible revised scheme for new assessment regulations, including the treatment of capital, for the purposes of charges for local authority residential accommodation was issued early last year. We will be giving further consideration to the matter in the context of the outcome of the supplementary benefit review and taking into account comments received on the proposals in the consultative document.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in pursuance of the answer of 11 March, he will notify the hon. Member for Walsall, North when the information sought in the original question is available.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will write to the hon. Member when the information is available.

Drug Abusers

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a full list of all those organisations which have received financial assistance from the £10 million allocated for drug abusers, indicating how much each has received and for what purpose.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is in the table:

"Support for the Elderly"

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take following the recent report of the Audit Commission on "Support for the Elderly".

Mr. John Patten: Most of the recommendations of the Audit Commission report on managing social services for the elderly are primarily addressed to local authorities and will be for consideration by them. Those addressed to central Government will be considered by the Departments responsible.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of persons eligible for exemption from prescription charges on low income grounds in 1981 and 1983, the number of persons entitled to full remission of dental and optical charges on low income grounds in 1981 and 1983 and the percentage of those entitled in each category who claimed exemption or remission.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This information is not available. Eligibility for exemption and remission on low income grounds, as distinct from automatic exemption and remission, is determined only when claimed and is dependent on the claimant's financial circumstances at that time. The number of persons who received full remission of dental charges on low income grounds was 94,000 in 1981 and 162,000 in 1983. Corresponding figures cannot be separated out from the total number of exemption and remissions for prescription and optical charges. The totals were:—

(England only)	1981	1983
Number of prescription items for which exemption was given	205,000,000	227,000,000
Number of optical dispensings for which charges were remitted in full or in part	815,000	1,121,000

Tranquillisers and Sedatives

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of prescriptions for, and the total amount prescribed of (a) tranquillisers and (b) sedatives in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information is available only from 1975 onwards, and for tranquillisers and sedatives taken together. The number of prescriptions for them in each of the years 1975-83 was as follows:

Year	(Thousands)
1975	20,868
1976	21,190
1977	20,836
1978	21,028
1979	20,516
1980	18,920
1981	18,378
1982	17,916
1983	14,657

Figures are England only and are derived from a 1 in 200 sample of all prescriptions. The large reduction between 1982 and 1983 is due mainly to the reclassification of certain drugs as anti-emetics rather than sedatives or tranquillisers.

Disabled People (Organisations)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of 28 February, Official Report, column 269, concerning grants to organisations representing the disabled, if he will give for those 11 organisations receiving an annual grant of over £200,000 from his Department, a summary of their objectives and functions, their total annual income and the number of years for which they have been receiving a grant from his Department.

Mr. Newton: Listed are those organisations specifically dealing with disability which received a grant of £200,000 or more from the Department in 1983-84 under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 (General Scheme). The first year in which they received a section 64 grant is given in brackets.

Grants made to certain disability organisations under Section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 - General Scheme - in 1983-84

	Amount (£)
Disabled Living Foundation	256,000	(1972-73)
MENCAP	256,917	(1981-82)
Motability	331,228	(1977-78)
National Association for Mental Health	350,000	(1976-77)
Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation	240,000	(1977-78)
Royal National Institute for the Blind (Embossed Literature Service)	240,000	*(1948)

It would be for the organisations themselves to provide information about their objectives, functions and accounts.

* The grant for this service, currently made under section 64, dates back to an agreement made following the 1948 National Assistance Act that an Exchequer grant be made towards the production of braille literature. Prior to 1948 grants had been made by local authorities.

Board and Lodging Establishments

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will extend the Registered Homes Act to cover all board and lodging establishments as well as residential care units and other places providing accommodation for the long-term homeless;

(2) if he will seek powers to extend the existing powers of inspection of residential care units held by local authorities to include all board and lodging establishments.

Mr. John Patten: No. The Registered Homes Act 1984 provides for the registration and inspection of residential establishments providing personal care; its provisions are not appropriate for other types of establishment. Local authorities already have powers under the Housing Acts to monitor houses in multiple occupation and any extension of these powers is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

National Insurance Credits

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what class of national insurance credits is given to 16 and 17-year-olds (a) on youth training schemes as trainees, (b) in work earning below the lower earnings limit, (c) at college or school and (d) on supplementary benefit; and in each case, what are the benefits towards which the credit may be counted

Mr. Newton: Class 3 national insurance credits are given to all 16 and 17-year-olds to the extent required to make a year count for claims to retirement pension, widows pension and widowed mothers allowance. If a claim to unemployment benefit, sickness benefit or maternity allowance is made, class 1 credits are also available as necessary for the contribution year on which that claim is based.

Single Payments

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single payments for maternity needs were made to one-parent families in the years 1978 to 1984; and what was the average payment for maternity needs.

Mr. Whitney: The information is not available in the form requested. Single payments for maternity needs have been identifiable only from November 1980 when the regulatory based scheme was introduced. The number of single payments for maternity needs to single parents together with the average payment for all groups for the years 1981 and 1982 is as follows. Data for 1983 and 1984 are not yet available.

Year	Number to single parents	Average amounts all groups £
1981	28,000	43·45
1982	46,000	53·61

Source: Annual Statistical Enquiries of 1981 and 1982

Because the figures relate only to claimants who received single payments during one week in December 1981 and 1982 and not to those who received a single payment during the course of the relevant year but who ceased to receive benefit before the week of the enquiry, they are an under-estimate of the total number of single payments made during the particular year.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single payments or exceptional needs payments before 1980 were claimed by one-parent families on supplementary benefit in the years 1978 to 1984; what they were for; and what was the average payment for (a) one-parent families and (b) other claimants.

Mr. Whitney: The two tables cover the period 1978-82; information for 1983 and 1984 is not yet available. Because of a change in the method of collecting data on the introduction of the regulatory based scheme, the tables are not comparable. The average payment relates to all categories of claimant as the information for one-parent families is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many one-parent families on supplementary benefit had additional requirements in the years 1978 to 1984; and what they were for.

Mr. Whitney: The information is as follows:

Inequalities in Health

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the present cost of implementing recommendations 10, 12, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28 and 29 respectively, of the working group report on inequalities in health using the same criteria as in his answer of 16 December 1982, Official Report, columns 242-3.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. It is no longer possible to produce costings which would be compatible with the figures given earlier and bear any relation to the likely present costs of implementation.

Residential Homes

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what responsibilities are placed upon private and local authority residential care homes to provide adequate care, supervision and access for inspection by local authorities and central Government; and what sanctions are taken against residential care homes which do not meet expected standards.

Mr. John Patten: The Residential Care Home Regulations 1984 which took effect from 1 January 1985 specify the services and facilities to be provided in voluntary and privately run residential care homes and the way in which they are to be conducted. In addition, my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Social Services and the Secretary of State for Wales have commended "Home Life", a code of practice for residential care, as a guide to the standards they expect local authorities to have regard to both in registering and inspecting these homes and in running their own homes. Registration authorities may refuse or withdraw registration from persons who do not comply with the registration criteria.

The Department's social work service officers are empowered to enter and inspect these homes and similar homes operated by local authorities.

Nursing Homes

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what responsibilities are placed upon private and local authority nursing homes to provide adequate care, supervision and access for inspection by local authorities and central government; and what sanctions are taken against nursing homes which do not meet expected standards.

Mr. John Patten: Nursing homes in England and Wales are registered and inspected by district health authorities; those which do not meet the required standards may have their registration cancelled.

Regional Health Authorities

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the total administrative cost of each regional health authority in the last year to a convenient date, including the amounts for expenses and remuneration of chairmen and committees, the number of staff and the total of salaries and wages paid, the cost of rent and equipment, and all other significant items of expenditure.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Birth Statistics

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys' monitor FMI 84/6 last published on 17 July 1984 will be updated to include figures for 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. John Patten: Updated and extended versions of the tables published in OPCS monior FMI 84/6, including analyses of conceptions occurring in 1982, were published on 28 February 1985 in "Birth Statistics 1983" (OPCS Series FMI No. 10), a copy of which is in the Library. Figures for conceptions occurring in 1983 will be published in an OPCS Monitor as soon as they become available, towards the end of 1985. Figures for 1984 will be published about a year later.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects his noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to reply to the letter of the hon. Member for Tatton, dated 22 February, on the subject of his reply, reference PO(6)4449 112, to the hon. Member's letter of 20 December 1984 about Terpoin Antitussive's exclusion from the list of drugs prescribable on the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My noble Friend has written to my hon. Friend today.

Drugs (Therapeutic Applications)

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the therapeutic applications of Gaviscon, Maalox, Gelusil and Mucogel which cannot be met by Polycrol;

(2) what are the therapeutic applications of Polycrol which cannot be met by Gaviscon, Maalox, Gelusil and Mucogel.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: These antacids have varying, and sometimes different, indications for use. The group of independent medical and pharmaceutical experts set up to advise on the selected list recommended that all clinical needs could be met without dimethicone-containing antacids such as Polycrol. We have accepted this advice.

Drug Manufacturers (Inducements)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) pursuant to his reply of 25 February, Official Report, columns 71-72, if any savings on the adjustment of reimbursement prices paid to dispensing doctors will be made to the National Health Service;

(2) pursuant to the reply of 25 February, Official Report, columns 71-72, over what period of time and for how long dispensing doctors have been obtaining discounts on drugs costs from wholesalers and manufacturers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 28 February 1985, c. 272]: There are no savings to be transferred to the National Health Service. General medical practitioners' remuneration is set so that all the practitioners as a body are reimbursed either directly or indirectly through fees and allowances all the expenses they incur in the course of providing general medical services. Actual expenses due to the profession as a body are, and always have been, calculated after deducting discount. Before the introduction of the discount scale dispensing doctors were, however, reimbursed the cost of drugs without any adjustment for discount. As a result, they received a disproportionate share of the total expenses incurred by and reimbursed to the profession. Any gain by dispensing doctors from discounts has therefore been at the expense of other doctors and not the taxpayer. We do not know precisely how long doctors have been receiving discounts but the practice appears to have developed in the last five years or so.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all those hospital closures or partial closures to which community health councils have objected since 1979, indicating whether or not the closure went ahead.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1985, c. 419]: Following are those hospitals for which proposals for whole or partial closure were referred to the Secretary of State for approval because they were opposed by community health councils. The table indicates which proposals were approved or not approved, or on which a decision was pending at 31 December 1984.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Arms Control

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration has been given by the United Kingdom and its allies to the use of an international inspectorate under the United Nations' control for purposes of verification under international arms control agreements; and whether any view has been expressed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on such a proposal.

Mr. Luce: We and our allies have always stressed the need for effective verification of international arms control agreements. On 12 March I introduced at the conference on disarmament in Geneva a further British proposal for comprehensive international inspection of civil chemical plants to ensure non-diversion to illicit military stockpiles.

No recent specific proposals for an international verification inspectorate under the United Nations' control have been made, but we are prepared to consider any serious proposals which will improve the monitoring and verification of compliance with existing and future international arms control agreements.

Immigration Control

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration he has given to the recommendation in the report on immigration control procedures by the Commission for Racial Equality that his Department should fund two additional advisory posts at its Bangladesh immigrants advisory service in Sylhet.

Mr. Renton: During my recent visit to Bangladesh I was able to go to Sylhet to consider the matter carefully on the spot. Since that visit I have decided that the provision of additional resources for two further advisory posts cannot be justified in the present economic climate.

Central America (Diplomatic Representatives)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the number of United Kingdom diplomatic representatives in 1983, 1984 and 1985 for the countries of Central America.

Mr. Renton: The following table gives the information requested:

‖ In addition a first secretary resident in Managua is also accredited to Costa Rica.
¶ In addition the defence attaché resident at Bogotá is accredited to Panama.
● Includes a defence liaison officer.
■ In addition a first secretary resident in San Salvador is also accredited to Honduras.
• The ambassador to Honduras is also accredited to El Salvador.
The ambassador to Costa Rica is also accredited to Nicaragua.

In addition, the defence and assistant defence attachés resident in Mexico City are accredited to Honduras, El Salvador and Nicaragua.

VE Day

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what instructions have now been given to British embassies abroad over responding to invitations to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the end of the war against Nazi Germany.

Mr. Renton: We will consider our response to specific invitations to commemorative events in the light of the nature of the event and the level of representation.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what offers have been made either to the Falkland Islands Administration or to Her Majesty's Government of agricultural land by the Falkland Islands Company since June 1982; what reply was given; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: In addition to offering for sale to the public 50 50-acre plots along the Port Stanley—Fitzroy road the Falkland Islands Company has since June 1982:

(i) Offered to the Falkland Islands Government, free of charge, a 50-acre plot for grassland trials. The offer has been accepted;

(ii) Sold to the Falkland Islands Government 8,300 acres of agricultural land for the construction of Mount Pleasant airport.

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many diplomats have claimed diplomatic immunity in relation to alleged criminal offences in each of the past 10 years; of these numbers, how many diplomats then left the United Kingdom and how many continued in office; and what was the general nature of the charges.

Mr. Renton: The evidence given by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in June 1984 to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs gave details of criminal offences since 1 January 1974 allegedly committed by persons enjoying diplomatic immunity. This evidence listed 13 alleged serious offences in 1984 which were then known to us. The known total for the whole of 1984 is 48, of which the general nature was: drinking and driving 32; theft 13; other three.

The following numbers of diplomats are known to have been transferred from the United Kingdom following representations by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office about offences they are alleged to have committed:

1982	14
1983	17
1984	13
1985	to date four (plus one waiver of immunity)

The corresponding figures for the earlier years could not be extracted from our records except at disproportionate cost. Centralised records were not kept before 1982.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Farmers

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each of the financial years ended 1980 to 1984 the gross trading profit of farmers for tax purposes on the same basis as that used in the replies to questions from the hon. Member for Great Grimsby on 8 March 1982, Official Report, columns 299-300, 29 March 1982, Official Report, columns 21-2, and 21 April 1982, Official Report, columns 92-3, if he will add particulars of the taxable income after reliefs, the numbers in each income band, the number of wives counted separately from their husbands and the gross profit accruing to such wives, and the number of partnerships and partners.

Mr. Moore: The available information has been set out in eight tables, each including notes on definition and coverage, a copy of which I am placing in the Library of the House. I regret that information by band of profits is not available for companies, that the source of the information for individuals does not distinguish partnership income from that of sole traders, and that information for periods covering 1984 is not yet available.

‡ 1980 standard industrial classification.

Note to part (a) of Table 1:

Agricultural companies are those whose main activity is agriculture. Their trading profits may include profits from non-agricultural activities. Companies whose main activity is not agriculture are excluded although they may also carry on agricultural activities.

Notes to part (b) of Table 1:

Information on agricultural companies alone is not available after 1981-82 as, with the introduction of the Standard Industrial Classification (1980 revised), those companies which hire out agricultural machinery (without operatives) were reclassified with other hire companies and the remaining agricultural companies are not identified separately from horticultural companies.

Agricultural and horticultural companies are those whose main activity is agriculture or horticulture. Their trading profits may include profits from non-agricultural and non-horticultural activities. Companies whose main activity is not agriculture or horticulture are excluded although they may also carry on agricultural or horticultural activities.

Notes to both parts of Table 1:

Gross trading profit is after deduction of short term interest and before any adjustments for losses, stock relief and capital allowances.

Taxable income after reliefs includes income other than trading profits and is after deduction of losses, stock relief, capital allowances and other reliefs.

Table 2—Individuals (Summary)

(a) Individuals in Agriculture (1968 standard industrial classification)

	Income tax year
	1979-80	1980-81
Number of cases (thousands)	300	284
Gross profit for tax purposes (£m)	1,430	1,460
Taxable profit (£m)	942	916

Source: Survey of Personal Incomes 1979-80 and 1980-81.

The number of cases is the number of individuals with self-employment income whose largest source of profit is agriculture.

Gross profit includes balancing charges and stock relief withdrawn. It also includes any non-agricultural profits of the individual concerned but excludes the agricultural profits of individuals whose largest source of profit is not from agriculture. The profit was mainly earned in accounting periods ending in the year before the Income Tax year.

(b) Individuals in Agriculture and horticulture (1980 standard industrial classification)

	Income tax year
	1981-82	1982-83
Number of cases (thousands)	301	305
Gross profit for tax purposes (£m)	1,550	1,630
Taxable profit (£m)	1,020	1,130

Source: Survey of Personal Incomes 1981-82 and 1982-83.

For these years, incomes from agriculture cannot be distinguished from incomes from horticulture. The number of cases is the number of married men and single people whose "main source"—usually but not always the largest source—of earned income is from self employment in agriculture and horticulture; plus the number of married women whose largest source of self employment income is from agriculture and horticulture.

Gross profit includes balancing charges and stock relief withdrawn. It also includes any non agricultural/horticultural profits of the individual concerned but excludes profits from agricultural/horticultural of married men and single people whose "main source" of earned income is not from self-employment in agriculture and horticulture, and of married women whose largest source of self employment income is not from agriculture and horticulture.

Notes to both parts of Table 2:

Taxable profit is gross profit less losses, stock relief and capital allowances so far as allowed for the Income Tax year. Partners are counted individually but cannot be distinguished from sole traders. Wives are counted separately from their husbands.

With the same industrial coverage (ie excluding horticulture) as used for this table, but otherwise using the new definition of largest or main source of income for subsequent years, given in the note to part b of Table 2, the total number of cases shown above would be reduced to about 267,000 and the amount of gross profit to about £1,440 million. The bulk of these reductions would be within the gross profit range £1 to £1,000.

Oil Prices

Mr. Batiste asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost to the Exchequer of a drop in the price of oil of one United States dollar per barrel.

Mr. Moore: A change in the dollar price of oil may have an effect on the exchange rate and can also affect non-oil tax revenues. If it is assumed that there are no such second-order effects, then a reduction of $1 per barrel in the oil price would reduce Government revenues by some £½ billion in a full year.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Bright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will estimate what share of the market in goods currently zero-rated for value added tax is held by domestic producers and what share is held by foreign producers;

(2) if he will estimate the increase in import penetration if goods currently zero-rated for value added tax were exempt in the next financial year;

(3) if he will list the categories of goods currently zero-rated for value added tax; and if he will estimate the revenue to be raised from each of them if they were exempt from value added tax in the next financial year;

(4) whether any study has been conducted into the administrative savings to be made by small firms if goods currently zero-rated for value added tax were exempt in the next financial year;

(5) if he will estimate the proportion of family expenditure currently accounted for by goods which are zero rated for value added tax; and by how much it would change if they were exempt in the next financial year;

(6) what the effect on the retail price index in the next financial year would be if goods which are now zero-rated for value added tax were exempt;

(7) what is his policy towards the exemption of goods and services from value added tax in the light of the provisions of the European Economic Community's sixth value added tax directive.

Mr. Hayhoe: Goods and services which are zero-rated are specified in schedule 5 to the Value Added Tax Act 1983; the main items are:

Group 1—Food and drink, except (a) when supplied in the course of catering and (b) certain foods, alcoholic and soft drinks and pet food.
Group 2—Sewerage services and water.
Group 3—Books and newspapers.
Group 4—Talking books for the blind and handicapped and wireless sets for the blind.
Group 5—Newspaper advertisements.
Group 6—News services.
Group 7—Fuel and power (but not road fuel).
Group 8—Construction of buildings.
Group 9—International services.
Group 10—Transport.
Group 11—Caravans and houseboats.
Group 12—Gold.
Group 13—Bank notes.
Group 14—Drugs, medicines and appliances.
Group 15—Certain import transactions, prior to customs entry of the goods; transfer of goods or provisions of services by a United Kingdom or Isle of Man business to its address abroad; supplies to fulfil contracts relating to international defence collaboration projects.
Group 16—Charities.
Group 17—Young children's clothing and footwear.

Supplies of goods are also zero-rated if the goods are exported or shipped as stores on a voyage or flight to a destination outside the United Kingdom.

Most goods and services which are zero-rated are supplied by domestic producers. The main exceptions are food, young children's clothing and footwear.

The zero-rate of VAT applies directly to about 25 per cent. of consumers' spending, and to a further 10 per cent. in respect of expenditure on housing, which is indirectly affected by the zero-rating of new construction.

The EC sixth VAT directive specified those goods and services which member states must or may exempt from VAT. To extend exemption to other supplies, whether at present standard-rated or zero-rated, would be in breach of the directive. My hon. Friend's questions about the various effects of exempting supplies which are now zero-rated are therefore hypothetical.

Mr. Gregory asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what communications he has had with the manufacturers of confectionery for the Indian community in the United Kingdom about the applicability of value added tax to their products.

Mr. Hayhoe: None.

Mr. Bright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations Her Majesty's Government received from the European Commission concerning the compatability with the sixth value added tax directive of the exemption of certain goods and services from value added tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The EC Commisssion has issued one reasoned opinion on the United Kingdom's exemptions from VAT, concerning medical goods supplied together with services by the medical and paramedical professions. The Commission's case is that the directive's exemption for "medical care" covers services only and not related goods. It is the Government's view that the words "medical care" were deliberately used to cover supplies of both goods and services needed to treat a patient's condition and we have firmly rejected the reasoned opinion. It is now for the Commission to decide whether to pursue the matter to the European Court of Justice.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received since his Budget on matters related to value added tax.

Mr. Hayhoe: A very large number.

Mr. Batiste asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the net cost to the Treasury, taking into account savings of administrative costs, of raising the threshold for value added tax to (a) £50,000, (b) £75,000 and (c) £100,000.

Mr. Hayhoe: Increases in the limit of this magnitude would cause such a change in the nature of the tax that it is not possible to make a realistic estimate of the net cost.

European Community Budget

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action the European Economic Community Council of Ministers has taken when the European Assembly has put commitment appropriations into the European Economic Community Budget, although the money for them is not available.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Under article 203 of the treaty of Rome the European Parliament has the final say on non-obligatory expenditure. The build-up of commitments relating to non-obligatory expenditure has been criticised by the Court of Auditors. The United Kingdom is seeking to improve the Community's financial control and, with other member states, will look for improvements to meet the Court's criticisms during the 1986 budgetary procedures. The Council of Economic and Finance Ministers, which I attended on 11 March, agreed that Permanent Representatives of member states should examine these issues further and report back to the Council.

Fuel Taxation

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total taxation element in the price of (a) a gallon of petrol and (b) a gallon of derv, in (i) May 1979, (ii) May 1984 and (iii) January 1985.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information is as follows:

	May 1979	May 1984	January 1985
Premium petrol
pence/gallon	39·9	101·9	102·6
per cent. of price	44·8	55·6	54·3
Derv
pence/gallon	41·9	88·4	89·9
per cent. of price	45·3	51·1	48·7

Married Women

Mr. Rowe asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received on the treatment of the unearned income of married women on their tax return; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I have received about 50 letters on this subject in the past year.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total yield from capital gains tax in the latest available year.

Mr. Moore: £671 million in 1983-84. The budget estimate for 1984-85 is £710 million.

Pound Sterling

Mr. MacKenzie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table, taking 1964 as a base year, showing the spending power of the pound sterling in the United Kingdom from 1964, and in each year to the latest convenient date.

Mr. Lawson: The internal purchasing power of the pound (based on movements in the RPI) is set out in the following table.

Year	Purchasing power (1964 = 100)
1964	100
1965	96
1966	92
1967	90
1968	86
1969	81
1970	76
1971	70
1972	65
1973	60
1974	51
1975	41
1976	36
1977	31
1978	28
1979	25
1980	21
1981	19
1982	17
1983	17
1984	16

Hot Take-away Food

Mr. Speller asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue from the imposition of value added tax on hot take-away foods (a) during the first six months after the imposition of value added tax on these goods and (b) for the period since the imposition of value added tax on these goods to the latest available date.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer on 12 November 1984 to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) at column 89.

EC (Contributions and Receipts)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total amount paid to the European Economic Community and the total amount received in grant since the beginning of the financial year.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (Advance Payments)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why he has presented two separate Supplementary Estimates for £99 million and £265 million respectively, for advance payments to the Common Market; and on what basis they have been calculated as representing one month's payment of European Economic Community own resources other than value added tax own-resources.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Local Authorities (Borrowing)

Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he estimates will be the additional financial costs to local authorities' borrowing expenditure, pursuant to his decision relating to tax assessment on bond washing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: The effect of the decision relating to bondwashing on the overall borrowing costs of local authorities is likely to be insignificant. Most forms of local authority borrowing, in particular from the Public Works Loan Board and from the money market, are not affected at all. Local authority borrowing through the issue of bonds represents a very small proportion of their total borrowing. To the extent that the cost of borrowing through the issue of bonds may rise, local authorities can of course obtain funds for periods of one year and above at highly competitive rates from the Public Works Loan Board, and from the money market for shorter periods.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will ensure that any report sent to him by Price Waterhouse or by the City police fraud squad into the affairs of Johnson Matthey Bankers will be published.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Economic and Finance Council Meeting

Mr. Rowe asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the meeting of the European Community Economic and Finance Council in Brussels on 11 March.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Council of Economic and Finance Ministers met in Brussels on 11 March. I represented the United Kingdom. This was the first occasion on which the ECOFIN Council has implemented the budgetary discipline procedures and at which the Court of Auditors report has been discussed.

Following the Council's discussion of future financial provision for the European agricultural guidance fund, it formally adopted an opinion, in accordance with the arrangements laid down on budgetary discipline, that the total amount to be made available for expenditure commitments to be charged to the guidance fund for the next five years should be limited to 5,250 million ecus. The 5,250 mecus figure agreed is substantially lower than the figure of 5,716 mecus requested by the Commission in February and than their original proposal of 5,900 mecus. This figure is without prejudice to any decisions which may subsequently be taken on the Commission's proposals for integrated Mediterranean programmes. The Council reviewed the economic situation and decided to make no changes to the economic policy guidelines agreed in December 1984.

At the request of the United Kingdom the Council discussed the report of the Court of Auditors on the execution of the Community Budget for 1983. The Council agreed that further work was needed on the deficiencies identified in the Court's report, in particular the excessive build-up of unused payment appropriations and of unused commitments, the need for improved monitoring and control of FEOGA guarantee and for more rapid disbursement of food aid. The Council invited the Committee of Permanent Representatives to consider the necessary follow-up action and to report back to a subsequent meeting of the Finance or Budget Council.

The Council discussed the draft 20th VAT directive, permitting the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany to give special aid to its farmers as agreed at Fontainebleau. The Council decided to ask the European Parliament to give its opinion on the draft directive as a matter of urgency and to continue its own work on the subject.

The Commission notified the Council of its request for a new negotiating mandate on mixed credits in preparation for negotiations in the OECD. Nine Member States, including the United Kingdom, supported the Commission's request, which will be further discussed at the General Affairs Council on 17-19 March.

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many occasions during each of the last five years customs investigations have commenced into the commission of drug-related offences by people who have at the time of apprehension or theft claimed diplomatic immunity; what effect these claims of immunity have had on the seizure of drugs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1985, c. 60]: Customs and Excise investigators were faced with claims to diplomatic immunity at the time of commencement of investigation into drug-related offences as follows:

1980 on six occasions
1981 and 1982 no occasions
1983 on two occasions
1984 on two occasions

In each case, Customs maintained the seizure of the drugs.

Corporation Tax

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many companies have paid corporation tax of over (a) £100,000, (b) £500,000, (c) £1 million and (d) £5 million in each of the last five fiscal years.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 25 February 1985, c. 58]: Broad estimates for the most recent year for which figures are available are:

(a) 5,000
(b) 1,300
(c) 700
(d) over 100

These estimates are very tentative, and I regret that figures for each of the last five years could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of (a) gross trading profits and (b) net trading profits was paid by all industries in corporation tax for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 25 February 1985, c. 58]: The percentages are as follows:

	Gross trading profits	Net trading profits
1975-76	16	32
1976-77	20	50
1977-78	20	42
1978-79	17	33
1979-80	18	38
1980-81	16	33
1981-82	17	41
1982-83	19	46
1983-84	18	42
1984-85	20	35

Gross trading profits are net of losses and are based upon national accounts estimates but after adjustment for net interest flow. For North Sea companies oil tax accruals (royalty PRT and SPD) have been deducted. Net trading profits are gross trading profits less capital allowances claimed, not all of which can be set against profits in the same year; the allowances claimed usually exceed commercial depreciation. Corporation tax receipts in each financial year have been expressed as a percentage of profits in the previous calendar year.

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what percentage of net trading profits was paid in corporation tax by (a) agriculture, (b) energy and water supply, (c) extraction and chemicals, (d) metal goods and engineering and (e) other manufacturing industries in the last fiscal year for which statistics are available;

(2) what percentage of net trading profits was paid in corporation tax by (a) construction, (b) distribution and repairs, (c) hotels and catering, (d) transport and communications, (e) banking, finance and insurance, (f) business services, (g) other services and (h) overseas industries in the last fiscal year for which statistics are available.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his replies, 25 February 1985, c. 58]: The most recent reasonably reliable estimates related to profits arising in 1980; and can be disaggregated only for the following sectors:

Corporation tax receipts in 1981-82 as a percentage of net trading profits† in 1980 (private sector only)*

	per cent.
Manufacturing	45
Distribution and repairs, hotels and catering	50
Banking, finance and insurance	50
North sea companies‡	25
Other industrial and commercial companies	50

* These percentages have been affected by transfers of losses across years and across sectors and by ACT payments covering more than one sector.

† Gross trading profits as recorded for tax purposes, ie after deduction of short term interest (except for North Sea companies—see ‡), less capital depreciation allowances.

‡ Corporation tax charge, before set off of advance corporation tax, as a proportion of net trading profits gross of interest payments, net of petroleum revenue tax and royalties. The total tax charge, including petroleum revenue tax and royalties, amounted to 65 per cent. of net trading profits, gross of interest payments, in 1980.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Grain Stocks

10. Mr. Charles Morrison asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current estimated level of grain in store in England and Wales.

Mr. MacGregor: There were 2·7 million tonnes of wheat and 0·6 million tonnes of barley in intervention stores in England and Wales on 13 March 1985. Comparable information is not available on stocks held on farms or in private stores.

Agricultural Prices

14. Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what increased expenditure will result from the Commission's European Economic Community agricultural price proposals.

Mr. Jopling: The Commission estimates its proposals will add 138 million ecu to expenditure in 1985 but produce a saving of 34 million ecu in 1986.

Halvergate Marshes (Drainage Payments)

15. Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the number of farmers to whom money for land drainage in the Halvergate levels area has been disbursed.

Mrs. Fenner: Since 1 October 1980, when the present capital grant schemes were introduced, three farmers have received grant for field drainage in the area stipulated.

Sugar Cane

16. Mr. Spearing asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement concerning negotiations for enlargement of the European Economic Community in respect of cane sugar refining.

Mr. MacGregor: It is too early to say what the final outcome will be of current negotiations between Portugal and the Community on the arrangements to apply after accession for raw sugar supplies to the Portuguese refining industry. The Government's main concern is that the arrangements should not disrupt supplies to existing Community refiners.

Horses and Ponies

17. Mr. Greenway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any plans to introduce changes to the law relating to tethered horses and ponies.

Mrs. Fenner: We have no such plans.

Landscape and Wildlife Conservation

18. Mr. Alton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the implications for landscape and wildlife conservation of the European Economic Community's 1985-86 farm price proposals.

Mrs. Fenner: I would expect that the changes implied by the Commission's proposals for CAP prices 1985-86 would have only a very small impact on the environment; that impact, however would be likely to be favourable.

Agricultural Production (Targets)

19. Mr. Freud asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will draw up a medium-term plan for the agriculture industry to include levels of production targets in the light of the European Economic Community surpluses.

Mr. MacGregor: I do not believe that the setting of overall production targets is the right way to proceed. Guarantee thresholds, under which production in excess of defined levels triggers off reductions in support, and which now apply to many more commodities, are one of the most important ways of tackling the surpluses.

Milk Quotas

20. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from dairy farmers whose preliminary allocation of secondary milk quota has on appeal been reduced; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I have received representations from a number of producers in this position. But all producers were warned before lodging their appeals that the tribunal could reduce awards made by local panels. The tribunal has a duty to amend panels' awards where necessary.

24. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the progress made towards the introduction of flexibility into milk quota arrangements.

Mr. Jopling: The February Agriculture Council reached agreement on flexibility between direct sale and wholesale quotas. This was our first objective and it is a major improvement.

A number of organisations have urged the need for arrangements to enable quotas to be bought and sold separately from land. This would certainly have attractions though, as has been widely recognised, there would be a problem about providing for landlords' interests in quotas. I do not, however, see a system of this sort being immediately negotiable in the Community while the quota scheme itself is still being put in place.

Some flexibility would be introduced if quotas not required by one producer could be temporarily re-allocated to another through a system of leasing. My officials are consulting the interests concerned about the details of such a scheme and I intend to pursue this possibility with the Commission.

25. Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received on the future management of milk quotas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I have received numerous representations. A great many will, I am glad to say, be resolved as a result of the package agreed at the February Agriculture Council.

Eastern Bloc Countries (Trade)

21. Mr. Walden asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the level of trade in agricultural produce between the United Kingdom and the Eastern bloc countries.

Mrs. Fenner: Including items such as farm machinery and pesticides, the United Kingdom's agriculture and food exports to the USSR and the six other East European countries totalled some £200 million in 1984, compared with imports from these countries of about £80 million.

Surplus Food and Wine

22. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total sum spent by the European Economic Community in storing and disposing of surplus food and wine in 1984; and if he will express this in a sum per day.

Mr. MacGregor: Final figures for expenditure in 1984 are not yet available, but the budgetary provision for storing and disposing of stocks of commodities which are in structural surplus (cereals, sugar, wine, milk and beef) was £7,188 million or about £20 million a day.

Surplus Produce (Disposal)

23. Sir John Farr asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the present arrangements for disposing of surplus agricultural produce; what are the main uses to which such surpluses are put; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The main outlets for existing surpluses of agricultural products are by export on to world markets with the use of export refunds, by the incorporation in animal feed with the help of subsidies, and in the case of wine, by distillation into alcohol. There are also a number of other special schemes for surplus disposal. The Government's objective is to achieve improvements in the operation of the CAP so that the production of costly surpluses is avoided.

Outgoers Scheme

26. Sir Hector Monro asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much quota has been surrendered under the outgoers scheme to date.

Mr. Jopling: To date, producers have committed themselves to surrender 223·1 million litres of quota (on a full year basis) in the United Kingdom as a whole.

39. Mr. Knox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress made on the outgoers scheme for dairy farmers.

Mr. Jopling: To date, invitations have been sent to 4,200 producers in England and Wales. by 8 March, 1,360 producers had decided to go out of production and they will, on a full year basis, surrender a total of 190 million litres. As other producers come to make their decisions, some will no doubt drop out thereby allowing offers to be made to others. I have no reason to suppose that we will not be able to reach our target of 289 million litres.

Surplus Grain

27. Mr. Wareing asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the Government's policy towards proposals for the conversion of surplus European Economic Community grain into plastic and other non-food materials; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government are always prepared to consider the merits of new uses for grain but we would have to be convinced that a project involving the conversion of grain into plastic or other non-food materials was viable.

Spanish Fishing Vessels

28. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the current level of fishing by Spanish vessels in waters around the British Isles.

Mr. MacGregor: Spain is entitled to fish in certain waters of European Community member states under the EC-Spain fisheries agreement 1980. Under the arrangements agreed for 1985 Spain's fishing around the British Isles is limited to her fishery for hake and associated by-catch species in waters to the west of Scotland, in the English Channel and south-west approaches, and to the south and west of Ireland, and is restricted in terms of the number of vessels and the quantities of fish which may be caught. Spain is currently allocated a total of 65 standard vessel licences for her hake fishery in these areas and we understand that all these licences are currently taken up.

During 1984 a number of Spanish vessels were prosecuted for fishing without a valid licence in these waters, although only a minority of these were found fishing in United Kingdom waters.

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the Spanish fishing vessels which have been arrested in United Kingdom waters in the last three years and give their home ports; where cases against them were heard; and what were the penalties imposed.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is set out in the following table; it includes details of the two Spanish vessels arrested so far this year.

1982

Milk Production

29. Mr. Colvin asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the United Kingdom's present production of milk exceeds its domestic consumption.

Mr. MacGregor: Production of milk in the United Kingdom substantially more than meets our requirements for liquid consumption. Taking account of other outlets for milk in addition to liquid consumption it is possible to calculate for the two main components of milk ratios of self sufficiency. The Milk Marketing Board estimates, that for 1983 these were 91 per cent. for butterfat and 117 per cent. for solids not fat. Figures for 1984 are not yet available.

EC Structures Directive

30. Mr. Richard Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current state of negotiations on a new European Economic Community structures directive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: As I announced yesterday, the Council of Agriculture Ministers reached agreement on the new structures policy earlier this week.

Common Agricultural Policy

31. Mr. Marlow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the cost of the common agricultral policy for 1983 and 1984 and give his latest estimate for 1985.

Mr. Jopling: Expenditure on the common agricultural policy in 1983 amounted to 16,634 mecu. Final figures for 1984 expenditure are not yet available but the supplementary and amending budget No. 1 for 1984 made provision for CAP expenditure of 19,121 mecu. The 1985 budget has not yet been adopted.

Research (Departmental Support)

32. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to ensure that his Department gives adequate support to programmes of research which are in the national interest.

Mr. Jopling: In determining research priorities Agriculture Ministers and the Agricultural and Food Research Council are advised by the Priorities Board for Research and Development in Agriculture and Food. In addition to the funds provided by the Exchequer to support the research programme we shall be encouraging industry to make a greater contribution towards the research and development from which it benefits.

Food Labelling

33. Mr. Beith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will include in his plans for the labelling of packaged foods a requirement that the carbohydrate content should be listed.

Mrs. Fenner: As my right hon. Friend announced on 12 March, we propose to circulate for comment draft guidelines on nutrition labelling of food, which includes the declaration of carbohydrate content.

38. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received on the introduction of nutritional food labelling.

Mrs. Fenner: Representatives of the food industry have asked the Government to consider the possibility of introducing full nutrition labelling of food and some discussions with them have taken place. Comments upon the idea have also been received from a number of organisations. Any proposals for the introduction of nutrition labelling will be subject to full consultation.

Spain and Portugal (British Farm Products)

34. Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is planning to assist the export of British farm products to Spain and Portugal after their entry into the European Economic Community.

Mrs. Fenner: My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food intends to visit these two countries at an early opportunity when trade will be among the subjects he hopes to discuss. After entry, their markets will become progressively more open to United Kingdom produce during a transitional period. We are confident that our exporters will be in a position to take advantage of the new opportunities with help from Food from Britain and the British Agricultural Export Council and the British Overseas Trade Board's services.

Milk (Fat Content)

35. Mr. Key asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any plans to alter the level of payments for the fat content of milk.

Mr. MacGregor: In its 1985-86 price proposals, the Commission has proposed an adjustment in the value placed on the butterfat and solids-not-fat parts of milk from the present ratio of 50:50 to 47·15:52·85. This would affect the various support mechanisms for milk and milk products, in particular the levels of intervention prices.

In the United Kingdom the arrangements for compositional payments to producers for the milk they supply to the milk marketing boards, and the degree to which they reflect changes in the Community's support arrangements, are for the boards to decide.

Forestry Commission

36. Sir Dudley Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he is satisfied with the performance of the Forestry Commission in safeguarding the woodlands of England and Wales.

Mrs. Fenner: Yes. I am satisfied that the Forestry Commission is taking active measures to safeguard woodland, both through its felling licence controls and in developing policy initiatives to encourage positive and sympathetic management of the country's broadleaved woodlands.

Less Favoured Areas

37. Mr. Wigley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the Government have any plans to make further assistance available for less favoured areas.

Mr. Jopling: The overall level of support to farmers in the less favoured areas is kept under careful review. I have already announced that I intend to provide new assistance for farm tourism and craft industry in these areas when the new EC structures regulation is implemented.

Grain Production

40. Mr. Yeo asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the amount by which grain production in Britain exceeded demand in 1984.

Mr. MacGregor: United Kingdom cereals production in 1984 is estimated at 26·5 million tonnes. Home demand (of which some 2·4 million tonnes is likely to be met by imports) in the 1984-85 crop year is forecast at 19·4 million tonnes. Export demand cannot be accurately forecast but exports in the first seven months of the crop year had reached nearly 4 million tonnes.

Agricultural Development and Advisory Service

41. Mr. Bruce asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the likely effects of recent cuts in expenditure on the Farm Advisory Service.

Mr. Jopling: I refer the hon. Member to my reply earlier today to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood).

Government Purchasing

42. Mr. Thurnham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he proposes following the conclusions of the recent report by the Management and Personnel Office on Government purchasing.

Mr. Jopling: I have appointed a small internal team, and a part-time commercial adviser, to consider how the conclusions of this report might assist towards achieving better value for money from my Department's expenditure on purchasing.

Cereals

43. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he has agreed with the European Economic Community to curb overproduction of cereals.

Mr. MacGregor: While pursuing a restrictive price policy, the Community has not adopted any measure designed to curb the volume of cereals production directly. We shall continue to press in the current Council meetings on this year's price proposals for a policy of price restraint as the best means of securing a better balance in the cereals market.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the measures taken subsequent to the agriculture package of 31 March 1984 to curb the production of cereals; how effective they have proved in practice; and what steps the Government are now taking to ensure that expenditure on cereals under the common agricultural policy is reduced.

Mr. MacGregor: The Community has not adopted any measure designed to curb the volume of cereals production directly. Action to reduce expenditure on cereals under the common agricultural policy must be taken at a Community level. While the Government would urge an even more stringent approach, I welcome the European Commission's recognition of the need for a restrictive price policy, and particularly its proposals for a reduction in cereals support prices and the elimination of intervention for breadmaking wheat at the minimum reference price for the next marketing year. These measures would be a useful step towards the objective of reducing expenditure and also of securing a better balance in the cereals market itself.

Milk Producers

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether the Government considered a levy on milk producers to help finance the payment of compensation for farmers agreeing to give up milk production;

(2) what proposals the Government will put forward in the European Economic Community to ensure that farmers who continue to produce milk do not profit as a result of the introduction of quotas.

Mr. MacGregor: At a time when dairy farmers are having to accept the restraints involved in cutting milk production to bring it closer to demand, I do not think that the action suggested by the hon. Member would be appropriate.

New Zealand Lamb

Mr. Freeman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what volume and value of imports of New Zealand lamb arrived in the United Kingdom during 1984.

Mr. MacGregor: According to United Kingdom trade statistics 144,000 tonnes of sheepmeat valued at £176 million were imported from New Zealand in 1984.

Pastureland

Mr. Freeman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what statistics he has collected on the number of acres of farmed pastureland in Northamptonshire and nationally for each of the last five years.

Mr. MacGregor: The following information is available from the annual June census:

Total Grassland (hectares) (excluding rough grazing)

	England	Northamptonshire
1980	4,184,084	76,485
1981	4,127,031	74,263
1982	4,058,361	71,219
1983	4,045,160	69,898
1984	3,999,432	68,285

Rough Grazing (hectares) (Sole right)

	England	Northamptonshire
1980	750,431	1,536
1981	741,803	1,581
1982	744,252	1,464
1983	748,529	1,540
1984	740,986	1,261

The figures exclude minor holdings which are not required to complete an annual census return.

Breeding Ewes

Mr. Freeman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what statistics he has collected on the number of farm holdings with breeding ewes, and the total number of breeding ewes, in Northamptonshire and nationally, for each of the last five years.

Mr. MacGregor: The number of holdings with breeding ewes and the total number of breeding ewes collected in the June census for the last five years are as follows:

	England		Northamptonshire
	Holdings	Breeding ewes	Holdings	Breeding ewes
1980	40,691	6,544,829	891	147,263
1981	40,850	6,699,350	896	150,555
1982	41,537	6,921,372	887	153,171
1983	42,266	7,163,838	897	158,010
1984	42,541	7,261,917	909	160,825

The figures exclude minor holdings which are not required to complete an annual census return.

Confectionery (Indian Community)

Mr. Gregory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the volume and value of (a) confectionery manufactured in the United Kingdom for the Indian community and (b) confectionery imported for the Indian community in each year since 1979.

Mr. MacGregor: I regret that the information requested is not separately identified in the official statistics.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements are in hand to ensure that his Department complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984, the "Programme of Action on Women in the Civil Service".

Mr. Jopling: Arrangements which accord with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the code are already in hand following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the "Programme of Action on Women in the Civil Service". Existing joint management and trade union machinery is being used at departmental and national level to review such matters as promotion, selection for training and the incidence of part-time working. Women are being encouraged to attend courses —particularly developmental courses—and to make the maximum use of the training opportunities available. Use is being made of the Civil Service college course in middle management for women and consideration is being given to whether such courses can be introduced into our departmental training programme.

Sheepmeat

Mr. Freeman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the European Economic Community concerning a change in the sheepmeat regime's seasonal scale of guide prices so as to reduce the rate of fall of the scale during June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: When the scale was first proposed we said problems would arise. After they did so we raised the subject in the Council of Agriculture Ministers last July with particular reference to the fall in June. Since last summer we have made repeated representations on the subject. However, the Commission's proposals for next year's seasonal scale offer no improvements and we shall continue to press for changes which will promote more orderly marketing.

Cormorants

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many cormorants were estimated to exist at each of the locations for which applications were made for licences to kill them in 1984; and how many were permitted to be killed in each location where permission to kill was granted;

(2) on what grounds the six applications to kill cormorants were refused in 1984; and to which parts of the United Kingdom they related;

(3) to which parts of the United Kingdom each of the applications to kill cormorants granted in 1984 related;

(4) why a licence to kill cormorants was issued against the advice of the Nature Conservancy Council;

(5) what was the cost in 1984 of administering the scheme to determine whether or not a licence to kill cormorants will be issued; and what was the cost to public funds per licence;

(6) how long each of the licences issued to kill cormorants lasts;

(7) what was the nature and extent of the damage alleged to have been caused by cormorants in each of the applications for licences to kill the birds;

(8) what definition he uses of (i) serious damage and (ii) serious economic loss in the context of the granting of an application to kill cormorants;

(9) why it is necessary to protect the identity of those who apply for licences to kill cormorants.

Mrs. Fenner: Licences applied for and issued under section 16(1) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 for the killing of cormorants causing serious damage in England and Wales during 1984 are set out in the table.

Agriculture Departments in England and Wales have agreed with the Nature Conservancy Council that "serious damage" should mean convincing evidence of actual or potential significant economic loss. The degree of economic loss will depend upon the circumstances of the particular case.

Details of each licence application are passed to the Nature Conservancy Council for its views, but it is for Agriculture Ministers to decide on the issue of a licence, taking account of all the circumstances.

Licence applications are treated in confidence, but the Nature Conservancy Council is free to pass details of any case to any responsible body with an interest. Licence applicants are so informed.

The cost of administering the issue of all licences under section 16(1) of the 1981 Act is borne within the general administrative and ADAS Votes of the Department concerned. To obtain information specifically about cormorant licensing at this stage could only incur disproportionate cost.

Fishing Industry

Mr. Jim Spicer asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the various schemes of assistance available from the United Kingdom and the European Economic Community for the United Kingdom fishing industry.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows:

SCHEMES OF ASSISTANCE FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM FISHING INDUSTRY

The Fishing Vessels (Acquisition and Improvement) (Grants) Scheme 1981 (as amended).

—Grants towards the construction of new fishing vessels and the modernisation of existing ones.

Regulation (EEC) No. 2908/83

—Grants in addition to national aids for the purchase or construction of new fishing vessels, or for the modernisation or conversion of existing ones, of between 9 and 33 metres in length.

The Fishing Vessels (Financial Assistance) Scheme 1983 and Directive (EEC) 83/515

—Grants for the laying up or decommissioning of fishing vessels and for exploratory voyages and joint ventures.

The Fish Producers' Organisations (Formation Grants) Scheme 1982 and Regulation (EEC) No. 3796/81

—Grants in respect of the initial administrative expenses for Producers' Organisations.

The Fisheries Act 1981 provides for loans to be made available for the construction or re-engining of fishing vessels and for acquiring, reconditioning or improving plant for ice-making or processing sea fish.

The Fisheries Act 1955 provides for grants to be made available for harbour improvement to public authorities and other similar bodies in Great Britain where such assistance will promote the maintenance or development of the fishing industry. For Northern Ireland, grants are available under the Harbour Act (NI) 1970 to persons improving, maintaining or managing a harbour or carrying out harbour operations.

The Sea Fish Industry Authority also provides assistance in various forms to the United Kingdom industry generally.

Under the common organisation of the market in fishery products varying forms of support are available for certain designated species of fish. These include financial compensation for fish withdrawn from the human consumption market and storage aid payments. Payments are made by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce and reimbursed by the European Commission.

Regulation (EEC) 355/77 (as amended by Regulation (EEC) 1932/84)

Assistance for processing and marketing of fisheries products.

Details of assistance to fish farming were given in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) on 14 December 1984 at columns 624-25.

Thames Flood Barrier

Mr. Jessel asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the existing arrangements for the operation of the Thames flood barrier provide adequate protection against flooding in Twickenham and Teddington.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Catch Log Books

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will outline the progress made so far in the introduction of catch log books to United Kingdom fishermen.

Mr. MacGregor: EC logbooks and landing-transshipment declarations are due to be introduced on 1 April 1985. The task of distributing logbooks and agreeing the most efficient arrangements for their completion and return from that date began on 21 January. I am satisfied with the progress made so far. This has been made possible by the generally high level of co-operation from all concerned in the industry.

Milk Marketing Board

Mr. Leigh asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning the possible abolition of the Milk Marketing Board.

Mr. MacGregor: None.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements are in hand to ensure that his Department complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984, of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

Dr. Boyson: The code of practice of the Equal Opportunities Commission will not apply to the Northern Ireland Civil Service. However, in respect of staff in the Northern Ireland Civil Service, a new joint management and trade union side equal opportunities committee is monitoring and reviewing all aspects of equal opportunities policy, including those which particularly affect women, such as recruitment, promotion, training, career development and opportunities for part-time working or job sharing.

In light of the committee's deliberations and following further consultation with the Equal Opportunities Commission in Northern Ireland, a document will be issued for the Northern Ireland Civil Service corresponding to the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

In respect of the Home Civil Service, existing joint management and trade union machinery is being used at departmental and national level to review such matters as promotion, selection for training and the incidence of part-time working.

Transport Costs

Mr. Clifford Forsythe asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will investigate with leaders of business, commerce and the transport industry ways in which they may be able to overcome the high costs of transporting goods to and from Northern Ireland.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, of 12 March 1985, c. 125]: I am always ready to give full consideration to suggestions as to how the problems—including transport costs — resulting from Northern Ireland's peripheral location might be alleviated. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the recent report on transport costs in peripheral regions jointly commissioned by the Department of Economic Development, the Industry Department for Scotland and the European Commission, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Biffen: One hundred and twenty-one Members currently have offices in the Norman Shaw North building. This compares with 124 in 1975-76, 123 in 1977-79, 122 in 1980-82, and 121 in 1983 and 1984.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Terrorism

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning international terrorism and the discussions he has had with other countries to eradicate it.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 22 January at column 372. Discussions continue with like minded countries. We hope that the Bonn summit in May may provide a suitable opportunity for further constructive exchanges.

Frontier Relaxations

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning proposed frontier relaxations between France, West Germany and the Benelux countries.

Mr. Luce: The Governments of France, Germany and the Benelux countries are discussing the possibility of progressively relaxing controls at the land frontiers between them, on the lines of the agreement reached last year between France and Germany. We welcome this development. Separate discussions are taking place about making travel easier throughout the Community as a whole.

Agreement for Co-operation on the Safety of Atomic Energy

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the number of changes incorporated in the amendment to the agreement for co-operation on the uses of atomic energy for mutual defence purposes, which had become necessary since the last amendment, Cmnd. 7976, as indicated in his answer of 11 March.

Mr. Luce: The changes incorporated in the latest amendment to the agreement for co-operation on the uses of atomic energy for mutual defence purposes are listed in Cmnd. 9336.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom delegation will be led by my noble Friend Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The deputy leader will be Dame Anne Warburton DCVO, CMG, United Kingdom Permanent Representative to the office of the United Nations at Geneva. The delegation will also include my noble Friend Baroness Gardner of Parkes (United Kingdom Representative on the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women), my noble Friend Baroness Platt of Writtle (Chairman of the Equal Opportunities Commission), Mrs. Clark-Glass (Chairman of the Northern Ireland Equal Opportunities Commission),

Mrs. Nancy Catchpole (Women's National Commission) and a small number of Government officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Home Office. Representatives from Dependent Territories will also be included.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom permanent representative to the United Nations is today signing the United Nations convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment on behalf of Her Majesty's Government.

DEFENCE

Boarding School Allowances

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence, further to the reply of 10 January, Official Report, column 528, concerning departmental expenditure on boarding school allowances, whether such allowances are payable when scholastic instruction is available locally in the English language; and whether he will provide in respect of the armed forces (a) a breakdown showing the numbers of children drawn from each command area receiving an allowance and the number being educated locally and (b) the average cost to the Government of each child educated locally and the corresponding figure for those receiving an allowance, including the cost of visits to parents at the public expense.

Mr. Lee: Boarding school allowance is payable in respect of service children irrespective of whether scholastic instruction is available locally in the English language. In the case of children of parents in the armed forces, the allowance is paid to ensure continuity of education. It is for parents to choose whether to claim the allowance in order to achieve continuity for their children or to have their children with them on their frequent postings at home and abroad and send them to local schools.

(a) Boarding school allowance records are not maintained centrally in the form requested and cannot be obtained without disproportionate effort. In 1983-84, it is estimated that there were some 9,000 children of service parents who were in receipt of an allowance and who were serving abroad. The numbers of children educated in local schools run by the Service Children's Education Authority as at September 1984 were as follows: British Forces Germany 24,855; Cyprus 1,718; Gibraltar 643; Hong Kong 1,844; and Naples 90.

(b) In 1983-84 the average cost to the Government of each child educated locally in schools run by the Service Children's Education Authority is estimated at £2,275. In the same year the estimated average cost of a child of service parents serving overseas who were in receipt of an allowance was £2,516. The cost of visits to parents at the public expense is not separately identifiable.

Tellurometers

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if Tellurometers have been purchased and used by the British armed forces.

Mr. Butler: Yes.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements Her Majesty's Government propose to ensure access by United Kingdom companies to technologies developed in the research phase of the United States' Government's strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Butler: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister stated to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) on 26 February 1985, at column 180, it is important that we should keep up with the relevant technologies which span a wide range. We are therefore currently considering, and will be discussing with our United States allies, how best to pursue this. Some British companies are, of course, already closely involved in studies relating to this area.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements are in hand to ensure that his Department complies with the monitoring and positive action recommendations of the draft code of the Equal Opportunities Commission following the publication on 9 February 1984 of the programme of action on women in the Civil Service.

Mr. Butler: In accordance with the programme of action, a departmental equal opportunities officer has been appointed with responsibility for co-ordinating the Civil Service policy of non-discrimination within the Ministry of Defence. This officer acts as a focal point for monitoring the equal opportunities policy.

Existing joint management and trades union machinery is being used to review such matters as promotion, selection for training and the incidence of part-time working.

Women are being encouraged to attend courses and to make the maximum use of the training opportunities available. A developmental course for women middle managers is currently being run on a regular basis by this Department's central training division and use is also being made of the Civil Service college course in middle management for women only.

RTM 322 Helicopter Engine

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the progress of the testing of the RTM 322 helicopter engine; and if he will make a report.

Mr. Butler: The progress made so far in testing the RTM 322 has been very encouraging. Initial testing of the first two development engines has been completed, on schedule, by Rolls-Royce Limited and Turbomeca SA. The test objectives were achieved, the performance of the engines meeting the predicted levels.

Royal College of Surgeons (Research)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence what research projects have been financed by his Department at the Royal College of Surgeons; and what is the purpose of such projects.

Mr. Lee: It is not our policy to give information of this nature concerning research contracts.

TRANSPORT

M4 (Litter)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list his Department's responsibilities in respect of the collection of litter from the grass verges of the M4.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department is responsible for all sweeping and cleansing of motorways. The main concern in exercising that responsibility is to ensure the safety of those using the roads. In addition we periodically clear litter for amenity reasons from verges, central reservations and slopes. The work is carried out on our behalf by agent authorities.

Vehicle Testing

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the way in which he expects the proposed new conditions for his Department's test station authorisation will improve the safety record of the Ministry of Transport garage industry.

Mrs. Chalker: The primary purpose of the new conditions of appointment is to raise the standard of the MOT test. Whilst safety is the responsibility of the garage operator under the surveillance of the Health and Safety Executive or local authority, our proposals aim to follow good practice in so far as they affect the circumstances in which testing is carried out.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport how the proposed changes to his Department's test station layout and dimensions will improve the standards of his Department's testing.

Mrs. Chalker: The changes in test area requirements will contribute to an improved standard of testing by enabling the inspection to be carried out with the vehicle within the test bay, and by ensuring that the tester has adequate space to conduct the examination properly and to use the equipment.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the number of his Department's testing facilities which will be unable to meet his proposed new requirements for test station authorisation, and may have to close.

Mrs. Chalker: In view of the wide variation in the size and layout of existing testing premises, it is not possible to give an accurate figure for those which will be unable to meet the new requirements. However in view of the relaxations I propose to make, I expect the majority to be able to do so within the five-year period allowed.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve the training of his Department's testers.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall be proposing improved arrangements for training MOT testers in the future.

Illegal Parking (Hertfordshire)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he will give to the introduction of an order to immobilise vehicles illegally parked in Hertfordshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I have received no such request to date.

London Regional Transport

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made towards decentralising the operations of London Regional Transport as required by the London Regional Transport Act 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have given my approval under section 4 of the Act to proposals submitted by London Regional Transport for the formation by them of two companies, London Buses Limited and London Underground Limited to operate London bus and underground services. These companies will be incorporated as wholly-owned subsidiaries of LRT and will commnce trading on 1 April 1985.

At the same time, under its general powers conferred by section 3(1) of the Act, LRT will be establishing a separate wholly-owned subsidiary, LRT Bus Engineering Limited to provide bus engineering and overhaul facilities.

LBL will be able to bid for bus service contracts with LRT in competition with other suppliers, as has already started. BEL will be required to operate without subsidy as soon as possible and to provide its services to LBL and other operators in competition with other suppliers in the market.

I believe that the establishment of these three companies is a major step towards lower costs, improved efficiency and better value for money for London's public transport passengers. It represents a milestone of achievement in the evolution of LRT.

Moped and Motor Cycle Riders (Training)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what numbers of moped and motor cycle riders, by age group, came forward for training during 1981 and 1983; and if he will give these totals as a proportion of provisional licence holders for both years.

Mrs. Chalker: I regret that this information is not available. In 1983, 51,203 motor cyclists took part one of the motor cycle test and a course of training with an appointed training body.

Motor Cyclists (Tests)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the pass rate during 1983 of those motor cyclists taking the part one test with (a) an approved training body and (b) his Department.

Mrs. Chalker: The pass rates were: (a) 93 per cent. and (b) 50 per cent.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the part two pass rate during 1983 of those motor cyclists passing part one of the driving test with (a) each of the approved training bodies and (b) his Department.

Mrs. Chalker: I regret that the information is not available. For 1984, the average pass rate of motor cyclists taking part two for the first time, having passed part one with an appointed training body, was 74 per cent.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will provide information on the average length of time taken by motor cyclists between passing part one and taking or passing part two of the driving test.

Mrs. Chalker I regret that this information is not available.

Motor Cycles (Provisional Licences)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will indicate the number and proportion of motor cycle provisional licences issued from 1 October 1982 which have been (a) replaced by a full licence and (b) allowed to lapse.

Mrs. Chalker: I regret that this information is not readily available.

Sailing Vessel Marques (Inquiry)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the report of the inquiry into the loss of the sailing vessel Marques.

Mr. David Mitchell I have just received a report of this inquiry and am considering its recommendation. I shall make a further statement shortly.

Railway Passenger Services

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has been informed by the Transport Users' Consultative Committee of any objections to the proposed discontinuation of all railway passenger services on the line between Henley-in-Arden and Bearley junction; and whether an inquiry will be held.

Mr. David Mitchell The Transport Users Consultative Committee for the west midlands has informed my Right hon. Friend that it has received objections to British Rail's proposal to close the line between Henley-in-Arden and Bearley junction. Under the statutory closure procedures laid down in the Transport Act 1962 the committee will report to my right hon. Friend on any hardship it considers closure would cause. I understand that the committee hopes to hold a public hearing later this year.

Missing Vessels

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his reply of 5 March to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, he will give the last known or reported location of each missing vessel; and whether activity of submarines of any nationality was reported to the inquiry in each case.

Mr. David Mitchell [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1985, c.51].

Such information as is available about the last location of each vessel is given below:

MV Derbyshire 270 miles East of Okinawa
FV Pat Marie 1 mile South East of Benacre Ness
FV Celerity In Pentland Firth
FV Reborn Under the cliffs, East of Folkestone Harbour
FV Zanto Off the West Coast of Denmark
FV Exuberant Between Weymouth and Dartmouth; possibly off Portland Bill
FV South Stack Between Anglesey and the Isle of Man

In only one of these casualties, the Exuberant, was any report of possible submarine activity made to the inquiry and in that case it was established that no submarine was known to be in the area at the time.

ENERGY

Standing Charges

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has recently received from pensioners and pensioner organisations regarding the continuation of public utility standing charges.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have received a number of representations on electricity and gas standing charges from pensioners and pensioner organisations this year. Standing charges for water and telephone services are a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and Trade and Industry, respectively.

Petrol and Diesel Prices

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what studies his Department has made of the contribution which higher receipts to crude oil producers, consequent upon the rise in the United States dollar—pound sterling exchange rate, can now make towards stabilising or reducing petrol prices to the consumer.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Oil is traded world-wide; its price is determined by the balance of market supply and demand. Over the past year this has led to some fall in the dollar price of crude oil. Petrol is also a freely traded commodity, subject to competitive forces, overseas and in the United Kingdom, which have led to increases in sterling prices in recent months. Prices of crude oil and petrol can only be related to each other through trade and competition.

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what studies his Department has made of the movements in petrol prices over the last six months; and what estimates he has made on the impact of movements in the United States dollar—pound sterling exchange rate on retail petrol and diesel prices.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Petrol prices in the United Kingdom rose by 15 pence per gallon (8 per cent.) on average over the six months to mid March. During the same period the dollar rose by 16·5 per cent. against sterling. The exchange rate is only one of many influences bearing on the process of competition which determines petrol prices in the United Kingdom.

North Sea Oil

Mr. David Howell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what estimates his Department has made of the impact on changes in the United States dollar—pound sterling exchange rate on the gross returns of oil companies producing crude oil in the North sea over the last six months to 1 March.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My Department does not make estimates of the gross returns or receipts to oil companies involved in UKCS production over any six-monthly period. It is concerned with the returns to individual fields over their production life. The influence of recent exchange rate movements on the Department's calculations can only be considered in the context of the productive life of the field.

Sellafield (Solid Waste)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much of the plutonium in the solid waste at Sellafield originated in the Central Electricty Generating Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board Magnox reactors.

Mr. Goodlad: About half of the plutonium in solid wastes at Sellafield orginated from spent fuel from the United Kingdom generating boards' Magnox reactors.

Energy Policy

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he intends introducing a White Paper on energy policy.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Government's energy policy has been stated on many occasions.

SCOTLAND

Broadleaved Woodlands

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the names and areas of those broadleaved woodlands which his Department confirmed to the Forestry Commission would make a significant contribution to the viability and economy of the agricultural holding concerned if clearfelled and converted to agriculture in the years 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date, respectively.

Mr.John MacKay: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date officials from his Department confirmed to the Forestry Commission that a proposal to clearfell a broadleaved woodland and convert it to agriculture would make a significant contribution to the viability and economy of the agricultural holding concerned.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Clearfelled Woodlands

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the names, areas and principal tree species of each of the woodlands clearfelled under felling licence and subsequently converted to agriculture in 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85 to date, respectively.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mental Deficiency Nurse Staffing Project

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be able to report and make decisions on the information gained from the pilot study carried out into the mental deficiency nurse staffing project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The information from the pilot study is now being collated, but a report is not expected before the summer.

South of Scotland Electricity Board (Tendering)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will investigate the tendering procedure undertaken by the South of Scotland Electricity Board for the transport of coal from Knockshinnoch to Longannet; if he will instruct the board to retender if there has been any failure to follow prescribed tendering procedures or if the contract has not been awarded to the lowest suitable tenderer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Secretary of State does not prescribe tendering procedures since that is a matter for the board. I am advised that the board's formally approved procedures, which are also subject to independent audit, were complied with in this case.

"Broadleaves in Britain"

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Forestry Commission plans to hold further meetings about the "Broadleaves in Britain" review, before 8 May with any of the following: Timber Growers UK, the Institute of Chartered Foresters, the National Farmers Union, the Country Landowners Association, the Association of District Councils, the Nature Conservancy Council, the Countryside Commission, the Countryside Commission for Scotland, and the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors.

Mr. John MacKay: It may be necessary for the Forestry Commission to have discussions with Timber Growers UK, the Country Landowners Association, the Nature Conservancy Council and the two Countryside Commissions about particular aspects of the development of the draft policy proposals to be discussed at the seminar on 8 May.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police (Shooting)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on an incident in Islington, London, on 2 March, in which a man was shot by the police; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has already called for a report and will study it carefully when he receives it.

Firearms

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the criteria by which chief constables issue licences under the Firearms Act 1968; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Firearms Act 1968 itself sets out the considerations which a chief officer of police is required to take into account before issuing a firearms certificate, and we have no plans at present to bring forward amending legislation. The administration of the Act has been reviewed by a working party which reported in April 1984 and recommended standardised procedures for adoption by all forces. The report of the working party was circulated to chief officers of police under cover of Home Office circular No. 47/1984, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Prisons Control Review Committee

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in implementing the report of the Prisons Control Review Committee.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend intends to make a statement about our progress in the next couple of months.

Holloway Prison

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the actual and potential number of student attendances at classes and groups in Holloway prison in (a) the education unit, (b) the skills training unit and (c) the mother and baby unit in the most recent convenient week.

Mr. Mellor: For the week beginning Monday 11 February 1985, the information available is as follows:

Police Tactical Aid Groups

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines exist, or what advice his Department gives, on the use of police tactical aid groups in conjunction with (a) industrial disputes, including picket duty, (b) demonstrations and (c) student demonstrations.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Department has issued no advice on the use of such units in these circumstances.

British Crime Survey

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is yet in a position to publish the findings of the follow-up study of the British crime survey; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No, but we expect to do so in about two months when the analysis is complete.

Mr. Ralph L. Moss

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department has completed its investigation into the loss or disappearance of the personal possessions of Ralph L. Moss, who is currently held at HM remand centre, deport block, Ashford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: When it was discovered early in January that property belonging to Mr. Moss had apparently disappeared from Ashford remand cente, the police were asked to investigate. I understand that a report on the investigation is expected to be submitted shortly, and I will communicate with the hon. and learned Member when the results are available.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Non-Clinical Scientists

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will seek to establish a career structure offering continuity for non-clinical basic scientists engaged in medical research.

Mr. Brooke: The terms of employment of research staff are matters for employees and their representatives and for the university or other employing body.

A-level Passes

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report a list of local education authorities in order of achievement, according to the number of A-level passes obtained, expressed as a percentage of the total number which could have been obtained; and if he will include in the compilation of the list figures relating to tertiary colleges of education as well as secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: The information is shown in the table.

ENVIRONMENT

Law Centres

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about his policy towards the use of urban aid for law centres; and whether he consults the Lord Chancellor about the support given by his Department for legal advice on law centres.

Sir George Young: Ministerial guidelines for the urban programme accord first priority to projects designed to strengthen local economies, and in particular to capital schemes. The urban programme is, however, wide-ranging and does provide revenue funding for projects tackling social problems, including law centres. Urban programme revenue funding is always for a limited period in the expectation that if a project is successful it will subsequently find support from local authority main programmes or elsewhere. Each application from a law centre is considered on its merits against other bids for the use of limited resources. The Lord Chancellor's Department is consulted when new bids for urban programme support for law centres are put forward by sponsoring local authorities.

Lambeth (Youth Training Scheme)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will disregard for penalty purposes expenditure by Lambeth council in support of mode B youth training schemes.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I shall consider any representations to this effect that I receive from the council.

Inner City Partnerships

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he monitors how many projects collapse within 12 months of becoming time-expired under the inner city partnerships in cases where the project is not subsequently supported by a local authority.

Sir George Young: The Department carries out an annual survey of time-expired urban programme projects. At the end of 1983-84, within all the partnership and programme authorities, only two time-expired voluntary sector projects for which renewed urban programme support was sought and refused failed subsequently to receive local authority funding. The survey did not investigate what happened to these projects.

House of Commons (Maintenance)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the costs for 1983-84, and the estimated costs for 1984-85 and 1985-86, of maintaining the House, divided between building repairs, general services, and furniture and equipment.

Sir George Young: The Property Services Agency's records do not readily identify the precise costs attributable to individual buildings forming the parliamentary estate, nor do they distinguish between costs for the two Houses. The following figures accordingly relate to the parliamentary estate as a whole:

£ thousand

	1983-84*	†1984-85	†1985-86
Building alteration works	1,485	950	1,203

Local Government Employees

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North on 25 February Official Report, column 61, if he will give details of total employee pay and associated costs, including cost of office accommodation, heating, lighting, and other associated costs, for local government white collar and manual employees, for each of the years 1978-79, 1979-80, 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84; and if he will show for each year the average cost per employee.

Mr. Waldegrave: Information is not available centrally about the costs of office accommodation, heating, lighting and other costs associated with employees.

Town and Country Planning (Compensation) Bill

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation analogous to that contained in the Town and Country Planning (Compensation) Bill to extend to all other types of property; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The provisions of the Town and Country Planning Bill, which remove compensation rights under section 169 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, have been limited to extensions to blocks of flats, because these are the cases where there is clear evidence that compensation rights are currently being abused. Any evidence of similar abuse which is produced during the passage of the Bill through Parliament will be carefully considered.

Radon Gas

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give his assessment of the amount of radon gas present in a dwelling in (a) Sellafield, (b) north Bedfordshire and (c) Cornwall.

Sir George Young: Preliminary estimates by the national radiological protection board, based on its current surveys of dwellings in the United Kingdom, are that the levels in Cumbria are about the same as the average for the United Kingdom as a whole; in north Bedfordshire about half the average; and in Cornwall generally about four times the average. No measurements of radon levels have been made in dwellings in the immediate area of Sellafield, but NRPB has not identified any factors there which would be expected to lead to levels significantly different to those in the rest of Cumbria.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies his Department has carried out into the effect of double glazing and stone floors in dwellings in which radon gas accumulates.

Sir George Young: Research on radon gas accumulation by the Building Research Establishment of my Department and by the NRPB has not specifically addressed the influence of these two factors. However, the surveys of dwellings in the United Kingdom currently being undertaken by NRPB may provide useful information. In terms of current knowledge, the material from which floors are constructed and the nature of glazing are not likely to have overriding significance in determining radon levels.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will indicate the steps the Government propose to take to carry out the recommendations on radon gas formulated in paragraph 5.49 of the Royal Commission's report on environmental pollution Tenth report.

Sir George Young: The position remains as set out in paragraphs 53 and 54 of "Controlling Pollution: Principles and Prospects: the Government's response to the Tenth Report of the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution" (pollution paper no. 22), which was published on 13 December 1984 and is in the Library.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether local authorities engaged in formulating their case against a nuclear waste depository at Elstow and the other sites to be announced will be permitted to treat such outlays or part thereof as expenditure not subject to penalty for the purpose of local government grant.

Mr. William Waldegrave All Costs incurred by a local authority in opposing any proposals for development will count towards that authority's total expenditure. We have not so far been persuaded of the case for disregarding any such expenditure for the purposes of calculating any holdback of block grant. My right hon. Friend will however reconsider the representations he has received on this matter in relation to possible sites for nuclear waste, and any new representations, before he takes further decisions on grant abatement for the relevant financial year.

Radionuclides (Report)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Atomic Energy Authority proposes to report on the study it has undertaken into the behaviour of radionuclides in geological formations beyond repositories; and whether its findings will be disclosed to the public.

Mr. Waldegrave: The United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority is carrying out a number of research projects, under contract to my Department, on the behaviour of radionuclides in geological formations. Some will be completed this summer, and the remainder in the first half of next year. In addition, my Department publishes an annual report summarising the results from all research undertaken as part of its radioactive waste management research programme. Copies of the annual reports are in the Library of the House. Reports on these projects will be made publicly available by my Department through the British Library Lending Division, as has already happened with previous projects in the same programme.

London Docklands

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has examined the possibility of declaring the area covered by the London Docklands Development Corporation a simplified planning zone.

Sir George Young: No, the powers to declare a simplified planning zone do not exist. The consultation paper my right hon. Friend issued last year on how such zones might operate provoked widespread comment which my right hon. Friend is at present considering. My right hon. Friend hopes to make an announcement shortly.

Rate Support Grant (Manchester)

Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent discussions he has had with the leader and representatives of Manchester city council regarding the rate support grant for that city; and what was the outcome.

Mr. Waldegrave: Manchester city council was one of the 26 authorities, including 17 rate-limited authorities, represented at a collective meeting with my right hon. Friend on 4 February. The outcome of those discussions was recorded in the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 6 February at column 621.

Planning Authorities

Mr. Hordern asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the cost of fees paid to planning authorities for applications; and how much of this cost is covered not by charges, but by subsidy.

Mr. Macfarlane: The current scale of fees is laid down in the Town and Country Planning (Fees for Applications and Deemed Applications) Regulations 1983. Fees are estimated to raise a total revenue of about £32·3 million in the present financial year, as a contribution towards the overall costs of development control to local authorities of about £73 million.

British Waterways Board

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will increase his Department's grant to the British Waterways Board by an amount equivalent to the cost of work on the route to Rhodesia section of the Chesterfield canal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: No. The British Waterways Board uses grant-aid from my Department to meet statutorily defined standards for maintenance of their network. This section of the canal is classified as a remainder waterway, and is therefore maintained to minimum standards.

Additional funding for maintenance to higher standards must come from other sources.

Land Reclamation

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much of the £76·4 million provided in 1985-86 for derelict land reclamation will be spent on reclaiming landfill sites.

Mr. Macfarlane: There is no specific allocation for the reclamation of landfill sites in the 1985-86 derelict land programme. Applications for grant in respect of such sites will be considered on their merits, but grant will not normally be available for those which are subject to restoration conditions.

Refuse Disposal (Costs)

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to which local authority has the highest cost per tonne of refuse disposal, and which has the lowest; and if he will give the figures.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information requested is published annually by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy in its publication "Waste Disposal Statistics". Its "1983-84 Actuals" contain the latest available figures for English waste disposal authorities and show that Buckinghamshire had the lowest net revenue cost per tonne of £1·54, and Berkshire the highest at £15·62; costs were not available for the Greater London council or for Cambridgeshire. However the "1982-83 Actuals" did include figures for the GLC, and showed that they were the third highest for that period.

Leaseholders (Insurance)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will introduce legislation to prohibit freeholders from prescribing a sole insurer or sole broker for the insurance of the building by the leaseholder; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to prohibit proceedings being taken by a freeholder for the forfeiture of a lease on the grounds that the leaseholder has failed to insure the property with an insurance company, or through an insurance agency, prescribed by the freeholder; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The Government have no proposals for legislation on the insurance of leasehold residential property at this stage. As regards flats, the committee that my hon. Friend the Minister of Housing and Construction established under the chairmanship of Mr. Edward Nugee QC, is looking at a wide range of management problems, including insurance. Its recommendations may have implications for other forms of residential property. Most leaseholders living in houses can enfranchise under the terms of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 (as amended) if they wish to free themselves from obligations regarding insurance arising in connection with their lease.

PRIME MINISTER

Community Service

Mr. Irving asked the Prime Minister what consideration the Government have given to the extension of community service; whether the Government have commissioned any estimate of costings of various community service options; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Community service schemes are available to courts throughout England and Wales. In all areas, except Humberside, these schemes have been or will be extended next month to cover offenders aged 16 and over. In Scotland, schemes for offenders aged 16 or over are available to sheriff courts serving four fifths of the population and we hope for further extensions. Schemes for offenders aged 17 and over are available to courts throughout Northern Ireland.

The schemes are administered locally and vary according to local needs and circumstances, as would alternative options and their costs. The Government believe that the schemes are administered in an effective and imaginative manner, and do not see a need to commission centrally any studies such as my hon. Friend has in mind.

WALES

Local Authority Manpower

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 31 March of each of the years 1974 to 1984 together with the latest available figures, the number of local authority employees in Wales, analysed by part-time/full-time status within sex, covered by each of the items (i) to (v) in part III of his consultation document "Competition in the Provision of Local Authority Services"; and if he will reconcile these numbers with the published joint manpower watch.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information requested is not available centrally. The joint manpower watch does not collect information for this detailed level of service, nor does it collect information about the sex of employees.

Holyhead

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what financial assistance to create jobs has been directed through his Department since 1979 to the Holyhead travel-to-work area; how many jobs have been created; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Since 1 January 1979, offers of regional selective assistance made by my Department totalling £114,000 have been accepted by companies for new and expansion projects in the Holyhead travel-to-work area. These projects were expected to lead to the creation of 95 new jobs.

In addition, since that date my Department has approved urban programme assistance of £269,000 towards schemes which the local authority has estimated will employ between 170 and 180 people.

M4 (Design Life)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the effects on the theoretical design life of more recently constructed sections of the M4 of the transference of heavy freight from rail to road being maintained after the coal strike for a period of (a) one year and (b) five years.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: I shall reply as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the United Kingdom and the European Economic Community the ratio between the estimated contribution of agriculture to gross domestic product and the contribution of a 1 per cent. value added tax each year from 1980.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is contained in the following table. The table gives figures for value added tax in agriculture, for the yield from a 1 per cent. tax on the harmonised value added tax base, and for the ratio between them. The data are given for 1980, 1981 and 1982. 1982 is the last year for which figures for value added in agriculture are available for the major countries of the European Economic Community; for Ireland and Luxembourg 1982 figures are not available, so the EC total is an estimate.

Value added in agriculture, and the yield from one per cent. of the harmonised value added tax base

	1980	1981	1982
(1) Value added in agriculture (millions of ecus)
United Kingdom	7,318	8,861	10,205
European Community	64,043	77,840	89,363
(2) One per cent yield from harmonised VAT base (millions of ecus)
United Kingdom	1,856	1,942	2,984
European Community	10,904	11,721	13,143
(3) Ratio (1)÷(2)
United Kingdom	3·94	4·56	3·42
European Community	5·87	6·64	6·80

Notes:

(i) Value added in agriculture is the contribution to GDP, and covers agriculture, hunting, forestry and fishing. Source: OECD National Accounts 1970-1982, except for France (UN Monthly Bulletin of Statistics); for Ireland and Luxembourg 1982 figures were not available, so agriculture was assumed to account for the same share of GDP as in 1981.

(ii) Value added, measured in national currencies, was converted to ecus using ecu exchange rates (average for the year). Source: European Economy.

(iii) The figures for one per cent. yield from the harmonised VAT base are Customs and Excise calculations based on European Commission figures and use Commission estimates for Greece. They were converted at budget exchange rates which vary significantly from year to year.

(iv) The Civil Service strike of 1981 delayed collection of some VAT until 1982. This is the major factor behind the exceptional 1982 figure for the United Kingdom's 1 per cent. VAT base. The budget figures for 1983 and 1984 are 1,926 and 2,927 million ecu respectively.

Taxation

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of earnings was absorbed by income tax and social security contributions for (a) a single person and (b) a married couple with two dependent children in 1979 and 1984 for the following income categories in 1984, with equivalent categories in 1979 expressed in constant prices: £1,500, £5,000, £12,000, £20,000 and £50,000.

Mr. Moore: Information is as follows:

Income tax plus NI contributions less child benefit as percentage of gross earnings

	1978-79			1984-85
*Gross earnings as percentage of average earnings	Gross earnings £ per year	Single	Married man with two children*	Gross earnings £ per year	Single	Married man with two children

VAT

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will indicate for the most recent year for which figures are available the value added tax collected by the offices in Truro, Penzance and Launceston.

Mr. Hayhoe: VAT is collected centrally, and receipts are not broken down by the locations of the businesses accounting for the tax. I regret that the information would not be available without disproportionate cost.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if any current or pending EC regulations require the application of value added tax to non-domestic and civil engineering works.

Mr. Hayhoe: Under the EC sixth VAT directive, there is no specific relief for non-domestic construction or civil engineering work, but the United Kingdom Government take the view that zero rating is permissible as a transitional derogation under article 28.2. This view has been disputed by the Commission.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations Her Majesty's Government have received from the European Commission concerning the compatibility with the sixth value added tax directive of the exemption of certain goods and services from value added tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer on 14 March, at column 257, to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright).

Hot Take-away Food

Sir Peter Blaker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue derived from the imposition of 15 per cent. value added tax on hot take-away food.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue has been received as the result of value added tax being imposed on hot take-away food.

Mr. Shersby asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated revenue from value added tax on hot take-away food during the first year of the liability to this tax.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my right hon. and hon. Friends to my answer on 12 November 1984, at column 89, to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett).

Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate how many jobs have been lost as a result of value added tax being imposed on hot take-away food.

Mr. Hayhoe: No reliable information is available on employment in the hot take-away food industry. However, there has been substantial real growth in the take-away food industry in recent years and this long-term trend can be expected to continue.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect the imposition of value added tax has had on the take-away food industry.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer on 13 December 1984, at column 570, to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any undertaking was given when value added tax on hot take-away food was imposed that this tax decision would be reviewed at the end of 12 months.

Mr. Hayhoe: No. But all taxes are kept under regular review by the Government.

Families (Taxation)

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received concerning the taxation of families.

Mr. Moore: I have received several proposals on this subject from hon. Members and others.

Departmental Staff (Bonus Payments)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if bonus payments are to be given to Inland Revenue staff as a result of the intended collection of extra revenue following closer inspection of the accounts of small businesses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: As part of their policy to enhance the management performance and effectiveness of the Civil Service, the Government announced on 5 December 1984 an experimental scheme starting in April 1985 under which staff at the levels of grade 3 (Under Secretary) down to Principal and equivalent grades will have the opportunity to earn a bonus for particularly good performance during the year. This scheme will operate in all Departments. The staff eligible in the Inland Revenue include the more senior tax inspectors, but there is no question of the scheme being set up specifically for them. As it happens, the inspectors who will qualify for bonuses do not generally deal with the accounts of small businesses. But, in any event, no inspector has been offered the chance of a bonus for bringing in extra tax revenue from small businesses.

Merchant Shipping Industry

Mr. Colvin asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the gross receipts to the United Kingdom invisible balance of payments arising from the operations of the United Kingdom merchant shipping industry in each year from 1979 to 1984; and what were the net balances on the sea transport invisible account as a whole in the same years.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The latest estimates are as follows:

Balance of Payments Invisibles Account

£ million

	United Kingdom ship operators' gross credits	Balance on Sea Transport Account
1979	3,187	127
1980	3,144	141
1981	3,063	−160
1982	2,527	−530
1983	2,328	−884
1984*	2,570	−1,108

* Provisional.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will ensure that any report sent to him by Price Waterhouse or by the City police fraud squad into the affairs of Johnson Matthey Bankers will be published.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 14 March 1985, c. 260]: The Price Waterhouse report was commissioned by the Bank of England and is a matter for the governor. But I am advised that it contains confidential information concerning the commercial affairs of customers of Johnson Matthey Bankers, who are entitled to the normal confidence owed by a bank to its customers, and will not therefore be published. The findings of the report will, however, be taken fully into account by the official committee which is currently reviewing the system of banking supervision in the light of events at Johnson Matthey Bankers.

I have no reason to expect a report on the affairs of Johnson Matthey Bankers from the City police fraud squad.

EMPLOYMENT

Dock Labour

Mr. Moate asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what representations he has received on behalf of dock labour scheme port employers expressing concern at the effect on their competitive position of the burden of financing severance schemes administered by the National Dock Labour Board and drawing attention to the possible loss of jobs consequential upon any decision by scheme port employers to terminate their operations;

(2) when he expects to complete his urgent review of the basis of dock worker severance finance referred to in his minute presented to Parliament dated 30 January; on what basis severances of registered dock workers will be permanently financed after the current arrangements expire on 31 March; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will make it his policy to ensure that any revised scheme for the financing of severance payments for dock workers takes account of the impact of such a scheme on the relative competitive positions of scheme and non-scheme port employers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend is having continuing discussions with representatives of the port employers about severance arrangements in their industry. These discussions have embraced the issues to which my hon. Friend refers.

Job Release Schemes

Mr. Christopher Hawkins asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will announce the results of the review of the rates of allowance payable under both the part-time and full-time job release schemes.

Mr. Alan Clark: Following our annual review of allowances, the rates payable under the job release schemes from 8 April, will be as follows:

PART-TIME SCHEME

For disabled men aged 60 and 61 and men aged 62 and 63 who are married with a dependent wife whose net income from all sources does not exceed £13 a week: £40·70 a week taxable; for all others £33·80 a week, taxable.

For women aged 59 and men aged 64 who are married with a dependent spouse whose net income from all sources does not exceed £13 a week: £35·55 a week, tax free; for all others £28·95 a week, tax free.

The new part-time scheme allowances include a supplement of £4, to make the scheme more attractive to employees.

FULL-TIME SCHEME

For disabled men aged 60, 61, 62 and 63—and for men who have joined the scheme at aged 62 and 63—who are married with a dependent wife whose net income from all sources does not exceed £13 a week: £71·15 a week, taxable; for all others £58·35 a week, taxable.

For women aged 59 and men aged 64 who are married with a dependent spouse whose net income from all sources does not exceed £13 a week: £63 a week, tax free; for all others £49·95 a week, tax free.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he is proposing to make any further changes to the job splitting and part-time job release schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: As my right hon. Friend announced on 12 November, both schemes will continue in 1985-86 but with improvements designed to encourage changes in working patterns and to help in reducing unemployment.

The rules of the job splitting scheme will be changed with effect from 1 April to widen the scope of the scheme and to ensure that it operates more flexibly. The main changes are:

—to increase the grant available to employers from £750 to £840 payable in three instalments;

—to allow employers to create two new part-time jobs which must be filled by people leaving other Government schemes, notably the youth training scheme;

—to allow employers to create a part-time job from combining the regular overtime hours of existing full-time jobs;

—to remove the restrictions in the current rules on the time allowed for part-time workers to work or train alongside each other;

— and to permit more flexibility in the working arrangements to be adopted by allowing the hours of the part-time jobs to be averaged over a 13-week period.

In addition, for the first time, the grant will be payable to an employer supporting a successful application under the part-time job release scheme. Further changes have also been made to the part-time job release scheme to make it more attractive. They will apply in respect of employees who join the scheme on or after 29 April:

The main changes are:

—to remove the restriction preventing individuals from moving from the part-time scheme to the full-time schemes; and

—to simplify the application procedure and the current rules, particularly those covering the hours to be given up by the employee.

In addition, the new part-time scheme allowances applying from 8 April will include a supplement of £4, in addition to the usual annual increase, to make the scheme more attractive to employees.

New leaflets giving details of the changes will be available from Department of Employment regional offices, jobcentres and careers offices shortly.

Manpower Services Commission

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will set out the main improvements in economy and efficiency achieved in the Manpower Services Commission since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison: While total expenditure on the Commission's programmes and services is increased from £640 million in 1978-79 to an estimated £2,260 million in 1985-86 as a result of the introduction of major new programmes, such as the community programme, the youth training scheme and the enterprise allowance scheme, MSC staff numbers have been reduced from 25,300 in April 1979 to 20,800.

Jobcentres

Major economies and improvements in efficiency in jobcentres have resulted from.

—the abandonment of compulsory registration for unemployed people (1,300 staff saved);

—a Rayner scrutiny of the employment service which resulted in a wide range of changes saving £8 million a year and almost 400 staff.

In addition recently agreed plans for the development of the employment service produce a larger jobcentre network with more advanced computerised vacancy handling arrangements leading to eventual savings of almost 1,000 staff and £8 million a year.

Professional and Executive Recruitment

Since April 1983 PER has been required to break even. It achieved this for the 1983-84 financial year and looks set to do so again this year. It now employes 290 permanent staff as compared with 770 in April 1979, but makes more placings overall.

Adult Training

It is planned to double—to 250,000—the number of adults trained under the commission's programmes within the current levels of resources available.

In order to ensure that the resources devoted to the direct provision of training by Government are spent cost effectively, the Government's main providers, the skillcentres, were reorganised in 1983 into the separate skillcentre training agency, and required ultimately to cover costs from trading income, in competition with other providers. The agency's proposals to enable it to do so from April 1986 will involve a significant streamlining of its operations.

Industrial Training Boards

Sixteen statutory industrial training boards out of a total of 23 have been replaced by more flexible voluntary arrangements, and the cost to the taxpayer of supporting these boards—over £60 million a year at today's prices —has been wholly eliminated.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheepmeat

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculure, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1984 the prices and consumption of sheepmeat on the same basis as that given in his answer of 19 March 1984, Official Report, columns 356-58.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows. The estimated figures for 1983 given in my answer of 19 March 1984 have been replaced with the final figures.

Sheepmeat

Animal Feedingstuffs

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much rapeseed in the EEC is used for animal feed; what is the cost to EEC funds of using this feed; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the total subsidies paid by the EEC on ingredients to animal feed and the total value of the feed produced.

Mr. MacGregor: In 1984, Community production of rapeseed is estimated to have been 2·9 million tonnes, providing about 1·8 million tonnes of rapeseed meal, nearly all of which was incorporated in animal feed. Very little whole rapeseed is used in animal feed. Crushing subsidies of about 417 mecu were paid in 1984 to make Community-produced rapeseed competitive with imported seed but these payments were made in respect of the seed, of which the meal is only a by-product. Crushing subsidies of about 196 mecu and 33 mecu respectively were paid on sunflower seed and soya beans.

The following subsidies are estimated to have been paid by the Community in 1984 on other ingredients of animal feed (in mecu).

	mecu

† A small part of this expenditure relates to aid for peas and beans for human consumption.

The total value of feed produced is not known but the value of purchased animal feed in 1983 is estimated at 30,683 million ecu.

Egg Production (Document)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the document, "Egg Production: briefing document," issued by the British Egg Industry Council, a copy of which has been sent to him; and whether he accepts the statistical information therein as to the condition of hens in cages.

Mr. Jopling: I have no responsibility for this document which was, I understand, issued by the British Egg Industry Council for the information of Members of Parliament, the media and others.

Thames Flood Barrier

Mr. Jessel asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he considers existing arrangements for the operation of the Thames flood barrier provide adequate protection against flooding in Twickenham and Teddington.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 14 March 1985]: Yes. I have no evidence that existing arrangements for the operation of the barrier are not working as designed.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

COCOM

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the new modified procedures agreed at the high-level COCOM meeting on 6 and 7 February for reviewing its list; into which four segments the list is divided for review purposes; and in which sequence the segments will be reviewed.

Mr. Channon: The division of COCOM lists has been arranged so that each segment contains similar list items grouped together and that there is a logical sequence of items between the segments, which will normally be reviewed between June of one year and the following June. In general terms, the first segment covers components and the associated manufacturing machinery and processes, chemicals, metalloids and petroleum products, and the atomic energy list; the second covers chemical and petroleum equipment, electronic communications equipment and related technology, and computers and software; the third covers metals minerals and their manufactures, metal working machinery, robotics and communications and fibre optic related list items, including telecommunications switching systems; and the fourth covers test equipment, transportation equipment, related electronic detection measurement and test equipment and their components, and the munitions list.

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how he proposes to consult the information technology industry prior to the annual reviews by COCOM of segments of its list.

Mr. Channon: My officials will follow the normal consultation process of approaching the relevant trade associations concerned, but, as always, we will be ready to consider the views of any interested parties. My Department issued a press notice on 4 March seeking firms' urgent views on those list items to be reviewed in the first segment. Copies of this notice were sent separately to trade associations and specialist trade journals, and it was also reprinted in my Department's weekly journal British Business on 8 March.

Overseas Trade Fairs

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to increase the number of small companies which participate in British Overseas Trade Board-supported overseas trade fairs.

Mr. Fletcher: As the BOTB stated in the consultation document dated 3 December 1984, which is available in the Library of the House, the board believes it right to concentrate on helping the smaller and medium sized firms to overcome the problems of entering new markets.

The BOTB believes it is best to achieve this emphasis by the nature of the schemes of support rather than by rules relating to the size of firms.

Registered Designs Act 1949 and Copyright Act 1956

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any proposals to amend the Registered Designs Act 1949 and section 10 of the Copyright Act 1956; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. and learned Member as soon as possible.

Regional Aid

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect of his regional aid policy upon net employment in those industries to which the policy is directed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Until the recent changes in regional industrial policy, the policy was broadly directed at manufacturing industry in the assisted areas, although assistance was provided to some service sector projects. The available evidence suggests that by 1981 there were between 250,000 and 445,000 more manufacturing jobs in the assisted areas than there otherwise would have been if regional policy had not operated throughout the period since 1960. In addition to the effect on manufacturing industries directly aided, it is estimated that a further 100,000 to 185,000 jobs were indirectly created in the assisted areas in other industries.

It is too early to make an estimate of the employment effects of the changes in regional industrial policy introduced late last year.

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations have been made to him regarding the effect of regional and other aid given to companies and persons where there is already over capacity in that particular industry; and what checks his Department makes on these matters before making grants to new firms.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Scrap Metal

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received concerning the increase in the price of scrap; if he has made any estimate of or has any information about the impact of this on the United Kingdom foundry industry; by how much the price has risen in each quarter since 1982; and what powers he has to introduce a system of export licences.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to the reply, 14 March 1985, c. 206-7]: My Department has received representations from some 60 companies and organisations about the price of ferrous scrap, including a number from owners of foundries.

I am aware that ferrous scrap is an important raw material for the foundry industry and that changes in the price of scrap have a serious effect on its costs. The industry estimates that over the last 12 months this has added 10 per cent. to its production costs.

The following table shows the average price span for one grade of ferrous scrap for the first week of each quarter since 1982.

Date	£ per tonne
8 January 1982	39—41
2 April 1982	42—45
2 July 1982	32—34

7 January 1983	26—29
8 April 1983	38—43

7 October 1983	44—48
6 January 1984	56—59
6 April 1984	53—57
6 July 1984	62—66
5 October 1984	68—72
4 January 1985	67—71
8 March 1985	84—89

Note: The prices given are for No. 1 heavy melting (OA) scrap.

Powers to introduce a system of licences for exports of ferrous scrap to countries other than EC member states exist under the Import, Export and Customs Power (Defence) Act 1939. It would be contrary to the treaty of Paris establishing the European Coal and Steel Community to impose controls on exports to other member states.

United States (High Technology Exports)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will obtain and place in the Library a copy of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development report prepared for that organisation by Dr. Stuart Macdonald entitled, "The Sisyphus Syndrome—Implications of US Controls on High Technology Exports"; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to his reply, 14 March 1985, c. 208-9]: I understand that the report in question was commissioned by the OECD secretariat directly from Dr. Macdonald to help it assemble background material for work on high technology issues. It has been written for the OECD secretariat and has not been distributed to any OECD member Government.

Clothing and Textiles

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in which multi-fibre arrangement product categories Pakistan, India and Sri Lanka utilised 90 per cent. or more of the multi-fibre arrangement quotas to the United Kingdom in the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 26 February 1985, c. 119]: In 1982 and 1983 India, Pakistan and Sri Lanka utilised 90 per cent. or more of their multi-fibre arrangement quotas to the United Kingdom for the following categories:

*India
1982: MFA categories 4, 6, 15B, 27 and 29
1983: MFA categories 4 and 27
Pakistan†
1982: MFA categories 1, 2, 4, 7, 8, ex 10, 27 and 80
1983: MFA categories 1, 2, ex 10 and 27
Sri Lanka
1982: MFA category 7
1983: MFA categories 7 and 8

* For India, category 6 was erroneously included for 1983 in reply to the hon. Member's question of 22 February 1985, at column 119.

† For Pakistan, category 27 was erroneously omitted for 1983 in the reply.

The final 1984 utilisation figures are not yet available.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the level of utilisation of the United Kingdom's multi-fibre arrangement quotas for each group I product category by each supplier country in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 26 February 1985, c. 117-20]: Utilisation of the 1983 quota for category 2, Egypt, was 80 per cent*.

* Erroneously shown as "n.a." in the reply.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Health Data

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why patient data held by family practitioner committees is not covered by the report from the confidentiality working group and the draft code "Confidentiality of Personal Health Data."

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The report from the working group on confidentiality set up by the steering group on health services information—the Körner committee—was written as advice to health authorities on the policies and management arrangements appropriate for the information they hold about patients and employees. The draft code of practice on confidentiality of personal health data issued for consultation by our Department last October was also written with the needs of health authorities in mind. Preparations are being made for consultation on a separate code for family practitioner committees and other bodies involved in family practitioner service administration, which will be based on the same general principles.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will describe the nature and extent of personal data held by family practitioner committees in respect of patients;

(2) what arrangements exist for the protection and maintenance of confidentiality of patient data held by family practitioner committees; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will list the items of personal data held by a family practitioner committee in respect of a person registered under the National Health Service and on the list of a general practitioner.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Family practitioner committees may hold some or all of the following personal data relating to patients:

- Names and former and other names.
- Address and previous addresses.
- Sex.
- If female, marital status.
- Date and place of birth.
- National Health Service number.

Name of usual general medical practitioner, previous GMPs, and GMPs providing any emergency treatment.

Group identifiers (for example, students, new arrivals registering for general medical services).

- Patients receiving:
- Cervical cytology tests
- Maternity medical services (date of confinement).
- Contraceptive services.
- Sight tests (date of tests and collection of glasses).
- Oxygen supplies and equipment.
- Dental treatment, including details of treatment and husband's name if married; women living with husband where a refund is applied for; and details of emergency NHS dental treatment.
- Treatment to arrest dental haemorrhage and signature of parent or guardian, if applicable.
- Certain vaccinations and immunisations including reason for and date of vaccination, and school attended, if appropriate.

Under general medical service arrangements:

- Night visits
- Treatments as a temporary resident including expected stay in an area and details of treatment.
- Emergency treatment if residing in an area for 24 hours or less.

Exemptions from prescription, dental and optical charges giving health reasons or social security status.

Claim for refund for replacement of dental appliance on hardship grounds giving details of size of family, total weekly income, major weekly outgoings.

Medical records of deceased patients and those who have ceased to be registered with the GMP.

FPCs are expected to hold records in secure conditions and not to use personalised information for purposes other than that for which it was obtained without the written consent of the patient or his personal representatives save for bona fide research or in exceptional circumstances such as pursuant to a court order.

AIDS

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to make additional funds available to the National Health Service on (a) acquired immune deficiency syndrome research, (b) treatment and care of haemophiliacs and (c) other high risk groups; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government are already financing research on AIDS. Research in the United Kingdom is being co-ordinated by the Government funded Medical Research Council (MRC) working party on AIDS. It is for the MRC to decide its research priorities in this area.

As regards haemophiliacs, we are acting to protect them from the risk of contracting AIDS through their use of blood products and making considerable investment in new plant and equipment to manufacture safer products. I refer the hon. Member to my replies on 4 February and 5 February to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) at columns 450, 451, 525 and 527.

More generally we are distributing nearly £500 million in additional cash to regional health authorities in 1985-86, and are also expecting health authorities to produce cost improvement programmes yielding in excess of £100 million. The cost of dealing with AIDS will be a comparatively small demand on these additional resources for the Service as a whole.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultations he proposes to have with Health Ministers of the Governments of France and the Federal Republic of Germany about measures which they have taken in their respective countries to combat the acquired immune deficiency syndrome virus.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our officials are in regular contact with the World Health Organisation AIDS reference centre in Paris which collates AIDS data from European countries.

There is United Kingdom membership of the Comité de la Recherche Medicale (CRM) working group on AIDS which is responsible for European Community medical and public health research on the disease.

As well as maintaining contact with the CRM working group, members of the United Kingdom Medical Research Council working party on AIDS are collaborating with research workers overseas who have isolated the AIDS related virus.

The Italian Presidency is planning a meeting of the European Community Council of Health Ministers in the near future and this subject may be on the agenda.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to increase the facilities for genito-urinary medicine to accommodate symptomatic acquired immune deficiency syndrome cases referred by general practitioners.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is for individual health authorities to decide the allocation of funds in this area in the light of local needs and circumstances.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assistance he intends to give to health authorities to enable them to raise the level of provision of counselling services in hospitals and communities for citizens who fear they are at risk of contracting the acquired immune deficiency syndrome virus.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are distributing nearly £500 million in additional cash to regional health authorities in 1985-86 and are also expecting health authorities to produce cost improvement programmes yielding in excess of £100 milion identified this year. This money may be used for the development of services generally including, where it is considered appropriate, services in connection with AIDS.

Drug Addiction

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the number of persons addicted to (a) sedatives and (b) tranquillisers.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what specialist services are available within the National Health Service for those addicted to prescribed tranquillisers or sedatives.

Mr. John Patten: There are no specialist services available within the National Health Service specifically for those addicted to prescribed tranquillisers or sedatives. They would normally either be treated by their general practitioner or referred for treatment under the hospital general medical and psychiatric services. A copy of a report containing guidelines for good clinical practice in the treatment of drug misuse, including guidance on the treatment of those addicted to tranquillisers or sedatives, was sent to every doctor in the country last year. All doctors should therefore now have the basic information necessary to enable them to help this group.

Prescriptions

Mr. White asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the current level of income below which a person may qualify for free prescriptions; what account is taken of dependants; whether income from any particular source or sources is disregarded; and whether he intends to increase the income limit when prescriptions are next raised.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The qualifying levels of income are based on the supplementary benefit scale rates to which is added a "tolerance margin" equal to £1·50 plus the cost of one prescription item. The levels vary with individual circumstances, including the number, age and income of dependants, any additional requirements and items of income which are disregarded in full or in part. They increase automatically when supplementary benefit is uprated or when the "tolerance margin" is raised.

When the prescription charge is increased from £1·60 to £2 on 1 April, the "tolerance margin" will automatically increase by the same amount. This will ensure that no-one currently entitled to low income exemption loses out due to the increase in the prescription charge.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of free prescriptions are dispensed for drugs which do not require a prescription to each category of persons entitled to free prescriptions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We estimate that approximately 30 per cent. of medicines and appliances prescribed and dispensed for those in the exempt groups are also available without prescription.

We do not collect prescription information in a way which would allow similar estimates to be made for each of the exempt groups.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of free prescriptions are dispensed to each category of persons entitled to free prescriptions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information available is as follows:

Percentage of all exempt items dispensed for that category

Exemption Category	percentage
Children under 16	19·3
Women 60 and over, men 65 and over	58·1
FPC Exempt	8·2
DHSS Exempt	14·0
War/Service Pensioners	0·4

Notes:
1. Figures relate to England only in 1983 and are based on sample data.
2. The category 'FPC exempt' covers those entitled to exemption on medical grounds, pregnant women and women who have had a baby within the preceding 12 months.

3. The category 'DHSS exempt' covers those entitled to exemption because they receive supplementary allowance, supplementary pension, family income supplement or housing benefit supplement and those awarded low income exemption.
4. The small proportion of exempt items where the exemption declaration does not specify an exemption category have been ignored.
5. No charge contraceptive items are not included.

Investigation (Runcorn and Widnes)

Mr. Oakes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how long his Department's fraud investigation team has been operating in the Runcorn and Widnes area; and for how long they intend to remain.

Mr. Newton: The visit of a specialist claims control team to the Department's Widnes local office started on 2 January and is planned to finish on 29 March.

Mr. Oakes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claimants have been investigated to date; and how many cases of fraud are under investigation in the current investigations taking place in the Runcorn and Widnes area.

Mr. Newton: The specialist claims control team has completed 56 investigations to date; inquiries are continuing in a number of other cases and it is expected that by the end of the exercise about 130 cases will have been examined.

Sick Pay

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will institute a search of case papers of supplementary benefit claimants in receipt of statuory sick pay back to April 1983, following the decision of the social security commissioners case CSB402/84;

(2) (a) what are the numbers of supplementary benefit claimants likely to be affected by the decision in the social security commissioner's case CSB402/84, (b) what are the estimated annual costs of applying the commissioner's decision and (c) when he anticipates that paragraphs 6564, 6583 and 6653 of the 'S' manual will be altered to take account of the decision.

Mr. Newton: I will let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the European Commission concerning the status of his limited list proposals with regard to European Community law; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Commission has invited us to submit observations on our proposals and we will be replying in due course. We are quite satisfied that our proposals comply with Community law.

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to make available on National Health Service prescription the 13 drugs which were previously available on prescription only but which under the National Health Service (General Medical and Pharmaceutical Services) Amendment Regulations 1985 would no longer be available for supply under pharmaceutical services either in generic or brand-name form; if he will explain the reasons for his original decision in respect of these 13 drugs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have been advised by our panel of independent experts that adequate alternatives exist to all the drugs which will cease to be available on NHS prescription from 1 April, whatever their licensed status. By making a selection of drugs to remain available on NHS prescription, substantial savings will be made, to be used for other services to patients in the NHS.

Patients will, if they wish, be able to obtain prescription-only medicines not available under the NHS on non-NHS prescription. But there will be no medical need for them to do so.

Board and Lodging (Barking and Dagenham)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people received board and lodgings allowances in the borough of Barking and Dagenham in the last month for which figures are available; and what was the total cost.

Mr. Newton: Separate figures are not available for Barking and Dagenham and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Blind and Partially Sighted People

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many male and how many female registered blind people are in receipt of severe disablement allowance;

(2) how many registered blind people, now receiving severe disablement allowance, were receiving non-contributory invalidity pension or housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension before the severe disablement allowance was introduced;

(3) how many registered partially sighted people, male and female, are in receipt of severe disablement allowance;

(4) how many registered partially sighted people, now receiving severe disablement allowance, were receiving non-contributory invalidity pension or housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension before the severe disablement allowance was introduced.

Mr. Newton: I regret that information is not available in the form requested.

However, the latest available figures show that, as at April 1983, some 800 men and 400 women with disorders of the eye were incapable of work and receiving non-contributory invalidity pension. It is not known how many of these were registered blind or partially sighted. All those drawing non-contributory invalidity pension immediately prior to the introduction of severe disablement allowance on 29 November 1984 were automatically transferred to the new benefit from that date. One man and 35 women who have been newly awarded severe disablement allowance since last November are shown as suffering from disorders of the eye. Of these all but one of the women have been accepted as satisfying the disablement condition on the grounds that they are registered blind or partially sighted.

Clobazam

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, if he will explain the reasons for his decision to place restrictions on the circumstances in which Clobazam may be prescribed; if he will reconsider his decision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We were advised by the Chief Medical Officer's panel of independent medical and pharmaceutical experts that Clobazam was essential for the treatment of certain types of epilepsy but not in its use solely as a tranquilliser. Other tranquillisers have similar effects for all cases other than epilepsy and are much cheaper. To make Clobazam generally available as a tranquilliser would therefore entail a substantial amount of unnecessary expenditure.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will make it his policy to refrain from issuing any administrative guidance which calls in question the right of a community health council to represent the interests of its non-resident public;

(2) if he will make it his policy to refrain from issuing any administrative guidance which calls in question the right of a community health council to raise issues with a regional health authority as a managing authority and as a planning authority;

(3) if he will make it his policy to refrain from issuing any administrative guidance which calls in question the right of a community health council to consider issues which are not the responsibility of its corresponding district health authority;

(4) if he will make it his policy to refrain from issuing any administrative guidance which calls in question the right of a community health council to concern itself with issues which extend beyond the geographical boundaries of its district.

Mr. John Patten: We have no plans to issue such guidance.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to publish the replies of district health authorities to his circular of June 1984 asking about drug abuse and their plans to counter it.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Antacids

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the comparative cost per dose of (a) Polycrol and (b) the branded antacids which remain available on National Health Service prescription; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is as follows:

Basic NHS Cost per Dose

Product	Pence
(a)
Polycrol Gel	3—6
Polycrol Tablets	1·7—3·4
Polycrol Forte Gel	3—6
Polycrol Forte Tablets	2·4—4·8
(b)
Gastrocote Tablets	4·1—12·4
Gaviscon Infant	16
Gaviscon Liquid	5·8—11·5
Gaviscon Tablets	4·8—9·5
Gelusil Suspension	2·5—10·1
Maalox Suspension	5·5—11
Mucogel Suspension	5·5—11
Mucaine	0·8—1·5

I am advised that the antacid effect varies between products and is not necessarily related to the dose on which these prices are based.

I also refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him on 14 March at columns 242-43.

Domestic Services

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what criteria he has laid down for health authorities which decide to privatise domestic services to ensure that arrangements are made to secure competitive bids from the maximum number of applicants, including in-house tenders.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have advised health authorities to ensure that tenders are sought from a sufficient number of firms and the in-house service, to provide fair and adequate competition.

Public Laboratories

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what medical bodies he intends to consult while considering his proposal to transfer the public health laboratory service's 52 regional and area laboratories to the administration of health authorities;

(2) what resources he will make available to health authorities to enable them to continue recruitment of well-trained consultants to the laboratories of the public health laboratory service and to maintain a clinical microbiological service, a public health microbiological service and co-ordination for national epidemiological work in the 52 laboratories if they are to administer them in the future;

(3) in which spheres of research the public health laboratory service and the Department of Health and Social Security are currently working jointly.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Cataract

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidelines he intends to issue to patients about the advantages and disadvantages of replacing a cataractous lens by an equivalent implant of plastic over traditional pebble spectacles.

Mr. John Patten: Clinical advice is entirely a matter for a patient's medical practitioner who would, no doubt, take account of relevant published researh and the advice of professional bodies.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the waiting list figures for 30 September 1984 will, when they are published, reflect the review which health authorities have been asked to carry out to improve their accuracy, referred to in the answer of 28 January, Official Report, column 62.

Mr. John Patten: No. The letter asking authorities to carry out the review went out in December 1984.

Ancillary Services (Contractors)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all those district health authorities with which he or his Department has had discussions or correspondence with regard to the awarding of in-house contracts for laundry, cleaning and catering services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 28 February 1985, c. 275]: We have identified the following health authorities with which our Department has had discussions or correspondence where the work has been, or might have been, awarded in-house.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Latent Damage (Report)

38. Mr. Chapman asked the Attorney-General what representations he has received from the various parts of the construction industry following the Law Reform Committee's report on latent damage, Cmnd. 9390.

The Solicitor-General: The closing date for comments on the Law Reform Committee's report is the end of March. But the Lord Chancellor's Department has already received comments from a number of sources, including the construction industry.

"MI5's Official Secrets"

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Attorney-General if the Independent Broadcasting Authority sought his advice about its competence to ban the Channel 4 programme, "MI5's Official Secrets", on grounds that this might infringe the Official Secrets Act; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: No.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Attorney-General if, subsequent to the initial decision of the Independent Broadcasting Authority to ban the showing of the programme, "MI5's Official Secrets", on Channel 4, and before his announcement that there were to be no prosecutions against the makers of this programme, he had discussions with the chairman and members of the authority about possible infringements of the Official Secrets Act.

The Attorney-General: No.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Attorney-General if he had discussions with the Independent Broadcasting Authority about possible infringements of the Official Secrets Act by the programme entitled "MI5's Official Secrets" before the authority's initial decision to ban the showing of this programme on Channel 4.

The Attorney-General: No.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Sub-Sahara Africa

39. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest famine reports from the sub-Sahara.

Mr. Raison: The situation in Africa continues to be serious, although substantial progress in the provision of food has been made. For the financial year 1985-86 we have pledged in advance a minimum bilateral allocation of £30 million for drought victims, refugees or others suffering from disaster in Africa.

46. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if United Kingdom aid in parallel to the World Bank special fund for sub-Saharan Africa will be untied.

Mr. Raison: Yes.

Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on why Her Majesty's Government will not contribute directly to the World Bank's special facility for sub-Saharan Africa.

Mr. Raison: We could only make a direct contribution to the special facility at the expense of our future bilateral aid programmes, including programmes to African countries. The Government preferred to make some of our bilateral aid available in close support of the special facility and subject to the same World Bank conditionality. This arrangement has been accepted by the World Bank as constituting "special joint financing" in support of the facility. The offers of the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan and Switzerland have been similarly designated.

Departmental Contingency Reserve

44. Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what items he had planned to spend his Department's contingency reserve for 1984-85 prior to his decision to allocate the reserve to alleviate the famine in Ethiopia and the Sudan.

Mr. Raison: The reserve existed to deal with contingencies as they arose within the financial year.

Africa (UN Conference)

45. Mr. Mark Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the United Nations Secretary-General's conference on Africa in Geneva on 11 to 12 March.

Mr. Raison: Although it was not intended as a pledging conference, considerable progress was made towards the mobilisation of resources. Precise figures will not be available until all delegations' speeches have been analysed in detail. There was a feeling overall that the conference was of real value.

Namibia

47. Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what circumstances he would be prepared to authorise the granting of loans and grants for development projects in Namibia.

Mr. Raison: Her Majesty's Government would certainly consider offering development assistance to Namibia after independence achieved in accordance with Security Council Resolution 435.

World Bank Fund for Africa

48. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the United Kingdom offer of $75 million to the World Bank fund for Africa was rejected; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The United Kingdom offer was not rejected. The World Bank's press release, at the
